Colonel T. Wood thought, with reference to the late case, that had the plan been adopted of calling together the officers of the regiment and submitting the matter to them, the result would have been different from that which it unfortunately was. He could not but remark that the discussion had turned principally upon the Army, among the Members of which the practice of Duelling was less common than with almost any class of the community. The Articles of War proposed, embodied the spirit and practice of the Army. He had frequently seen in his own connection with the Army, officers called together and consulted upon the subject of disagreements arising between them. He wished that something of the sort had been effected in the late case.

Viscount Palmerston having been alluded to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary at War thought it right to say one or two words. The gallant Officer had quoted a case in which he, when Secretary at War, had determined, that a pension should not be granted to an officer's widow, in consequence of that officer having lost his life by his own hand. The right hon. Gentleman stated that in recording that decision, he had given an opinion that the same rule should hold good as to the widow of an officer killed in a duel. He had no distinct recollection of the case alluded to; many matters had since passed through his hands which might have caused him to forget it; but as the right hon. Gentleman had stated it, he had no doubt that such was his decision. He thought that the principle upon which that decision must have been founded was the principle on which pensions were granted. Pensions were granted not on considerations connected with the widows of officers, but on considerations connected with the officers themselves. He considered a pension to be in some respects an increase of an officer's pay. It was one of the advantages given him as a reward for his services; and the knowledge that a pension would be granted to his widow, rendered it unnecessary that he should make those sacrifices, of a portion of his pay, which would be necessary to secure an annuity to his widow by other means. Therefore, he looked upon a pension as a part of those pecuniary advantages which were given to officers in return for services rendered. It, therefore, had always been usual that the claims of a widow to a pension should depend upon the services of the husband, and, as the right hon. and gallant Officer opposite had observed, there were cases in which, after very distinguished service, when the officer had lost his life in a brilliant manner in action, it had been usual to increase the amount of the widow's pension, although the loss was only the same to her whether her husband had died in action or in any other way. He thought it very likely that, in applying that principle, he should have felt it his duty to have abstained from recommending to the Crown the granting of a pension to the widow of an officer who had committed suicide, as he had deprived the army of his services by his own act, and had in no way increased by his death his claims upon his country. With respect to Duelling, this principle did not apply in the strictest and most unvariable manner. The claims of the widow depended upon the circumstances of the duel—and speaking in this case under great ignorance of detail—knowing only what he had read upon the subject in the ordinary channels of information, he should have been disposed to have come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by Government. Because, judging merely from the common sources of report, it appeared to him that Lieutenant-Colonel Fawcett was least to blame of all the parties concerned. The challenge did not come from him, but from his antagonist, who, therefore, was primâ facie the party the most to be blamed. The seconds were blameable in the next place, because, though it was painful to speak so as to im-pute censure to men who were not present to answer for themselves, yet he could not conceive that in a case like that in question, any two Gentlemen acting as seconds, and inspired with a desire to accommodate matters without having recourse to extremities, could not find means for arranging the matter. Therefore he should say, that in the view which he took of the case, Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett was least to blame, and on that ground he should have felt disposed to take a favourable view of the claims of his widow for a pension. At the same time, not knowing the nature of the facts which might have come to the knowledge of the Government in regard to the parties, he could not pronounce any decided opinion. Upon the subject of Duelling, he must say, that it appeared to him that in general the seconds were the parties who could with most difficulty shift the blame from their shoulders. Because in most quarrels one party, if not both, would be found to be in the wrong—indeed, a case could hardly be supposed in which one of the parties was not to blame; and if the principals were placed in the hands of their friends, as they should be placed, and as their friends should require them to place themselves, then if the friend of either party saw that his principal had been in the wrong, and used his own judgment, in regard to making a suitable and becoming concession, it would rarely happen that there would not be found means of adjusting the matter in dispute honourable for both parties. As to the additional Articles of War which they had heard read, he certainly felt with his hon. Friend, the Member for Finsbury, that in one respect the change which had been made was rather a relaxation of what now existed; but he must say, that if the Articles of War, as they at present stood, had been strictly enforced, there would have been no necessity for greater stringency; and if the new Articles were not to be enforced more strictly than the old ones had been, he was afraid that the best disposition on behalf of the public and of the House to put down the system of Duelling would be ineffectual. He agreed that they could not expect the Army to stand in this matter on a different footing from the community at large; and any expectations that, so long as Duelling could find favour or protection with the community at large, it could be effectually put an end to in the Army, must infallibly be disappointed. The Army would keep pace with the rest of the community in the abandonment of this practice, but could not be required to do more. But if it wasto be held that, in all cases in which an officer lost his life in a duel, a pension was to be withheld from his widow, he agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir C. Napier), that such rule should be made publicly and generally known. However, if discretion was to be used, and if the decision was to depend upon the circumstances of the case, he should hope that, however firmly the right hon. and gallant General the Secretary at War had at present made up his mind, this case might still remain open for consideration; and if it should be found that Lieutenant Colonel Fawcett had not been the most to blame in the transaction, and if Mrs. Fawcett, were not by the amount of her own independent income excluded from the pension by the standing regulations of the service, then he hoped that the melancholy fate of her husband would not be an insurmountable bar to prevent a pension from being granted to her.

Sir Robert Peel wished to take this opportunity of stating the ground on which after hearing of the Resolution of his right hon. Friend the Secretary at War—he had cordially approved of that Resolution. In the course of last Session, after the public mind had been strongly excited by this unfortunate duel, he was called on to state whether, during the recess, Government would take into their consideration any means for discouraging the practice of Duelling. He then stated that Government were prepared to take the subject into consideration, although not to bring forward any definite measure with respect to it. In accordance with this pledge the matter was taken into consideration. A few nights ago an hon. Gentleman opposite had put a question to him upon the subject. He then thought it right to state the course which the military authorities had taken with reference to the late unfortunate duel. He approved of that course, on the ground that he understood the general rule of the War Office to be, that the claim of the widow of a deceased officer to a pension was not admitted as an absolute right—that the admission of such a claim was to depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. He understood the rule to be, that in cases of suicide, the claim for a pension of the widow would not be good. He did not, however, understand, and he did not think there should be an absolute rule, that in cases of death in consequence of Duelling the pension should be irredeemably lost. He understood the general principle to be, that in such cases the particular circumstances attending each should be taken into account. So far as the widow was concerned, it was impossible to deny that the application of the rule might be attended with individual hardship; but the hardship would, at least, press as heavily on the widow in cases of suicide as in cases of death by Duelling. If they looked to the position of the widow, it was easy to believe that her condition, upon losing her husband by his own hand, might be as deserving of sympathy as the cases in which the death of the husband had been produced by Duelling. The rule was laid down, not so much on considerations respecting the widow, as with a view to deter others from following the example of her husband. The case then arose as to whether the widow of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Fawcett was entitled to receive a pension. In former cases of the sort, the granting or withholding of the pension had been regulated by the particular circumstances of each case. He was loth to enter into the consideration of the circumstances of the present case, and he hoped that he had said nothing derogatory to the memory of Lieutenant-Colonel Fawcett, or harsh towards Lieutenant Munro. What were the circumstances of the case? Colonel Fawcett was the brother-in-law of Lieutenant Munro. True, he had a second; but that second was an extremely young man, of far inferior rank to Colonel Fawcett, and therefore not likely to exercise that influence over his principal which every second ought to command. There, then, was the case of a distinguished officer, who it could not be denied was the party to offer the offence, and that under the most aggravating circumstances, turning his brother-in-law out of the room—turning Lieutenant Munro, he believed down stairs in the presence of a servant. He was very sorry to enter at all into those details. He must say that he had a very strong impression that no duel was necessary in this case; and that the only potent offence being the turning down stairs in the manner he had stated, Colonel Fawcett might have said—"I acted hastily in turning you down stairs, and for the language at which you justly took offence, I tender an apology." That was his impression; and the rule being such as his right hon. and gallant Friend had stated, he thought his right hon. Friend was perfectly justified in refusing his widow a pension. He thought if it had been given, his right hon. Friend would have acted on a principle different from that adopted in previous cases, and would in effect have announced to officers, "no reference shall be had to special circumstances; and, however aggravating, you may rely on it your widows shall be entitled to pensions." These were the grounds on which he thought himself justified in performing the painful duty of withholding this pension. With respect to Lieutenant Munro, he had no knowledge of the circumstances which the hon. Member for Finsbury had referred to. Lieutenant Munro was not superseded. Being charged with an offence cognizable by the law of the land, no immediate step was taken with regard to him, though he was absent without leave. It was felt that there was some justification for his having so absented himself, on the ground that, with the prejudices then existing, he could not well come before a jury; but it was distinctly stated to him that when that public prejudice had subsided, he must submit his case to examination before a jury. He declined to do so: two Sessions passed, and being absent without leave, he thought his noble Friend, the Commander-in-Chief, fully justified in superseding Lieutenant Munro. As to the additional Article of War, he must observe there was a general impression that if an officer refused to fight, he subjected himself to dismissal by court-martial. The public declaration on the part of Her Majesty must effectually remove that impression. [The right hon. Baronet then read the additional article, which we have given above]. This was a decisive declaration of opinion that officers were exempt from blame or disgrace who refused an appeal to arms; and the terms were so explicit, that he thought it would tend much to discourage the practice of Duelling.

Mr. Bernal regretted that the supposed circumstances of this case were canvassed in the House. It was true that the seconds had no high rank, and were not of mature years; yet, in the absence of all proof, it was hard to judge, or to throw on the heads of these young men an additional share of public odium. He thought there should be a positive, distinct announcement that no widow of an officer who fell in a duel should receive a pension, if the object of the Government was to put down Duelling. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said, that there should be an inquiry into the particular merits and circumstances of each case. What were the particular circumstances of the present case? He knew little more of them than what he saw in the newspapers. The hon. Member for Finsbury had told them that when Lieutenant Munro submitted his case to his superior officers, they told him that the circumstances were so gross that he must go out. But the offence, as far as the world knew, was simply that Colonel Fawcett had turned Lieutenant Munro out of doors. Why, if the facts were so gross that there was in the opinion of those officers but one, and that the extreme remedy, must there not be something concealed from public view much worse than anything that had been stated? Would it be believed, that Colonel Fawcett would have refused to hear his relative speak, would have said, 'I will hear nothing about the Brighton houses; I will not hear a sentence from you about my property,'—if there had been no other cause of dissension than that which was stated in the public prints? Now, these hints which had been thrown out that evening put the case in a different point of view. The hon. Member for Finsbury had said, that Lieutenant Grant, the second, had declared upon the field, "I can do nothing; after the manner in which we have been treated, I can do nothing." Yet, knowing so little of the real facts as they appeared to know, they sat there, as it were, a Pseudo Court of Justice, to try the merits of the case: one hon. Member passing an opinion upon one part of the transaction, and another upon another, but few really possessing a fair opportunity of judging. He was not aware of the state of Mrs. Fawcett's circumstances; all he knew was, that her husband had received the honour of a Commander of the Bath for his distinguished services in China, and that, putting aside this unfortunate occurrence, she would have been entitled to a pension. As to Lieutenant Munro, he had always heard him spoken of as a gentlemanly sort of man, who had attained the rank of Adjutant in the Blues—an officer to whom it was well known the men looked up more than to all other officers, and that he had a character to lose. Under those circumstances he should hope that his right hon. Friend would think it consistent with the execution of the important duties he had to discharge to look a little more into this case. With respect to the new regulations which were proposed to be promulgated in Her Majesty's service, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, that little good would result from them. It was a mistake to say that there was an impression in the Army that officers would be dismissed for not fighting a duel; but they knew that not responding to a challenge, and being therefore sent to Coventry, was a great deal worse than being cashiered. As to Lieutenant Munro's not submitting to be tried by the proper legal tribunals, such was the feeling in the country at that time that he could not be surprised at his evading it.

Viscount Howick thought the result of this debate showed either that the pension should be granted to the widow of Colonel Fawcett, or that more should be done by Government towards suppressing the practice of Duelling. There was none who would not most deeply regret that the sorrows of that lady might possibly be added to by straitened circumstances. He could see no justifiable ground upon which her pension was refused, except that such a measure, severe and painful as it was, might have the effect in future of putting a stop to Duelling. But if they were to allow Duelling to go on hereafter, as it had done heretofore, he asked the House and the country what they gained by denying to this unfortunate lady, what, by her husband's death under ordinary circumstances, she would have been entitled to? Let the House, however, consider whether the course taken by the Government, and the debate of that evening, were calculated to check Duelling? What had been the tone of this discussion; had it been to reprobate Duelling as a general practice? Or had it not been to blame a particular duel, and to say, that this was a case in which the frightful alternative was unnecessary, and in which both seconds and principals were to blame for resorting to it? What had the right hon. and gallant Officer told them? That this pension was withheld on the grounds of the particular circumstances. They were not then indiscriminately to lay down a rule for all officers who fell in a duel, but the circumstances of their death were to be considered. Those were to bar the claims of widows to a pension, but in particular cases they were not to interfere. What, then, were the circumstances of this case? The right hon. and gallant Officer had the other night read an Article of War by which Duelling was strictly prohibited, and he took credit to the Government for their determination to enforce that Article of War. But he did not perceive that the moment he said special circumstances were to be the ground upon which a pension was to be refused, that in a case where there were not those special circumstances, and the party was supposed to be in the right, a duel was the proper course, and the widow was to have a pension? Did he not see that by laying down that principle he gave a sanction to Duelling, because he compelled the Government, the War Office, and the military authorities to sit in judgment upon such particular case? He, for one, believed Duelling to be a most unchristian and barbarous practice. But the right hon. and gallant Officer had read certain new Articles of War which he meant to propose with Her Majesty's sanction: in fact, he stated that Her Majesty had already signified her approbation of those Articles, and that as soon as the Mutiny Act was passed those Articles would be brought forward. Now what was the result of those new Articles? Why with regard to officers on full pay, they were, in reference to duelling, as the hon. Member for Finsbury had stated, a positive relaxation of the severity of the existing Articles. But with respect to an officer on full pay who had a quarrel with an officer on half-pay, or a civilian, they were not meant to apply. The right hon. and gallant Officer said he could not consent to deprive an officer of the army of the privilege—[Sir H. Hardinge: I did not say privilege.] Well, not privilege, but the power of defending himself against an insult the same as the other subjects of Her Majesty. But he conceived that that argument amounted to a direct sanction on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, to an officer on full pay fighting a duel when insulted by a civilian or an officer on half-pay, against whom he could have no redress under the Articles of War. But what was the distinction between an officer on full pay and another with respect to the immorality of the offence? As to officers in a regiment, it might interfere with military discipline, and there might be strong military objections to it. But in this case that objection did not apply; for though it was true that both were on full pay, they were not serving together. So far as this quarrel was concerned it was the same thing as a quarrel between officers on half-pay or between civilians, though technically within the jurisdiction of a court-martial. Well, then, he wished to know, if the right hon. and gallant Officer admitted that officers on half-pay who were insulted might properly avail themselves of this mode of protection, with what consistency did he in this case make the duel fought by Colonel Fawcett a bar to his widow obtaining her pension? The right hon. and gallant Officer, by his own showing admitted that a half-pay officer who was insulted by a civilian was not called upon to abstain from fighting a duel.

Sir H. Hardinge: I am sorry to be obliged to interrupt the noble Lord. I said this Article did not apply to those who were not amenable to court-martial. If an officer on full pay were grievously insulted in the streets by one on half-pay or a civilian, I said the proposed Article did not apply; for it would aggravate the evil we intended to put down if we thus placed officers on an unequal footing with their fellow-subjects. I thought it right to tell the whole truth, and say this Article would have no such effect. It was chiefly intended for the purpose of keeping up military discipline; and when applied to men holding high station, and actively pursuing their duties, I am in hopes it will gradually have the effect of suppressing this practice.

Viscount Howick: What the right hon. and gallant Officer now said, bore out his argument which was this:—let them refuse Mrs. Fawcett her pension if they meant to put down Duelling but not without; for the right hon. and gallant Officer said that an officer on half-pay could not be expected to abstain from fighting a duel if insulted. [“No, No.”] What else was the meaning of what the right hon. and gallant Officer said? By his own showing he was not prepared to put down Duelling, for this new Article of War was solely directed to the case of an officer on full pay, and left the case of an officer on half-pay as it now stood. But how could they expect duelling to cease in the army if they kept up the practice in civil life? He agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that it was greatly to the credit of the army, that whilst the practice was sanctioned it was of such rare occurrence that they were now looking to a much wider question—to an evil not confined to officers in the Army, but extending also to civil life. He asked the House, then, once more to consider what was the advantage they proposed to gain by refusing this pension, unless it would have the effect of discouraging the practice generally? If no further useful or beneficial object were to be gained by such refusal, it would be a gratuitous act of hardship towards Mrs. Fawcett; but if such object were to be produced by it, individual hardship ought not to interfere.

Lord C. Fitzroy said, that with reference to the late unfortunate duel, one thing very much struck him as to Colonel Fawcett's conduct, and that was that it was not clear he had ever fired at his opponent. He never could understand why officers were held up as a pugnacious part of the community, and considering their profession he thought they did not deserve that character. He regretted that there seemed little prospect that the present debate would elicit from Her Majesty's Government the expression of a firm resolution to suppress the practice of Duelling. At present a most anomalous state of things existed; for the military authorities might bring officers to trial by Court-martial if they refused to fight a duel, and if they did fight, they ran the risk of being superseded; or, if they fell in the encounter, of pensions being refused to their widows or relatives.

Mr. W. Cowper regretted that so much of the present discussion had been conducted in what might be supposed to be a tone of indirect sanction of Duelling; and also that so much attention had been turned towards the peculiar circumstances of the duel which had proved fatal to Colonel Fawcett, as if the disapprobation of the House were to depend upon the manner in which the several steps of that affair had been carried on. The hon. Member for Finsbury had broadly stated that he considered no blame attached to Lieutenant Munro, while the hon. and gallant Member for Marylebone seemed to think that there was no harm in anybody fighting a duel, provided he did not go out with a first cousin or a near relative. He regarded Duelling as a crime condemned alike by the laws of God and of man, and he conceived that it was not justifiable under any circumstances whatever. The hon. Member for Weymouth (Mr. Bernal) had said that he doubted whether any individual would, upon the ground of religious scruples, refuse to fight a duel. He felt bound to say, and he did it without hesitation, that he, for one, would give such a refusal; and he also begged to inform that hon. Member that there were many officers of high reputation, both in the Army and Navy, who had on many occasions, exhibited their personal courage in the most indubitable manner, who had enrolled themselves in an Association for the suppression of Duelling, and who had thereby virtually pledged themselves not to engage in such transactions. He believed that the tide of public opinion in this country, was now setting in against the practice of Duelling; and he hoped that on a future occasion, when opportunity should be afforded for the purpose, a strong expression of this opinion would be made in that House: he hoped that an impression would not go forth to the public, from what had taken place to-night, that any feeling existed in that House in favour of continuing the practice of Duelling. There appeared to him to be two points that were new in the regulations which had been read to-night by the right hon. Secretary at War. One was that of taking into consideration the various degrees of culpability on the part of the seconds, with a view to their being punished with more or less severity; and the other related to the reference of disputes between officers to the commanding officers of regiments. He was glad that the latter regulation had been adopted, for he conceived that it was a step in the right direction. He wished, however, that power should be given to commanding officers to make inquiry into cases, and to summon courts-martial or courts of inquiry, for the purpose of examining the peculiar circumstances of the dispute, and dictating the apology which might be due from one or both parties. There were precedents for such a course. He found it stated in Mr. Samuel's History of the Army, that two disputes had been so settled by the Horse-Guards in the reign of George III. One case occurred in 1773, in a dispute between Lieutenant General Murray and Sir W. Draper; the other related to certain differences which arose out of the trial of Major Browne, of 67th Regiment. On these occasions His Majesty constituted the courts-martial of their respective regiments, into courts of honour for investigating the affair, with power to inquire into the grounds of quarrel, enjoining submission to their sentence, and exacting from all parties a pledge of honour to observe it. Much more would be done by the general measure of establishing Courts of Inquiry than by withdrawing the pension from any solitary and innocent victim of this unfortunate practice. Many modes could be pointed out by which an effectual substitute for duelling could be found. The subject was one well worthy of the care and attention of Her Majesty's Government. If they would but proceed still further in the direction in which they had entered, he was sure they would be supported by public opinion, and would gain much more credit than by taking the step they had done in reference to the late unhappy case.

Sir R. H. Inglis must express the cordial approval and pleasure with which he had listened to the declaration of the gallant officer who had just spoken—a declaration honourable to the gallant officer from the moral courage which dictated it, and requiring much higher courage than would be needed for accepting a challenge. He did not pretend to enter into the immediate subject before the House, but he could not resist taking occasion to call on the Government to consider whether they might not exercise a sounder discretion in discountenancing the practice generally than had been exercised in the course of these proceedings. It might not be in the knowledge of every Member of the House, but he knew it was in the knowledge of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had addressed them—it was in reference to the professional as well as to the personal character of the hon. Gentleman, that he had taken the liberty of paying him his humble tribute—and it was also in the knowledge of his noble Friend behind him, that an Association had been some time ago formed for the discouragement of Duelling. That Association did not ask for legislation generally on the subject, they asked only for such discouragement to be shown by the fountain of honour, as would best have shown the feeling of the authorities on this point, and they asked it only in terms, he would venture to say, the most respectful and at the same time earnest. They asked that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to take into consideration the evils arising from the sin, and he would say crime, of Duelling. This Association numbered among its body members on both sides of the House; there were the noble Member for Chester, and the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, and others; it was impossible to conceive any society, or question, more free from party pollution or taint, or more devoid of anything like a suspicion of political motive on the part of any of the Members. They had been received with personal courtesy, indeed, by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, when a deputation waited upon him; but he must complain of the written answer which, at a later period, the right hon. Gentleman had returned to their memorial. If they had been a body of Chartists, asking for the five points of the Charter, or of Leaguers, asking for a Repeal of the Corn-laws, their memorial could not have received a less satisfactory—he might be permitted to say, a less courteous answer. It was simply this: “I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the memorial to be presented to Her Majesty from your Lordship, and I have to acquaint you that I have laid the same before Her Majesty.” His right hon. Friend might have reflected that the memorial came from a society composed of his supporters as well as his opponents—from officers both of the Army and Navy, and he might have given them a better answer. By so doing, his right hon. Friend would not have violated the rules of official propriety, and would have satisfied the wishes of many of his Friends. He repeated that he did not complain of any want of personal courtesy; but his right hon. Friend would have thrown discouragement on the practice even if he had stated no more than this, namely, that Her Majesty had taken the subject into consideration, and that she appreciated the purity of the motives of those from whom the memorial came. Thus a practice most hateful to God, and condemned by the laws of the country, would have been discouraged.

Mr. W. O. Stanley did not think, that the public would be satisfied with the mere declaration which had been made to-night on the part of the Government. What did the Government propose to do? Not to enact new and stringent laws for the suppression of Duelling, but merely to amend the old laws contained in the Articles of War. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had referred to one of the Articles which had been read to-night, as if it was a new regulation,—the Article which declared that Officers who refused a challenge were acquitted of all disgrace or disadvantage which might arise from such refusal—but that was in substance an old law. He did not consider this a sufficient regulation; for his conviction was, that, both as regarded the military and civilians, the Government should adopt firm and determined measures to suppress the practice of Duelling. The House would not be satisfied with a mere declaration on this subject, even from a law officer of the Crown; and he hoped the Government would be called upon to express their strong and decided disapproval of the majesty of the law having been outraged in the very presence of the Judges. There was one point in the case which had been brought specially under the notice of the House, which he thought deserved the consideration of the authorities at the Horse-Guards. He alluded to the assertion that, during the day which elapsed between the challenge being given and accepted in the case of Colonel Fawcett, the challenger and his second consulted five General Officers in the Army; and he asked the right hon. Baronet whether it was not known that the officer to whom he alluded consulted several Officers of high rank in his own regiment? [An hon. Member—“I hope not.”] It had been contended, as essential to the welfare of the Army, that Officers should not shrink from fighting duels; but, for his own part, he believed that the honour and discipline of the Army might be fully and efficiently maintained if such a practice were suppressed. He hoped that some alteration would be made in the amended Articles of War to release Officers from their liability to be tried by court-martial if they refused to fight a duel, and that it would be made imperative upon all Commanding Officers, or Officers invested with supreme authority, to bring to trial by court-martial, all Officers who fought or engaged in duels. He did not, however, wish that Officers who were guilty of such offences should be cashiered, if there were circumstances which extenuated their conduct.

Mr. Turner exceedingly regretted the answer which had been given to the questions he had put to the right hon. Baronet on the subject of Duelling. Government having refused to take any further steps on the subject, he should be under the necessity of bringing the question forward in the best manner he could on Thursday next. The hon. and gallant Member for Weymouth had said, that the Motion he (Mr. Turner) meant to make would be of no service; but he thought that what had occurred that night had arisen chiefly from the notice he had put upon the Paper of the House. He felt very grateful for what had been already done to discountenance the practice, of which such general disapprobation had been expressed, and he was quite sure that, sooner or later, whatever might be the fate of his Resolution, Her Majesty's Government would be obliged to bring in a Bill for the entire suppression of the practice which all allowed to be unjustifiable.

Lord R. Grosvenor said, that the House would clearly be aware, from the allusions of the hon. Baronet opposite, of the opinions he entertained on the subject; but though, in his own case, he would admit of no compromise, he was willing to make great allowances for other persons. He felt that this was a most difficult question to deal with: and he was grateful to Her Majesty's Government for having taken up the subject, and for having gone so far as they had done. The House must feel that it would be impossible to apply a system of Legislation with reference to Duelling to the Army and Navy, unless they also legislated on the same question with regard to other classes of Her Majesty's subjects. He felt especially thankful to Her Majesty for having graciously permitted her name to be used for the discouragement of the practice of Duelling. He was sure after what had been said, more would be done on the subject. He trusted that those who felt with himself would afford some time for the matter to be settled. The habit and practice of Duelling was too deeply rooted to be destroyed in a moment. Any hurried legislation on the subject would only aggravate the evil. He would take another opportunity of stating to the House more fully his views on the subject.

Mr. Brotherton said, the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford had justly said, that the practice of Duelling was contrary to the word of God and opposed to the spirit of Christianity; and yet it was strange that Duelling was confined principally to the upper classes, those classes which were said to be the most civilized of mankind. He had no hesitation in stating that he would refuse to fight a duel, although he must confess that it did not require as much courage on his part to make such an avowal as it did on the part of the hon. and Member for Hertford, who had that night addressed the House. They could not make Christians by Acts of Parliament. There must be in existence first the principle of Christianity to influence the mind; if that influenced the mind, then the same spirit which discouraged Duelling would also discountenance all war. When the House was asked to pass a Vote of Thanks to the Army for distinguished services, then they saw the spirit which influenced military men. The man who killed one of his fellow-creatures was called a murderer, whilst he who caused the death of hundreds was called a hero. How great the inconsistency! Let it be considered disgraceful either to carry or send a challenge—let it be pronounced inconsistent with the character of a Christian and a Gentleman to do so. Let the House openly express its abhorrence of the practice. Were they to do so, he felt satisfied it would be followed by a good result.

Motion withdrawn.

Resolution agreed to.

IONIAN ISLANDS — EXPLANATION.]

Lord Stanley took the opportunity of explaining, with respect to the discourtesy with which the hon. and gallant Member for Liverpool supposed himself to have been treated by the Government in relation to his suggestion of a diminution of the amount of the contribution levied from the inhabitants of the Ionian Islands, that there had been no intension of showing any discourtesy to his hon. and gallant Friend. The fact was, that a diminution of the amount levied from the Ionians for the purpose of military contribution had been recommended by the several Lord High Commissioners, of whom the hon. and gallant Officer was the first; and within the last fortnight the Treasury had actually come to the determination of diminishing the sum. It was not the practice, however, to communicate resolutions of this kind to any parties in this country before they were promulgated in the Colonies. The communication of the Treasury Minute on the subject to the Ionian Islands had yet been barely made, and under these circumstances, he had not made the hon. and gallant Officer acquainted with the decision come to, which was taken very much in consequence of the representations made by his hon. and gallant Friend on various occasions. He trusted the gallant Officer would be satisfied that no discourtesy was meant in not making him acquainted with the result.

Sir-H. Douglas was perfectly satisfied with the noble Lord's explanation, and wished to know if he would have any objection to state the description and extent of the intended abatement?

Lord Stanley said, he would lay on the Table of the House the Minute of Treasury referred to. The principle on which it had been made was, that the reduction should be proportioned to the decline in the revenue of the Islands, which had considerably fallen off in the last two or three years. Their contribution was proportioned to the amount of revenue raised from them.

CONVEYANCES — ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGYMEN.] Mr. O'Connell rose pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a Bill relating to Roman Catholic Charities, and the tenure of land for Catholic worship in Ireland. He wished to have it most distinctly understood, that in offering this Bill to the notice of the House, he had not the slightest intention to impede or embarrass Her Majesty's Ministers in whatever measures they might have in contemplation to introduce respecting Ireland, and which were alluded to in the Queen's Speech. On the contrary, he thought the Bill he meant to propose would facilitate measures coming from the Government. He should also add, that he did not conceive any person whomsoever would be pledged to support this Bill in a future stage by the fact of his being permitted to lay it on the Table. His object was one of peculiar importance. He wished to obviate the great expense necessarily incurred upon going into a Court of Equity to establish the right to any bequest left by Roman Catholics for Roman Catholic purposes. The expense was ruinous to the parties concerned, and often absorbed the amount of the charity itself. He wished it to be clearly understood that he did not ask for the slightest extension of legal authority to apply to Roman Catholic purposes in Ireland any sums of money, bequests of money, and grants of land. The Statute of Charitable Uses was never enacted in Ireland, never in force there, and the Courts of Equity had at all times executed the trusts, and carried into effect charitable aids for Roman Catholic purposes; so much so, that several years ago a final decree of the Court of Chancery in Ireland applied a sum of 25,000*l.* to the purpose of saying masses for the repose of a soul. There was, therefore, at the present moment, a complete and unlimited capacity by deed and will, of bequeathing not only personal but landed property for Roman Catholic purposes. One great inconvenience, however, arose from the want of a settled residence and glebe for the Roman Catholic Clergy, who were frequently placed in a most distressing position in that respect. They were often very much in the power of their parishioners for the want of a permanent place of residence independent of their contributions. His object by this Bill was simply to give to Roman Catholic Archbishops, Bishops, and parish priests in Ireland a power of succession as in the case of a corporation, but not making them a corporation for other purposes than that of taking and conveying grants. That was the whole object of his Bill, to give a succession, a permanent title to deeds required for Roman Catholic purposes. He was not applying for public money, he was not applying for any contribution of any sort from the State or from the public funds. All they wished was, to obtain in a safe, secure, and inexpensive mode, those endowments which were essential to the respectability of the Catholic Clergy, and to secure them against any undue influence that might be exercised upon them. Having made this short statement, he did not feel warranted in trespassing longer upon the House, but would conclude by moving for leave to bring in a Bill to enable Roman Catholic Archbishops, Bishops, and Priests in Ireland to take grants and conveyances of land to them, and to their successors, without the intervention of trustees.

Leave given.

Bill brought in and read a first time.

House adjourned at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 12, 1844.

MINUTES.] BILLA. Private.—1st. Rodbard's Name.
Reported.—Schuster's Naturalization.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By the Duke of Richmond, from Whitwell, and by the Earl of Rosebery, from Linlithgow, for Protection to Agriculture.—By the Bishop of Bangor, from Tindaethwy, and 3 other places, and by the Bishop of London, from Stottesdon, and 4 places, against the Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—From Dissenting Congregations of Dublin, for Extending the Provisions of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill to Ireland.

PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.] The Earl of Rosebery said, he held in his hand a Petition for the Protection of Agriculture, which emanated at a county meeting at Linlithgow, that he, as Lord Lieutenant of that county, had convened, he having received a requisition signed by some of the most influential gentlemen, freeholders, and farmers, requesting him to call the meeting. There was not much speaking, he believed, when the Petition was proposed, but he was bound to say, that he believed it conveyed the sense of the majority of persons engaged in agriculture in that county, and it was in favour of the present Corn Laws. Although he did not concur in the sentiments of the Petition, still he felt bound to present it, as it had been entrusted to him with that view. The Petition was signed by a most respectable body of persons.

The Duke of Richmond said, that his noble Friend had remarked that there was no discussion at the meeting, and he (the Duke of Richmond) begged to ask why there should be? The Corn-Law question was not a new one, and it was not therefore necessary that it should be argued. The farmers had been charged by the Anti-Corn-Law League with being indifferent to the question, or with being friendly to a repeal of the Corn Laws, and they felt anxious to get rid of the disgrace of such an imputation. They determined upon showing the Anti-Corn-Law League that this was the case, by having meetings in all parts of the country, and petitioning Parliament. The farmers, however, were not averse to discussion, and in different places they fairly beat their opponents out of the field. He believed that the same result would follow in nearly all the counties of England if they had fair play. The landowners and farmers only desired to show that they were favourable to just protection, and that they were opposed to schemes that must end in the ruin of themselves, and of the labourers who were under their protection. He was glad to hear the noble Earl admit, that though he did not approve of the sentiments of the Petition, it nevertheless spoke the opinion of the great majority of the landowners and farmers of Linlithgowshire.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.] Lord Campbell having asked the Lord Chancellor respecting the progress of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, said, the next question he would ask related to a subject of very great importance. Individuals could not administer, so far as personal property was concerned, till probate was granted, which must be granted by the Ecclesiastical Court; and, under the present system, a great deal of hardship was experienced. For example, if a testator died worth 100,000*l.* in one diocese, a single probate was sufficient for that; but, if he had property to the amount of 10*l.* or 12*l.*, in another diocese, there must be probate granted with reference to that property. Now, he found in his noble and learned Friend's Bill nothing to remedy this inconvenience. It was, however, of the highest importance that some remedy should be devised to remove this inconvenience with respect to the passing of personal property. What he wished his noble and learned Friend, therefore, to explain to him was, what he intended to do in reference to those cases to which he had adverted? His noble Friend's Bill cured the evil retrospectively, by some very proper clauses, providing that all probates hitherto granted should be valid; but prospectively, he wished to know whether it was intended that hereafter, if probate were taken out bond fide, in any Diocesan Court respecting the bona notabilia of a testator, if it happened that of these bona notabilia to the amount of 5*l.* lay in another diocese, another probate should be taken out in the Court of that diocese?

The Lord Chancellor said, this was quite a voluntary proceeding on the part of his noble and learned Friend. The Bill was on the Table of the House, and no one was more able than his noble and learned Friend of reading and construing an Act of Parliament, and he was sure he had, with his wonted industry, read the Bill, and must then be able to answer himself. It was, as his noble and learned Friend observed, a most important measure; and he would take upon himself to say, had not been introduced until after grave consideration. Several successive Administrations had endeavoured to carry a measure of this kind and had failed. This Bill had been framed with great care and attention to the interests of different parties. It had been framed to pass. But if what his noble and learned Friend wished to do was adopted, he was afraid that the Bill would not pass at all. He admitted the existence of the inconvenience which his noble and learned Friend had pointed out, but he was quite sure that if what his noble and learned Friend proposed were adopted, the fate of the Bill would be similar to that of former attempts on the same subject. If his noble and learned Friend would suffer the Bill to pass, he might afterwards introduce another Bill for the purpose of extending it.

Lord Campbell said, he and others more competent than himself, had read the Bill, without being able to form a precise opinion as to the intention of his noble and learned Friend on the point adverted to, therefore he wished for information as to the intention of his noble and learned Friend. He now learned, that the law, as it stood, was to remain unaltered. He regretted it extremely. He knew that his noble and learned Friend might carry almost any Bill he pleased. But when this Bill was passed, he would probably be told that the time was gone by for the introduction of another.

Lord Brougham agreed that this was an important drawback upon a very important measure. The Bill had originated with himself in 1831, and he was sure, if his noble Friend who had spoken last was aware of the infinite difficulty of carrying any Bill at all on the subject, he would feel that they must be content with what they could get. He first brought it in as one Bill, then as two, then as six, then as two again, and then again as one, and when he went out of office it was reduced to its original state of unity, and it was the different interests—local interests—that created the difficulty, only exceeded by the extreme difficulty in passing the most useful and important alteration in the law that perhaps had ever been proposed—one in which he and all their Lordships, and all who possessed landed property in the country, had an interest—a General Registry Bill. That measure was defeated by precisely the same interest which defeated the Ecclesiastical Courts

Bill—that important body, and as the Americans would call them—influential body of men, the practitioners in the Courts, who were too strong for its supporters. As Cromwell said, "The sons of Zeruiah were too strong for them." The Measure was defeated, whether in the shape of one, two, or six Bills, and therefore he agreed with his noble Friend on the Woolsack. He was glad to receive the great good which was contained in this Bill, and hoped that when it was passed a more perfect Measure would be introduced afterwards.

BUILDINGS' REGULATIONS BILL.]
The Marquess of Normanby said, he observed that a Bill had been introduced into the other House for the better Regulation of new Buildings. That Bill was entirely confined to the metropolitan districts, to which he believed it to be less applicable than to other crowded cities and towns; and he thought the restricting it to the metropolis would increase the evil, because those speculators who should desire to run up buildings in contravention of prospective enactments would be warned by the Bill of what they might do, and what if the Bill were extended to other towns, they would be precluded from doing. He thought a little effort on the part of the Government might make the Bill applicable to other parts. If the Government wished to remedy the great evil that existed in the metropolis they would proceed with a Drainage Bill. There was one part of the Bill which would be of great use both in the metropolis and elsewhere, namely, the prohibition—except under certain regulations—against living in cellars, but this was still more wanted in other parts of the country. He wished, therefore, to ask whether it was not possible to extend the provisions of the Bill to other towns?—and he would put another question, upon which, if his noble Friend was not at present prepared to answer him, he would probably give him the information he desired at a future time. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships, that works had been undertaken for the construction of a park, called Victoria Park, which would tend to promote the health and comfort of those classes of the residents in the metropolis who were in a great measure shut out from the reach of those outlets for free air which were situate at the west end of the town. He wished to know what progress had been made in the Victoria Park, and why the progress of the works had been, if they were, suspended?

The Duke of Buccleuch said, he was not prepared at present to answer the last question put by the noble Marquess, but he would inform himself upon the subject. With regard to the Metropolitan Buildings Bill, it had been under consideration since 1841, and it had not been found since then that the number of houses run up, with a view to avoid prospective enactments, was so great as to create any very considerable evil. With regard to the principal towns, there were in some of them local Acts to regulate Buildings, and it would require great care to frame any measure which would affect them. It was desired that the present Bill should pass as it was, and when its true meaning and intention were understood, it would be in the power of the municipalities in large towns to consider whether its enactments were applicable to their districts. He was not disposed at present to recommend the extension of the Measure, because there was a prospect next Session of introducing a really effective measure, and that would occasion small expense to the country.

The Marquess of Normanby put it to the Government whether it would not be desirable to extend the provisions of that part of the Bill which referred to cellars now actually occupied to the suburbs of the metropolis, and other parts of the country. The parties occupying them were charged enormous rents, which they were obliged to pay, in order that they might reside in the district where their occupation called them.

The Marquess of Salisbury admitted the evil of having persons huddled together, but did not think the suggestion of the noble Marquess would diminish the expense to those parties, as they would have to pay still higher rents for new abodes.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.] Lord Monteagle said, the observations he was about to make were not observations recommending a new establishment or an additional collegiate foundation for the education of the Roman Catholic Clergy of Ireland. This was a question on which they were not called for the first time to argue upon, and therefore he should have less reluctance in expressing his opinions upon the matter. Their Lordships found the Roman Catholic Collegiate Establishment in that country neither unrecognized nor unsupported by the public; it was not an institution of the day; they found it established, and he doubted very much whether, in either House of Parliament, except amongst some clerical individuals, there was one individual—at least among those connected with the Administration of the country—who was prepared to abandon or destroy the existing Establishment. He would refer to the high authority of Mr. Spencer Perceval, a strong Protestant, and one not inclined to be favourable to the Roman Catholic religion, and yet no man stated more strongly than he did the obligation contracted at the Union to maintain an endowment for the Roman Catholic Clergy of Ireland. He (Mr. Perceval) stated in the strongest language that this Vote was connected with the contract of the Union itself. His (Lord Monteagle's) object in pressing this view of the subject was, to prove to noble Lords that they should bear in mind that he was not now arguing for the establishment of a Roman Catholic endowment in Ireland, but, having found that Institution in activity, he wished to impress upon the House and the Government the present condition and nature of the Establishment. He would ask them to inquire whether Maynooth was not an Establishment of great public interest; he would ask them to consider the object for which it was instituted, and then to decide if it were expedient that this college should be allowed to remain in its present state? He should say but very few words with regard to the state of education of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland before the foundation of Maynooth in 1795. By a series of statutes the Irish Government had first prohibited the domestic education of the Roman Catholics both lay and clerical; and when candidates for orders were consequently obliged to be sent to other countries, the Legislature again and barbarously interposed, rendering foreign education penal likewise. Thus many serious evils were produced, for which the Irish Government was responsible. As the result of such Acts of Parliament, foreign countries were made attentive to the many advantages which this unnatural state of things held out to them; and as appeared from Papers laid before the House, a provision for the education of nearly 500 Roman Catholic

Ecclesiastics was made prior to 1795 in various foreign countries throughout Europe. Those Papers had been laid before Parliament when the noble Duke opposite was Chief Secretary for Ireland, and they showed that before 1795 there were two considerable Colleges established for this purpose at Paris, and one at each of the following places,—Nantes, Bordeaux, St. Omer, Lisle, Antwerp, Salamanca, Douay, Rome, and Lisbon; and that there were endowments provided by various European states for no fewer than 478 scholars and twenty-seven teachers. Many such establishments were gratuitous, and were partly founded by the wise munificence of different sovereigns; the Sovereign of England prohibiting the very education which Foreign Powers so sedulously encouraged; the Kings of France and Spain, and many other Foreign Potentates, founded Colleges, at which the education was applicable to a class considered as poor scholars, while the richer Roman Catholics in this country formed what were called bourses or scholarships, by which students could be educated abroad gratuitously. The education thus given was for the most part, gratuitous, and chiefly applicable only to that class—the poorer class, from which it had been argued that Roman Catholic Clergymen were too exclusively selected. He was quite ready to admit that many of the Irish priesthood, who were educated abroad before the Revolution, returned to Ireland men of very enlightened minds, of liberal character, of great accomplishments and learning, and that on obtaining benefices in their own country they were justly to be regarded as eminent ornaments to the Church to which they belonged, and a great addition to the society of which they formed a part. He was aware it might thence be argued that a similar result would now be apparent, as a consequence of foreign education, and that they would probably see a superior class of Clergy introduced into Ireland, if that country were left without means of a domestic Education. But, with some knowledge of clergymen educated at home and abroad, he ventured to doubt that the same result would now follow a Continental Education that attended it before the French Revolution. At that time the Irish Clergy were received on the Continent into the highest families; men were chosen from amongst them to act as Chaplains to the noblest families, even to the Royal Family itself; they, in fact, from their piety and virtue obtained and deserved a preference over the Clergy of the countries in which they resided. As a strong illustration of this interesting fact, he might remind the House that the ecclesiastic who attended Louis XVI. in his last moments was a distinguished Irishman—the Abbé Edgeworth. But these advantages were no longer open to the Irish priesthood, who were now educated abroad under very different circumstances, and between whom and those educated at home there was no very traceable superiority. It was a mistake to imagine that political excitement was peculiar to the Maynooth priests. Without mentioning names, he might observe that a Roman Catholic Bishop, who had been frequently adverted to in no very favourable terms in their Lordships' House for his political vehemence, had been educated in France and other parts of the Continent. Foreign education, therefore, ought not to be relied on as the means by which the Irish priesthood could be educated so as to confer the greatest advantages on the Irish people. No one had considered this question more deeply than Mr. Leslie Foster. He had so considered it without any Roman Catholic predilections. He was one of the Commissioners who had conducted a protracted and laborious investigation as to the whole internal management and discipline, and, to a certain extent, the doctrines of Maynooth College; and, opposed though he was to the Catholic Question, he entirely approved of that Institution as a substitution for St. Omer and other Colleges on the Continent. He (Lord Monteagle) wished the House to bear in mind that one of the characteristics which distinguished Mr. Grattan in his attachment to his native country, was the horror he ever felt with regard to any political connection between Ireland and foreign countries, and, above all, between Ireland and France; therefore he (Mr. Grattan) always warned the House of Commons and the Government to withdraw the young Ecclesiastics from the Continent, by providing them with a proper education at home. The same opinion had been held by the highest authorities among the Irish ecclesiastics themselves and was indicated to be a sound one by the counter-movement of one who was not indifferent to the advantages he might gain by establishing an interest in Ireland—he meant the Emperor Napoleon. In France, the establishments which were instituted for that purpose were destroyed during the Revolution, but they still existed in Spain and Portugal. He (Napoleon) made the students there most munificent offers if they would quit the Peninsula and accept educational establishments in France. The answer that was given was one befitting the loyalty of British subjects. The answer given was, that the Irish students would not accept such offers, nor receive education tendered to them by a Sovereign who was at war with Britain. The Roman Catholic Bishops carried the matter further, and issued an Ecclesiastical document, forewarning Ecclesiastical students, that if any student accepted the offer of Napoleon all ordination—all support—all maintenance—all Ecclesiastical promotion should be withheld and refused. He wished to impress these facts upon their Lordships, for the purpose of removing from their minds the supposition that foreign education was a good, or could be taken as a boon. Foreign education—as Grattan said—might make the students Deists in religion, or if not Deists in religion, anti-British and Papistical in politics; but certainly not good Catholics or good priests for instructing the people of Ireland. The foundation of Maynooth took place in 1795, under no mean auspices. Mr. Pitt was its founder; he acted on the suggestion of Edmund Burke, and an Irish Roman Catholic prelate, Dr. Hussey, was the first President. It had been said, plausibly enough, that there was something narrow and monastic, too bigotted and exclusive, in an establishment which gave only an ecclesiastical education; and it had been asked, too, why confine this education exclusively to Roman Catholics? The first application made to Parliament by the Roman Catholics of Ireland for the endowment of this College did not contemplate exclusiveness, but prayed that the College might be open to Protestants as well as to Catholics. The Irish House of Commons answered that prayer, undoubtedly, by endowing the College, but they accompanied the endowment with a direct prohibition, by statute, against receiving any Protestant within its walls, or the child of any Protestant. He was not arguing whether such restriction was right or wrong, but he said it was not fair to stigmatize the institution on account of its exclusive character, when of that very exclusiveness they themselves were the authors. When the College was first founded it was not confined to ecclesiastical education; there was a lay college attached, and many laymen did receive their education in that college; among others, he believed was to be found an hon. Gentleman now a Member of the House of Commons—Mr. Corbally. But in 1801 or 1802 Mr. Abbott, the late Lord Colchester, then Secretary for Ireland, complained of that lay education as a diversion of the funds allowed by Parliament. As to the charge that the College was too exclusively ecclesiastical, not all who were educated there took the priestly office, though it was the general road to it. It was supported by Lord Castlereagh. The connection of the late Mr. Alexander Knox with Maynooth was a strong argument of his approval of that Establishment, because nobody who knew that Gentleman could think pecuniary considerations alone would induce him to be associated with an institution he condemned. He continued up to his death the agent for Maynooth, and the medium of communication between the College and the Government. During the existence of that College, during somewhat more than half a century, its proceedings had not remained unnoticed by Parliament, or unannounced upon. No public establishment had been more strictly scrutinized. During the Whig Government of 1807 an increase was made in the grant. That increase was much questioned. The succeeding Government of the noble Duke applied to the authorities of the College to know upon what grounds the grant had been increased, and why it should be continued at the increased rate. That letter contained minute and acute queries upon various points, and on these returns, for the most part, he now founded the motion with which he intended to conclude. The letter was written by Sir Arthur Wellesley, and it was as follows:—

“With the view to ascertain the grounds on which the application was made in the last Session for an increase of the grant to the College of Maynooth, and whether any grounds exist to require an extension of the Establishment at Maynooth, and to justify the continuance of the additional grant from Parliament, I have been directed to require answers to the enclosed queries.

“I have the honour to be, &c.

“ARTHUR WELLESLEY,”

Even at that period, then, the noble Duke's purpose of inquiry was to ascertain what justification there was for an increased grant; and there was nothing in his letter holding out the slightest intention of withholding it. He would undertake to show grounds, now existing, for altering the course previously pursued towards that establishment, and, therefore, without calling upon the noble Duke to admit any principle whatsoever not laid down in his original correspondence, he would ask him to give due weight to facts he was about to state. In 1813 Mr. Ryder examined into the condition of Maynooth. Again, in 1817, further Papers with respect to the course of study and system of education pursued there were called for and produced. During the Government of Lord Wellesley reports having been circulated that disaffection and a dangerous spirit of combination had been introduced among the students, the trustees applied to the Lord Lieutenant to send down a special visitor; this request was not granted, the usual visitation being near at hand; and when that visitation occurred, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland attended, and after investigating the matter informed the trustees that there was not a shadow of ground for the calumnious imputation. In 1826 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into all educational establishments in Ireland, and made a searching investigation into the system of Maynooth. The grant had been annually renewed, after all these inquiries had been made by various Governments; it had never been withdrawn, and he did not think that any one in office under the Crown had any intention or desire to withdraw it. But, though he did not apprehend that any considerable number of persons in this country, or any persons in authority, had such a desire, he feared that from ignorance of the facts of the case, there might be some indisposition to deal with this establishment in a proper manner by making a larger extension of liberality towards it. There were about 500 ecclesiastical students; 250 had been supported by Parliament by an annual vote of about 9,000*l.* a year, which amount remained unaltered with one trifling variation, an increase of 700*l.*, whilst almost every other Irish vote had increased. What did their Lordships think was the amount munificently given for the purpose of educating men for the sacred ministry of their own faith? The utmost sum given by Parliament, for the education of each priest, and including commons, fuel, and candles, was 23*l.* a-year! Their Lordships paid their lowest menial servants more than this wretched pittance, besides allowing clothing and other advantages. Yet too many men turned round and expressed surprise that the priesthood of Ireland were not of a higher class, that they were not superior persons, and better educated! Parliament thought it performed its duty by allowing 23*l.* per annum for the education of a priest! But sometimes this paltry sum was not given; the demands were so great for an increased number of clergy, that even this sum was divided between two students. If Parliament undertook to educate a priesthood competent to become the instructors of the people, and if it performed the task inefficiently it was almost as much an insult as a boon. The demand for Roman Catholic priests in Ireland was so great and so rapid in its increase, that as Dr. Crotty stated, they were often obliged to dismiss students before their education was completed. One of the causes of this was, and a cause which redounded to the honour of the Roman Catholic priesthood — the readiness with which they exposed themselves to risks, and the toil they freely underwent in the performance of their duties among the people. In one year in the county of Kerry ten Roman Catholic priests were carried off by typhus fever, caught whilst engaged in their duties. In the diocese of Clogher upwards of twenty Roman Catholic priests had died of fever in one year. He wished the Members of Her Majesty's Government, he wished those who had to decide this Question, would but visit Maynooth, and examine the building, and ask themselves whether it was physically possible to give the average number of students within the walls of that establishment an education fit for the ecclesiastics of any Christian sect or country whatever? Three persons were at times compelled to occupy one room; everything was out of repair and in a state of dilapidation. Did Parliament wish to improve the habits of the Irish people? Ought they not then to improve the habits of that clergy, who during seven years were pent up in the incomplete establishment of Maynooth? Dr. Murray had stated the building was incomplete, and the students too numerous for the accommodation it afforded. Dr. Crotty made a similar statement. The place was poverty-stricken; it was without the proper appliances for the use of the tutors and lecturers. It had been stated in evidence that one professor had to transcribe their course of lectures, and another to dictate, in consequence of their being without the means of procuring sufficient books. He would ask their Lordships if this state of things ought to be continued? No doubt the noble Duke came to an accurate conclusion at the time he made the inquiry; but there was conclusive evidence that a different opinion now be formed. At the foundation of Maynooth the population of Ireland was 4,500,000; at the time the noble Duke made his inquiries it did not amount to 5,500,000; at present it was 8,100,000; and the great increase unquestionably had been on the part of the Roman Catholics. He was the last person to say a word which could be interpreted as giving a preference over his own, to a religion from which he entirely dissented. But at the same time he would say there was a greater necessity for an increased number of clergymen of the Roman Catholic persuasion than for those of the Church of England, because the personal labours of the Catholic priest were much more unremitting than those of his Protestant brother: they were incessant in Ireland. In Maynooth there ought to be a scientific and literary education, as well as a theological one; but they had no apparatus; they had no adequate supply of books; they had no means of conveying to the students that knowledge which was received elsewhere, and which students educated for the priesthood ought to get. Whether they were dealing with Catholics or Protestants, the duty was the same. The Christian instructors of both faiths should have the benefit of the best and most enlarged education. If a preference were to be given, on grounds of mere expediency, it should be given to those belonging to the religion of the majority of the people. To anticipate an objection, which had been as frequently, as it was ignorantly made, he would mention that it was a rule that every ecclesiastical student, on entering the College, should be provided with a Bible, and that College, notwithstanding its poverty, had at one time supplied its inmates with 300 Bibles, and the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics at the same time had taken measures to reduce the price of the Bible for general distribution from two guineas and a half to 14s., the present price; they had omitted also every comment and note of an acrimonious nature and which could be, with truth, considered offensive to their Protestant brethren. In a very clever book upon Ireland, published anonymously this year, he found a description of Maynooth so thoroughly graphic, that he would beg to read it to their Lordships:—

“An accurate description of Maynooth would be of necessity so disagreeable, that it is best to pass over it in a few words. An Irish Union-house is a palace to it. Ruin so needless, filth so disgusting, such a look of lazy squalor, no Englishman who has not seen it can conceive. Lecture-room and dining-hall, kitchen and students' rooms are all the same. Why should the place be so shamefully ruinous and foully dirty?”

Such was the Parliamentary Establishment for educating the Roman Catholic Clergy of Ireland. Now, Parliament could do much to remedy the state of things he had described, and this without much difficulty—nay, with the greatest facility; and he, therefore, entreated their Lordships and the Government to give the subject their most serious attention. He was convinced, that if an enlarged and liberal view were taken of this question, Parliament could, by acting liberally towards Maynooth, do more quietly and unostentatiously to promote the general improvement of Ireland than by many of the means which were loudly insisted upon by declaimers; indeed, this was no popular grievance; many of those who took the most vehement tone in agitating the people of Ireland, did not urge the Government to continue the grant to Maynooth at all; but the quieter and better disposed desired to see the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics enjoying the best and most comprehensive, and most liberal education which it was practicable to give them, so that they might be placed on a level with the higher ranks of the community around them, and thus be admitted to the companionship of the country gentlemen and resident nobility, of both denominations, and of the Protestant clergy themselves, by having their condition improved, their minds liberalised, and being thus rendered, what they ought to be, not only the spiritual but the intellectual guides of the people. The present was just the moment, when the Government, after taking strong measures to enforce their own opinions, and to put down views adverse to their own, the present was the moment when they could most favourably introduce measures really tending to improve the character and condition of the Irish people. A measure of the kind he had now proposed would, above all others, have the highly beneficial effect of showing the people of that country that Parliament and the Government sympathized with them on a subject, upon which it had hitherto been considered that Government was either apathetic, most unwilling, or most adverse. The Government might thus show that they truly desired to promote, at once the spiritual and the temporal advancement of the people. The establishment of Maynooth ought immediately to be placed upon a higher footing, so as to fit it for the reception and education of the better classes. As it was, it was hardly to be expected that children, who had been brought up in a happy and comfortable and respectable home, would willingly be sent to such an establishment as he had shown this to be. The Roman Catholic bishops took the greatest pains to raise the character of the institution, but they possibly could not overcome the great difficulties which impeded their wise and benevolent object. What said Dr. Crotty on this subject, in his evidence in 1826?

"I know that the Roman Catholic bishops are always anxious to procure young men of the most decent families to be members of Maynooth; but I know likewise, in the present state of the country, it would be impossible to find a sufficient number of that description to supply the wants of the Roman Catholic Ministers. The labours of a Roman Catholic clergyman are greater than the public at large are aware of; they are frequently exposed to the most imminent danger of losing their lives in going out at night and visiting the most wretched hovels of the peasantry, where nothing is to be found but misery and contagious disorder, there is no temporal inducement for the children of the higher classes to become Roman Catholic Ecclesiastics in Ireland."

A more liberal treatment should be introduced, scientific and liberal education superadded, the professors adequately supported, and proper appliances for instruction in each branch of knowledge be supplied. There should be competition in various classes of composition, the best specimens of which should be sent forth for the suffrage of the public; and, in the absence of fellowships and tutorships, small prizes of the nature of exhibitions should be awarded to the more meritorious students, on which, for three or four years, they might be able to maintain themselves after leaving the colleges and until they had obtained employment. This might be done for a very small sum; even 800*l.* a-year would produce a great deal of good in this way. As to the building itself it should be put into proper repair, and be placed permanently under the care of the Board of Works, to be upheld in the same way as other public edifices. The best proof of the present penury of the institution which he could give was this, that last year they were in such distress that, in default of the means of supporting the students there, they were obliged to continue their vacation for a period of several continuous months. It might be suggested that his object was to secularize the Roman Catholic Clergy, and thereby to render them less effective in their spiritual character; but nothing could be more foreign from his views; nothing could be more mischievous, his whole argument went simply to prove the necessity of making them more enlightened, and in making them more enlightened, to render them better ministers of religion, better spiritual, because also better intellectual, guides of the people. That respected Prelate the late Dr. Baines, and the learned and excellent Bishop Wiseman were not less admirable as ecclesiastics, because they were two of the most accomplished scholars of Europe. Was Bossuet less energetic, as a defender of his Church because he emulated the masters of ancient eloquence. By improving the condition and character of this College, the Government and Parliament would operate beneficially upon the most important class of persons in Ireland; that class which had it in its power to be the agents of more moral good than any other class there. Get the hearts and feelings of the Roman Catholic Clergy with you, and they would become your fellow-labourers in all good works, and you would soon effect vast benefits for Ireland. There ought to be no difficulty of a pecuniary nature which should prevent Government from taking the desired course with reference to Maynooth. In the thirty years which followed the Union, upwards of 700,000*l.* had been expended by the Government on the Charter Schools, which their own Commissioners had altogether condemned. Another sum of 780,000*l.* had been expended on the Foundling Hospital in Dublin, which had been voted a nuisance, and abolished accordingly. The sums which had been assigned for these two purposes, showed that towards an object which was deemed, however erroneously, to be beneficial, the Government of this country was quite willing to display its liberality. He trusted that its liberality, in every sense of the word, would be extended to the institution to which he had now called their Lordships' attention. The noble Lord concluded with moving for certain Papers relative to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth.

The Duke of Wellington was not at all surprised at the noble Lord's having called their attention to this subject; it was one of very great interest undoubtedly, but he must say he regretted that, instead of entering so deeply as he had done into the subject now, the noble Lord had not adopted the proposition which he (the Duke of Wellington) submitted to the noble Marquess opposite on the subject, on Thursday last, and delayed making his statement until the Papers were before the House. The reason why, on Thursday last, he had requested this motion to be postponed from the Friday till the Tuesday following, was, that he desired an opportunity of looking over the voluminous information now before Parliament. He had no sort of objection to give the papers moved for, but he wished, as he had just said, that any discussion on the subject had been postponed until they were actually before the House. He had since Thursday endeavoured to collect all the information he could on the subject, but certainly the noble Lord had now stated many facts of which he was entirely ignorant. He certainly had not been aware of the state of things described. The statements made on this occasion by the noble Lord were perfectly correct, as appeared from the records already on their Lordships' Table. He did not exactly recollect the letter which the noble Lord had read, which was signed by him more than thirty-five or forty years ago, but he must undoubtedly have acted by order of the Government of the time, and must have reported to the Government the answer which he received to the communication. He did not recollect what the grievances referred to were, but he did recollect the question respecting an augmentation of the grant, and that a determination was arrived at to reduce it to the amount at which it was before, and so the grant continued till, he thought, the year 1812, when it was augmented on the score of building, by 7,000*l.* or something of that kind. Doubtless, there could be no subject more interesting than this could be to the House of Lords. This was an institution formed by the Irish Parliament in 1795; the Act was amended by another Act in 1800, before the Union, so that the institution was entirely formed by the Irish Parliament before the Union. The Act of 1800, indeed, was amended by the Imperial Parliament in 1808, but, he would repeat the institution itself was entirely formed of the Irish Parliament, and came to their Lordships altogether as from that body. As he had said before, he did wish this discussion had been postponed until they should have had all the information which it was intended they should have, in consequence of the production of these Papers upon their Lordships' Table. He had no objection to produce the Papers, but he should only be deceiving their Lordships, if he did not say that he stated this without conveying any present intention on the part of the Government to make any alteration in this grant. Undoubtedly the Government must take the whole subject into their consideration, though, he would repeat, there was no intention that any alteration should be made in the grant. If such an intention, however, were to be entertained, it would be announced in the first instance in that quarter where the grant must originate. He trusted he might be excused from going further into the subject now; he fully admitted the statement of the noble Lord to be a most important one, and he could promise that all the facts the noble Lord had set forth should be taken into mature consideration.

The Marquess of Lansdowne could not allow this discussion to close without expressing his feeling that Ireland was greatly indebted to his noble Friend for having called the attention of their Lordships, thus fully and thus ably to a most important subject. The noble Duke seemed to think it would have been better to postpone the statement until the promised Papers were before the House; but he (the Marquess of Lansdowne), with the information already before Parliament, did not think that any new facts which could be elicited, would in any degree interfere with those general views of policy which his noble Friend had taken an early opportunity that Session of inculcating, with a view, which his noble Friend would not disclaim, of calling the attention of Parliament to the subject at a period when they might be enabled either to legislate, if legislation were deemed advisable, or to add, under the sanction of Government, to the amount of the Vote now yearly proposed. He considered that his noble Friend was quite justified in anticipating that the Government would be by this time fully prepared for the consideration of the subject. For this was no new subject. Year after year it had been pressed on the consideration of the Government, in various forms. In the very last year it had been pressed on the Government, which professed itself ready to give it the consideration which its importance merited. The Government which talked of educating the people, could not reasonably decline to take into its immediate and serious consideration the primary object of educating the educators. Parliament had a right to expect, that during the recess, the Government would have collected every available information, and have taken it into their mature consideration, so as to form some distinct opinion on the subject. Delay in deciding this question had been the besetting sin of all Governments for the last forty or fifty years; after the principle had been adopted by the Irish Parliament, and recognised by the English Parliament, the principle had never been applied practically in the way it ought to be applied,—to provide the most proper and fit instruments that could be provided for the education of the Catholics of Ireland, and adequate in point of ability and of number. It was notorious that the supply was not adequate to the necessity of the case. Owing to the great narrowness of the means at Maynooth, persons were sent out whether or not they were willing or qualified. The tendency of the narrowness of the institution was to disunite the Roman Catholic priesthood from the proprietors, instead of blending them as much as possible with them. They were, under various pretences, delaying from year to year the duty of endeavouring to induce the Roman Catholic Clergy to blend heartily with the population at large. All those were considerations which he could not admit ought to be delayed for a moment. They had been too long delayed already. Their Lordships had plenty of information before them; the history of Maynooth was before them; the consequences of that history were before them; and the consequence of the negligence of Parliament and of the Government upon the subject was before them. He did think, unless the House was prepared to take the course which he was sure the noble Duke would not recommend—of destroying that establishment altogether, that Parliament was bound in justice to the Irish people to provide for the education of their Clergy; for if they would not renounce the establishment, they must take that which was the only other line open to them, and proceed to give it that ample and complete effect which alone could insure good and permanent consequences. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) therefore did think, that the public should not only be obliged to his noble Friend near him for calling the attention of the Government to this subject, but that the public was more particularly indebted to him for bringing the matter forward at this early period of the Session. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) was convinced that the discussion, such as it had been, could have but one effect—that of throwing upon Her Majesty's Government the responsibility of omitting to effect that reform in the establishment which they had been discussing—a reform which circumstances for years had called for, but never so imperiously as they did at this moment.

Lord Monteagle shortly replied, and the Motion was put and agreed to.

MILITARY DISCIPLINE—DUELLING.]

Mr. Gill inquired of the right hon. Baronet (Sir H. Hardinge), pursuant to notice—first, whether the right hon. Baronet was aware that two officers of the 76th Regiment of Foot at Devonport had been under arrest since the 14th of July, for the space of eight months, in consequence of a dispute, and to prevent evil consequences? Secondly, did the right hon. Baronet know that application had been made in the months of December and January last on behalf of one of these officers by letter to the Horse Guards, desiring to know the charges made against him? and if such was the case, what notice had been taken of those letters? Thirdly, had the right hon. Baronet any objection to state the grounds of the arrest, and the reason why they had not been either released or had their case submitted to a competent tribunal for trial? Lastly, he wished to know whether it were not contrary to the 107th Article of War to continue an officer under arrest for more than eight days without giving him the benefit of a court-martial?

Sir H. Hardinge said, in answer to the first question of the hon. Member, he had heard that two officers of the 76th Regiment of Foot had been arrested, and that they had been put under arrest on account of a dispute, and to prevent further consequences. As to the application on behalf of one of the officers, some letters, he was aware, had been addressed to the Horse-Guards. The next question put to him was, if he had any objection to state the grounds of the arrest, and whether the officers ought not to have been released or put upon their trials. The hon. Member alluded to the 107th Article of War. He did not carry the Articles of War about with him at his own fingers' ends, but would state the reasons why the two officers had been placed under arrest. One of them, a junior officer, was the bearer of a challenge to a senior officer, and in consequence the challenge was accepted. Both the officers had been placed under arrest in consequence. After being arrested the junior officer had made the most ample apologies, which were accepted by the other, and the aggressor, who was very much in the wrong, was about to be tried by court-martial for his conduct. The other was not so much to blame. About that time measures were in contemplation by the Commander-in-Chief to suppress Duelling, and he intended that these parties should be tried under the new arrangement. They were therefore arrested for a period, and, as both had violated their duty in an unjustifiable manner, the Commander-in-Chief punished them by arrest at large, while they were not allowed to attend at mess, or wear their swords, or do duty on parade. Under these circumstances the Commander-in-Chief, bearing in mind that they had been so long under arrest, intended to release them immediately, after a suitable admonition.

Captain Bernal asked if it was not the case that by the Articles of War no officer could be kept under arrest for more than eight days, without being brought to a court-martial?

Sir H. Hardinge.—Certainly not. Any officer might be kept under arrest for a longer time by the order of the Commander-in-Chief.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES—THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST.]* Mr. Cobden rose to bring forward his Motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the effects of Protective Duties on imports on the interest of the tenant-farmers and farm-labourers of this country. He said—Sir, the Motion which I have to make is one of a nature which I believe is not ordinarily refused; it is for a Select Committee to sit up stairs, to take evidence on a question that excites great controversy out of doors, and which I believe is likely to cause considerable discussion in this House. It may be thought that my Motion might have been appropriately placed in other hands. I am of that opinion too. I think it might have been more properly brought forward by a Gentleman on the other side of the House, particularly by an honourable Member connected with the counties of Wiltshire or Dorsetshire. But, although not myself a county Member, that does not necessarily preclude me from taking a prominent part in a question affecting the interests of the tenant-farmers and farm-labourers of this country, for whom I feel as strong a sympathy as for any other class of my countrymen; nay, I stand here on this occasion as the advocate of what I conscientiously believe to be the interests of the agriculturists. We have instances of Committees being appointed to take evidence as to the importation of silk, the exportation of machinery, the navigation laws, on all questions of similar importance. It must also be admitted that such Committees have been appointed without the parties more immediately concerned having in the first instance, petitioned the House for their appointment. On the appointment of the Committee relative to the exportation of machinery, the Motion was granted, not at the instance of manufacturers who had a monopoly of the use of machinery, but by parties whose interests were concerned in the making and exporting of machinery. I do not therefore anticipate that my Motion will be resisted on the ground that no petitions have been presented demanding it. I shall now state what my views will be on entering the Committee. I shall be prepared to bring important evidence forward, shewing the effects of "protection," as it is called, on the agriculturists by the examination of farmers themselves. I will, in fact, not bring forward a single witness before that Committee who shall not be a tenant-farmer, or a landed proprietor, and they shall be persons eminent for their reputation as practical agriculturists. The opinion which I shall hold on entering the Committee is, that "protection," as it is called, instead of being beneficial, is delusive and injurious to the tenant-farmers; and that opinion I shall be prepared to sustain by the evidence of tenant farmers themselves. I wish it to be understood I do not admit that what is called protection to agriculturists has ever been any protection at all to them; on the contrary, I hold that its only effect has been to mislead them. This has been denied both in this House and out of doors.

I have recently read over again the evidence taken before the Committees which sat previous to the passing of the Corn Law of 1815, and I leave it to any man to say whether it was not contended at that time that sufficient protection could not be given to the agriculturists unless they got 80s. a quarter for wheat. I wish to remind the hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Bennett) that he gave it as his opinion before the Committee of 1814, that wheat could not be grown in this country, unless the farmers got 96s. a quarter, or 12s. a bushel for it, while now he is supporting a Minister who only proposes to give the farmers 56s. a quarter, and confesses he cannot guarantee even that. It is denied that this House has ever promised to guarantee prices for their produce to the farmers. Now, what was the custom of the country from the passing of the Corn Law in 1815? Why, I will bring old men before the Committee who will state that farmers valued their farms from that time by a computation of wheat being at 80s. a quarter. I can also prove that agricultural societies which met in 1821, passed resolutions declaring that they were deceived by the Act of 1815, that they had taken farms calculating upon selling wheat at 80s., while, in fact, it had fallen to little more than 50s. In the Committee which sat in 1836, witnesses stated that they had been deceived in the price of their corn; and I ask whether, at the present moment, rents are not fixed rather with reference to certain Acts that were passed than the intrinsic worth of the farms? In consequence of the alteration that was made in the Corn Law of 1842, the rent of farms has been assessed on the ground of corn being 56s. a quarter. I know an instance where a party occupying his own land was rated at a certain amount, viz., at the valuation of corn being 56s. a quarter, while, in fact, it was selling at 47s.; and, upon his asking why he had been so rated, he was told that the assessors had taken that mode of valuation in consequence of what the Prime Minister had stated was to be the price of corn. ["Oh, oh."] Hon. Gentlemen may cry, "Oh, oh," but I will bring forward that very case, and prove what I have stated concerning it. What I wish in going into Committee is, to convince the farmers of Great Britain that this House has not the power to regulate or sustain the price of their commodities. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir R.

Peel) has confessed that he cannot regulate the wages of labour or the profits of trade. Now, the farmers are dependent for their prices upon the wages of the labourer, and the profits of the trader and manufacturer; and if the Government cannot regulate these—if it cannot guarantee a certain amount of wages to the one, or a fixed profit to the other—how can it regulate the price of agricultural produce? The first point to which I should wish to make this Committee instrumental is to fix in the minds of the farmers the fact that this House exaggerates its power to sustain or enhance prices by direct acts of legislation. The farmer's interest is that of the whole community, and is not a partial interest, and you cannot touch him more sensitively than when you injure the manufacturers, his customers. I do not deny that you may regulate prices for awhile—for awhile you have regulated them by forcing an artificial scarcity; but this is a principle which carries with it the seeds of self-destruction, for you are thereby undermining the prosperity of those consumers upon whom your permanent welfare depends. A war against nature must always end in the discomfiture of those who wage it. You may by your restrictive enactments increase pauperism, and destroy trade: you may banish capital, and check or expatriate your population; but is this, I will ask, a policy which can possibly work consistently with the interests of the farmers? These are the fundamental principles which I wish to bring out, and with this primary view it is that I ask for a Committee at your hands. With regard to certain other fallacies with which the farmers have been beset, and latterly more so than ever; the farmer has been told that if there was a free-trade in corn, wheat would be so cheap, that he would not be able to carry on his farm. He is directed only to look at Dantzic, where corn, he is told, was once selling at 15s. 11d. per quarter, and on this the Essex Protection Society put out their circulars, stating that Dantzic wheat is but 15s. 11d. per quarter, and how would the British farmer contend against this? Now, I maintain that these statements are not very creditable to the parties who propagate such nonsense, nor complimentary to the understandings of the farmers who listen to and believe them. It would be no argument against free-trade, but quite the contrary, if wheat could be purchased regularly at Dantzic at that price; but the truth is, that in an average of years at that port, it has cost much more than double; and the truth, I suppose, is what all men desire to arrive at. The farmer will very easily be disabused on this and other points if you will grant me the Committee I seek. We know what the price has been in the Channel Islands where the trade is free. These islands send the corn of their own growth to this country whenever it is profitable to do so, and they receive foreign corn for their own consumption duty free. Sir, without pretending to look into futurity, I know of no better test of what the price of corn in this country would be in a state of free-trade, than the prices in the island of Jersey afford, taken, not like the Essex Protection Society for a single week or month, but for a number of years, comprising a cycle of high and low prices in this country. We know that the fluctuation of prices in this country embraces the fluctuation of the whole of Europe. We have papers on the Table shewing what the prices of corn were in Jersey, in the ten years from 1832 to 1841 inclusive. The average price was in those ten years 48s. 4d. What do you think was the average price in your own markets in those years? It was 56s. 8d. Now, I have taken some pains to consult those who best understand this subject, and I find it to be their opinion, that a constant demand from England under a free-trade would have raised the level of European prices 2s. or 3s. a quarter during the above period. If this be a fair estimate, it brings the price up to within 5s. or 6s. a quarter of our own average. Was this difference in price to throw land out of cultivation, annihilate rent, ruin the farmer, and pauperise the labourers? But in years of high prices the farmers do not receive the highest price for their corn. On the contrary, they sell their corn at the lowest prices, and the speculator sells his at the highest. A short time ago I met a miller from near Winchester, who told me the prices which he paid every year for the corn which he purchased before the harvest and after the harvest during five years. That statement I beg to read to the House:—

Load of 5 qrs.
1839. August	Wheat	.....	£19 10s.
November	"	.....	16 0
2 F

			Load of 5 qrs.
1840.	August	"	..... 18 0
	October	"	..... 14 5
1841.	August	"	..... 19 0
	October	"	..... 15 0
1842.	August	"	..... 17 0
	September	"	..... 12 0
1843.	July	"	..... 15 15
	September	"	..... 12 10

Thus in these five years there had been a difference of 3*l.* 18*s.* a load, or 15*s.* a quarter, between the prices of wheat in July and August and in October and November in each year, shewing, beyond dispute, that the farmer did not sell his corn at the highest, but at the lowest of the markets. Now, Sir, there is another point upon which as much misrepresentation exists as upon the one I have just stated, namely, the price at which corn could be grown abroad. The price of wheat at Dantzic during those ten years to which I have referred averaged upwards of 40*s.* a quarter; and if you add to it the freight, it will corroborate the statement I have made with regard to the price at which wheat has been sold at Jersey. Another point upon which misrepresentation has gone abroad, relates to the different items of expenditure in bringing wheat to this country. We have had consuls' returns from various ports, of the charges for freight at various periods, but we have not had full accounts of the other items of expenditure. It would be important to elicit as much information as possible upon this subject, and the best means of arriving at it would be to examine practical men from the City before a Select Committee of the House as to the cost of transit. As far as I can obtain information from the books of merchants, the cost of transit from Dantzic, during an average of ten years, may be put down at 10*s.* 6*d.* a quarter, including in this, freight, landing, loading, insurance, and other items of every kind. This is the natural protection enjoyed by the farmers of this country. I may be answered, that the farmers of this country have the cost of carriage to pay also, as, for instance, from Norfolk to Hull or London. But I beg to remind hon. Gentlemen that a very small portion of home-grown corn is carried coastwise at all. Accurate information upon this point might be got before a Select Committee of this House. From information which I have obtained, I am led to believe that not more than 1,000,000 of quarters are carried coastwise at all, or 5 per cent. of the yearly growth of the country; the rest is carried from the barn-door to the mill. This is an important consideration for those who say that there is no natural protection to the farmer, inasmuch as it gives the farmer here a constant protection of half-a-guinea. But hon. Gentlemen ought to bear in mind, that the corn which is brought from Dantzic is not grown on the quays there, any more than it is grown on the quay of Liverpool. On the contrary, it is brought at great expense from a very long distance in the interior. I have seen a statement made by an hon. Member from Scotland, who said that the rafts on which the corn was brought down the river to Dantzic, were broken up and sold to pay the cost of transit. I have not been able to verify that statement in the course of my inquiries. These are points which might all be cleared up by practical men before the Committee; and thus, instead of resorting to prophecy, we should be able to judge from facts and past experience as to the ability of the English farmers to compete with foreigners. Hon. Gentlemen would do well to consider what happened in the case of wool. Every prediction that is now uttered with regard to corn, was uttered by Gentlemen opposite with regard to wool. If hon. Gentlemen visited the British Museum, and explored that Herculaneum of buried pamphlets which were written in opposition to Mr. Huskisson's plans for reducing the duty on wool twenty years ago, what arguments would they find in the future tense, and what predictions of may, might, could, would, should, ought, and shall. But what was the result? Did they lose all their sheep-walks? Had they no more mutton? Are their shepherds all consigned to the workhouse? Were there no more sheep-dogs? I have an account of the importation of wool and the price of wool, and the lesson I wish to impress on Gentlemen opposite is this, that the price of commodities may spring from two causes—a temporary, fleeting, and retributive high price, produced by scarcity; or a permanent and natural high price, produced by prosperity. In the case of wool, you had a high price springing from the prosperity of the consumers. It so happens, in the case of this article of wool, that the price has been highest when the importation has been most considerable, and lowest in the years when the importation has been comparatively small. I beg to read a statement which illustrates this fact :—

		Imported lbs.
1827 ....	10d. per lb. ...	29,115,341
1839 ....	7d. per lb. ....	21,516,649
1836 ....	18d. per lb. ....	64,239,000
1841 ....	11d. per lb. ....	56,170,000
1842 ....	10d. per lb. ....	45,833,000

From this statement it appears, that in every instance where the price has been highest, the English farmer has had the largest competition from foreign growers, and that the price was lowest where the competition was least. Well, that is the principle which I wish to see applied in viewing this much-dreaded question of corn. You may have a high price of corn, through a prosperous community, and it may continue a high price: you may have a high price through a scarcity, and it is impossible in the very nature of things that it can be permanent. Now, put this test of wool in the case of cattle and other things that have been imported since the passing of the Tariff. I want this matter to be cleared up. I do not want Gentlemen to find fault with the Prime Minister for doing what he did not do. I do not think his Tariff caused a reduction of one farthing in the price of articles of consumption. But I must say, with all deference to him, that I think he himself is to blame for having incurred that charge by the arguments which he brought forward in support of the Tariff, for assuredly he took the least comprehensive or statesmanlike view of his measures, when he proposed to degrade prices, instead of aiming to sustain them by enlarging the circle of exchanges. It is said that the Tariff has caused distress among the farmers. Why, I don't believe there has been as much increase in the imports of cattle as would make one good breakfast for all the people. Did it never enter the minds of hon. Gentlemen who are interested in the sale of cattle, that their customers in large towns cannot be sinking into abject poverty and distress, without the evil ultimately reaching themselves in the price of their produce? I had occasion, a little time ago, to look at the falling-off in the consumption of cattle in the town of Stockport. I calculated the falling-off in Stockport alone, for three or four years, at more than all the increase in the importation of foreign cattle. It appears, therefore, that the distress of that town alone, has done as much to reduce prices, as all the importation under the Tariff. It has been estimated, that in Manchester, 40 per cent. less of cattle was consumed in 1842 than in 1835; and it has also been estimated that the cotton trade was paying 7,000,000*l.* less in wages per annum in 1842 than in 1836. How could you then expect the same consumption? If you would but look to your own interests as broadly and as wisely as manufacturers look to theirs, you would never fall into the error of supposing that you can ruin your customers, and yet, at the same time, prosper in your pursuits. I remember hearing Lord Kinnaird, whose property is near Dundee, state, that in 1835 and 1836, the dealers from that town used to come and bespeak his cattle three months in advance; but in 1842, when the linen trade shared the prostration of all the manufactures, he had to engage steamboats three months in advance to bring his cattle to the London market. Hon. Members who live in Sussex and the southern counties, and who are in the habit of sneering at Manchester, should recollect, that they are as much dependent upon the prosperity of Lancashire, as those who live in their immediate neighbourhood. If graziers, on looking at the Price Current, find they can get a better price for their cattle in London than in Manchester and Stockport, will they not send their cattle up to London, to compete with the southern graziers? The point, therefore, which I wish to make known is, that the Tariff has not caused the reduction in price. There is nothing which I regret more than that the Corn Law or the Tariff should have been altered by the right hon. Baronet at all. Without this alteration I feel confident we should have had prices as low at least as they are; our lesson would then have been complete, the landlords and tenants would have been taught how dependent they are on their customers, and they would have then united with the manufacturers in favour of free-trade. But, if the late alterations in the Corn Law and Tariff are now to be made the bugbear for frightening the farmers from the path of free-trade—if they are to be told that those measures have reduced their protection 30 per cent.,—then I think those political landlords who were returned to this House as “farmers’ friends,” pledged to defend “protection” as it stood, and who betrayed their trust, ought to do something more if they are sincere; they ought to reduce their rents in proportion to the amount of protection which they say they have withdrawn from the farmer—they ought to do this, not for one rent-day, but permanently; and they should do it with penitence and in sack-cloth and ashes, instead of hallooing on the poor farmers upon a wrong scent, after the Anti Corn Law League as the cause of their sufferings. Now, with regard to the low prices having been caused by the change in the Tariff, I do not know whether a noble Lord happens to be present, who illustrated this very aptly, by stating that the farmers in the West of Scotland had been ruined by the reduction in the duty on cheese. There could be nothing more unfortunate than that statement, as there happens, in that respect, to have been no alteration, and yet, I believe cheese fell in price as much as any other article. It is well known that whilst the price of cheese has fallen in the home market, the importation from abroad has been also considerably diminished. There is another subject upon which I must entreat hon. Members' forbearance, for it is an exceedingly tender point and one which is always heard with great sensitiveness in this House. I refer to the subject of rent. We have no tenant farmers in this House. I wish we had, and I venture here to express a hope that the next dissolution will send up a bonâ fide tenant farmer. I know nothing more likely than that, to unravel the perplexity of our terminology—nothing more likely to put us all in our right places and to make us speak each for himself on this subject. The landowners, I mean the political landowners, those who dress their labourers and their cattle in blue ribbons, and who treat this question entirely as a political one, they go to the tenant farmers and they tell them that it would be quite impossible for them to compete with foreigners, for, if they had their land rent-free, they could not sell their produce at the same price as they did. To bear out their statement, they give a calculation of the cost per acre of growing wheat, which they put down at 6*l*. Now, the fallacy of that has been explained to me by an agriculturist in the Midland Counties, whom I should exceedingly like to see giving his evidence before the Committee for which I am moving. He writes me in a letter which I have received to-day,

"You will be met by an assertion that no

alteration in rent can make up the difference to the tenant and labourer of diminished prices. They will quote the expenses on a single crop of wheat, and say how small a proportion the rent bears to the whole expense but that is not the fair way of putting it. Wheat is the farmer's remunerating crop, but he cannot grow wheat more than one year in three. The expense, then, of the management of the whole farm should be compared with the rent, to estimate what portion of the price of corn is received by the landlord. I have, for this purpose, analysed the expenses of a farm of 400 acres—230 arable, 170 pasture.

"The expenses are:—		£
Parish and county rates	.	90
Interest of capital	.	150
Labour	.	380
Tradesmen's bills	.	80
Manure and lime	.	70
Wear of horses	.	20
		<hr/>

"So that on this farm, which is very fairly cultivated, the rent is 800*l*. the other expenses 790*l*. Now, if it requires 55*s*. per quarter in an average year, to enable the tenant to pay the rent and make 150*l*. profit, it is obvious that without any rent he would be enabled to pay his labourers and tradesmen as well, and put the same amount of profit into his pocket, with a price of 30*s*. supposing other produce to be reduced in the same proportion. But I do not anticipate that wheat will be reduced below 45*s*., even by free-trade, and meat, butter, and cheese, will certainly not fall in the same proportion."

This then is a very important statement from a competent authority, and the gentleman who makes it I should be very glad to have examined before the Committee if the House grant one. ["Name."] I believe that the writer will have no objection to his name being published he is Mr. Charles Paget, of Ruddington Grange, near Nottingham.* Allow

* We retain this letter which was appended to the corrected report. "The following important letter was received, after the speech had been delivered:—

"Ruddington Grange, March 14.

"My dear Sir,—It is a great satisfaction to me to find the statement I sent to you so fully confirmed by Lord Worsley.

"He takes a farm which is entirely arable, while the one whose expenses I stated is 230 arable and 170 pasture, which is a fair proportion for the Midland Counties. His rent is divided between the landlord and the clergyman; mine is paid entirely to one landlord. He takes a farm which requires an outlay for manure equal to half the rent; I, one which me now to state the method by which I calculate the proportion which rent bears to the other outgoings on a farm. I ascertain first what amount of produce the farmer sells off his farm in the year, and next I inquire how much of the money brought home from market goes to the landlord for rent. I take no account in this money calculation of the seed corn, stock manure, horse keep, or other produce of the land used or consumed upon the farm, because these things are never converted into money, and cannot, therefore, be used in payment of rent, taxes, &c. Now I am prepared to prove before a Committee, by a Scotch farmer, that one-half of the disposable produce from a Lothian farm goes to the landlord for rent—that 26s. out of every 52s. for a quarter of wheat is rent: and that, consequently, if they had their land rent-free, and sold their wheat at 26s. a quarter, they would do as well, pay as good wages, and everybody about the establishment be as well provided for as they are now, when paying rent and getting 52s. for their wheat. With such a margin as this, I think we need not be in much fear of throwing land out of cultivation in Scotland! I believe many hon. Gentlemen opposite have never made a calculation of what proportion of the whole of the saleable produce goes for rent. It must be borne in mind that every acre of a farm pays rent, although, probably, not more than one acre in three, and in the best farming not more than one in four, is in the same year devoted to the growth of wheat; whilst a part of the farm is generally in permanent pasture. My mode of calculation then is this: ascertain the money value of the whole produce of every kind sold in a year, find how many quarters of wheat it is equal to at the price of the year; and next divide the total number of quarters by the number of acres in the farm, and the result will give you the quantity of wheat sold off each acre in the year. I have made the calculation, and in doing so have had the opinions of those who have taken pains upon the subject; and these are the conclusions to which I have come. I calculate that an arable farm, on an average, does not yield for sale, of every kind of produce, more than equivalent to ten bushels of wheat per acre; so that a farm of 500 acres would not dispose of more than what is equivalent to 5000 bushels. In many parts I believe that this estimate is too high, and that the farmer does not dispose of more than one quarter per acre. And the result of the inquiry would show, that in Scotland (where much of the labour on the farm is paid in kind) one-half of the produce taken to market goes to the landlord as rent, whilst in England it will average more than 20s. a quarter upon the present price of wheat. With regard to cheese, I am prepared to bring wit-

will maintain its fertility at an expenditure of one-twelfth the rent in artificial manure; and if you refer to the explanation appended to my statement, you will see that I consider it applicable to the heavy and mixed lands, and that for the poorer light lands a rectification was required for the quantity of manure purchased.

"Now let us take Lord Worsley's statement. He takes:—

Landlord's rent .	£800
Tithe rent .	200
	—£1,000
Add excess of manure .	360
	£1,360

"His horse keep ought to have been treated like his seed corn: it is not an outgoing from the farm, but an abstraction from the disposable produce. His other expenses are;—

Farm labour .	£800
Mechanics or Tradesmen's bills	200
Parochial rates .	150
Interest of capital .	200

£1,350

So that had his land been of such a quality that it would have required only 140l. instead of 500l. to maintain its fertility, he would of course have paid 360l. more rent. The result then would have been,—

Rent .. ..	£1,350
Other expenses ..	1,360
Manure .. ..	140
	— 1,490

Had one-third of the land been old turf, the expenses would have been reduced 200l. So that Lord Worsley more than confirms my statement.

"I see the Lothian farmers estimate the landlord's share at one-half, while I only state it at 25s. out of every 55s. for England.

"I believe the opposition you meet with is from an honest conviction that a change would be injurious to the tenant and labourer. I am therefore very sorry that your Committee has been refused.

"I am my dear Sir, very truly yours,

"CHARLES PAGET.

"Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P."

nesses to prove that more than half of the produce goes to the landlord, owing to the fact of there being less paid in wages upon dairy farms. For every 5*d.* received for cheese, more than 2½*d.* is paid in rent; and upon grazing farms, also, for every 5*d.* received for a pound of meat, at least 2½*d.* is paid to the landlord. This is, after all, the important point in the consideration of this question, because, it being settled, the public would no longer labour under the apprehension, that if free-trade were adopted the farmers would suffer, or that land would be thrown out of cultivation. This is a point upon which I should not have entered, had not the investigation been challenged by my opponents. It must not be imputed to me that I entertain the opinion that free-trade in corn would deprive the landowners of the whole of their rents. I have never said so—I have never even said that land would not have been as valuable as it is now if no Corn-law had ever existed. But this I do mean to say, that if the landowners prefer to draw their rents from the distresses of the country, caused by their restrictive laws to create high prices through scarcity of food, instead of deriving an honourable income of possibly as great, or even greater amount, through the growing prosperity of the people under a free-trade, then they have no right, in the face of such facts as I have stated, to attempt to cajole the farmer into the belief, that rent forms an insignificant item in the cost of his wheat, or to frighten him into the notion that he could not compete with foreigners if he had his land rent-free. I shall now touch upon another and more important branch of this question, I mean the interests of the farm labourer. We are told that he is benefited by a system of restriction which makes the first element of subsistence scarce. Do you think posterity will believe it? They will look back upon this doctrine, in less than twenty years, with as much amazement as we do now upon the conduct of our forefathers when they burnt old women for witchcraft. To talk of benefiting labourers by making one of the main articles of their consumption scarce! The agricultural labourers live by wages: what is it which regulates the wages of labour in every country? Why, the quantity of the necessities and comforts of life which form the fund out of which labour is paid, and the proportion which they bear to the whole number of labourers to be maintained. Now, the agricultural labourer spends a larger proportion of his wages in food than any other class. And yet, in the face of this fact, do you go on maintaining a law which makes food scarce in order to benefit the agriculturist! I hold in my hand a volume which has been presented to the House relating to the state of the agricultural population of this country, and which, I think, ought to have been brought under the notice of the House, by some one competent to deal with the subject, long before now. Last year a Commission was appointed to inquire into the state of women and children employed in agriculture. I beg to make a few observations before proceeding further, upon the manner in which this inquiry has been conducted. Some years ago the House will recollect that a Commission was appointed on the condition of the hand-loom weavers. That commission sat two years; its inquiries have since been directed to the state of other manufacturing interests; and it is still, I believe, in existence. The inquiry upon the state of the labourers employed in our manufactures, therefore, will have been very fully gone into. But when an application was made to a member of the Cabinet to allow the same Commission to institute a similar inquiry into the state of the labourers employed in husbandry, he refused to do so; but afterwards, he agreed that an inquiry should be made by the Assistant Poor Law Commissioners, but that only thirty days could be allowed for such inquiry. The volume which I hold in my hand is, therefore, the work of four gentlemen during only thirty days; one of these gentlemen, Mr. Austin, set forward on his task, and consumed two days in travelling. He had thus only twenty-eight days to inquire into the condition of the agricultural population in four counties in the south of England. We have, however, some facts elicited on that inquiry, which ought to have drawn forth remarks from hon. Gentlemen opposite, as to the condition of their own constituents. Before I allude to the condition of the agricultural labourers, I wish to state that, whatever may have been the animus which influenced others in investigating the condition of the manufacturing districts, I am actuated by no invidious feeling whatever towards the agriculturists; for, bear in mind, that my conduct has been

throughout marked by consistency towards both. Had I ever concealed the wretched state of the manufacturing operatives, or shrunk from the exposure of their sufferings, my motives might have been open to suspicion in now bringing before your notice the still more depressed condition of the agricultural poor. But I was one of that numerous deputation from the north which, in the spring of 1839, knocked in vain at the door of this House for an inquiry at your bar into the state of the manufacturing population. I was one of the deputies who intruded ourselves (sometimes 500 strong) into the presence of successive Prime Ministers until our importunities became the subject of remark and complaint in this House. From that time to this, we have continued without intermission to make public in every possible way the distress to which the manufacturers were exposed. We did more. We prescribed a remedy for that distress. And I do not hesitate to express my solemn belief that the reason why, in the disturbances which took place, there was no damage done to property in the manufacturing districts was, that the people knew and felt that an inquiry was taking place, by active and competent men, into the cause of their distresses, and from which they had hoped some efficient remedy would result; and I would impress upon hon. Members opposite as the result of my conviction, that if the labouring poor in their districts take a course as diabolical as it is insane—a course which I am sorry to see they have taken in many agricultural localities—of burning property to make known their sufferings—if I might make to those hon. Gentlemen a suggestion, it would be this—that if they had come forward to the House and the country as we, the manufacturers, have done, and made known the sufferings of the labouring population, and prescribed any remedy whatever—if that population had heard a voice promulgating their distresses, and making known their sufferings—if they had seen the sympathies of the country appealed to—I believe it would have had such a humanising and consoling effect upon the minds of the poor and misguided people, that in the blindness of despair they would never have destroyed that property which it was their interest to protect. I have looked through this volume, which is the result of Mr. Austin's twenty-eight days' travels through the agricultural districts, and I find that during that period he visited Somersetshire, Devonshire, Wiltshire, and Dorsetshire. He has given the testimony of various respectable gentlemen in these several localities, as to the condition of the agricultural labourers. Some of these accounts are highly important. The first that I shall refer to is the evidence of the Rev. J. Guthrie, the Vicar of Calne, in Wilts.

"He says (speaking of the agricultural labourers in that district)—'I never could make out how they can live with their present earnings.' Dr. Greenup, M.D., Calne, says: 'In our union the cost of each individual in the workhouse, taking the average of men, women, and children, is 1s. 6d. a week for food only; and buying by tender, and in large quantity, we buy at least 10 per cent. cheaper than the labouring man can. But, without considering this advantage, apply the scale to the poor industrious family. A man, his wife, and two children will require, if properly fed, 6s. weekly; their rent (at least 1s.), and fuel will very nearly swallow up the remainder; but there are yet things to provide—soap and candles, clothes and shoes—shoes to a poor man are a serious expense, as he must have them strong, costing about 12s. a pair, and he will need at least one pair in a year. When I reckon up these things in detail, I am always more and more astonished how the labourers contrive to live at all.' Thos. King, Esq. surgeon, Calne, Wilts., says—'If women and boys who labour in the fields suffer in their health at all, it is not from the work they perform, but the want of food. The food they eat is not bad of its kind, but they have not enough of it, and more animal food would be most desirable; but with the present rate of wages, it is impossible. Their low diet exposes them to certain kinds of diseases, more particularly to those of the stomach.'—Mr. Robert Bowman, farmer and vice-chairman of the Board of Guardians, Calne Union, deposes—'In the great majority of cases the labourer has only the man's wages (8s. or 9s. a week) to live on. On that a man and his wife, and family of four, five, or six children must live, though it is a mystery to me how they do live.' This was the evidence of a farmer.—Mrs. Britton, wife of a farm labourer, says—'We could eat much more bread if we could get it.'—Mrs. Wiltshire, wife of a farm labourer at Cherill, Wilts, in her own pathetic way, says—'Our common drink is burnt crust tea. We also buy about half a pound of sugar a week. We never know what it is to get enough to eat. At the end of the meal, the children would always eat more. Of bread there is never enough. The children are always asking for more at every meal. I then say, "You don't want your father to go to prison, do you?"

That is a specimen of the evidence collected in the South of England, in the purely agricultural districts, by Mr. Austin. I have myself had the opportunity of making considerable observations in the agricultural districts, and I have come to this conviction that the farther you travel from the much-maligned region of tall chimneys and smoke, the less you find the wages of labourers to be; the more I leave behind me Lancashire and the northern parts of England, the worse is the condition of the labourers, and the less is the quantity of food they have. Does not this, I will ask, answer the argument that the agricultural labourer derives protection from the Corn Laws? Now, what I wish to bring out before the Committee is not merely that, in the abstract and as a general principle, the working class can never be benefitted by high prices occasioned by scarcity of food, but, that even during your casual high prices, caused by scarcity, the agricultural labourers always suffer. Pauperism increases as the price of food rises—and, in short, the price of the loaf is in a direct ratio proof of the increase of pauperism. ["No, no."] An hon. Gentleman says, "No, no." I hope I shall have him on the Committee, and if he will only hear me out, I am sure I shall persuade him to vote for the Committee. With regard to the condition of the agricultural labourer, I have taken some pains to ascertain what has been the relative progress of wages and rents in agricultural districts. I know that this is a very sore point indeed for hon. Members opposite, but I must tell them that in those very districts of Wilts and Dorset the wages of labour, as measured in food, are lower now than they were sixty years ago, while the rent of land has increased from two-and-a-half to threefold. Mind, I don't pretend to decide whether with a Free Trade rents might not have advanced even fivefold, but I do contend that, under those circumstances, the increased value of land could have only followed the increased prosperity of every portion of the industrious community; and so long as you maintain a law for enhancing prices by scarcity, and raising artificial rents for a time and by the most suicidal process, out of the privations of the consumers, you must not be surprised if you are called upon to show how the system works upon those for whose benefit you profess to uphold the law. I find that the following were the ordinary wages of the common agricultural day-labourers previous to the rise of prices after 1790, taken from the accounts of the respective counties, drawn up for the Board of Agriculture; not including hay time and harvest:—

Average price of wheat.....	44s. 6d.
Devonshire.....	6s. to 7s. 6d. per week.
Wiltshire.....	6s. to 7s. "
Somersetshire.....	7s. to 9s. "
Dorset.....	6s. to 6s. 6d. "
(With wheat at 5s. a bushel.)
Gloucester.....	7s. to 10s. per week.

Since that period money wages have hardly increased in those districts, and wages computed in food have certainly declined, while rent has progressed from 200 to 250 per cent. I will mention another fact illustrative of the relative progress of rents and wages. When lately attending a meeting at Gloucester, I heard a gentleman say publicly that he had recently sold an estate which had belonged to his great-grandfather, and which brought him ten times the price his ancestor had given for it. But what, in the same time, has been the course of wages? It is stated in a work, attributed to Justice Hale, published in 1683, upon the condition of the working classes, that the wages of a farm labourer in Gloucestershire were 10s. a week, and he remarks, "Unless the earnings of a family, consisting of the father, mother, and four children, amount to that sum, they must make it up, I suppose, by begging or stealing." Wheat was then 36s. a quarter. Now that wheat is 40 per cent. higher, the average wages in Gloucestershire are only 8s. to 9s., and in many cases 7s. and 6s. And Mr. Hunt, a farmer in Gloucestershire, who is also a guardian of the poor, stated publicly at the same meeting, that in his district it was found when relief was applied for, that in many instances families, who were endeavouring to exist on wages, were, taking the number of the family into account, only obtaining one-half the amount which their maintenance would cost in the workhouse. Mr. Hunt also stated that directions having been received by the guardians of the Union to keep the poor who were inmates of the Workhouse upon as low a diet as the able-bodied labourer and his family could obtain out of it, they were, on inquiry, startled at the small quantity of food upon which, from the low rate of wages, the labouring population were forced to subsist; and upon referring the point to the medical officer of the Union, he reported that it would not be safe to feed the able-bodied paupers upon the scale of food which they were getting out of the Workhouse. Hitherto I have spoken of the food of the agricultural population; and when we speak of food, it implies lodging, clothing—it implies morality, Education, ay, and I fear, religion, and everything pertaining to the social comforts and morals of the people. I have informed the House in what manner that population is fed; but there is another point in the volume before me which most especially calls for the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite—I refer to the lodging of the agricultural poor. That is a point that more nearly concerns, if possible, the character of the landowner than, perhaps, the question of food. Mr. Austin in the report from which I have before quoted, in reference to the four counties I have enumerated, says:—

“The want of sufficient accommodation seems universal. At Stourpaine, a village near Blandford, Dorset, I measured a bedroom in a cottage. The room was ten feet square, not reckoning the two small recesses by the side of the chimney, about eighteen inches deep. The roof was the thatch, the middle of the chamber being about seven feet high. Eleven persons slept in three beds in this room. The first bed was occupied by the father and mother, a little boy, Jeremiah, aged one year and a half, and an infant, aged four months; second bed was occupied by the three daughters—the two eldest, Sarah and Elizabeth, twins, age twenty, and Mary, aged seven; third bed was occupied by the four sons—Silas, aged seventeen, John, aged fifteen, James, aged fourteen, and Elias, aged ten. There was no curtain, or any kind of separation between the beds.”

Mr. Phelps, an agent of the Marquess of Lansdowne, says,—

“I was engaged in taking the late census in Bremhill Parish, and in one case, in Studley, I found twenty-nine people living under one roof; amongst them were married men and women, and young people of nearly all ages. In Studley it is not at all uncommon for a whole family to sleep in the same room. The number of bastards in that place is very great.”

The hon. and Rev. S. Godolphin Osborne, Rector of Bryanston, Dorset, says,—

“Within this last year I saw in a room, about thirteen feet square, three beds; on the first lay the mother, a widow, dying of consumption; on the second, two unmarried daughters, one eighteen years of age, the other twelve; on the third, a young married couple, whom I myself had married two days before. A married woman, of thorough good character, told me a few weeks ago that on her confinement, so crowded with children is her one room, they are obliged to put her on the floor in the middle of the room, that they may pay her the requisite attention; she spoke of this as to her the most painful part of that, her hour of trial.”

Mr. Thomas Fox, Solicitor, Beaminster, Dorset, in his evidence to Mr. Austin, says:—

“I regret that I cannot take you to the parish of Hook (near here), the whole parish belonging to the Duke of Cleveland, occupied by a tenant of the name of Rawlings, where the residences of the labourers are as bad as it is possible you can conceive; many of them without chambers, earth floors, not ceiled or plastered; and the consequence is, that the inhabitants are the poorest—the worst off in the country.”

He is asked:—

“Are you of opinion that such a want of proper accommodation for sleeping must tend very much to demoralize the families of the labouring population?—There can be no doubt of it; and the worst of consequences have arisen from it, even between brothers and sisters.”

Mr. Malachi Fisher, of Blandford, Dorset, says:—

“That in Milton Abbas, on the average of the late census, there were thirty-six persons in each house. It is not an uncommon thing for two families, who are near neighbours, to place all the females in one cottage, and the males in another.”

And Mr. Austin, in his report, says:—

“The sleeping of boys and girls, young men and young women, in the same room, in beds almost touching one another, must have the effect of breaking down the great barriers between the sexes: the sense of modesty and decency on the part of women, and respect for the other sex on the part of the men. The consequence of the want of proper accommodation for sleeping in the cottages are seen in the early licentiousness of the rural districts; licentiousness which has not always respected the family relationship.”

I am by no means desirous of using excitable language or harsh terms in anything I may have to address to the House upon this subject; but I should not do justice to my own feelings if I failed to express my strong indignation at the conduct of those owners of land who permit men, bred on the soil, born on their territory, to remain in the condition in which the labouring population of Dorsetshire appear, not occasionally, but habitually, to exist. [Lord Ashley: Hear.] I am glad to hear that cheer from his Lordship; I should have expected as much. You talk to us about the crowding together of the labouring population in the manufacturing towns, and charge that upon the manufacturer and the mill-owner, forgetting that the crowding together in towns cannot come under the cognizance of particular individuals or employers; but in the agricultural districts, we find the large proprietors of land, who will not allow any other person to erect a stick or a stone, or to build a cottage upon their estates, nevertheless permitting men, for whose welfare they are responsible, to herd in this beastly state, in dwellings worse than the wigwags of the American Indians. When we see these things, I repeat, that the persons by whom they are permitted to continue, deserve to be visited with the most unqualified reprobation of this House. It was well said by the late Mr. Drummond, "that property has its duties as well as its rights," but these duties are grossly neglected when a Commissioner from the Government can find people living in such pig-sties—or worse than pig-sties—as have been described. I have alluded to the evidence of the Rev. Godolphin Osborne. I have not the honour to be acquainted with that gentleman, and I have no doubt that in political matters we differ "wide as the poles," but I cannot but admire him or any other man who will come forward and express his opinion, and make public the state of a population so degraded. That gentleman, in a letter lately written, says:

"Our poor live on the borders of destitution * * * From one year's end to another, there are many labouring families that scarcely touch, in the way of food, anything but bread and potatoes, with now and then some bacon. Bread is in almost every cottage the chief food of the children, and, when I know of what that bread is often made, I am not surprised at the great prevalence amongst the children of the labourers, of diseases known to proceed from an improper or too stinted diet * * * The wages paid by farmers I do not find exceeding 8s., except, perhaps, in the case of the shepherd or carter. In many parishes only 7s. a-week are paid. * * * A clergyman in this Union states to me, that he had lately had four blankets sent to him to dispose of. In making inquiry for the most proper objects, he found in fifteen families in his parish, consisting of eighty-four individuals, there were only thirty-three beds, and thirty-five blankets, being about three persons to one bed, with one blanket. Of the thirty-five blankets, ten were in good condition, having been given them within the last four years, the other twenty-five were mere patched rags."

Bear in mind that I am describing no sudden crisis of distress, such as occasionally takes place in the manufacturing districts, but the ordinary condition of the people. The strikes and tumults of which you hear so much in those districts, are the struggles of the operatives against being reduced from their comparatively comfortable earnings to the deplorable condition in which the agricultural population have sunk unconsciously, and, I am afraid to think, contentedly. Speaking of the Union of Tarrant Hinton, the same reverend gentleman says:—

"In Tarrant Hinton parish, a father, mother, married daughter and her husband, an infant, a blind boy of sixteen, and two girls, occupying one bedroom; next door, a father, mother, and six children, the eldest boy sixteen years of age, in one bedroom; two doors below, a mother, a daughter with two bastards, another daughter, her husband, and two children, another daughter and her husband, one bedroom and a sort of landing, the house in a most dilapidated state! It is not one property or one parish alone, on or in which such cases exist; the crowded state of the cottages generally, is a thing known to every one who has occasion to go amongst the poor. In one or two cases whole villages might be gone through, and every other house at least would tell the same tale; and I know this to be true out of this Union as well as in it; and in some of these worst localities a rent of from 3*l.* to 5*l.* yearly is charged for a house with only one room below and one above. It may serve to corroborate what I have stated of the crowding of the villages to add, that I have now a list before me of forty families belonging to other parishes in the Union, who are now actually residing in the town of Blandford."

Now, mark! the progress of the evil is this. The landowner refuses to build up new cottages, and permits the old cottages to fall down; and I speak advisedly when I say, that this is the course adopted systematically in Dorsetshire, and the people are driven to Blandford and other towns. And what a population are they thus sending to the manufacturing districts! Why, what are these villages but normal schools of prostitution and vice?

Oh, do not then blame the manufacturers for the state of the population in their towns, while you rear such a people in the country, and drive them there for shelter, when the hovels in which they have dwelt fall down about them. I wish to be understood that in speaking of the condition of the agricultural labourer, and of the wages he receives, I do not intend to cast imputations upon any individual. I attack not individuals, but the system. I say emphatically, I do not attack individuals, but a system. Although I hold the proprietor to be responsible for the state of lodging on his own land, I do not hold him responsible for the rate of wages in his district. I never held the farmers responsible for the want of employment or the price of labour, although it has been foolishly said of me that I did so. I challenge the Argus-eyed opponent I have to deal with, to show that I have ever done so. But, so far from that being the case, I have, in every agricultural district which I have visited, told the labourers "that the farmers cannot give what wages they please—wages are not to be looked upon as charity—the farmers are in no way responsible for low wages—it is the system." I have thus spoken of the food and lodging of the agricultural labourers, and shall content myself with one extract from Mr. Austin's description of their clothing:—

"A change of clothes seems to be out of the question, although necessary not only for cleanliness, but saving of time. It not unfrequently happens, that a woman on returning home from work is obliged to go to bed for an hour or two, to allow her clothes to be dried. It is also by no means uncommon for her, if she should not do this, to put them on again next morning nearly as wet as when she took them off."

Now, what kind of home customers do hon. Gentlemen opposite think these people are to the manufacturers? This is the population, who, according to those hon. Gentlemen, are our best customers. I should be glad for a moment to call the attention of the right hon. the Home Secretary, to the present working of the New Poor Law in Wilts. I have observed in a Wiltshire paper a statement which I will read to the House:—

"In Potterne, an extensive parish on the south-west side of Devizes, in which reside two country Gentlemen, who are magistrates, considerable landowners, and staunch advocates of the Corn Laws, besides other Gentlemen of station and of wealth, this plan of letting the labourers has been adopted; and the following are the prices which are put on those poor fellows who cannot get work at the average rate of 7s. a-week, and of whom, we understand, there are, or lately were, about forty:—Able-bodied single men, 2s. 6d. a-week; ditto married men, 4s.; ditto with two or three children, 5s.; ditto with large families, 6s. a-week: At these rates, then—fixed with reference to the number of mouths to be fed, and not according to the ability of the parties as workmen, the object clearly being to reduce the poor's rate—may any person in the parish, or out of it either, we presume, command the services of any of these forty unfortunates. We say command, for these independent labourers, 'bold peasantry, their country's pride,' have no voice in the matter; they have not even the option of going into the Union-house while any one can be found willing to use up their sinews and their bones at this starvation price."

I have seen this in the Independent Wiltshire newspaper, and have taken it down, and had the names of the parties sent to me corroborating it. And is not this, I will ask, quite inconsistent with what is the understood principle of the Poor Law? Here is a sliding tariff of wages beginning at 2s. 6d., and ending at 6s., the men who are the victims of the system having no more voice in the matter than the negro slaves of Louisiana? Now, I put it to you who are the supporters of the Corn Law—can you, in the face of facts like these, persist in upholding such a system? I would not, were I in your position, be a party to such a course—no, nothing on earth should bribe me to it—with such evidence at your doors of the mischiefs you are inflicting. I have alluded to the condition of the people in four of the southern counties of England—in Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and Devonshire; and what I have stated in regard to those places would apply, I fear, to all the purely rural counties in the kingdom, unless you go northward, where the demand for labour in the manufacturing districts raises the rate of wages on the land in the neighbourhood. The hon. and gallant Member for Lincoln says no; and I will concede to the hon. and gallant Member, for I have no wish to excite his temper by contradicting him, that it is not so in Lincolnshire, I admit there is an exception to the general rule in regard to that county—there, I believe both the labourers and farmers are in a much better condition than in the south. But I am referring to the condition of the agricultural population generally. And when we look at the orderly conduct of that population, at the patience exhibited by them under their own sufferings and privations—fortified, as it were, by endurance so much, that we scarcely hear a complaint from them, I am sure such a population will meet with the sympathies of this House, and that the noble Lord, the Member for Dorset (Lord Ashley), whom I see opposite, and whose humane interference on behalf of the factory labourers is the theme of admiration, will extend to the agricultural population that sympathy which has been so beneficial in ameliorating the condition of a large portion of the labouring people. But where are the Scotch county Members, that they have nothing to say? In that country there is an agricultural population, that as far as their conduct is concerned, would do honour to any country. Yet I find the following description of the diet of these labourers in a Scotch paper:—

“In East Lothian the bread used by hinds and other agricultural labourers is a mixture of barley, peas, and beans, ground into meal; and you will understand its appearance when we inform you that it is very like the rape and oil cakes used for feeding cattle and manuring the fields; and it is very indigestible coarse food.”

And I have received from a trustworthy person a letter, giving me the subjoined account of the peasantry of the county of Forfar:—

“In this county (Forfarshire), the mode of engaging farm-servants is from Whitsunday to Whitsunday; in some cases the period of engagement is only for half a year. The present average rate of wages is 11*l.* per annum, or a fraction more than 4*s.* per week, with the addition of two pecks or 16*lbs.* of oatmeal, and seven Scotch pints of milk weekly. The amount of wages may be stated thus:—

Money	-	-	4 s. 0 d.
Oatmeal, two pecks at 10 d.	-	1	8
Seven pints of milk at 2 d.	-	1	2

Total weekly wages - 6 10

That is the current weekly wages of an able-bodied agricultural labourer. An old man—that is, a man a little beyond the prime of life—if employed at all, his wages are considerably lower. The universal food of the agricultural labourers in Forfarshire is what is locally called ‘brose,’ which is merely a mixture of oatmeal and boiling water; the meal is not boiled, only the boiling water poured on it. There is no variation in this mode of living; butcher’s meat, wheaten bread, sugar, tea, or coffee, they never taste. The outhouses they live in are called ‘bothies,’ and more wretched hovels than these bothies are not to be found among the wigwams of the uncivilized Africans.”

It really would appear, from the slight notice taken here of the state of suffering in the rural districts, that the County Members were sent up to this House to conceal rather than to disclose the condition of the people they left behind them. Then there is the case of Wales. There can be no excuse for ignorance as to the state of the Welsh people, for during the time of the recent disturbances we had the account given by the Times reporter, corroborated by persons living in the locality, shewing clearly what was the condition of both the farmer and the labourer in that country. In one of those accounts it was stated:—

“The main cause, however, of the disturbances is beyond question the abject poverty of the people. The small farmer here breakfasts on oatmeal and water boiled, called ‘duffery’ or ‘flummary,’ or on a few mashed potatoes left from the previous night’s supper. He dines on potatoes and butter-milk, with sometimes a little white Welsh cheese and barley bread, and as an occasional treat, has a salt herring. Fresh meat is never seen on the farmer’s table. He sups on mashed potatoes. His butter he never tastes; he sells it to pay his rent. The pigs he feeds are sold to pay his rent. As for beef or mutton, they are quite out of the question—they never form the farmer’s food.”

Then as to the labourer:—

“The condition of the labourer from inability in the farmer to give him constant employment, is deplorable. They live entirely on potatoes, and have seldom enough of them, having only one meal a day. Being half starved, they are constantly upon the parish. They live in mud cottages, with only one room for sleeping, cooking, and living—different ages and sexes herding together. Their cottages have no windows, but a hole through the mud wall to admit the air and light, into which a bundle of rags or turf is thrust at night to stop it up. The thinly-thatched roofs are seldom drop-dry, and the mud floor becomes consequently damp and wet, and dirty almost as the road; and, to complete the wretched picture, huddled in a corner are the rags and straw of which their beds are composed.”

I have now glanced at the condition of the agricultural population in England, Scotland, and Wales. You have too recently heard the tales of its suffering to require that I should go across the Channel to the Sister Island with its two millions and a half of paupers; yet bear in mind, for we are apt to forget it, in that country there is a duty this day of 18*s.* a quarter upon the import of foreign wheat. Will it be believed in future ages, that in a country periodically on the point of actual famine—at a time when its inhabitants subsisted on the lowest food, the very roots of the earth—there was a law in existence which virtually prohibited the importation of bread! I have given you some idea of the ordinary condition of the agricultural labourers when at home: I have alluded to their forced migration from the agricultural districts to the towns; and I will now quote from the report of the London Fever Hospital, a description of the state in which they reach the metropolis:—

“ Doctor Southwood Smith has just given his annual report upon the state of the London Fever Hospital during the past year, from which it appears that the admissions during the period were 1462, being an excess of 418 above that of any preceding year. A large proportion of the inmates were agricultural labourers or provincial mechanics, who had come to London in search of employment, and who were seized with the malady either on the road or soon after their arrival, evincing the close connexion between fever and destitution. These poor creatures ascribed their illness, some of them to the sleeping by the sides of hedges, and others to a want of clothing, many of them being without stockings, shirts, shoes, or any apparel capable of defending them from the inclemency of the weather; while the larger number attributed it to want of food, being driven by hunger to eat raw vegetables, turnips and rotten apples. Their disease was attended with such extreme prostration as generally to require the administration of an unusually large proportion of wine, brandy, and ammonia and other stimulants. The gross mortality was 15½ per cent. An unprecedented number of nurses and other servants of the hospital were attacked with fever, namely twenty-nine, of whom six died.”

I have another account from the Marlborough-street police report, bearing upon the same point which is as follows:—

“ Marlborough-street.—The Mendicity Society constables and the police have brought a considerable number of beggars to this court recently. The majority of these persons are country labourers, and their excuse for vagrancy has been of the same character—inability to get work from the farmers, and impossibility of supporting themselves and families on the wages offered them when employment is to be had. It is impossible to describe the wretched appearance of these men, most of whom are able-bodied labourers, capable of performing a hard day's work, and, according to their own statements, willing to do so, provided they could get anything to do. A great many of these vagrant agricultural labourers have neither stockings nor shoes on their feet, and their ragged and famished appearance exceeds in wretchedness that of the Irish peasantry who find their way to this metropolis. The magistrates, in almost every instance, found themselves obliged to send these destitute persons to prison for a short period, as the only means of temporarily rescuing them from starvation. Several individuals belonging to this class of beggars were yesterday committed.”

You have here the condition of the agricultural labourers when they fly to the towns. You have already heard what was their condition in the country, and now I appeal to honourable Members opposite, whether theirs is a case with which to come before the country to justify the maintenance of the Corn Laws? Why, you are nonsuited, and put out of court; you have not a word to say. If you could shew in the agricultural labourers a blooming and healthy population, well clothed and well fed, and living in houses fit for men to live in—if this could be shewn as the effects of the Corn Laws, there might be some ground for appealing to the feelings of the House to permit an injustice to continue while they knew that they were benefiting a large portion of their fellow countrymen. But when we know, and can prove from the facts before us, that the greatest scarcity of food is to be found in the midst of the agricultural population, and that protection does not, as its advocates allege, benefit the farmer or the labourer, you have not a solitary pretext remaining, and I recommend you at once to give up the system which you can no longer stand before the country and maintain. The facts I have stated are capable of corroboration. Before a Select Committee we can obtain as much evidence as we want to shew the state of the agricultural population. We may get that evidence in less time and more satisfactorily before a Select Committee than through a Commission. Though I by no means wish to undervalue inquiries conducted by Commissions, which in many cases are very useful, I am of opinion that an inquiry such as I propose, would be carried on with more satisfaction and with less loss of time by a Select Committee than by a Commission. There is no tribunal so fair as a Select Committee; Members of both sides are upon it, witnesses are examined and cross-examined, doubts and difficulties are removed, and the real facts are arrived at. Besides the facts I have stated, if you appoint a Committee, the landlords may obtain evidence which will go far to help them out of their own difficulty—viz., the means of giving employment to the people. The great want is employment, and if it is not found, where do you suppose will present evils end, when you consider the rapid way in which the population is increasing? You may in a Committee receive valuable suggestions from practical agriculturists—suggestions which may assist you in devising means for providing employment. There may be men examined more capable of giving an opinion, and more competent to help you out of this dilemma, than any you could have had some years ago. You may now have the evidence of men who have given their attention as to what can be done with the soil. Drain tiles are beginning to shew themselves on the surface of the land in many counties. Why should they not always be placed under the surface, and why should not such improvements give employment to the labourers? You do not want Acts of Parliament to protect the farmer—you want improvements, outlays, bargains, leases, fresh terms. A farmer before my Committee will tell you that you may employ more labourers by breaking up land which has lain for hundreds of years in grass, or rather in moss, to please some eccentric landowner, who prefers a piece of green turf to seeing the plough turning up its furrows. This coxcombry of some landlords would disappear before the good sense of the Earl of Ducie. You may derive advantage from examining men who look upon land as we manufacturers do upon the raw material of the fabrics which we make—who will not look upon it with that superstitious veneration and that abhorrence of change with which landlords have been taught to regard their acres, but as something on which to give employment to the people, and which by the application to it of increased intelligence, energy, and capital, may produce increased returns of wealth. But we shall have another advantage from my Committee. Recollect that hitherto you have never heard the two sides of the question in the Committees which have sat to inquire into agricultural subjects; and I press this fact on the notice of the right hon. Baronet opposite as a strong appeal to him. I have looked back upon the evidence taken before these Committees, and I find that in none of them were both sides of the question fairly stated. All the witnesses examined were protectionists—all the members of all the Committees were protectionists. We have never yet heard an enlightened agriculturist plead the opposite side of the question. It is upon these grounds that I press this Motion upon hon. Gentlemen opposite. I want to have further evidence. I do not want a man to be examined who is not a farmer or landowner. I would respectfully ask the Earl of Ducie and Earl Spencer to be examined first. And then hon. Gentlemen could send for the Dukes of Buckingham and Richmond. I should like nothing better than that—nothing better than to submit these four noblemen to a cross-examination. I would take your two witnesses and you would take mine, and the country should decide between us. Nothing would so much tend to diffuse sound views as such an examination. But you have even Members on your own side who will help me to make out my case. There is the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Pusey); he knows of what land is capable—he knows what land wants, and he knows well that in the districts where the most unskilful farming prevails, there does pauperism exist to the greatest extent. What does he say to you? Why, he advises that—

“More drains may be cut, more chalk be laid on the downs, the wolds, and the clays; marl on the sand, clay on the fens and heaths, lime on the moors, many of which should be broken up; that old ploughs be cast away, the number of horses reduced, good breeds of cattle extended, stock fattened where it has hitherto been starved, root crops drilled and better dunged; new kinds of those crops cultivated, and artificial manures of ascertained usefulness purchased.”

Why, it appears from the testimony of our own side, that you are doing nothing right. There is nothing about your agriculture which does not want improving. Suppose that you could shew that we are wrong in all our manufacturing processes—suppose a theorist could come to my business, which is manufacturing garments, and which I take it, is almost as necessary, and why not as honourable, in a civilized country, and with a climate like ours, as manufacturing food; suppose, I say, a theoretical chemist, book in hand, should come to me and say, “You must bring indigo from India, madder from France, gum from Africa, and cotton from America, and you must compound and work them scientifically so as to make gown pieces, to be sold for 3s. each garment." Why, my answer would be, "We do it already." We require no theorist to tell us how to perform our labour. If we could not do this, how could we carry on the competition which we do with other nations? But you are condemned by your own witnesses; you have the materials for the amelioration of your soils at your own doors: you have the chalk and clay, and marl and sand, which ought to be intermingled, and yet you must have people writing books to tell you how to do it. We may make a great advance if we get this Committee; you may have the majority of its Members protectionists if you will. I am quite willing that such should be the arrangement. I know it is understood—at least, there is a sort of etiquette—that the Mover for a Committee should, in the event of its being granted, preside over it as Chairman: I waive all pretensions of the sort—I give up all claims—I only ask to be present as an individual Member. What objections there can be to the Committee I cannot understand. Are you afraid that to grant it will increase agitation? I ask the hon. Baronet, the Member for Essex (Sir J. Tyrell), whether he thinks the agitation is going down in his part of the country? I rather think there is a good deal of agitation going on there now. Do you really think that the appointment of a dozen Gentlemen to sit in a quiet room up stairs, and hear evidence, will add to the excitement out of doors? Why, by granting my Committee you will be withdrawing me from the agitation for one. But I tell you that you will raise excitement still higher than it is if you allow me to go down to your constituents—your vote against the Committee in my hand—and allow me to say to them, "I only asked for inquiry; I offered the landlords a majority of their own party; I offered them to go into Committee, not as a Chairman, but as an individual Member; I offered them all possible advantages, and yet they would not, they dared not grant a Committee of inquiry into your condition." I repeat to you I desire no advantages. Let us have the Committee. Let us set to work attempting to elicit sound information, and to benefit our common country. I believe that much good may be done by adopting the course which I propose. I tell you that your boasted system is not protection, but destruction to agriculture. Let us see if we cannot counteract some of the foolishness—I will not call it by a harsher name—of the doings of those who, under the pretence of protecting native industry, are inviting the farmer not to depend upon his own energy and skill, and capital, but to come here and look for the protection of an Act of Parliament. Let us have a Committee, and see if we cannot elicit facts which may counteract the folly of those who are persuading the farmer to prefer acts of Parliament to draining and subsoiling, and to be looking to the laws of this House when he should be studying the laws of nature. I cannot imagine anything more demoralising—yes, that is the word—more demoralising than for you to tell the farmers that they cannot compete with foreigners. You bring long rows of figures, of delusive accounts, shewing that the cultivation of an acre of wheat costs 6*l.* or 8*l.* per year. You put every impediment in the way of the farmers trying to do what they ought to do. And can you think that this is the way to make people succeed? How should we manufacturers get on, if, when we got a pattern as a specimen of the productions of the rival manufacturer, we brought all our people together and said, "It is quite clear that we cannot compete with this foreigner; it is quite useless our attempting to compete with Germany or America; why we cannot produce goods at the price at which they do." But how do we act in reality? We call our men together, and say "So-and-so is producing goods at such a price; but we are Englishmen, and what America or Germany can do, we can do also." I repeat, that the opposite system, which you go upon, is demoralising the farmers. Nor have you any right to call out, with the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire—you have no right to go down occasionally to your constituencies and tell the farmers, "You must not plod on as your grandfathers did before you; you must not put your hands behind your backs, and drag one foot after the other in the old fashioned style of going to work." I say you have no right to hold such language to the farmer. Who makes them plod on like their grandfathers? Who makes them put their hands behind their backs? Why, the men who go to Lancashire and talk of the danger of pouring in of foreign corn from a certain province in Russia, which shall be nameless—the men who tell the farmers to look to this House for protective Acts instead of their own energies—instead of to those capabilities which, were they properly brought out, would make the English farmer equal to—perhaps superior to—any in the world. Because I believe that the existing system is worse for the farmer than for the manufacturer—because I believe that great good to both would result from an inquiry—because I believe that the present system robs the earth of its fertility, and the labourer of his hire, deprives the people of subsistence, and the farmer of feelings of honest independence, I hope, Sir, that the House will accede to my Motion for “A Select Committee to inquire into the effects of protective duties on imports upon the interests of the tenant-farmers and farm-labourers of this country.”

Mr. Gladstone congratulated the hon. Gentleman on the tone and temper of the speech which he had just made. The hon. Gentleman had introduced, with an apology creditable to his feelings, an indignant mention of a certain case, with the particulars of which he was not entirely unacquainted, in Dorsetshire; and in which he stated that a number of human beings were living together in a wretched hovel, under circumstances the most degrading to them, and the most discreditable to those who were placed over them. He was quite certain that the hon. Gentleman might reckon on finding those feelings of sorrow and indignation with which he contemplated such cases in the rural districts—he might reckon on finding abundant sympathy with that sorrow and indignation on both sides of the House. He apprehended that one of the most important practical considerations connected with the maintenance of the agricultural system, was the conviction that among the rural population kindly ties did prevail, and did connect different ranks together, and that upon the part of those who did own land a sense of personal responsibility existed for the condition of those living under them. And when the hon. Gentleman pointed out such cases as that he had referred to, he did feel that he was cutting the ground from under their feet; and if it could be shown that that exceptional case which the hon. Gentleman had stated was to be viewed as an example of the generally existing state of things in the rural districts—if it could be shown that the owners of land and the owners of houses were indifferent to the comforts of those who occupied their property, then he granted to the hon. Gentleman that he had succeeded in removing one of the most powerful impediments to our following in the course which he recommended. Now, as to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, and as to the speech by which he introduced it, he must confess that he did not think that the latter quite corresponded with the former. The Motion was for “a Select Committee to inquire into the effects of Protective Duties on Imports upon the interests of the tenant-farmers and the farm-labourers of this country?” But, as he followed the speech of the hon. Gentleman, it appeared to him very difficult to discover what really should be the object and scope of the inquiries of such a Select Committee as the hon. Gentleman proposed to constitute. In different parts of his speech, the hon. Member indicated many subjects for inquiry separate and distinct from each other. Some of these seemed to be capable of reference to a Select Committee, there were others which could not advantageously be so referred, but certainly the result would be most unfortunate were a Committee to entertain both classes of subjects in connection. The hon. Gentleman bestowed a large part of his speech upon the description of the rural population in particular districts, but he did think that the hon. Gentleman had imparted some degree of exaggeration to that portion of his address. The hon. Gentleman said—after describing some particular spots and parishes—that he had now given the House an account of the condition of such and such a county; now he thought that this was by no means a fair way of proceeding, nor was the hon. Gentleman's subsequent plan of argument more so; for, after having extended his account from the narrow basis of parishes and particular spots to four counties—he made the still more unreasonable statement, that these four counties represented, with the exception of Lincolnshire—in coming to which the hon. Member seemed to anticipate the hon. Member for Lincoln—the condition of the whole of the purely rural districts of England. It might be true that, not only in these four counties, but in other agricultural districts, a low rate of wages—much lower than he would wish to see—prevailed; and if the hon. Member had confined himself to a demand for a Committee to inquire into the state of the Agricultural Population, such a proposition would have been a very different one from that before the House. But the hon. Member had combined in his Motion, with an examination of the state of the labouring population, a number of difficult questions of political economy, and a number of other difficult questions, with which strong party feeling was much mixed up. Could, then, the hon. Member think—knowing by what sentiments the minds of men on both sides were governed—could he think that he would obtain a calm and dispassionate inquiry into the circumstances of the agricultural labouring population, by combining with that inquiry a reference to the irritating and exciting topics which belonged to the general subject of protection. If the hon. Gentleman could prevail upon the House to grant him that Committee—whatever might be its result, with respect to the doctrines of political economy which the hon. Gentleman wished to establish, the hon. Gentleman would find, that instead of having taking the best mode of laying the grounds for the application of a remedy to agricultural distress—that he had sacrificed all hopes of advantage by the unfortunate combination of his object with questions of political economy. In another part of his speech the hon. Gentleman had spoken on the subject of agricultural improvement, and had quoted some advice of the hon. Member for Berkshire, with reference to the subject, which did that hon. Gentleman the greatest honour. Now, as to improvement, no doubt the hon. Gentleman had the means of drawing comparisons favourable in this respect to the manufacturing interest. Where they had capital in large masses, as in manufactures, they had facilities for the introduction of improvements which they did not possess, when the capital to be expended, as in farming, was more broken into small portions. But how could the hon. Gentleman think that a Committee like that which he proposed to institute would lead to agricultural improvement? It was one of those subjects which, like the condition of the labouring population, might be appreciated by a Committee of Gentlemen earnest in their

inquiries, but which must be investigated with an entire freedom from passion and prejudice. But what would be the effect of an inquiry into the condition of the agricultural population, and mixing up with that inquiry the question of the Corn Laws? Why the effect would be that many Gentlemen favourable to the existing Corn Law would be placed in a false position of hostility to agricultural improvement, and instead of promoting it the Committee would be more likely to retard its course. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the first proposition which he meant to prove in his Committee was, that this House had no power to regulate and controul the prices of agricultural produce. The hon. Gentleman further stated, that there was a belief in 1815, that the price of corn to be guaranteed was 86s. per quarter; that in 1828 the rate had been reduced to 64s.; and that his right hon. Friend near him had stated that the effect of the present Corn Law would be to keep corn at about 56s. per quarter. Now, he must say, that no such statement as the last was made by his right hon. Friend, and such an impression, if it existed in the country, could only exist in the minds of those who were willing to delude themselves. But no hon. Gentleman, he took it, would maintain that the House had the power of keeping up prices, or if any hon. Gentleman, or any party of hon. Gentlemen, held that it was in the power of this House to secure by law a fixed price for corn, then the question would be open, whether the arguments against such hon. Gentlemen could be best brought forward in a Select Committee or in debate. He had certainly heard hon. Gentlemen say, that they would do all they could, by means of legislative enactments, to secure certain prices—that they would secure, so far as they could, a guarantee for certain prices, by excluding foreign corn in certain states of the home markets, and he concluded that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockport did not deny, that they could effect this, inasmuch as he admitted the enhancing influences in prices of the Corn Laws. But as to the proposition, that Parliament had the power to fix prices—before the hon. Gentleman could show reasonable cause to institute a Committee, in order to overthrow that opinion, he ought to show that there were actually persons who held it. The hon. Gentleman went through many other matters which he stated that he intended to investigate if he obtained his Committee: but if that Committee was for any one purpose, it was for the large purpose of converting the House to the politico-economical views which the hon. Gentleman entertained. The hon. Member went round the entire circle of these doctrines. He spoke of the Corn Laws, of the Tariff, of the Wool Duties, and said many things connected with them which he believed to be very true. With respect to the Tariff, the hon. Gentleman stated what he (Mr. Gladstone) confessed he believed to be substantially true. He stated—although would to God it were not so!—he stated that the great reduction which took place in the price of cattle was to be ascribed, not to the importation of foreign cattle under the Tariff, but to the impoverishment of the home consumer. Now, although this might be the case, yet still he thought, that with respect to what was retrospective, they did not require the Committee, and with respect to what was prospective, by mixing up the questions of Corn Laws and protective duties with the question of agricultural improvement, they would be pursuing a most unwise and useless course. But the hon. Member had addressed himself to the question of the proportion in which rent entered into the price of agricultural produce, and he quoted the case of an intelligent agriculturist, who had stated that, in a farm which he occupied, the total expenses of the farm amounted to 790*l.* while the total amount of rent paid was 800*l.* ["No, no."] Well, he was not now prepared to deny the accuracy of the hon. Gentleman or of his informer, but he put it to the hon. Gentleman whether he himself believed that that relation of something more than mere equality between expenses and rent, in the case he had quoted was a fair example of the general state of things in this respect? He would put it to the hon. Gentleman whether he believed that that case fairly represented the proportion between expenses and rent generally existing throughout the country? If he did so believe it, he suspected that he was singular in that belief, and he doubted whether he would find that his informant would coincide with him in this respect. On the other hand, if the hon. Gentleman did not believe his case to be a fair example of the general proportion between rent and expenses, why did he adduce it to the House? But the hon. Gentleman had afterwards modified his arguments, and placed the rent at one-half of the price of the whole produce. But he thought that the hon. Gentleman before he came to this conclusion, must have deducted the whole maintenance of the farmer and his family. He did not allow that to enter into his calculation of the produce. He deducted also the maintenance of persons upon the farm, but if he did so, how could he conceive that he could take such a statement as that which he laid before the House in reference to a farm in Haddingtonshire as a fair representation of the relation between rents and expense? The hon. Gentleman gave it as his emphatic opinion that that on which the whole question depended was, the amount of comforts and commodities which constituted the fund out of which labour was to be paid. But there was another element besides that of the amount to be considered, and that was the distribution. It appeared to him that there was a great error in the school to which the hon. Gentleman belonged—that they were not apt to allow for the influence which habit exercised upon men—that the hon. Member, and those who thought with him, contemplated the transfer of labourers from place to place—from that place where they were born, and their fathers before them—reckoning merely the economical advantages of such a transfer, without allowing anything for the disruption of old ties and associations. [Mr. Cobden; "Employ the labourers at home."] He admitted that when the hon. Member spoke of agricultural improvement, he did express a desire to employ the labourers at home, but when he spoke of the protective system, and of the equalizing tendency of labour, he thought that the hon. Gentleman did omit the most important consideration of the serious mischief which would attend such a violent transaction. As far as his speech went upon protection, the hon. Gentleman appeared to him to argue that question upon mere abstract principles, and not to adapt his arguments to the condition of a country where a protective system had long existed. Nothing could be more distinct than the inquiries: whether, if they had a new community to found, and a new commercial code to establish, they should introduce a protective system, and give encouragement to some one occupation, probably at the expense of another, and whether it would be proper for them, as a legislative body, composed of practical men, to adopt, in a country where they found a system of protection established, a sudden disruption of the relations between great masses of the people which had grown up under that system. As to the condition of the labouring agricultural classes, he thought that the hon. Gentleman had not shown that the depressed condition of that population was fairly ascribable to the Corn Laws. As to the prices of corn, the hon. Gentleman had adopted a tone in this House of which, although he was not prepared to say that it was at variance with the tone adopted by the hon. Gentleman elsewhere, yet he did say that it fixed the standard of reduction in prices which he expected would follow free-trade, on a very moderate scale indeed. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the standard of prices for twelve years gave an average of about 56s. 7d. per quarter. And then he referred to Jersey and the Channel Islands, as showing, on a small scale, what would probably be the working of a free-trade in corn. It appeared, then, from the hon. Gentleman's statement, that during the corresponding twelve years the prices of corn in the Channel Islands showed an average of 48s. He also stated that it was but fair to anticipate that the continental price of corn would be raised by the opening of English ports, and therefore he concluded, that the prices under a free-trade in corn would be from 50s. to 51s. per quarter. He believed, that this avowal would carry considerable weight in certain quarters; but it was rather against those portions of the hon. Gentleman's argument where he spoke of the artificial scarcity, and of the urgent necessity for providing some great improvement in the condition of the capability of the poorer classes to purchase food. But perhaps the hon. Gentleman would maintain, that the charge upon importation not only enhanced prices, but produced irregularity of supply. Many persons however contended, that the Corn Laws had not produced irregularity of supply; and if he wished to do justice to all parties, he would acknowledge, that the parties who had passed the Corn Laws in 1815—the Earls of Liverpool and Ripon—did so under the sincere belief, that they were thereby doing their best to secure to the people the most steady and abundant supply. But there were many of the facts which the hon. Gentleman proposed to prove in his Committee, of which there was no need of a Committee to prove. As to the amount of freight from foreign ports, they were almost bewildered with the facts which they had already collected with reference to that subject. He believed, that the assumed protection on the ground of the cost of freight was sometimes underrated and sometimes overrated, but the facts were already thoroughly examined, and the hon. Gentleman could not go a step further in sifting them if his Select Committee were to sit from the present time to a dissolution. It would be most unwise, then, to appoint a Select Committee for such a purpose. There were many other matters which must come before the Committee—matters, he admitted, less perceptible in the Motion, than the speech of the hon. Gentleman. But let them look at one proposition mooted on the Motion itself. The hon. Gentleman was prepared to show, that protection laws were useless or positively injurious to farmers or farm labourers. Well, many hon. Gentlemen were prepared to argue the very contrary. He had himself heard the hon. Member for Wiltshire argue with great ingenuity and a good deal of truth, that one of the most inconvenient results in effecting any change of the law, was the sudden and violent change as regarded the farmers. The hon. Member for Wiltshire reasoned thus: "The landlord must live; and if he cannot get a fair rent for his land, he will endeavour to effect that object by taking it out of the pockets of the farmer." In point of fact he said, "If you press upon the landlord, you will force him either to farm his own land, or to adopt cheaper modes of cultivation." And he confessed it was no absurd or improbable supposition, that if there was any great pressure on the landlords as a class, they might extend their efforts to new modes of managing or cultivating land. He did not mean new modes of carrying on the process of cultivation; but he meant that other persons, of a different class or description, would settle upon farms, which being no longer dwelt upon by men of limited capital, a system of wholesale management would be introduced, with a view to more economical production. And it was quite possible, that such products might be raised at a cheaper rate when the cultivation of the land was taken out of the hands of the farmer, who held a middle place between the landlord and the labourer. But he did not think, that because such results might be favourable in a general or abstract point of view, it was, therefore, wise to change the present law, and cause a violent revolution in the condition of the farmers. Of course it must follow, on his supposition, that many farmers would be superseded, not having capital enough to carry on the cultivation of their farms under the new system, and, after suffering the greatest inconvenience themselves, must aggravate the evil in the case of others, for whose farms, situated in other places, they would become competitors. Well, again, if one looked to the case of the labourer, there were many who were seriously of opinion that the danger of causing a great and sudden displacement of rural labour was the best and most valid argument against a change in the Corn Laws. No doubt there was great force in it. The hon. Gentleman might think that danger chimerical. In his speech he introduced the allegation that the Corn Laws were opposed to the interests of the landlords, as well as of the farmers and the labourers. In his Motion he separated the landlords from the other two classes, and he left it open to the invidious construction that the landlords were pursuing a course with reference to their own interest alone, and exhibited an inhuman and brutal disregard of the interests of those under them. But was it not perfectly possible that the landlords should be not the most interested but the least interested in the maintenance of the Corn Laws? Did not the hon. Gentleman himself tell us that, in the grazing farms of Northamptonshire, a larger share went to the pockets of the landlords than on land cultivated in corn? No doubt, the hon. Gentleman's speculation, in alluding to this point, was, although there might be a decrease in the growth of corn, yet the increase would be so great in the consuming power of those engaged in manufactures—there would be such an augmentation in the demand for meat and other articles, as must compensate for the detriment arising from the abolition of the Corn Laws, and in that way would be replaced any immediate diminution in the amount of rents. That might or might not be a good argument in the case of landlords. It might be a fair and reasonable thing for the hon. Gentleman to undertake to show that assuming a much larger demand for meat and other articles of agricultural produce, the landlords might on the whole be able to keep up their rents. But how did that argument apply to the labourer? The hon. Gentleman had himself supplied them with information which made the result patent to the most cursory observer. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that little labour was employed on the grazing lands which he instanced, and he glanced at the possibility of such a state of things arising on the repeal of the Corn Laws, as that the landlords might be able to maintain their rents by a different application of the soil. But it must be recollected that a large proportion of agricultural labourers were habituated from youth to employment on the land, and on its continuance they were now wholly dependent; and it was to this he adverted when he ventured to say the hon. Gentleman had not, he thought considered sufficiently the effects of any great and sudden change in the law affecting corn; because the hon. Gentleman must know, that however prosperous the owner of land might ultimately be from the increase in the amount of manufactures, the labourer would be cut off from all hope, deprived of the occupation which supplied his bread; and though others might profit by the change, to him it would be utter ruin. There was one very emphatic passage in the speech of the hon. Gentleman, in which, having referred to a picture of the state of the rural population, he summed up the particulars by asking, "who can be acquainted with these things, and stand up for the Corn Laws?" But the hon. Gentleman forgot to prove that there was any connection between the two. The real question was, not whether the distress existed, but whether the Corn Law was the cause of it. He must confess that part of the hon. Gentleman's argument seemed to him to resemble the precipitate views of some who, seeing in the manufacturing districts some flourishing and having abundance of wages, and others on the other hand living on extremely low wages, and being in great distress, said, like the hon. Gentleman, "can you admit these facts and stand up for manufactures?" The hon. Gentleman would argue that machinery had nothing to do with the distress, just as others were ready to argue the Corn Laws had nothing to do with it in the agricultural districts. They were not then debating the question of the Corn Laws; but the hon. Gentleman was bound to recollect that there were those who maintained, not only that the Corn Laws were not the cause of distress, but that they greatly tended to limit it in the agricultural districts; and he ought not, therefore, to assume without proof, a connection on which the whole argument must depend. Now, as to the assumption that protective laws were opposed to the interests of the tenants and farmer labourers. No doubt these were curious questions of investigation, but surely they were difficult questions of political economy. They could not be investigated on a statement of facts. They were as pure propositions in political economy as any other in Adam Smith, M'Culloch, and Ricardo. The questions how the interests of different classes were affected by protective laws—in what proportion the benefits accrued to each—what were the different modes and channels through which each received its share—were most important, interesting, and difficult questions; but he contended they were not questions on which they with advantage could put men into the witness box and question them as to facts. If there was any ground for the distinction between questions of fact and of opinion, these were questions of opinion, and not of fact. Instead of being fit for the consideration of a Select Committee, they were the very last that should be referred to such a tribunal. And he must say, from the long argument into which the hon. Gentleman entered, it was clear he did not really contemplate a Committee as the best mode of arriving at a practical result; for making a speech in introducing his views, which he discussed with great ability, he had an opportunity of setting forth the impartiality and fairness of the tribunal to which he meant to refer for adjudication, of declaring that he was disposed to be liberal in its composition, and that it should reflect fairly the opinions that prevailed in the House; but it was evident, from the line the hon. Member adopted, that the advantage he anticipated was the consideration of abstract and difficult questions, such as the doctrine of rent. [Mr. Hawes: "Mr. Cobden did not say so."] He was not about to oppose the Motion on this dry ground alone, for there were many others on which he should object to it; but he defied the Committee to investigate the effect of "protective duties on imports," without a full consideration of the different theories referring to the doctrine of rent. The whole question turned on this; what proportion went to the landlord, and what was retained by the farmers. On account, then, of the complicated and unsuitable nature of the subjects which must be investigated, he was opposed to the Motion for a Committee. ["Laughter!"] The hon. Gentlemen opposite could not surely be surprised at his coming to such a conclusion. He asked the hon. Member for Stockport himself whether he did not see good reasons against a Select Committee. What was a Select Committee? It was a body to which, during its sitting, the House might be supposed—he did not mean by any formal compact—to delegate its authority. It was instituted, they all knew, generally to prepare materials to assist the House in forming its judgment on any important question, but one of the most important practical results of the institution of a Committee was, that for the time it put the authority of the House in abeyance on the subject under examination. Was the hon. Gentleman prepared to accede to those terms? Did he mean to exclude the consideration of the Corn Laws while the Committee sat? [Mr. Bright had no objection.] Let the House observe the materials on which this Committee would have to work. First, they were to examine the subject of freights; next the power of Parliament to regulate the price of Corn; then the doctrine of rent; then the condition of the agricultural labourer; and then the whole subject of the agricultural improvement, including all those multiform regulations in which his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire (Mr. Pusey) took so warm an interest. If thirty days were too little for a man acquainted with a county to investigate the condition of the labourers in it, he should like to know how long fifteen Gentlemen advocating fifteen different opinions, would take in examining through a Committee box the condition of the agricultural population in all the districts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It was clear that the hon. Gentleman had better adjourn—he would say sine die—the sittings of the Anti-Corn-Law League, if he were prepared to accede to the terms which the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Bright) would agree to. That hon. Gentleman had no objection to exclude the whole matter from discussion. [Mr. Bright: "In this House."] If the hon. Member were prepared, even as far as this House was concerned, to observe an inviolable silence until this Committee should report—this Committee consisting of a majority of agriculturists—mark the unfortunate predicament he would be placed in if the House were to accept his proposition. He would have placed himself in the hands of a majority of protectionists, who would know that he could not moot the subject in this House until they had made their report, and they would have the power by a majority of voices of prolonging the period of making their Report from Session to Session. But seriously; when they were acquainted with the manner in which the examinations and cross-examinations were conducted in Select Committees of this House, and the way in which every hon. Member who cross-examined a witness endeavoured to induce him to contradict what he before said, did the hon. Gentleman think that agricultural improvement of all descriptions, along with the situation of the rural population in every district, and along with other subjects the most difficult in political economy, could be examined into and reported upon by a Committee in the course of the present Session? He was quite convinced, although the hon. Member was disposed just now to make a very handsome offer, that that hon. Gentleman would not be well supported by those with whom he usually acted, that they would not be bound by his pledge, and that although he himself might be precluded from proposing a Motion and speaking upon the subject, yet others would preserve themselves unfettered. He saw behind the hon. Gentleman the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, who, he believed, within the last few weeks had emphatically signified his intention to bring on the annual discussion on the Corn Law. Of course, when he gave that intimation, he must have been cognisant of the intended proceeding of the hon. Member for Stockport. Was that hon. Gentleman prepared to forego his Motion in case a Select Committee was appointed? [Mr. Villiers: "Certainly not."] Then the House would stultify itself if it appointed a Committee to examine into and report upon a subject which would be discussed in this House at the very time the Committee was engaged in its inquiries. He would not go into detail; for he thought it must be apparent to the common sense of every gentleman who heard him, that to appoint a Committee, and delegate authority and power to it, to examine into a difficult, complicated, and extensive subject, upon which the House meant to vote definitively within the space of a few weeks, and before that Committee could possibly report, must be allowed to be a proceeding that the hon. Gentleman himself did not expect would be seriously entertained; and that in proposing it his object was simply to raise a discussion upon the Corn Law. There were other practical objections to a Committee of this description. The Committee, according to the terms of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, would be perfectly free to inquire, not only into the Protective Duties upon Corn, but into all Protective Duties; and an inquiry into the Duties upon Sugar would, of course, form a prominent feature in their labours. That would be an additional chapter in the labours of the Committee, and would probably occupy them for another Session; and they would, no doubt, institute inquiries into the Protective Duties on various other articles. Now, he must be permitted to express his opinion that if no strong practical reason could be shewn for appointing a Committee of this description, it was a most unfortunate and ill-judged proceeding to adopt such a step; for the measure must have the effect of unsettling the public mind on the subject to which the inquiry related, and of paralysing trade and revenue as far as they were connected with it. They had had some experience on this subject. He would take the case of Sugar, the Duties on which, putting aside their protective character, involved a great revenue—about 5,000,000*l.*; and the article of Sugar formed a most important element of the home trade, as well in the great central markets of this country, as in the most remote and sequestered districts. He contended that there were great objections to inquiries by Committees of that House with respect to such articles, because such a course was likely to exercise a most paralysing effect both upon revenue and trade. He was far from meaning that these objections were in every case to over-rule the reasons for inquiry. There might be very strong and valid reasons for inquiry; but, if such reasons did not exist, he conceived that the disadvantages which must necessarily attend inquiry were of great weight, and deserved careful consideration. In the present case his argument was, that they could do nothing by a Select Committee which they could not do better without it. The topics to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, so far as they related to matters of fact, had already been extensively elucidated by returns and discussion; they were in possession of all the means of discussion, and it was wholly useless to appoint a Committee to prepare those means. The hon. Gentleman had said, "Do you think the appointment of this Committee will add to the agitation on the subject of the Corn Laws?" He thought it would; or at least it would add to what was of much more importance—to apprehension on the subject. With regard to agitation, this country had the happy peculiarity of being able to bear a larger amount of agitation, without serious consequences, than perhaps any other nation in the world; and he believed that there was a strong impression upon the public mind that the exertions of the Anti-Corn-Law League, with which the hon. Member for Manchester was connected—however active, and able, and indefatigable its Members might be—need not, at all events under existing circumstances, so long as it should please Providence to bless the country with the abundance which it now enjoyed, and so long as the Parliament and the Government were firm in redeeming the pledges—expressed or implied—which they had given, be regarded with any very serious apprehensions, and that the most important feature of the meetings was probably the parade and ceremonial with which they were attended. But, if the House consented to the appointment of this Committee, it would be said that legislation was contemplated; and this brought him to the question, "Do we contemplate legislation on the subject of the Corn Laws?" Upon this subject he thought he need not do more than refer to the declaration made, he believed on the very first day of the present Session, by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government. But if they assented to the appointment of this Committee, he conceived that the very fact that the hon.

Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cobden) was the originator of the proposition—a Gentleman whose speeches in that House on the subject of the Corn Laws had been marked by the most unvarying, rigorous and consistent opposition to the Corn Law—would lead parties out of doors to imagine that a proposition for inquiry into the effect of Protective Duties, emanating from such a quarter, was not a general launching of the question for impartial investigation, but indicated a foregone conclusion; and such a measure must have the effect of unsettling public confidence. It was not of alarming the selfish fears of some men that he was afraid, though even from that, mischief might arise; but he did consider it of the very highest importance that confidence should be maintained with regard to the intentions of the Legislature on the subject of the Corn Laws; first, for the sake of the character of the Legislature itself, which he trusted had not reached such a pitch of levity that, without new cause shown, it would be prepared to reverse solemn decisions to which it had come after mature deliberation; and, secondly, because the important subject of the increase of rural employment through the extension of agricultural enterprise—a question the importance of which, he conceived, could not be exaggerated—was involved in the maintenance of this confidence. What would be the effect upon this increase of employment and extension of enterprise, if the House were to indicate any intention of legislating upon the Corn Laws, and to indicate such intention in a manner which, of all others, would, he believed, be the least acceptable that could be chosen, by placing the question in a state of lingering uncertainty, by submitting the subject to the examination of a Committee, which for a long period at least would be utterly unable to present an adequate report? For the sake, then, of the extension of agricultural employment and improvement, and for the sake of the trade of the country, he strongly deprecated the appointment of this Committee.

Mr. Hawes had heard with unfeigned regret the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and who, he conceived, had made a most unsatisfactory reply to the able speech in which his hon. Friend had introduced his Motion. That hon. Gentleman in proposing the appointment of this Committee, had showed that most severe and extensive misery and distress prevailed throughout the country, and he had called upon the House to institute an inquiry into the subject. The right hon. Gentleman had declared that this distress could not be attributed to the Corn Laws; but he was prepared to maintain that it was distinctly traceable to that source. He must say, notwithstanding the personal respect which he entertained for the right hon. Gentleman, that he considered the greater part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was neither more nor less than the most frivolous trifling. Had no Committees been appointed on former occasions to inquire into agricultural affairs? When the subject of agricultural distress was, at a former period, brought before the House, was any objection taken to the settlement of the question of rent, before an inquiry was instituted as to whether protection ought to be increased? But now, when a decrease of protection was demanded, it was objected that the abstract question of rent stood in the way of inquiry. The hon. Member for Stockport had proposed this Motion on the ground that great moral and physical degradation and destitution prevailed throughout the country, and especially in the agricultural districts. The right hon. Gentlemen opposite objected to the institution of such an inquiry, on the ground that a long period must elapse before the Committee could prepare a report; but was that a sufficient answer? The right hon. Gentleman had said, that the question of price must enter into the discussion of this subject. Why, what said the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) when he introduced the Corn Law? He said, that Acts of Parliament could not regulate prices; but, said the right hon. Baronet, "Under the New Corn Law I fully expect you will have a price of 56s. or 58s." The expectations of the right hon. Baronet, however, had not been realized. He must call the attention of the House and of the farmers of this country to a declaration which had been made by the right hon. President of the Board of Trade in the course of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman said, "Grant this Committee, and an expectation will go abroad, that we may legislate on the Corn-laws." And he added, "That while we are blessed with abundant harvests, while Providence enables us to have corn at the same price at which we should obtain it under a system of free-trade, he anticipated there was no reason for legislation." He agreed in the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman, that if they always had abundant harvests—such, for instance, as they had in 1836—they would hear no more about the repeal of the Corn Laws; but did experience justify such an expectation? Had they not recently had four bad harvests; and was a statesman in that House to tell the country, that the maintenance of his law depended only upon the weather—that as long as prices were low he would continue his law, but that when they became high, he would abandon it? Was this a proof of the firmness of Parliament? [Mr. Gladstone: I made no such remark.] He certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, that the existing law was safe while abundant harvests continued. This, he contended, was neither more nor less than a declaration that the legislation of that House upon the important subject of the Corn Laws—affecting rent, on the one hand, and the comforts of the poorest labourers on the other—depended upon the mere accident of weather. The right hon. Gentleman had said, it was surely right that Parliament should abide firmly by the pledges, implied and expressed, which had been given on the subject of the Corn Laws. He had occupied a seat in that House for a considerable time, and certainly, the pledges which were given there were generally rather implied than expressed; but he had heard pledges given which most distinctly implied the maintenance of the old Corn Law; and by no set of men had those implied pledges been more distinctly or definitely given than by the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade. But the people found they could put no faith in those pledges; and, indeed, they ought not to put faith in them. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the introduction of the Corn Law of 1815, and had contended, that the grounds upon which Lord Liverpool introduced that measure were those of maintaining greater abundance and regularity of price. These, however, were not the grounds assigned by Lord Liverpool himself, in a very remarkable speech which he made on the 26th of May, 1820, in a debate relative to the foreign trade of the country, when the noble Earl vindicated the reasons, and explained the grounds on which he introduced and passed that measure. Lord Liverpool said:—

advocated the Corn Bill. In common with all the supporters of that measure, I believed that it was expedient to grant an additional protection to the agriculturist. I thought that after the peculiar situation of this country during a war of twenty years, enjoying a monopoly in some branches of trade, although excluded from others—after the unlimited extent to which speculation in agriculture had been for many years carried, and considering the low comparative price of agricultural produce in most of the countries of Europe; the landed property of the country would be subjected to very considerable inconvenience and distress if some further legislative protection were not afforded to it. I thought the Corn Bill was advisable, with a view of preventing that convulsion in landed property which a change from such a war to such a peace might otherwise produce. On that ground I supported the Corn Bill. During the discussion of that question I recollect that several persons were desirous of instituting a long previous inquiry; and that others, still more erroneously, wished to wait for two or three years to see how things would turn out before they meddled with the subject. At that time I told those who maintained the latter opinion, that it appeared to me to be a most mistaken one. What I recommended was to pass the Corn Bill (and thus to give a further, and under the circumstances, I thought, a proper protection to agriculture); but I delivered it as my opinion, that if it was not passed then, it ought not to be passed at all; and upon this ground, which, whether it be wise or not, is at least intelligible—that I could conceive a case in which it might be expedient to give a further protection to the agriculturist, but that I was persuaded that the worst course which it was possible for the Legislature to adopt was, to hang the question up in doubt and uncertainty; that the consequence of not legislating at all would be that rents would fall,—that a compromise would take place between the owners and occupiers of land,—that the landlord and the tenant would make a new bargain; and that if, after all the distress incident to such changes had passed away, a new Corn Bill should be agreed to, it would be most unequal and unjust in its operation."

Had no new adjustment between landlord and tenant taken place since this period? He had heard the admission from hon. Gentlemen opposite that rents had fallen; and if such a new adjustment had taken place they were bound to give up the Corn Law of Lord Liverpool. The majority which the right hon. Baronet had to support him in his opposition to the repeal of the Corn Laws would not, he thought, prevent that alteration from being ultimately carried into effect. He trusted to the progress of public opinion, led on as it was by the hon. Member for Stockport. It was said, as an objection to the Committee which the hon. Gentleman behind him had moved for, that it would affect the revenue? But had they not had on former occasions Committees of that House on subjects influencing the condition of the revenue. Had they not had Committees upon Sugar, upon Timber, and did not the Chancellor of the Exchequer only last night, assent to a Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose, for a Committee to inquire into the Tobacco trade? That article affected no less than 3,000,000*l.* of revenue, and yet the Committee was not opposed. The right hon. Gentleman said his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport had not traced the distress of the country to the Corn Laws: he (Mr. Hawes) thought his hon. Friend had very clearly done this; and he could refer to one proof of the injury done by the Corn Laws to the working man, where he should least have expected to find anything of so decisive and striking a nature—a Report to the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, in 1841, by Mr. Tremmenheere, one of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of education in Norfolk. That report contained a very strong proof of the great injury which labourers had to bear by reason of the high prices of corn, coupled with the fact that their wages did not rise in the same proportion. It was perfectly obvious, that any law which had this effect must greatly increase the sufferings of the agricultural population, and also the fluctuations in the prices of commodities. The Commissioner compared the wages of two families, one in 1840, making 62*s.* a month, the labourer himself 48*s.* or 12*s.* per week, and his son 14*s.*, or 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, while the flour consumed came to one bag at 53*s.* leaving 9*s.* applicable to the general expenditure of the family; the other family in 1841 making altogether 56*s.*, the labourer himself 44*s.*, at 11*s.* per week, and his son 12*s.* at 3*s.* a week, the consumption, one bag of flour at 42*s.*, leaving 14*s.* applicable to the general purposes of the family. In this case it would be seen that although 6*s.* were added to wages when flour was dear, 11*s.* had been added to the expenditure to purchase flour; and that when wages were high and flour high, the surplus applicable to general purposes was only 9*s.* per month, whereas, when wages were low, and flour low, the surplus applicable to general purposes was 14*s.* When prices were still lower the difference in favour of the labourer was increased, as Mr.

Tremenhere proceeded to shew in further instances. It was clear, therefore, that the Corn Law must have the most injurious influence on prices, and increase the natural fluctuations of employment. The House ought fairly to consider what would be the classes affected if the Committee were appointed. There would be the landlords, as regarded their rents; the farmers, as regarded their profits; and the labourers. If the rent of the land depended on its surplus produce, and if that depended on the capital and skill embarked in its cultivation, the Corn Law must necessarily fail to ensure the greatest amount of production and capital, unless it gave the most perfect security. But did the Corn Laws grant that security? Look at the history of these laws and of agricultural distress. From 1815 to the present time, how many different laws had they had, all of which had gradually broken down, and been swept away! If the right hon. Gentleman with his great abilities, had been able to make out a case favourable to the law in its bearing on the tenant and the labourer, would he not have done it? So far from doing so, the right hon. Gentleman had made a speech, which he did not think could be better described than as admirably seconding the speech of the hon. Member for Stockport. Sure he was that the refusal of the Committee accompanied by that Speech, was likely to have no small effect in stimulating the agitation now prevailing throughout the country. He regretted the refusal to inquire on public grounds; if the right hon. Gentleman would consent, there might be some chance of effecting a settlement at a time when the population of the country was not in a state of excitement and rage, and when the seasons had been comparatively abundant. It was the interest of the landlords and the farmers to agree to such a settlement, if they had not perfect security under the Corn Law, and he defied any body to say they had, notwithstanding the right hon. Gentleman's eulogy on the firmness of the Government. If there was not entire firmness, their opposition to change prevented the application of capital to the land, repressed enterprise, and limited production. Gentlemen opposite had a great horror of free-trade, as the cause of insecurity; but let them look back twenty years in the commercial history of the country, and point out if they could, a single instance to which any material approximation had been made to free-trade principles, that had not conduced to public wealth and abundance. Such had been the effect of all the alterations made by Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Thomson, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite. No doubt every alteration produced a certain portion of evil at the time, but this should be laid at the door of the protectionists, who built their house on a false foundation. He contended, that the final effect of every change had been to increase the industry and the material comforts of the people, and the revenue and moral power of the country. The late Mr. Cobbett, in his Weekly Register, proved that the effect of a change in the Corn Laws would be not to replace English corn by foreign corn, but to add a quantity of foreign grain to the insufficient supply of home-grown corn, which would be paid for by an increased export of manufactures. After all the evidence which had been given before Poor Law Committees, and Hand Loom Weavers' Committees, could it be doubted that the population of this country might consume double the quantity they now did? If this were so, our own agriculturists could not with their utmost efforts increase their produce so far as to supply the additional quantity wanted, or to give every able-bodied labourer a fair meal after his day's work. Unless they could do so, they had no right to tamper with starving men, or put them off with delays; and they were bound to allow our manufactures to be exported in increased quantity in order to procure a larger supply of provisions. Every step they had already made in this path, by letting in Irish corn and French or Prussian corn, had been coincident with an improvement in their trade. In support of these views he could refer to an article which, from the information he had received, he had every reason to believe was written by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in a periodical work of considerable circulation, which it would not be unprofitable to contrast with the speech which the right hon. Gentleman had that night delivered. He thought it too bad that Government having acquired influence by anonymous publications written on liberal principles, should afterwards make use of that influence in defence of protection. The Tariff passed two years ago, was full of instances in which the labour of the country was unsparingly exposed to competition, and at the present time, although Government was only asked not to give up the protection which particular classes enjoyed, but to enquire whether or not it was beneficial—now a Committee to examine the question was refused. The article he had referred to stated that,

"It had now become matter of the most plain and proximate utility, it should rather be said of necessity, as we were now forced into competition in all the markets of the world, to use every effort to cheapen production and relieve the materials of our industry, in the order of their importance, from fiscal exaction; mitigating with a just measure of regard to interests established by law, all partial burthens on trade, by which the community, as a whole, was laid under contributions to support particular interests or classes."

If this were the opinion entertained by Ministers, he said the first thing in the order of importance was corn; and they had no right to trifle with the interests of the labouring classes, and refuse to make any concession for their welfare. Throughout the country, he did not hesitate to say that great disappointment would be felt at the right hon. Gentleman's speech, while he was perfectly sure that that of the hon. Member for Stockport would make a great impression. There were some Gentlemen, who, if they had now to go before their constituents in a populous town of Nottinghamshire, would find that the subject was one of greater importance than by their demeanour they seemed to suppose. He should give his support to the Motion introduced by the hon. Member for Stockport whose speech would sink deep in the minds of the people, and produce before long, great practical effect in the country.

Viscount Pollington observed that within the walls of that House there were of course upon so important a question as the Corn Laws a variety of conflicting opinions, held by individuals whose high station and position before the country entitled them to the highest deference and respect. Great as was his estimation for his hon. Friend the Member for Hull, he could not concur in the whole of the sentiments expressed on this subject on a former evening by his hon. Friend. He did not think that the article of corn was a fair subject for taxation for the purpose of revenue. [Hear]. Before hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered it would be as well they should hear him finish the sentence. He did not think the Corn Laws a fair system of taxation for the sake of revenue, but that they were required, upon the principle and basis of preserving the country independent of foreigners, and for the protection of agriculture. He did not believe there was any greater blessing the people could enjoy than free-trade, but in order to make free-trade a blessing it was necessary that free-trade should be truly free, and not that sort of free-trade of which the right hon. Gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade was so enamoured—that free-trade which would admit the productions of all those countries which systematically opposed the import into their markets of the products of Great Britain. He did hope that the time would come when all the great markets of the world would awaken to their true interests, and by one general agreement consent to trade together in the most free and unrestricted manner, and when all import duties would cease. This he believed they might do without any fear on account of revenue. The greatest Minister who ever ruled this nation had held it was the duty of a nation to depend for its supply of food upon its own natural resources. This principle had been acted upon by the present Government, which by direct taxation had succeeded in obtaining an equilibrium between the income and expenditure of the country. The party opposite, of which the hon. Member for Stockport was at the head, had been put to great shifts in order to further their cause. He would mention one which was a little fact, the child of a "great fact." He alluded to the misrepresentations which had gone forth to the public with reference to Mr. Rand, of Bradford, a gentleman the possessor of a large fortune, and remarkable for intelligence and abilities. On the occasion of the contest for the West Riding of Yorkshire, when Lord Morpeth was thrown out, Mr. Rand had been selected to second the nomination of his hon. Friend who now so ably represented the West Riding (M. J. S. Wortley). Now at the Anti-Corn-Law Meeting lately held at Bradford, it was thought by the League that the first great thing to be achieved was to prevail upon Mr. Rand to take the chair; in this they failed, but succeeded in obtaining the services of a relative of that gentleman of the same name. Upon this, in the leading article of the leading journal of Whiggery, the Morning Chronicle, of the 26th December last, were the following remarks:—

"The comparative leisure of the Christmas holidays enables us to recur to the subject of the great Bradford meeting. The adhesion of Mr. Rand to the League is another proof that the screws are getting loose, and that the beginning of the end is near. Mr. Rand is a Tory manufacturer, chairman of the Tory committee in the Bradford district. In 1841 he preferred his politics to his trade: in 1843 he prefers his trade to his politics. At the hustings where Lord Morpeth was defeated no man was more energetic for the Tories. At the hustings, should such strictures be required this year, we take it, his energy will be on the side of Mr. Cobden. Mr. Rand belongs to a class of persons fast increasing, who are not disposed to sacrifice the commerce of the country to party politics. This, after all, is the class of persons who, in a practical country like England, make and unmake Administrations. We consider, therefore, the appearance of Mr. Rand on the Anti-Corn Law platform with Mr. Cobden, occupying as he did the conspicuous part of chairman, a symptom of great consequence."

Now, so far from Mr. Rand, the Tory chairman of the Bradford district, being the gentleman who presided at the League meeting referred to, he attended the protection meeting lately held at York, and proposed one of the resolutions adopted by the meeting. The noble Lord concluded by declaring his opposition to the motion before the House.

Mr. Francis Scott (Roxburghshire) believed, that although the hon. Member for Stockport was a sincere advocate for the interests of the League, he was not a sincere advocate of the interests of those whose cause he professed to advance, or else why should he exclude the labouring classes from being examined as witnesses before the Select Committee for the appointment of which he now moved? Again the Corn Law of 1815 had nothing to do, nor had it any connexion with the existing law, and it had only been alluded to by the hon. Member, in order to serve party purposes. In the same manner the hon. Member had drawn a most unjust comparison between the position of the interests of the manufacturers and the agriculturists, which he held to be identical with the position of each in 1815, at the close of the last war. The hon. Member had said the landlords kept up scarcity in order to improve their lands; this he denied, for the object and desire of the landlord was the production of plenty—a circumstance proved by the fact, that at the present time with double the population, and with threefold the amount of taxation, the people were fed as cheaply as they were forty or fifty years ago. The hon. Member had referred to the convention of Jersey as a fit test of the advantages of free-trade. Why refer to the smallest island in Europe? Why not have taken any one of the countries of Europe? If he had done so, he would have found from Returns already before the House, that the price of corn for the last fifteen years had been more steady in Great Britain than in any other country in Europe, except Sweden and Switzerland. The hon. Member next referred to the article of wool, as if it afforded an instance of absolute protection. Wool, however, had a greater variation in its prices than corn or any other produce and could not at all bear upon the present question. The next point urged, was the subject of rents, as though the landlords had brought them forward as the sole object for which the Corn Laws were maintained. Now, he should like to know in what proportion rents of land, taken in connexion with the wages of labourers employed on land, stood in comparison with the profits of manufactures taken in connexion with the wages paid to artisans. Rents were the same now as in 1815; the produce of the land was two-fold, and wages remained where they were. On the other hand, the produce of manufactures had increased beyond all imagination; the profits of manufacturers had increased in a similar proportion; but he wished to know whether wages were the same now as formerly, especially those of the handloom weavers and the framework knitters and others. There was no body of men who derived so small a profit on so large an amount of capital as the landlords, and, vice versa, there was no body of men who derived so great profits on so small capital as the manufacturers. He maintained that the labour of the poor man was his capital, and his only capital; and of that capital the hon. Member for Stockport sought to deprive him by the measure he proposed. It was that capital which they on his side of the House, in spite of the obloquy which had been attempted to be cast upon them, were determined to preserve [Cheers]. The hon. Member cheered—he was glad he did so, for it was the poor man's interest he was advocating at the present moment. The hon. Member had again alluded to Dorsetshire. He should leave Dorsetshire to defend itself; but a statement had been made as to the state of other counties which made the heart bleed for the condition of the poor man ; but when he heard the hon. Member refer to Scotland in the same manner, and state that his description of Dorsetshire applied to Scotland, he must say, that he was not indignant, but surprised, at the audacity of the hon. Member in making such a statement. The hon. Member had observed, that the further he was removed from those tall chimneys with which he was so enamoured, and from which he no doubt derived his wealth, in the same proportion he found increase of misery and destitution. He believed that in the same proportion as the hon. Member could remove from those same tall chimneys, in the same proportion he departed from accuracy. The hon. Member had had the assurance to state that the price of labour in Scotland was at an average of 6*s.* 8*d.* per week—that the common wages were 4*s.*, made up in meal, potatoes, and milk, to 6*s.* 8*d.* per week. When he looked at the hon. Member's inaccuracies with regard to Scotland, he could not believe him to be accurate in his statements as to Dorsetshire. When the hon. member alleged that 6*s.* 8*d.* was the average weekly wages in Scotland, he had stated about half ; for from 9*s.* to 12*s.* or 13*s.* per week would give a truer account of the amount of wages in Scotland, and that, too, during the whole year. Were the wages of manufacturers permanent throughout the year? The hon. Member (Mr. Cobden) had next dealt with the questions of produce and tile draining ; of this, the only matter that was clear was, that the hon. Member was entirely ignorant of the subject on which he was speaking. With regard to the state of the manufacturing and agricultural districts, he would allude to statistics which would enable the House to form some criterion on the comparative condition of each. In the first place, as to the duration of life, it appeared that in an average taken for a period of thirty years, the duration of life was thirty-eight years in the agricultural, and only seventeen years in the manufacturing districts. On the whole, then, he begged to ask, what was the proposed change to effect? Was it to enable this country to export more goods to foreign countries? Would those foreign countries take them if the change was made? Why, they had clearly shown they would not. The hon. Member stated, that in the county of Haddington the rent was about half the value of what each farmer brought to market. Why, if that was the state of things, why was it everybody in Scotland did not invest their property in land? The truth was, he suspected, that property so invested would not realize three per cent., whereas by applying it to manufactures it would return 30 per cent. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh, but let them remember the hon. Member for Stockport stated the other night the case of a poor man who from nothing had realized 100,000*l.* This had been done, not by an investment in land, but in mills and manufactories. The hon. Member stated, that pauperism and want of employment in agriculture had increased with protection, but he maintained there had been a much greater increase of pauperism with the increased profits of manufactures. In calling upon the gentlemen from Scotland, he understood the hon. Member for Stockport to throw out a challenge to them, and therefore he hoped to have the indulgence of the House while he detained them only one moment—while he stated what had occurred in his own county. The hon. Member in the course of his crusade against the Corn Laws—his itinerant voyage through the country—had come to the county with which he was connected. The hon. Member had stated that the landed proprietors there had been hallooing on the farmers to take part in this agitation, as if the landed proprietors were parties to the farmers holding meetings on the subject. For himself, owing to domestic circumstances to which he would not allude, he was not in the county at the time the hon. Member referred to ; but he could say that one very large and influential meeting had been held by the farmers of their own spontaneous accord (there not being more than two or three landed proprietors present), for the purpose of stating their aversion to the measures of the League ; and there was also in the county with which he was connected, a meeting about to be held, emanating from the farmers alone, without any instigation from the landed proprietors, for the same purpose. He stated this in order that it might be well understood that the farmers in that part of the country did not look upon the question as relating to landlords alone, but as extending to tenant farmers, to labourers, and to the whole community at large. The hon. Member had asserted that various tenants in Scotland had supported him, and also that the tenants of an influential nobleman in that county would have deserted their landlord and adhered to the standard of the League, if he had raised it among them. Now, in reply to this statement, he had the testimony of nearly 120 witnesses that the fact was not so, and there was this remarkable circumstance in the hon. Member's statement, that he had not dared to make it in that country, and it was not until he had crossed the border that he had ventured on the unwarrantable assertion for the purpose of producing an effect on the minds of his hearers. Having thus made his reply to the hon. Gentleman's challenge he should not detain the House further.

Lord Worsley had not intended to address the House; for, judging of the import of the Motion from the wording of it, he had concluded that it would resolve itself into a Motion for the revival of the Import Duties Committee, and if the hon. Member for Stockport had not said that should he obtain the Committee it would inquire among other things into the management of land he should have remained silent. The hon. Member had mentioned the case of a farm rented at 800*l.* a-year, on which the expenses were 790*l.* a-year. Now to this he (Lord Worsley) could only say, that if the fact was accurately stated, it must be a case of land near some great town, and therefore held at a great rent, as accommodation land, and also for the greater part pasture land, which would account for the great rent. Hence such a farm was not a criterion of rents and expenses generally. He had received from an intelligent farmer an account of expenses on a farm, which, as it was forwarded to him with reference not to this subject, but to the Enclosure Bill, which he had had the honour of submitting to the House, he begged to read. His correspondent, who occupied upwards of 2,000 acres, after stating generally that the present scale of duties was not calculated to keep wheat above 52*s.*, but supposing it to be 56*s.* a-quarter, and three quarters to be the produce of an acre, then eight guineas would be the gross value of the produce of an acre: deducting one guinea for seeds, seven guineas would be the value of the produce, and, taking 200 acres, 1,470*l.* would be the value of the produce for the first year. Then pursuing the usual rotation of the four-course system, the value the second year would be 500*l.*; the value the third, would be 1,200*l.*; the value the fourth year, in which they would have clover or seeds would be 280*l.*; that gave 3,450*l.* for the whole value of the produce of the 200 acres on the four-course system. It would be observed that the farmer mentioned by the hon. Member grew, what was not commonly done, wheat every three years. His correspondent calculated for labour of all sorts 1,000*l.*, for wages in the four years; 150*l.* for parochial rates; 200*l.* for tithes; for cost and expenses of horses 600*l.*; for artificial manure 500*l.* in the four years, for interest on 1,200*l.* capital, at 4½ per cent., 216*l.* All this was to be set against a rent of 800*l.* Upon the whole, therefore, he thought the House would see that the statement of the hon. Member was not to be relied on as a criterion of what took place on farms generally. He (Lord Worsley) also wished to state a fact or two to the House, in consequence of the hon. Member having said, that he expected Lincolnshire from what he said with respect to the state of the labourers. He (Lord Worsley) had certainly heard himself, and also seen reports which confirmed what the hon. Member had stated, so far as regarded the southern parts of the island. In fact, it was a marvel to him and to many other persons with whom he had conversed, how anybody could support himself on the wages that were given in the south of England. A friend of his had told him that he had met with a farmer from Yorkshire, and another from Lincolnshire, at present farming in Berkshire, who had told him that they did not mean to stay there, they found wages so low. They could not, they said, be the persons to begin to give higher wages than were given in their districts, but they were not satisfied with the existing system. In their own counties, they observed, they had found no difficulty, on an emergency, or in harvest time, of getting more work from their labourers without reluctance or grumbling on their part; but where they were it was difficult and disagreeable to get their labourers to make an effort. This was the statement of these practical farmers, and he believed, that although wages in the northern parts of England were comparatively high, the farmers were, nevertheless, flourishing. He had heard the farmers in those parts of England, and especially in Lincolnshire, say themselves—and the Poor Law Commissioners who came down there confirmed them—that the labourers were better able to do their work who had higher wages, and he had heard from the farmers in Lincolnshire, that the reason why they had their work better done than farmers in the southern parts of England was, that the labourer was better fed, and therefore better able to do the work. He did not mention this because it was connected with his own county, but for the purpose of inducing persons, if possible, who employed labourers, to give higher wages; for he fully believed that the farmer was better off where higher wages were given, and that where the wages were liberal, they found that the labourers were contented; and that the comfort of the farmer was the comfort of the labourer; and that the labourer looked happy, and was better contented because he was better fed, owing to a more liberal allowance of wages. The hon. Member for Stockport had stated, that there had been an expectation, that under the present Corn Laws, wheat would range to 56s. He (Lord Worsley) could certainly bear testimony that the general impression among farmers was, that it was held out to them that wheat would be at 56s. under the new law; and the farmers now said, that though the law was working better than they expected, still it was not giving them so much as this, though it was right they should have had. At any rate, whether rightly held or not, he could testify that this opinion was very generally held amongst farmers. The hon. Member seemed to think it was not possible that the agricultural class in the south of England could be placed in the same condition with the same class in the north of England, except with the assistance of leases. In reply to this, he (Lord Worsley) could state, that in Lincolnshire there was a high state of cultivation though there leases were only the exception. It was the custom of the county that farms should be continued from father to son; this showed a great degree of confidence between the landlord and the tenant. The consequence was, the tenant employed labour and capital liberally on the land. Now, when the labourers observed this state of confidence between the landlord and the tenant, was it not to be expected that they would feel the same for their employer the tenant-farmer? When the labourer saw that the tenant farmed the land as if it were his own, and that there was so great a degree of confidence between the landlord and him, they might depend upon it a similar confidence would grow up between the labourer and the tenant-farmer. With respect to the county of Lincoln, he affirmed this, that though wages were somewhat lower last winter than before, the labourer in no one instance at any time during the winter was receiving less than 9s. a-week. During the rest of the year, he believed, that the labourers had been receiving 12s. a-week, and, in some cases, the labourer had received that sum all the year round. But, he believed, that as a great deal was done in that county by task-work, from 13s. to 16s. 6d. were the wages generally, in fact, received by an active labourer. He thought, therefore, that he was justified in stating, that where they found the labourer in that condition, and, at the same time, the farmer in that condition, the reasons for it were obvious, and he hoped he should not be considered presumptuous, if he suggested to hon. Members connected with agricultural districts, to impress upon those who were connected with land to give higher wages, inasmuch as they would by doing so produce a higher degree of comfort, and obtain a greater degree of credit for the way in which their land would be managed, as well as afterwards have the satisfaction of feeling that they had not neglected a duty which the hon. Member (Mr. Cobden), he believed, had done good by calling attention to—the duty of endeavouring to improve the condition of the English labourer, which he (Lord Worsley) thought had been neglected in some counties. He could not, however, support the Motion of the hon. Member, because he felt that if the House appointed a Committee they would find each Member, according to his different opinions, wishing to bring forward different facts, so that the Committee would not agree to a report, much time would be wasted, not to mention the expectations which would be held out to one party or the other, and that the conclusion from the whole would be, that the House could not do anything which would render either more dear or more cheap the food of the agricultural labourer.

Mr. B. Cockrane rose to state, that he had received a letter from the hon. Member for Knaresborough (Mr. Ferrand), assigning as a reason why he was absent that night, that he was on the Grand Jury at York, and also obliged to wait for a trial which was coming on, and in which he was interested.

Mr. Curteis said, that as the hon. Member for Stockport had spoken in reference to Lincolnshire, he might be allowed to say, with respect to Sussex, and particularly the part in which he lived, and the labourers he employed, that quite as good wages were given there as in Lincolnshire. There was not a labourer in his employment who had not 12s. a-week, and he did not give more than his neighbours. He never knew less than 10s. given. He believed most employers gave 12s. a-week for ordinary farm-labour. They gave their carters 14s. a-week, and their shepherds 15s. a-week. He must say that the hon. Member had never convinced him by the arguments he had used. He thought that the prosperity of the labourer depended on the prosperity of the tenant and landlord. If the hon. Member had been, as he had, into the cottages of the peasantry of Sussex, he would find that his statements were not correct as regarded them. In addition to the statements which he felt it his duty to make with respect to Sussex, he was enabled, from his knowledge of the adjoining county of Kent, with which also he was connected, to say that the peasantry there were in a prosperous condition, especially in the hop districts. With respect to the speech made by the hon. Mover, he should say that it was a speech characterised by a very fair degree of cleverness, but it was far from convincing him that the House ought to agree to such a Motion as that which on the present occasion had been submitted for their consideration. He was the advocate of a fixed duty, not of the sliding-scale. At the same time he must say, that if pressed hard he should go from the fixed duty to the sliding-scale. He thought, that to take away all protection would be too bold an experiment. He should, whenever he had an opportunity, vote for the fixed duty, for by such a measure he thought that he should do a service to the manufacturing and the commercial interests without injuring the agricultural classes. He should never wish to see any measure introduced that was calculated to injure them, for he regarded the agricultural as the paramount interest, and he therefore felt at all times a cordial, sincere, and determined desire to support the agricultural interest.

Mr. Brotherton said, that the speech of the hon. Member for Roxburghshire reminded him of what was sometimes said, that mathematical truths could be denied if it were the interest of men to deny them; while the speech of the hon. Member who spoke last reminded him of the adage that—

Is of the same opinion still.”

For, whatever might be the facts, or whatever might be his opinion upon them, he appeared to be determined to keep to the agricultural interest. And that reminded him of an anecdote told of a landlord, once a Member of that House. He said it was of no use their arguing upon the question of the Corn Laws, the landlords believed they were for their own interests, and they had the power to maintain them, and while they possessed that power they would maintain them. The question before the House was whether protection was right or wrong, and whether that protection was beneficial to the farmer and to the agricultural labourer. This seemed to be controverted. Could there be, then, a fairer ground for the appointment of a committee? How could the House ascertain which side was right, unless there were an investigation? The hon. Member for Sussex had said, that the agricultural interest was the paramount interest of the country. Now, he (in opposition to such a statement) would boldly assert that the agricultural population of this country was not one-tenth part of the entire population; and that even in the agricultural counties the farmers, graziers, and agricultural labourers were not one-third of the population. He had had an opportunity of examining into this question as far as regarded twenty-three counties, and he found that the population of those twenty-three counties, not including the counties of Lancashire and Yorkshire, was 6,038,833. These were thus employed :—

The number of persons engaged in trade and various occupations .. ..	1,559,612
Farmers, graziers, and agricultural labourers .. ..	585,104
Total number of persons employed in twenty-three counties .. ..	2,144,715
The proportion of farmers, graziers, and agricultural labourers, to the number of persons engaged in trade and other occupations .. .. 27 per cent.

Persons of other occupations 73 per cent.

The proportion of persons engaged in trade and other occupations, as compared with the total population .. 26 per cent.

The number of farmers, graziers, and agricultural labourers, per cent., as compared with the total population .. 10 per cent.

There were two-and-a-half times more persons employed in trade and manufactures than in agriculture in twenty-three counties, principally agricultural. Therefore he (Mr. Brotherton) contended that the agricultural interest was not the paramount interest in the State; and if so, then it followed that it was unjust that a law should exist to give that interest an advantage over other interests. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire declared himself to be the poor man's friend, and he contended that the labourers ought to be protected. Why, that was the very thing he and his hon. friends were endeavouring to accomplish. They maintained that the manufacturing and agricultural interests were really identical. The best protection the agriculturists could have was the prosperity of their customers, and a repeal of all restrictions on trade was the best means to obtain them those customers. At a meeting in Brecknockshire, the hon. and gallant Member opposite was reported to have said, that if the people wished for free-trade, they ought to have free-trade in everything, and then that a pair of boots which now cost 2*l.* 5*s.* would sell for 1*l.* 5*s.* Surely that hon. and gallant Member would not make a statement intentionally to deceive the meeting; but it was impossible for any one to say that the reduction of a duty of 2*s.* 4*d.* on an article would cause the reduction of the price of a pair of boots from 2*l.* 5*s.* to 1*l.* 5*s.* That was one of the fallacies which hon. Gentlemen, when they got among agriculturists, were apt to deal in. Many eminent men had in former days condemned the Corn Laws—Lord Wentworth, Lord Grenville, and others. They contended that the law was merely an act of spoliation of the community to benefit the landlords; while Lord Liverpool himself admitted that it was a law to keep up the rents. Could it be a matter of surprise, then, that many considered the law to be unjust? He readily believed there were many landlords who thought that the law was equally beneficial to the tenants and agricultural labourers. If a Committee should be of the same opinion there could be no doubt that Parliament would adopt the principle; but until the question had been investigated there would ever remain a strong conviction on the minds of the people that the Corn Laws were most injurious in practice, unjust in principle.

Colonel Wood had not intended to take part in the present debate; but, as he had been personally alluded to by the hon. Gentleman opposite, he would make a very few observations. In the story to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, he had not been the anti-free-trader—it was the bootmaker. The facts were these. The bootmaker had said to him, “We are all for free-trade.” He had answered, “With all my heart, if you have it in everything.” The bootmaker then replied, “In everything except in boots—for they would send them from Paris for 1*l.* 5*s.*” With regard to the proportion of the agricultural population, if the hon. Member had taken the whole Kingdom, instead of twenty-three counties, he would have found the results very different. Instead of the agricultural population being less than the manufacturing, he believed, that if the two were compared it would be found that the former was as two to one, and he was satisfied that the amount which they contributed towards the expenses of the country was at least as two to one. But he was not one of those who wished to contrast one class with another. He deprecated any such course, and he was sorry to see the Anti-Corn-Law League on the one side and the Agricultural Associations on the other side engaged in such hostilities. He did not like this war of associations, but he felt bound to say that the agriculturists had only risen in self-defence—that the League were the first aggressors. He hoped that the old maxim—upon which he believed the Landlords and Tenantry of England acted—“Live and let live,” would be the prevailing principle. The hon. Member for Stockport had read a letter upon the cultivation of a farm. That hon. Gentleman had, he thought, somewhere, stated that he was a farmer's son. If he had been deluded by the statement contained in that letter, he could know but little of that which had been his father's occupation. That letter stated, that the expense of cultivating a farm of 400 acres was 750*l.*, and that the rent was 800*l.* A more absurd statement could never have been conceived. The old calculation always had been—and that had been made at a time when much less capital was invested in farming—that it was impossible to carry on an agricultural pursuit without realising three rents—one for the landlords, one for the tenant, and one for the expenses, and he believed that now four must be necessary. [An Hon. Member—More likely five.] Perhaps it might be so, but he would like to know by whom this letter had been written. If it had come from a tenant farmer, the sooner he gave up his farm the better. He had not intended to say anything on this question, but as he was on his legs, he could not refrain from expressing his very decided conviction, that the laws which regulated the importation of foreign articles into this country were for the benefit of the great masses of the people, and if he thought that they were not so, he would not support them.

The Earl of Shelburne said, that the Hon. Member for Stockport had alluded to a village near which he lived, and had stated that its population were in a state of the greatest distress. The inference which the House would draw from the statement of the hon. Member was, that the owners of land in that village did not study the comforts of the lower class of people. In this instance he could assure the House that no blame attached to the landowners of the place. He did not doubt that in many cases blame was imputable to them, but here it was not so. The principal owners of land in the village were a family, whose fortune was in a very embarrassed state, and from his own personal knowledge he could state that they had done everything in their power to ameliorate the condition of the poor labourers, and to better the position of their village.

Colonel Sibthorp would trouble the House with a few remarks, because he thought the Motion a very extraordinary one—viewing the period at which it was made; when in another part of the metropolis honour was being done to those who were desirous of disturbing the public peace*—and when the name of the hon.

Member for Stockport was on the lists of stewards for that occasion—of those stewards who were in the habit of walking about with white wands. If he had been appointed to so honourable an office—though not to such meeting—for at such a meeting he would never be seen—but if he had been honoured with the right of carrying a white wand, he would take care not to be absent—and he thought that the hon. Member ought not to have been absent, to show his allegiance to the hon. and learned Member for Cork. Before he came to the House he had taken the trouble of inquiring whether that hon. Gentleman—filling so important an office as that of steward—whose duty it was to walk about, and make arrangements, and keep order, and listen to what was going on—intended to be present, and, though he did not wonder that he preferred their company to the company of those of whom he would say with Sir John Falstaff, that “he would not march through Coventry with one of them”—he yet must say, that he was surprised that the hon. Gentleman was here to-night to make the Motion. Though the hon. Gentleman had done him the honour of excepting the county in which he resided from the list of those counties in which the rural population were neglected, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that he would just as soon have had his bad word as his good one. But the hon. Gentleman had brought forward his Motion. And why? Because he had heard of “better late than never,” and he knew that the influential and independent agriculturists of England were rising up, not to excite alarm or discontent, but to avail themselves of the Englishman’s right of self-defence. They were not men like the quack doctors of the League, who went about through the country to delude the people, and who, being paid for it, as they undoubtedly were, cared not what they said—of what misrepresentations they were guilty. They were not landowners, but were respectable tenant-farmers, who were at length determined to defend their own interests. Let them look at the petitions presented to that House. They had been signed by the labourers, who, according to the statement of the hon. Member for Stockport, had not a bed on which to lie, nor food to eat. That fact alone showed that the hon. Gentleman and the Anti-Corn Law League, of whom he did not know how to speak—for those miserable men sent forth language quite unfit for persons of their position; but the people of England had too much good sense to be led away by their knavery. The "Anti-Corn-Law League Circular"—not that he ever read it—he would not disgrace his house or table by admitting it—was full of falsehoods. He had not read it, but if he had, he would not believe a single word of it—but how had that Circular designated the tenant farmers and landowners of England—for tenant farmers were landowners, and landowners were tenant farmers? By epithets which none but the Anti-Corn-Law League would dare to have used. It showed of what stuff the League was made. It called them "monsters of impiety—relentless demons—heartless fiends—inhuman fiends—merciless footpads—plunderers of the people." Such names as he hardly knew how the Anti-Corn-Law League, with all their learning, could have conjured up and put on paper. But the landlords and the farmers of England looked upon the League with the same contempt as he did. He rejoiced that the hon. Member for Stockport had brought forward this Motion—and if he could depend upon its sincerity, he should not fear a Committee to inquire into the truth—the whole truth—and nothing but the truth—and he was sure that the hon. Member for Stockport, and the hon. Member for Durham, and the whole Anti-Corn-Law League, individually and collectively, would, to use a common phrase, come off second best. But this Motion was another attempt to humbug the people of England. It would be set forth in the newspapers—"What exertions does the Member for Stockport make for the poor—how anxious is he in their behalf!" He certainly did give them speeches—he would be glad to see him give them something else. It might, indeed, be interesting to have elicited by such an inquiry a fair statement of the origin in life of some hon. Members, and by what means and through whose assistance they had become Members of the British House of Commons. It was quite possible, that some who had nothing a few years back might be very great men at the present day. It might not be very agreeable to some hon. Gentlemen to inquire too minutely into the manner in which they got their present position, and what they contributed in grateful return to those who placed them there. He should wish to see the tenant-farmer and agricultural labourer, and also the master manufacturers and their operatives, going hand in hand, but he was sorry to see an unkind, illiberal, and selfish feeling manifested by one party towards another. He did not wish to be mistaken; his honest conviction was, that those unkind and illiberal feelings were all on the side of the manufacturers. A much better feeling had existed among all classes before the introduction of the Reform Bill, and it would have been most fortunate for the country if that measure had never passed. He should regard with suspicion any Motion emanating from the quarter from which the present Motion had come; and he should give this his decided opposition, because he believed it was brought forward with no other motive than to delude the people. He should never, so long as he was a Member of that House, support any measure tending, as the present motion evidently did, to create disaffection between man and man.

Mr. Villiers said, that the House was disposed to laugh at the speech of the hon. Member for Lincoln; but he thought the hon. Member's Speech as worthy of attention as those that preceded it, so far as it regarded the question. He did just what every preceding speaker did—namely, justify entirely his hon. Friend, the Member for Stockport in bringing forward his Motion, disputing his facts, opposing his opinions, showing that there was reason for doubt, and feeling satisfied that if inquiry was granted he would be shown to be wrong; yet, for some excellent reason that they knew of, they all opposed the inquiry. The President of the Board of Trade was afraid of losing the confidence of his supporters; the hon. Member for Rye was afraid of his neighbours; and the hon. Member for Lincoln knew somebody who would mistake him for somebody else. He believed, however, that nobody would mistake the motives of hon. Members in resisting the Motion. The gallant Gentleman, the Member for Brecon, had resisted the Motion as coming from the League, and referred for authority to the societies recently formed in opposition to it. He was happy to hear reference made to them, for he had begun to fear, notwithstanding the pomp and parade with which they had announced themselves as guardians of British agriculture, that they had lost their voices, or had no representatives in that House. He had read much of their sayings out of doors, but heard little of them in that House till now. This was then the moment for them to justify what they had said elsewhere; he had risen also as a competent witness of what had been said here at other times, to shew the propriety of his hon. Friend's Motion. He had unfortunately been for some years the mover of that question, and he wished to state here, distinctly and openly, what he conceived to be the ground that was invariably assumed by his opponents in resisting that Motion, which was—that though the Corn Law might be attended with some evil, though it might be questionable in some respects in its policy, yet that there were classes of persons belonging to the productive industry of the country, namely, the farmers and farm-labourers—who were deeply interested in it, who depended upon it for their prosperity, who were well off then, and who would be ruined if that law were repealed; that it was a question simply of the labourer and the farmer; that it was not a landowner's question; and on the account of those classes it could not be repealed. The debates would prove beyond all question that this was the ground invariably assumed by hon. Members. What then did the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, mean by asking what was the connection between his hon. Friend's Motion and the influence of the Corn Laws? These were the things also that were asserted out of doors; yet, on this occasion, when their sincerity was partly tested, he had not heard a word from these county Members, who were all sitting on a row before him, who were all the souls of the protection societies in their own counties, but who all appeared then silent about these laws, on the score of their being serviceable to the farmer and the labourer. He expected this the less, because at all their meetings they expressed mistrust of the present Government, and they would not, probably, consider the one Minister who had spoken could answer for their feelings or opinions. What could be more appropriate than his hon. Friend's Motion to meet their objection to the repeal of a law so injurious to every other interest? The right hon. Gentleman complained of his having confined his Motion to the farmers and the labourers, and asked how the landowners had been excepted? Why, he said, it was the landowners that had excepted themselves. It was they who were always saying that they had no interest in the question—that it was their feeling for the labourer that prompted them entirely in their course. It was only last night that it was asserted by a great personage in another place that this was entirely a farmers' question—that the farmers had lately come forward, quite independently of the landlords, in order to vindicate their interests, and that they were on this question as one man. This, then, showed the propriety of his hon. Friend's Motion; it was most important if it was so, that it should be proved that these Corn Laws were, or could be, or ever had been of any use to farmers or labourers, but that should be shown. There would then be a pretence, at least, for their continuance. He respected that body of men, and their interests deserved the warmest sympathy on the part of the House, and of all people out of that House. He had never spoken but in terms of respect of them, and never should; and he should listen with interest to hear what would be shown to be for their advantage at any time. But he wanted to know where the proof was, that protection was of use to the farmers. It might be disclosed in the Committee, but it was not obvious. The farmers had been notoriously in distress, had been so by the admission of the House on several occasions, and were so at present. And Great God, what a description had his hon. Friend given to-night of the state of the labourers, resting his statement upon the authority of Commissioners of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman said, that what the hon. Member for Stockport had referred to were exceptional cases, and that he must not conclude that such was the general condition of the labourers. He did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman had ever read the report, for he would have seen that it contained reports from all the different counties which were called agricultural, and that they all described the labourer as inadequately rewarded for his labour, insufficiently supplied with food. Did the right hon. Gentleman dispute the authority of the Rev. Mr. Osborne, who had so feelingly, and with such shocking detail, described the demoralising and distressing condition of the labourers? He had an extract from a letter that this Gentleman had written to the noble Duke at the head of the Protection Society only within a few days, in which the Rev. Gentleman complained that in the plan for this protection he could see no arrangement made for learning the condition of the labourer. And he implored of these great men to give at least as much attention to the labourer as they did to their cattle. His expressions were "there is no one creature belonging to your farms, not an animal you rear for use, or for sale, that has been treated with so much neglect as to everything tending to improvement as your labourers." Evidence then there certainly was before the world that the labourer was in a miserable condition. Evidence without end had been given by the landlords themselves that the farmers were in distress; the landlords meant that, and nothing else, when they talked of agricultural distress, or when they called for, and generally got, agricultural relief. They never proved that they were in distress themselves—their witnesses always showed that when wheat was low the labourers were best off, which was the case in 1836, when every witness that they examined declared that though wheat was never so low, they never knew the labourer better off. This, then, was a startling fact, considering the ground on which the Corn Law was defended, that when protection failed the most, the labourer, intended to be benefited by it, was best off. With all these circumstances, then, to rebut the presumption that the Corn Laws or the protective duties were of any advantage to them, what could be more reasonable than to demand the inquiry exactly in the terms of his hon. Friend's Motion—which was to inquire what good did protective duties do the farmer or the labourer? And let this be remembered, that there is no question that protection is attended with certain evil effects to the rest of the community; for, without deciding whether it does good to anybody, it is admitted that protective duties are imposed and are intended to act as obstructions to commerce, as throwing difficulties in the way of importing the necessities of life, and of enhancing the cost of living to the community. These effects have been admitted upon several occasions, when he had brought forward motions in that House; but it was said let this be granted, there is yet a national policy, there is public ground, there is interest connected with all our social arrangements that ought to make us bear with patience all these evils. Well, then, was it not just for those who suffer especially from these evils, to inquire whether these corresponding advantages do accrue to anybody from them, or to those, at least, who deserve our sympathy. Ought not some national advantage to be made quite clear, to reconcile us to what tends to perpetuate and aggravate so serious a cause of evil in this country as the want of more trade, more means of employment, more food for our vast population? Surely this is a subject which ought to engage their constant attention; and if this inquiry would elicit truth on this matter, how desirable was it that the inquiry should be conceded; for there is nothing more certain than this fact, that our increasing population, without a corresponding demand for labour, or adequate supply of food, will and must constantly force itself upon their notice. It has been doing so more and more for the last twelve years. It is coming before the House and the country in various shapes, and always indicating a pressure upon the means of subsistence and the means of employment by the people. Never before did the wants and sufferings of those who live by labour occupy so large a share of the time of this House as lately. It is constantly before the House, either in the shape of Factory Bills, or ten hours' Bills, or Commissions directed to inquire into and report upon the condition of different portions of the working classes. They all shew that there is uneasiness, discontent, and misery prevailing and increasing among our people, and all which, he believed would increase, and he believed could only be relieved by extending their trade with other countries, which extension of trade it was the object of these protecting duties to check. He asked again, if they thought that this was an evil that would cure itself? Did they think that people would be made happy or quiet, or contented, by doing what they threatened to do to-night, in rejecting this most reasonable, this most proper inquiry? If they refused to allow this House to use its appropriate functions in thus inquiring into great evils alleged to exist, with nothing better to occupy their time—did they suppose for one instant that they could stay or moderate the agitation in the country? He trusted that they would grant to his hon. Friend what he asked, and not, by a refusal, add so intensely to all the elements of anger, agitation, and complaint that now pervaded the country.

Mr. G. Bankes agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the agricultural Members should declare their opinions and the grounds of the vote they should give on this occasion. He congratulated the hon. Member for Stockport on the altered tone and feeling with which he had expressed himself; for, whatever difficulty there might have been in replying to his speeches, which were always delivered with talent, there was not now the additional difficulty of endeavouring to subdue those feelings which were invariably engendered by acrimonious expressions. If he were persuaded that by going into Committee with the hon. Member for Stockport, they could in any degree further the interests of those over whom it was their duty to watch and protect, he (Mr. Bankes) should willingly support the Motion, even although he might, in so doing, be charged with hypocrisy for attempting to sympathise with that class of his fellow-subjects. He should not be deterred by the fear of any such charge from speaking in that House, or elsewhere, the language of his heart. He would tell the hon. Member for Stockport, that if he could see any chance of benefitting by the present Motion that class, (which he admitted were not at present in that state and condition in which he would wish to see them) he would cordially support the proposition. But he saw no benefit that could possibly arise to them from the adoption of such a Measure, and, on the other hand, he saw counter-balancing inconveniences and evils that would arise affecting that class which he (Mr. Cobden) sought to benefit, and therefore, he was bound to exercise his judgment in contradiction of the eloquent appeal made, and would give a decided and cheerful vote against the proposition. He felt satisfied, that the immediate consequence of granting a Committee would be the exciting of a new degree of anxiety throughout the country. Anxiety on the part of the agricultural labourers was, happily, at present, subsiding, and he trusted we might now anticipate that security which the hon. Member for Lambeth said, and said with truth, was the chief foundation of agricultural prosperity. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Lambeth, however, in looking for security to the chance of realising all those bright visions which he and other eloquent persons endeavoured to present before our eyes, respecting the changed order of things when the free trade system would be adopted. It was that very change which he (Mr. Bankes) dreaded, because he felt convinced it could not produce those benefits predicated of it by the hon. Member for Stockport. Although the condition of the agricultural labourers was by no means such as he could wish, he could yet easily conceive a change which would render their condition much worse. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton asserted that the Members opposed to free-trade had been lately busily engaged in rousing up the spirit of the agriculturists throughout the country, and he called on them to declare in that House those sentiments which they had so boldly proclaimed in other parts of the Empire. He could assure the hon. Member that he could boast of no great share in raising that spirit which had gone from one end of the kingdom to the other. He had indeed attended a meeting called and promoted by the farmers in his own county. He had been invited to attend, he had gone, and having listened to their proceedings, had expressed his hearty concurrence in their sentiments, and that was all the part he took in the meeting. He should have been far from being ashamed if he had taken a much stronger part in it; but, in point of fact, it was wholly unnecessary. He was glad to find such a spirit manifested by that class who were said, by those who went through the country taunting them, to be a base and subservient class, who had no opinions of their own, or that if they had they had not the courage to express them. They were also represented as having opinions contrary to those which they now boldly proclaim from one end of the country to the other. But there was one sentiment imputed to him and the other agricultural Members by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton—a sentiment which they entirely disavowed—he meant the mistrust of Her Majesty's Ministers. He had freely expressed his opinions on Measures affecting the agricultural interest in former Sessions of Parliament, and had given his vote in accordance with those opinions, and if he felt mistrust, it was a mistrust of his own opinions, when in thus conscientiously giving his vote, he voted not only against the Ministry, but also against large majorities of that House; but that there was a mistrust of Her Majesty's Ministers among the agriculturists he hoped was not the case. He might, perhaps, complain of the hon. Member for Stockport, that when he referred to those parts of the Commissioners' Report which seemed to militate against the credit of the county which he (the hon. Member) had the honour to represent, he should not also advert to those parts which had an opposite tendency. He would quote from the Report some passages which the hon. Member had omitted. It was therein stated "That in Dorsetshire wages are higher than in a neighbouring county; near Blandford they average 11s. a week. The practice of employing labourers by the job is exceedingly common, even where constantly employed by the same master; and, in addition to his wages, the labourer has many advantages—fuel carriage free, and often at reduced prices, cottage sometimes at very low rent, and not unfrequently on large farms rent free, while many farmers give their regular labourers potato ground, they having in most cases also their master's horses to plough and to carry home the potatoes when dug."

And in another part the Commissioners said, speaking also of a parish near Blandford,

"All the labourers are employed, and there is hardly a sufficient number of hands; they get on an average 11s. a week. A great many have houses rent free, saving some 2l. or 3l. per annum. All get fuel carriage free, sometimes at half price, and potato grounds allowed them according to their families."

Perhaps he should not put the average mere, especially if taken exclusive of the miscellaneous advantages alluded to, so high as 11s. a week; but he had acted fairly in quoting the very Report which had been read against his county, and he would request those who desire to form any just inference from the contents of that Report, to have the kindness and the fairness to read the whole. Undoubtedly some cases had been painfully, though not improperly, discussed in the county, with the best intentions doubtless; though whether with the best effects, and in a manner most conducive to the end in view, he might be allowed to doubt. The Rev. Mr. Osborne had been referred to on this subject. He was an honourable and excellent gentleman; but he did not differ in politics so much from the Member for Wolverhampton as he supposed; and it was somewhat remarkable, that during the long reign of that party in power which agreed with that hon. and rev. Gentleman, Mr. Osborne, against whose character he would not state anything derogatory, did not publish anything on the subject referred to. He had had occasion previously to state to that gentleman, in his presence, at a public meeting, that in one of his publications there were very great inaccuracies. With respect to some of the worst cases of those cottages, which had been made the subject of animadversion, they had been old poor houses, and the Commissioners told the parishioners to sell them, or otherwise dispose of them, but no rate could be levied to repair them—that was one of the evils arising from the New Poor Law; and with every wish to uphold that law, he was of opinion, that there should be great changes in it before it could be adapted to the circumstances of the county he represented—a county which certainly had suffered more than it gained by the adoption of that law. He would request the hon. Members for Stockport and Durham to learn the real nature of the property in question, before they made such sweeping charges as they had made that night. It often happened that where a village nominally belonged to a landlord, he had no right whatever to a great proportion of it. In Dorsetshire a system of life leases had been universal; and, although worn out with respect to farms, it was not so with respect to cottages. The village in which he resided had been, whether by the hon. Member for Stockport or the hon. Member for Durham he knew not, but, at all events, it had been brought into a very prominent point in geography compared with what it used to hold in these kingdoms; it had now, by the literary labours of themselves, or of some of their allies, attained some degree of celebrity. It had been stated, that in this village there were to be found a number of cottages very good, and also a number excessively bad. And this was perfectly true. The writer intended this statement, no doubt, as an attack upon him, but he had missed his aim, because, in point of fact, the good cottages were his, and the bad were not. He had wished to purchase the bad cottages, but had not been able to do so, and this was the real state of the case with regard to this village. He contended, that it was most unfair to say, that the landowners were in all cases responsible for the present condition of the poor, inasmuch as they had in many cases no power to remedy that condition; and, without showing that they possessed such a power, it was both cruel and unjust to fix upon them such an imputation—an imputation which, if they had the power of applying a remedy, and did not exercise it, he admitted would be just. The hon. Member for Lambeth had defied any one to name, not a class, but any individual, who had been injured by free-trade, and he accepted the challenge. He would name not an individual, but a whole class, who had been ruined by the adoption of free-trade principles—and that was the class of hand-loom silk manufacturers of London. The evidence before the Committee which sat on the subject in the year 1831 or 32, of which he was a member, and before which Committee the hon. Member for Bolton took a prominent part, proved the ruinous effect of free-trade legislation on a once prospering branch of manufacture. And it was no satisfactory answer to him, and certainly no consolation to those who suffered, to be told that this manufacture never ought to have been established. Here, then, was a large class whose industry had been ruined by the effects of free-trade; but, without such an instance to guide him with respect to the admission or non-admission of foreign corn, he could only say, that he was prepared to give his support to the protection which the present laws gave to the agriculture of this country. He had already stated the reasons which should induce him to oppose the present Motion, and he supposed it was brought forward in its present shape, because, otherwise, it would not have been possible to have obtained for it the support of advocates of a fixed duty, and of no duty at all. These parties, no doubt, found the shape in which the Motion had been brought forward a convenient one. For his own part, however, he should give it his most decided opposition.

Mr. Bright said, that when his hon. Friend who had introduced this motion sat down, he felt convinced, that if party feeling could be driven out of that House for a single evening, there would be an unanimous assent to his proposal. He believed that his hon. Friend's statements were perfectly accurate—that they were altogether unanswerable; but whatever the fate of the motion might be in the House, he was well assured of the reception it would have in the country. He should not have risen, had it not been for the speeches which had been made since his hon. Friend's; and yet there was really a great difficulty in finding anything in them which had touched the question before the House. Nothing was more reasonable than that an inquiry should take place whether the Corn Laws, or protective duties generally, were beneficial to the tenant-farmers and to the farm-labourers of this country. Now, it was quite true that the question of sugar and of coffee, and it might be of timber and other articles, might come under the consideration of such a Committee; but he owned that the main object was to show the effect upon these two classes of his countrymen, and the operation of that law which was passed avowedly to give those two classes protection. The importance of this inquiry was admitted by all. Hon. Gentlemen opposite thought that a repeal of the Corn Laws would produce great disasters to the agriculture of this country, and to all connected with agricultural pursuits; and out of doors, whilst some thought with him, others, and it might be the majority of the tenant-farmers and of the owners of land, joined in those fears. He and his friends, however, believed, on the contrary, that the prosperity of the country depended upon the adoption of the principle of free-trade; they believed that to be the only just and true principle on which the Government of this country could be carried on. Were there none out of doors who thought with them? Let them not think because in that House they were few in number, that they were few everywhere else. The principle he advocated was espoused by millions. If they wanted proof of this he would give it. Deputations had waited on the Government, not from the manufacturing districts only. 500 deputies had asked the Government to consider this question. Petitions had been presented to that House, in one year, signed by 500,000, by a million the next, by a million and a half the third, and by two or three millions the fourth; but all these Petitions were cared little about. There was a subscription some four or five years ago of 5,000*l.* to the funds of the Anti-Corn-Law League. That subscription rose in the second year to 12,000*l.*, in the third year to 50,000*l.*, and in this year the League-fund was rapidly approaching 100,000*l.* This proved nothing as to the truth of the principle, but it showed the growing feeling which pervaded all classes in this country. Hon. Gentlemen charged them with inciting the population to violence and insurrectionary movements, and one Gentleman, who was Member for Warwickshire and a magistrate of that county, as he had heard, had stated in that House, and he had certainly stated at two meetings, that he could prove charges against them, and that facts had come to his knowledge, and of which, as a magistrate, he was cognizant, which showed the guilt of some men who were connected with the League. If, as a magistrate, the hon. Member knew these facts, he (Mr. Bright) said, that he was an accessory to the facts and to the crime if he had concealed them from the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It would have been much more becoming in him as a magistrate and a Member of Parliament, possessing this information, to have given it to the Government, than to have made these charges at meetings, at which only one party was present, and at which only one party was allowed to be heard. It might be that he and his friends excited the people; he never denied that they did excite, and they should continue to excite the people. The pamphlet which had been quoted of the Rev. G. Osborne, threw a little insight into what was meant by the charge of exciting the people. It was there stated:—

"On the other hand, the agricultural labourer has been restrained by every possible means, discouraged in every possible way from any attempt to set forth the grievances of his condition; nay, further than this, does he find a friend in any Gentleman in his own neighbourhood, who may seek to bring to light any act of injustice or oppression towards him, that friend is immediately met on all sides with remonstrances against what is called 'setting the men against the masters,' with, in many instances, serious expostulations on the danger of driving the labourers to acts of violence."

No man could go into the manufacturing or to the agricultural districts of this country, and address any multitude of people, however mild might be his language—if he told the truth, and if he pointed out how those sufferings were caused by the acts of that House—but he must excite discontent. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would tell him of any evil which had met with a remedy till discontent had been excited, there might be a prospect of removing this evil, although he and others might remain at home, and cease to agitate upon such topics as these. He and his Friends charged Gentlemen opposite with gross exaggeration, and with wrong-doing, for the most part, with their knowledge. He was not satisfied with their policy, and their own minds were unsettled with respect to it. He found, that at a recent meeting at York, held for the defence of protection, one gentleman spoke of the fatal bias of the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, who was believed to be favourable to free trade, and was not to be trusted, whilst it was acknowledged on all hands, that the agricultural interest could not be surprised at anything which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Queen's Government might do. How, then, was this question to be settled? All that his hon. Friend asked was, for a fair inquiry, and there could be no tribunal more fair than that proposed by his hon. Friend. He was not anxious that members of the League should be members of that tribunal; he was willing that there should be a majority of hon. Members opposite, and the witnesses to be examined should be the landowners and the farmers of the country. His hon. Friend's case was based on facts and experience; that of his opponents, on anticipation of future evils if the Corn Laws were abolished. He was prepared to show that the Corn Laws, since 1815, had been a continual fraud on the farmers of this country. In 1815, they were told that corn would be 80s. a quarter. The evidence given before the Committee of 1814, was, that if prices went below 80s. it would be ruinous to cultivation. From 1815 to 1841 or 1842, the average price of wheat had not been more than 60s. a quarter: yet that had been the time during which leases had been taken. The hon. Member for Wiltshire had declared that he did not believe the rents could be paid if prices were not higher. Although the average price had only been 59s., the rent of land had increased; it was said, also, that land would be thrown out of cultivation, whereas more land had been brought into cultivation; and it was further said, that the labourer would be thrown out of employ, which could not be the fact if more land had been brought into cultivation. Every prophecy of the agricultural soothsayers of 1814 had been unfulfilled, and he might argue from this, with regard to their future prophecies, that they would not be worth more than the past. He had before him a short report made to an agricultural society at Barnstaple in 1821, in which it was said:—

"That the Act of Parliament passed in the 55th year of the reign of His late Majesty has not answered the intention of the Parliament that passed it, inasmuch as it was generally conceived at the time of enactment, that the effect of the law would be, to secure to the grower of corn a price of 80s. a quarter for wheat, 43s. for barley, and 27s. for oats, on the average crop; whereas the crop of last year scarcely, if at all, exceeded an average one, and the present prices of grain are now but little more than half those contemplated to be afforded by the Act."

He could show that the farmers did believe that Act would give them a price of 80s. a quarter. He need not go fully into their prophecies in other matters, which had been equally well verified. It was prophesied of wool as it was now prophesied of corn. Every prophecy had been falsified by the event, and the wool farmer of this country acknowledged that for many years past they had been more prosperous than the cultivators of wheat. He presumed that there was one point on which all were agreed, that the Corn Laws were not passed to benefit trade—that the merchants of Liverpool and the manufacturers of Leeds were not benefited by them. But if they were prejudicial to the manufacturers and the merchants, they must in the long run be prejudicial to the farmers. When they talked of seven-ninths of the population as agriculturists, where did they get their information? He might ask, where did they live? Such proportions existed only in hon. Members' imaginations. He knew not why the Census Returns had not been as yet placed on the Table. If they were, he should be able to prove that the tenant-farmers were not more than one per cent. of the whole population, and he ventured to say that the farm labourers engaged in the cultivation of wheat were not more than one per cent. He was not speaking of the whole agricultural labourers. It was a statement which he could not prove till the Returns were on the Table, and then hon. Gentlemen might satisfy their curiosity, and see whether he was right or wrong in his estimate. What was the condition of the tenant-farmers and of the farm-labourers? They had had the Corn Laws during the last thirty years, and yet the result had been as appalling as had been stated that evening without contradiction. He advised hon. Gentlemen who went to agricultural meetings, not to continue this deception. They might themselves be the victims of deception. He found one of the Members for Haddingtonshire stated, that wheat, under a system of free-trade, could be sold in this country for 20s. a quarter. If this were true, it was only a proof of a greater wrong done to their country; but it was not true, and the hon. Member must have been profoundly ignorant, or something worse, when he made that statement. Then the hon. Member for Peeblesshire had turned a great prophet, and at another great meeting, after saying this, that, and the other would happen, he had said nothing of any benefit that accrued to the farmers by the present system. Then the hon. Member for the borough of Haddington had made some most extraordinary revelations with respect to the operations of the Corn Laws. He said that—"The farmers, so long as they are protected, will spend their money largely in the employment of labour, and they will pay high wages, and they will not confine themselves to labour, for they will increase generally in their means of expenditure. They will find out new luxuries, and they will thus spend their money among the tradesmen in the towns, so that the prosperity of all classes will be insured through the reasonable demand of the agriculturists for protection."

What was this but asserting that when they had overtaxed him for the food they had supplied, they would buy a larger quantity of his goods, whereas, they were buying his goods with his own property. There were other expressions betraying great carelessness on the part of hon. Members who uttered them. At a meeting holden at Framlingham in East Suffolk, it was said that the object of the free-traders "was to bring down the price of labour in this country to the level of the wages paid on the Continent." He had, he believed, undisputed authority for saying that the three gentlemen who sat at Somerset-house and who were not supposed to overflow with the milk of human kindness, could not discover any mode by which they could keep a man in health without going to a greater expense than a labourer could afford at his own home. Was there anything worse than this on any part of the Continent? If the hon. Member for Kircudbrightshire were in the House he would call his attention to what was told him recently by a large farmer in that county—that for a nineteen-feet drain, thirty inches deep, and eighteen inches wide, through a hard soil, the party finding spade, hammer, pick-axe, and crowbar, he would pay only a sum of three pence and it would be a good day's work if a labourer could cut four of them in a day and earn 1s. The effect of this was very certain. He would take only an extract from The Times of February 14, in which it was thus stated:—

"The village of Charlton-on-Otmoor, situate within a few miles of Oxford, has latterly been the scene of several very lawless proceedings. Some of the labourers, for want of employment, have been driven to the Bicester Union Workhouse, which has caused a great deal of excitement and dissatisfaction in the minds of those remaining. Several of the respectable inhabitants have had their windows broken; and on the night of the 26th of January three ploughs were destroyed, by cutting them to pieces. Each plough belonged to a different farmer of the village. A paper was left on one of them, with the following written on it;—'A full belly does not know what an empty one feels.'"

And he hoped that hon. Gentlemen who were accustomed to feed well, and to partake of many more luxuries than were perhaps conducive to health, instead of considering this question as one of party would ask themselves whether it were not their duty to apply a remedy to the discontent which existed in Scotland, which had found place in Wales, which had spread itself through the southern counties of England, and in a still more terrible form in the country with respect to which there had recently been great discussion. A gentleman, who, at a former Buckinghamshire meeting, had declared that the peasantry rejoiced in potatoes, had more recently declared, that "there was now no cry from the labour market in the rural districts; that the people were employed, and that provisions were cheap." But he had before him a letter, written by a clergyman of Bicester, to this Dr. Marsham, which gave an account of several families he had visited, and whose income was far less for the whole week than many hon. Members of that House spent uselessly in a day. In one case the man had a wife and five children, his wages were 9s. a week, and deducting house rent and coals there remained 1s. 0½d. per head per week for each of the family. In another case, the wages, deducting coals, allowed 10½d. each per week for a family of eight persons. In another case, a man had a wife and a large family, and was out of work. He need not enter into the particulars of their sufferings; suffice it to say, the wife, who worked at lace making, when she was visited by a member of the clergyman's family, was found to want the means to purchase fuel, and was sitting in bed at noon-day to keep herself warm, and continuing her work. This clergyman also stated,

"I have just called upon two families, who are in a state of great destitution and wretchedness. The men are able and willing to work, but they cannot get employment. They were boiling turnips for dinner, and had nothing else which they could eat. Think, sir, of two families, or fourteen persons, dining on boiled turnips. Your 'oatmeal and potatoes' would be a welcome meal to them! I have just met another able-bodied man, who has a wife and five children; he has been out of work for sixteen weeks. His daily and only employment is to stand in the streets watching to see if any person will employ him to carry coals into the coal-house."

He added that many of the houses he visited had next to no furniture; "how the poor creatures live is to me a mystery." And so it would be, he believed, to any one else. The hon. Member for Berkshire was in the House, and he found in a paper with which he was connected the following statement of the poverty in Wiltshire:—

template; they only, who have been masters of well-paid labourers, as well as of men who only receive the miserable pittance of 7s. or 8s. per week, can fully appreciate the advantages to be derived by making work as plentiful here as in other parts of the kingdom. The injuriousness of a system that creates so little labour is most apparent by a comparison of the different states of the labourer in the north and the south of England. In every respect the Wiltshire labourer has the disadvantage; most of his necessary wants are dearer; land is generally let to him at a higher rate than to the farmer; his house often comfortable and confined, even to indecency; his wages barely sufficient to find his family with food."

He would not trouble the House with many more extracts. He would quote one, a report of the Ashenden Petty Sessions, on Monday, January 19;—

"Present, T. T. Bernard and John Stone Esqrs., and the Rev. Thomas Martyn.—Charles Godfrey, a young married man of Brill, was charged by Mr. Richard Mumford steward to C. S. Ricketts, Esq., with having, on the 2nd of January, at Dorton, cut a branch from a maiden ash tree, the property of Mrs. Elizabeth Sophia Ricketts. Joseph Guntrip, gamekeeper to Mr. Ricketts, proved the offence. Godfrey did not deny the charge. He said he knew the wood was not his, but he was without firing. Coal was 1s. 8d. per cwt. at Brill. He had asked his employer to fetch him some from the wharf, and to stop 1s. a week for it, but he would not do so. He was only paid 6s. per week for his work, out of which he had to provide all. His wife was expecting to be confined every hour."

It would have been thought, that this intimation would have had some effect upon the magistrates with a clergyman amongst them, but—

"The Bench said, if such offences as this, cutting a maiden ash twig, were allowed to go unpunished, there would soon be an end to the rights of property. Convicted; ordered to pay 1s. damage, 10s. fine, and 16s. costs—in default of payment, one month's imprisonment! The Bench offered to give the prisoner time to pay the money, but he said it was impossible for him to pay it. He was consequently committed."

When they found such needless hardships as these inflicted on a man who earned but 6s. a week by his labour, and who was sent for four weeks to gaol for a crime so trifling, at a time when his wife was about to suffer the greatest trial to which her sex could be exposed, he considered it a scandal to every man in court, and to the Legislature which could allow such scenes to take place. He must say that such punishment was a reproach to the man who punished him, and to the Legislature that allowed it to take place. What could they expect from that man when he came out of gaol? Now, to speak for a moment of the farmers, and he would not have done so but that he had a document which his hon. Friend, the Member for Stockport, had intended to have alluded to, but had forgotten. It was a statistical abstract of fifty farms contiguous to each other, without any omission, within a circumference of about eighteen miles, taking Burlesdon-bridge as a centre, showing the names of farms and their owners, the occupiers whether as owners or renters in the year 1815, their fate and that of their families, with the names of the occupiers in 1843, comprising the twenty-eight years of Corn Law protection, passed for the avowed purpose of securing steady and remunerative prices. Ten of these tenants were dead, and their children had become labourers upon the parishes; nine more tenants were sold up and beggared; four left their farms, of whom two died poor, one was now living in reduced circumstances, and the other died by his own hand. Of the remainder, a few were still occupying their farms, whose circumstances were not stated. Ten only of the fifty tenants were known to have prospered. Here were facts which might be denied if they were deniable. He would hand any hon. Gentleman present a copy of this statement, and if there were any Member connected with Hampshire present, he might have these facts and investigate them, and he could bring statements as appalling as this from other parts of the country, to show that it was desirable to inquire whether the Corn Laws were not at the bottom of the evils which the agricultural classes had for so long a time been suffering. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire had complimented his hon. Friend near him upon the altered tone in which he had spoken. He was not in the House when that hon. Member, on a former occasion, had spoken with respect to his own favourite, he would not say pattern, county, but he did not then get up and deny the statements made with respect to that county. It was fortunate that the report was before the House, although the production of it reflected discredit on some party. When a Commission went down to inquire into the state of the handloom weavers and other classes, there was unlimited time given for them to prosecute their inquiries, and for the Commissioners to go to the furthest end of the island nearly, and come back again, and go into neighbourhoods entirely unconnected with the objects of the Commission. But with respect to the Commission of Inquiry into the state of the agricultural population, the sending of that Commission afforded good ground to believe that the authors of it were more disposed that the inquiry should be slurred over, than that there should be a thorough and searching investigation. The right hon. Baronet, the Secretary for the Home Department, if he had anything to answer for in this matter, was doubly culpable, inasmuch as he was the representative of the principal town of the county about which so much had been said. If he had known as much of the effects of the Corn Laws in that county, he would not have finished a speech with a peroration imputing everything bad and black to the manufacturing districts, and representing the agricultural districts as manifesting everything that was desirable on earth. If protection had not benefited Dorsetshire, he could not see that it had benefited Lincolnshire, which was certainly in a better position, but Lincolnshire had fortunately possessed some landowners who were men of ordinary sense and enterprise, and they had done just that which the Anti-Corn Law League wished to do for the manufacturing districts; they had endeavoured to turn their property to the best advantage. They had cultivated it well—they had reclaimed districts, which, thirty or forty years ago, were sterile and barren; they had given every encouragement to lay out capital; they had trusted their farmers, and their farmers had trusted them. It always gave him pain to hear any landowner or farmer attribute the prosperity of Lincolnshire to the Corn Laws, when, in fact, it was only due to the intelligence of the gentlemen and farmers of the county. It was not owing to protection, or else why had not protection done the same for Dorsetshire? The latter county had a population of 168,013 persons. At the Michaelmas quarter of 1843, the number of persons relieved from the Poor Rates in that county was 19,821, or about one-eighth of the whole population. He would ask the hon. Member for Dorsetshire what he could say to that? He was sorry that the noble Lord the other Member for that county had not remained, after hearing the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport, to take part in the discussion. It further appeared that, in ten years, the increase of the population of that county, if it continued in the same ratio as at present, would be 23,500. If there were no more farms than now, he would ask him where the sons of the farmers would obtain farms, and where the sons of the peasant-labourers could obtain employment ten years hence? This was not a question of party, and the Government ought to consider it of more importance than merely consulting the interests of a certain class. Nature was against them, and before long this question must be settled, and in the only way in which it could be, that which the Anti-Corn-Law League now proposed. A supporter of this present Corn Law, on being asked if he thought that the present Corn Law would last for ever, said no; it must be repealed when the pressure became strong enough. What was the meaning of that? When pauperism had gone on increasing from one-eighth to one-sixth, and one-fourth, and when, not only distress and want of employment stared them in the face in the manufacturing districts, but when the present murmurs of the agricultural districts had become a storm before which they would quail and tremble, then they would repeal the Corn Laws. Was it not better now, while they had a chance of doing it with something like grace, to repeal them, than to let the repeal be extorted from them, as it must inevitably be at last, and then there would be small thanks due to them for having given it. What would the hon. Member for Dorsetshire do with this population some years hence? Would he tell them to emigrate to the surrounding counties? But were not the other counties in the same condition, and would the hon. Member tell them to go down to Lancashire, to that dull, manufacturing portion of the country, of which the right hon. Baronet had spoken? Were they to go down to that county, where it was said more cruelties were practised than upon the Poles who were sent from Russia to Siberia? They could not come to the manufacturing districts for they had stopped the demand for labour there. The trade of these districts, by the Corn Laws especially, by the Sugar Laws secondly, and by other monopolies, was crippled, and when they came to that House and asked that those evils should be remedied, they had on a former occasion the plea of slavery, and on that occasion they had from the right hon. the President of the Board of Trade a speech, the most extraordinary that he had ever heard, and it must be a bad case, indeed, when the right hon. Gentleman could not make a better speech in defence of it. An attempt was made to mystify the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport, and it was said he wanted a Committee to inquire into the peculiar burthens falling upon land. He wanted no such thing; he wanted to prove that the Corn Laws sacrificed the interests of the farmers more than any other class. On almost every conceivable question they had a Committee, and on this question, if they thought that the evidence would be in favour of the Corn Laws, they would have a Committee also. They had a Committee on agricultural distress in 1836, and the evidence was so much against this law that the Committee dared not report such evidence, because the result would have been a call upon that House to take steps for the abolition of that protection which was ruining the tenant farmers and the labourers. The manufacturers had come to that House to tell them the state of the manufacturing population in former years, and they would have to come with darker tales of woe whenever there came another year or two of deficient harvests. He asked the House, whether they granted a Committee or not, did they believe that the Corn Laws could be maintained? Did hon. Gentlemen opposite believe that the right hon. the President of the Board of Trade, who had such a fatal bias towards free-trade, could be so forgetful of the interests of his country as to persevere in the maintenance of this law, or that the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, who had, as it were, sprung from trade, upon which his family had thriven, would stake his credit as a statesman in the continuance of a law which was laughed at by all intelligent men abroad, which all men of business abhorred, and which was becoming a subject of intense hatred to a large portion of the intelligent classes of this country. He had no doubt that the right hon. Baronet would refuse the Committee, and that hon. Members opposite would vote with him; but he should like to know the question which could be proposed in which they would not vote with him. But did they bear in mind that the time was soon coming when his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport and himself would again take their tour throughout the rural districts of this country? They would go to the farmers and tell them that their Landlords had called them together, not for the purpose of asking the Government for relief from the distress which existed amongst them, but for the purpose of asking the Government to keep them precisely as they were. They would tell the farmers that they dared not complain to that House that they were distressed—and why? because the free-trade question took so much hold upon the public mind, that if they came there to complain of agricultural distress, the whole country would laugh at their efforts to relieve it without getting rid of the Corn Laws. The right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not find a tax the removal of which would relieve the agricultural interest, and he could give no more protection, for during the years they had had it, ruin and calamity had spread over the whole country. They would say further, that their landlords had told them that in the agricultural districts they had exclusive burthens to bear. The hon. Member for Sheffield made a Motion in that House, that these burthens should be inquired into, which was refused. Why, they would not even tell their griefs. The fact was, they had no case. He would not say behind their backs those things which he would not say to their faces, and he acknowledged that he did not always speak in the most complimentary terms of them. He repeated that they had no case, or they would have given the hon. Member for Sheffield a Committee, and when that hon. Member again brought the subject before the House, he had no doubt but that it would share the same fate. They might tell the farmers that they had asked for a Committee to demonstrate to the whole country, out of the mouths of the farmers and labourers themselves, that the Corn Laws benefited only the landowners, and did not advance the interest of any class in this country but the class who depended on the rent of land. They would tell them that the right hon. the President of the Board of Trade got up, and after talking about anything else but the Motion before the House, stated that the Government could not grant an inquiry, and that hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Benches followed him, and stated also that from one cause or another they could not grant the inquiry. His hon. Friend the Member for Stockport would not have brought forward his Motion if some one on the other side of the House would have done so. Why did not the hon. Member for Dorsetshire do it? Why was the report on the condition of the agricultural labourers so long before the House, and not one man had brought the subject forward? He should be ashamed to call himself a Representative of the agricultural interest in that House, if he had allowed that report to have lain on the Table for nearly twelve months, and not have brought the subject before the notice of the country. Now, he thought that the case was clear as it stood, that there was only one way in which this question could be carried, and that was by making it thoroughly known to the country. When they exposed the bad principles of this law, they exposed also the most unwise policy of the Agricultural Members of that House; and passing from county to county, and town to town, the constituents of this Empire should know that the landowners sat in that House, if they did not do so with an express desire and design, yet they did sit there resisting any attempt, however small, to affect the price of the produce of land, with determined opposition, and maintaining a law the object of which was to prevent a reduction of rent, and when millions throughout the country asked for an inquiry into the subject, they did not hesitate to vote as if they were a corporation sitting there to support their own interests, and keep up the rent of land.

Mr. Newdigate rose in consequence of certain observations which had been made in the House of Commons and elsewhere, upon his having stated that the Anti-Corn Law League had been connected with the disturbances of 1842 in North Warwickshire, and in reply to the hon. Member for Durham, who said that he (Mr. Newdigate) ought, as a Magistrate, if possessed of sufficient evidence, to have instituted a prosecution against the League. He begged to state that he had not done so, because he had been acting as junior magistrate with the then acting Lord Lieutenant of the county (Lord Aylesford), who was in constant communication with the Home Office, and cognisant of the facts to which he had alluded. The hon. Member for Durham said, he (Mr. Newdigate) had made the charge of fomenting the North Warwickshire disturbances, in an exclusive meeting. He (Mr. Newdigate) had merely repeated in the statement complained of, what he had before stated in the House of Commons, when the leading members of the League were in their places opposing the Chelsea Pensioners' Bill in a factious minority of eight, which measure he deemed essential for the safety of the county which he represented. He would read the passage in his speech at Warwick, of which the hon. Member complained.

"Thus do I believe the origin, the extent, and the wealth, of the League may be accounted for, and with respect to its effect upon this county in particular, I will merely repeat what I have stated in the House of Commons, that from my personal experience as a Magistrate, I have reason to believe that that most dangerous Association, by its doctrines, its funds, and its agents, was mainly instrumental in fomenting those disturbances, which somewhat more than a year since obstructed the trade, interrupted the industry, and threatened the peace of a large district in the Northern division, by setting those classes at variance, whose interests are identical, and which would otherwise have remained happily connected."

The hon. Member complained that the names of the Leaguers to whom in particular he (Mr. Newdigate) had alluded, were not produced; when on a former occasion he (Mr. Newdigate) had been asked for these names in the House, the hon. Member himself Mr. Bright looked so uneasy that he (Mr. Newdigate) thought it right to specify that he did not allude to the hon. Member. The hon. Member for Bolton had asked him to give these names, but he had told the hon. Member that he was bound not to do so, which was the case; but he did not feel bound not to describe the parties. The hon. Member for Durham suggested the possibility that the parties he (Mr. Newdigate) alluded to, might not have been connected with the League; that body had a convenient way of avoiding responsibility by not publishing the names of its executive or officers. When application was made for a list of such persons in Manchester and at the London office of the League circular, on his (Mr. Newdigate's) part, the answer was, that the list was kept by the Council, and was not to be divulged; he (Mr. Newdigate) had however, one small list containing 1,500 names, which had been published by the League, as their 100,000*l.* fund Committee list, to which he would hereafter draw the attention of the House. He would now state to the House, as evidence bearing on the connection of the League with the disturbances of 1842, that in the Coventry Herald of July 22nd, 1842, two letters appeared as part of the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-law Conference, the first was dated Coventry, July 14th 1842, and was to the following effect:—

"My dear Sir,—I thank you for your communication; I think you will have another delegation from Coventry, but not for Repeal only. The people here are ripe for a struggle. We have to-day presented a requisition to the Mayor, at short notice, to call a meeting to consider the state of the country. He has done so, and we meet on Tuesday. Our measures are not resolved upon; but we cannot keep the people back; and I think we had better give the reins in favour of democracy. Do urge upon the League the propriety and policy of leading the people. We want but leaders, and we will do anything and everything, but the masses will not restrict their efforts to Corn-law Repeal—our language will be, denunciation of the aristocracy and class legislation, and defiance to the present House of Commons. I shall be glad of the latest information from head quarters, that our measures may be in harmony if possible: will you write on Monday night? Above all impress upon the delegates, that if they want the people at their back, they must take up the Suffrage Question, without that their efforts are hopeless, and the people will throw themselves upon more daring and reckless leaders, "I am your's truly,

"T. S. WHITTEM."

And he (Mr. Newdigate) would ask who the House supposed this Mr. Whittam was?—he was the present Mayor of Coventry. The other letter read at the Anti-Corn-Law Conference was as follows:—

"Dear Sir,—I have deferred replying to yours of the 12th ult., in order that I might send you the result of the exertions which were being made to get up a public meeting. From the enclosed hand-bills, you will see that we have met with a most signal success. It is signed by some of the most influential men in the town. The Mayor has agreed to preside; the universal cry is what is to be done next; all seem to agree upon the necessity of taking some decisive course. Why do not the League at once declare their belief in the utter hopelessness of obtaining justice from the aristocracy, and their determination to assist with all their power in agitating the complete Suffrage Question? Purify the Commons, let them be in reality the representatives of the people; they have been so nominally long enough, all parties are tired of their misrule. The Commons House must be made democratic, the spirit of the age demands it; starving thousands demand it. Distress here is increasing; the people are growing exasperated; the aristocracy are drawing down upon themselves the vengeance of injured millions. Let them beware in time ere it is too late; We expect to send one or more deputies up from the meeting.

"I am, dear Sir, your's truly,
"J. B. BROWNE."

"P. A. Taylor, Esq., jun."

Both these names appeared on the list of the 100,000*l.* Fund Committee of the Anti-Corn-law League. He would now call the attention of the House to the dates connected with those circumstances. Mr. Whittam's letter was dated 14th July, 1842, it was read by the Chairman of the Anti-Corn-law Conference on the 18th of that month. The meeting to which those letters referred took place on the 19th, they were published in the Coventry Herald on the 22nd; and the disturbances in North Warwickshire began on the 29th and 30th seven days subsequent to the publication of those letters. There were three persons whose names he must not produce, all of whom could be identified as Leaguers, who were most active during the disturbances. One of these persons, whose connection with the League the hon. Member doubted, and who took a leading part in supplying the agitators and strangers connected with them whilst in Warwickshire, was elected League delegate from Coventry on January 26, 1842, in the Town Hall of Birmingham, and spoke in that capacity at the Crown and Anchor, on the 9th of February, of that year, and had done so subsequently in several other places; some of his speeches were reported. He (Mr. Newdigate) would only further state, that it appeared in the report of the proceedings of the meeting held in Coventry, on the 19th of July, 1842, that one of the persons connected with the Anti-Corn-law League appealed to the Chartists then present, that they ought not to interrupt the adoption of the resolutions to which they had agreed the night previous, or that they would become liable to the imputation of bad faith. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Newdigate) appealed to the House, whether the observations with reference to the Anti-Corn-law League which he had made last Session in that House, and subsequently repeated at Warwick, were not justified?

Dr. Bowring was only desirous of uttering a sentence or two. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had brought forward a very grave charge against the Anti-Corn-Law League. He had stated that they had sent forth incendiaries amongst the people to whom might be attributed the attacks upon property. In his place in the House he had requested the hon. Member to name the parties to whom he attributed these gross misdemeanours, but the hon. Member objected to do so. He had also spoken to him privately and stated, that, connected as he was with the Anti-Corn-Law League, he was desirous of ascertaining whether any individual connected with that body had committed this offence; but the hon. Member still refused to name the parties. The hon. Member now said, that he could not get at the names of the council who composed the Anti-Corn-Law League. There could be no difficulty in doing so. If he subscribed 50l. he might himself be admitted.

Mr. W. O. Stanley said, that although he was neither a Leaguer nor an Anti-Leaguer, he felt bound to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport. He had listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Gentleman, and after the temperate manner in which he had stated his arguments, he felt that he could not refuse an enquiry which was called for on such strong grounds. He considered that if the Corn Laws could not stand the test of such an enquiry as was called for at the hands of intelligent men, they were no longer entitled to the support which he had hitherto given them. By Returns which could not be disputed, he found, in the county which he represented, one sixth of the population were receiving parish relief, and the labourers were receiving most inadequate wages. Whilst this was the case, though he disagreed from much that had been done by the Anti-Corn-Law League, he should most cheerfully give his support to the present Motion.

The House divided :—Ayes 133; Noes 224: Majority 91.

SUGAR IMPORTED.] Mr. M. Gibson moved for a Return showing the quantity of Sugar the produce of British possessions in America, the Mauritius, and the British settlements in India, upon which the duty chargeable on British plantation Sugar was paid; also showing the quantity of Sugar refined from the same, which was exported, calculating each ton of refined Sugar so exported as representing 21 cwt. of raw Sugar; also the quantity of Molasses upon which duty was paid, converted into its equivalent quantity of Sugar calculating 24 cwt. of Molasses to represent 9 cwt. of Sugar; and showing, from these data, the actual quantity of Sugar retained for consumption in the United Kingdom, in each year, from 1830 to 1843.

Sir R. Peel could not consent to the Motion. From its terms, an inference was drawn by the hon. Member for Manchester that his statement on a former evening with reference to the subject was not borne out by the Official Returns. He was quite ready to give every information on the subject, but he could not acquiesce in a Motion which assumed that a certain principle of calculation was a correct one.

Motion withdrawn.

House adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 13, 1844.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—<sup>3</sup> Commons Inclosure. Private.—1<sup>o</sup> Monkland Railways; Edinburgh, Leith, and Granton Railway; Harrowgate and Knaresborough Railway.
 PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Lord Henniker, Mr. Burroughs, and other hon. Members, from 168 Members, against any Alteration in the Corn Laws.—From Merchants (2), respecting Carriage of Goods by Railways.—From Twisselton, and 6 places, against Union of Seas of St. Asaph and Bangor.—By the Solicitor General, from Exeter, against Poor Law Amendment Bill.—By Mr. Hawes, from Lambeth (6), for Reduction of Duty on Tobacco.

COURT OF ARCHES BILL.] Mr. Elphinstone: In moving the Second Reading of the Arches Court Bill said, I can assure the House, that I shall be as brief as I can in explaining the object I have in view. The House is aware, that there are a vast variety of Ecclesiastical Courts (amounting to upwards of 300) in different parts of the country, and that an appeal lies from one to the other of these Courts, and afterwards to the Court of Arches, which latter Court is the supreme Ecclesiastical tribunal. For instance a Dissenter may be dragged before some peculiar or Archdeacon's Court, for non-payment of Church Rates; having no means of escaping the jurisdiction, he has to go through the whole expense of a suit in this inferior Court; an appeal is then made to the Bishop's Court; here, again, the same process of paying fees is to be gone through. Ultimately, both parties being dissatisfied with decisions in Courts below, an appeal is made to the Court of Arches, and, then, it is probably discovered that the whole proceedings have been irregular and the suit is quashed. It may even be worse than this, for the appeals may be on some interlocutory matter, and then the unfortunate party has to go through the Courts several times. It must be obvious that this system causes great expense and inconvenience to the public. Now, I propose to give to any party who may be so unfortunate as to be entangled in these inferior Courts, whether plaintiff or defendant, the power of declining the jurisdiction of the inferior Courts, and having his cause heard in the Court of Arches, a Court which is invariably presided over by a Judge on whose learning and on whose judicial fitness the public can rely. At the same time, if parties prefer to carry on litigation in a Local Court, I leave them at perfect liberty to do so. The principle on which this Bill is founded has been approved of by every person who has attempted to amend Ecclesiastical Courts. It formed part of the principle of Lord Brougham's Bill, of Sir F. Pollock's Bill in 1835, of Lord Cottenham's Bill in 1836; and it was included in the Bill introduced by my learned Friend the Judge Advocate last year. I introduced a similar measure in the course of last Session. My learned Friend (Dr. Nicholl) objected to my Bill last year (not on principle), because he said it was unnecessary, because Her Majesty's Government were determined to carry their Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. I ventured to tell my right hon. Friend that I was afraid he would not be a true prophet. If Dr. Nicholl had not interfered last year, this desirable improvement might have now been law. If my right hon. Friend makes the same objection this year, I venture again to say, that it is impossible to say what may be the fate of Lord Lyndhurst's Bill; and that it is worse than folly to reject a good measure because another measure may be passed. I cannot help thinking, that my right hon. Friend would adopt a wiser and a more practical course, if he really wishes to carry into effect those improvements in the Ecclesiastical law, of which both he and I have seen the necessity, if, instead of endeavouring in one Bill to make great and violent changes in the law, changes which excite the prejudices of some, and the interested opposition of others—if, instead of introducing Bills containing upwards of 100 clauses, of so complicated a nature that the best lawyer, either in or out of the House, cannot venture to predict what their operation would be on the general law of the land—if he were gradually and safely to introduce specific remedies for the different grievances which may be pointed out by the voice of the public, I will only add, Sir, that every person I have consulted on the subject, whether, in the profession to which I have the honour of belonging, or whether a suitor in these Courts, has cordially approved of the Bill. I beg, therefore, to move the second reading.

Sir James Graham suggested that the hon. Gentleman should postpone his Bill until the Government Bill came down from the other House, which he promised should take place before Easter.

Debate adjourned for a fortnight.

INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.] Lord Worsley moved the Second Reading of the Inclosure of Commons Bill.

Mr. Sharman Crawford opposed the Bill; but declared he had no desire to show disrespect to the promoters of it.

The rights of the poor should be scrupulously watched. Those rights were originally granted by the lords of the soil, who were called benefactors, and better entitled to that name he feared, than they were at present. He objected to the leading principle of the Bill, because he denied that those who were at present in occupation should be allowed to determine the rights of future generations. There was one clause by which it was enacted, that a public meeting should be convened to determine whether an Act of Inclosure should be applied for or not, which was to be determined in the affirmative on a requisition being signed by persons representing in the aggregate two-thirds of the value in the commons proposed to be inclosed. But there were no means to determine what the value was. This was to be determined afterwards, if necessary, by a scrutiny before the Commissioners. In the mean time, however, the Chairman might rule the question by his own arbitrary authority, against which those who dissented would have to appeal to the Commissioners. But, suppose the meeting were to disagree to the proposal for the inclosure, it was then provided that a paper might be handed about from house to house, and so the required number of signatures be obtained privately, after they had not been obtained at the public meeting. He asked what was the use of having a public meeting at all if the business could be accomplished afterwards, in spite, perhaps, of the views of the public meeting. There were several other clauses of the Bill, the effect of which would be that, whilst it was in appearance left to the commoners to decide whether the Enclosure should take place or not, the power was in fact ultimately vested entirely in the Commissioners. Then as to the class of persons who had a right to vote at these meetings. Here, again, a great injustice was done to the poor. On referring to the twelfth clause, he found that no person was to have a right to interfere in these proceedings when he paid more than two-thirds actual value rent, or where he had only a tenancy at will, or a lease of less than fourteen years; but if he had such an interest then he was to have a joint right of interference with the man under whom he held. But he would ask why, because a man held at a rack-rent, should he not have a voice in these proceedings in which he certainly still was interested? He thought this provision, like the rest of the bill, most unjust to the poorer classes. With respect to the working of the bill, should it ever be carried into effect, it was proposed to appoint the Tithe Commissioners to perform this duty, but it gave at the same time the power of appointing Assistant Commissioners, who might have a retinue of clerks. Of course these persons would expect to be paid, and the House might look to having an application made to it for remuneration; or if not, they would pay themselves in some other way less desirable for the public. It seemed to him very much as if it was the object to perpetuate the offices of these Commissioners, after their present duties were terminated; and it would be the object of the Commissioners in all cases to force on Enclosure Acts in order to perpetuate their duties. There was another point to which he objected. He did not see anything in the bill to prevent a person from acting as Commissioner in one of these cases who was himself directly interested in the result; and this was what he thought should never be allowed. The next point upon which he had to observe was, that it was proposed to advance the money for the expense of carrying this act into operation out of the Consolidated Fund. He objected strongly to this proposition, because he thought that those who were to be benefited by the contemplated proceedings should pay the necessary expenses, and not the nation at large. It seemed indeed to be the object of the bill to avoid the expense which was at present incurred in applying for Enclosure Bills in Parliament. But this very expensiveness of the present process was what he for one was not disposed to object to, because he considered that it acted as a wholesome check upon such proceedings—which were proceedings in their nature infringing on the interests of the poor. He would have no objection to the Enclosure of Commons, if it were done upon proper principles, by which the interests of the poor should be permanently benefited. Those Enclosures should be made, not for the individual advantage of wealthy landowners, but should be carried on under some authority appointed by the State, who should act as trustee for the interests of the poor. It appeared to him that one of the most important objects which the House should hold in view at the present time towards the alleviation of the distresses of the working classes and their elevation in the social scale, would be to supply them with small portions of land, to assist in their sustenance. As an instance of the advantages which would result from such a system, he would refer to a passage in the report of the Allotment Commissioners, where it was stated that a crop, value 5*l*, might be raised by spade labour upon an allotment of one-eighth of an acre of land. So important did he consider this fact, that he was firmly of opinion, that whatever means might be taken to give employment to the working classes, whether the Corn-laws were repealed or not, it would still be found necessary to give small allotments of land to the poor in various districts. Mr. Childers, in the report he referred to, gave instances of the quantity of marsh land which had been reclaimed in some places by the labour of the poor. He believed that if these Commons were given to the rich landlords they would be converted into grass lands; and what advantage, he would ask, would this be to the poor? There were already complaints abroad of the class legislation which was carried on all in favour of the interests of the rich, to the detriment of those of the poor; he hoped the House would not give additional occasion for such complaints by passing this bill. If this House did an act by which they would be enclosing for their own advantage all the common lands of this country, the people would have a strong and just ground for offence; but if, on the contrary, they shewed a respect for the rights and interests of the poor, it would have a great effect in producing a kinder feeling between the aristocracy and their humbler fellow-contrymen. With these opinions he should move, as an amendment, that this bill be read a second time this day six months.

Colonel Sibthorp in seconding and supporting the amendment of the hon. Member for Rochdale, begged to disclaim anything discourteous to the noble Lord who had introduced this bill. He had, however, told the noble Lord in private, when he mentioned his intention of bringing in such a measure, that he should give it his firm but humble opposition. With respect to the hon. Member who had moved the amendment, he believed he could say of him that there was not in the United Kingdom a landlord who was more generous to his tenants, more beloved by them in return, and who had a greater regard for the interests of the poor than that hon. Gentleman. Now, with respect to this bill; it was laid on the table on Saturday, when it contained 140 clauses; it had now, however swollen to 149 clauses, why or wherefore he did not pretend to know. He denounced the bill as most arbitrary in its principle, and likely to be most expensive in its carrying into effect. The expense was such that no one, not even the noble Lord himself could pretend to say how it would end. The noble Lord had thought to throw in a little sugar to sweeten the bitterness of the rest of the enactment, by proposing that the Tithe Commissioners should undertake the duties under this measure. But surely the noble Lord must be aware that the Tithe Commission would expire in four years; and, if he was not misinformed—he had been told it, indeed, to-day—that a great deal which the Commission should have done by this time was not done. But it should be borne in mind, also, that there was the power of appointing numerous assistants and secretaries, which would all incur expense. He saw that money was to be borrowed from the Consolidated Fund. He did not know what the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say to this. He should be happy to hear that the Consolidated Fund was in a sufficiently prosperous state to make those advances. But he was afraid they would have to be repaid out of the taxes to be levied on the country. They were to be repaid out of the Poor Rates. He thought the property of the landowners was already sufficiently burthened without having an undefined amount of money drawn from their pockets under the provisions of this Enclosure Bill. He objected to the powers proposed to be given to the lords of the manor. He, as a lord of the manor, might profit by them, but he would scorn to accept a bonus upon such terms. The noble Lord had stated that there were 1,358,419 acres of land in England, and 501,815 acres in Wales, of unenclosed land; but he had not stated how many of those acres could be properly cultivated. He had looked at the records of the House, and he found, that from 1801 to 1835, no less than 1,919 Enclosure Bills had passed the House, and when he looked at the number of Enclosure Bills which had been passed during the last eight years, he found that no less than 2,015

Enclosure Bills had passed the House since the commencement of the century. Then, why should they now call upon them to make further enclosures at the public expense? Another objection which he entertained to the Bill was, that it encroached on the right of the poor, who had no power of defending themselves. The Bill gave the aristocracy an unfair power, and he was surprised that Gentlemen opposite sanctioned the 140 clauses which composed the Bill. There was another point which he wished to advert to. He had always understood that the noble Lord, the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests had shown a great desire to widen the streets of the metropolis for the benefit of the poor. He would put it to the noble Lord, therefore, how, with any consistency, he could give his consent to a measure which would deprive the people of a great deal of the air, exercise, and recreation which they at present enjoyed. He did not like to see obstructions of this kind thrown in the way of the rational enjoyments of the poor. The noble Lord said, that the Bill would give employment to the poor, as it would cause lands which were now uncultivated to be brought under cultivation, but it at the same time interfered with the rights of the poor. He objected to the Bill in toto. He objected to the manner in which it was hurried through the House—to the expenses which it would entail—and to the oppression of the poor, which would be the consequence of it. On these grounds he opposed the Bill, and would support the amendment of the hon. Member for Rochdale. If it passed the second reading, he should feel bound to divide the House on each of the 149 clauses of the Bill.

Mr. Curteis would support the second reading of the Bill; but he thought the noble Lord showed too much tenderness for the rights of lords of manors. He wished the noble Lord had taken the opportunity, in preparing his Bill, of abolishing manorial rights, which were in general beneficial only to attorneys and agents—giving compensation to the lords of manors. He was anxious, while on his legs, to correct a misapprehension as to what had fallen from him on a previous evening in regard to the wages of labour in Sussex. He had been understood to say, that the wages of the agricultural labourer in that county were not less than 12s. a week,

What he had said was, that in his own neighbourhood the wages usually paid was 12s., and in no case less than 10s. a week. In West Sussex he had heard that wages were lower, but he himself had no knowledge whether it were so or not.

Mr. Darby said, the main objection to the Bill appeared to be, that it would operate injuriously to the poor; but he doubted whether at the present day common rights were, generally speaking, advantageous to the poor. He believed, that the most wretched portion of the rural population were those who lived on the edges of commons. In many cases the employment for labourers on the enclosed commons would tend to relieve the parishes of the surplus poor. He should support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Cowper thought the Bill good, as far as it went—but it stopped short at the most important point, viz.: the interests of the poor. He should vote for the principle of the measure, which he understood to be to refer to the discretion of a body of Commissioners, who had no personal interest in the matter, the apportioning of the rights of all parties in cases where commons were to be enclosed under Enclosure Bills. This was far better than leaving those matters to private legislation, where the rights of the poor were too frequently neglected—so far the Bill was important. The means of providing for the surplus population of the country was a question which had engaged some attention; but, in his opinion, if all the lands capable of remunerating labour were brought into cultivation, and if all the sources of manufacturing and commercial industry were unshackled, there would be no surplus population whatever. The common and waste lands in this country amounted, according to Mr. Porter, to 8,000,000 acres, of which more than 4,000,000 were capable of being brought into cultivation, and made a source of profitable employment. Many persons looked to emigration as the only means of removing the distresses of the country, and of providing for the surplus population. His opinion was, that the labouring population should not be driven from their own country until every source of employment at home had been exhausted. He thought, therefore, that the enclosure and cultivation of waste lands was a question of more importance than many which occupied the attention of that House. He should vote for the second reading of the Bill, in the hope that it would be materially improved in Committee. He concurred in very much that had fallen from the hon. Member for Rochdale as to the disadvantage that too often resulted to the poor from private Enclosure Bills. In former times every cottage almost had some common rights, from which the poor occupants derived much benefit—the privilege of feeding a cow, a pig, or a goose on the common was a great benefit to them,—and it was unfortunate, when the system of enclosing commons first commenced, that a portion of the land was not set apart for the benefit of every cottager who enjoyed common rights, and his successors; but the course adopted had been to compensate the owner of the cottage to which the common rights belonged, forgetting the claims of the occupier by whom they were enjoyed. He believed that if a portion of the enclosed lands had been allotted to every cottager enjoying common rights when the enclosure took place, the agricultural labourer would have been in a far better condition than he was at this time. He should be glad to see some arrangement such as he had suggested provided for in the present Bill; and if no other hon. Member should make a Motion to that effect, he would himself move the insertion of a Clause in regard to the allotment of land. It must be recollected that this was not a question affecting the welfare of the agricultural labourer only—the manufacturing labourer was equally interested. The greatest amount of waste lands, in the counties of Yorkshire and Lancashire especially, was to be found in the neighbourhood of the large manufacturing towns; and it would be conferring a great boon on the manufacturing labourer and to the whole country, if, in enclosing those lands, allotments were made for the benefit of that class of the community. He thought the Bill went too far in proposing to enclose all common lands. He should wish that in Committee, all common lands now unenclosed in the vicinity of great towns should be excluded from the operation of the Bill. It was true that the noble Lord (Lord Worsley) had provided that a discretion should be exercised by the Commissioners, and that in such cases as he alluded to they might consult the wishes of the inhabitants; but he did not think that was a sufficient security. He was sure the Bill would meet with considerable opposition in Committee if the rights of the poor were neglected in reference to the points he had adverted to.

Mr. Aglionby was favourable to the Bill, as tending to effect a saving both in time and money, over the old system of procuring Enclosure Bills. The rights of the poor would receive every consideration under the Bill. He had taken the greatest pains in going over the Bill, and there was not a Clause in it which did not give more protection to the poor than was generally given in the old Enclosure Bills.

Mr. Miles thanked the noble Lord for the trouble which he had taken in introducing his Bill. He was decidedly in favour of the principle of the measure, which would have his most ardent support. He only hoped that the noble Lord did not intend to refer it to a Select Committee up stairs, as in that case much time would be lost in its progress.

Colonel Wood observed, that there was not quite so large a quantity of waste lands in the country as had been imagined by the hon. Gentleman. From a return which had been laid upon the Table last year it appeared that there were only 1,000,000 acres. [Mr. Cowper.—That is only the return for some part of the country.] At all events, it extends to all the parishes in which the Tithe Commutation Act had been carried into operation. And, certainly, there could hardly be such a vast disparity between that estimate and the truth as between 1,000,000 and 8,000,000, as had been estimated by the hon. Gentleman. It had been estimated by the hon. Member for Somersetshire 15,000,000; so great was the variation of opinion on this subject. Now, the return enumerated upwards of 700 parishes, in which there were not 100 acres of common or waste lands. He deprecated the passing of a measure that should facilitate the enclosure of such small quantities of land as were not worth the expense of enclosure, but would yet be of great benefit to the poor as at present enjoyed. For he thought many much underrated the importance to the poor man of opportunity for feeding some small animals. He regretted that the Committee up stairs were not to have referred to them the subject of the several Enclosure Acts, instead of the particular measure before the House. The expense of procuring particular Acts might perhaps be beneficially reduced as to common or waste lands. As to common field lands, the particular Acts were not required. For under Lord Ellenborough's Act (6th and 7th William IV.), three-fourths of the occupiers of the common field lands might appoint Commissioners for enclosure; and he knew of parishes in his own county in which the measure had been carried into operation. He might advert to the Moor at Staines as one of a class of commons which afforded many valuable advantages to the poor man, which he should regret deeply to see diminished or deteriorated. With respect to other than common field land, if Private Acts were facilitated, particular cases could be thus provided for with that attentive consideration which was secured by the proposition of a Private Act. As to common field lands, what would be the effect of the present measure? Would it abolish Lord Ellenborough's Act? This point was worthy of consideration. He doubted the utility of the Bill, and he should vote against the second reading.

Mr. Hume said, the principle of enclosure had been carried much too far already. Instead of affording "facilities" for enclosing lands, they ought to throw every impediment in the way of those grasping proprietors who wished to take every plot of ground away from the poor for the purpose of applying them to private purposes. It should be considered, that open spaces were required for the health of the population. At present the poor were driven into dusty roads whenever they wanted a mouthful of fresh air. Grasping landlords stopped up all the walks through the fields and meadows, and not an acre of playground was left for the children of a country village. The consequence was, that they were reducing their population from a bold and hardy peasantry to a stunted, weak, and effeminate race of men. The effect of this sort of measures had never been to increase the labour of the poor—enclosures had never afforded any compensating advantages for the many disadvantages they involved, and for these reasons he should most undoubtedly give his negative to this attempt to extend their principle.

Sir R. Peel agreed with some of the observations of the hon. Member who had just sat down, but came to a different conclusion. He thought it but due to the pains which the noble Lord had taken with this Bill, that the House should give him the opportunity of submitting the details to further consideration, and therefore he should give his vote for the Second Reading. In the first place, he thought there were many descriptions of land, the inclosure of which was facilitated by this bill, which it would be for the general interest of the community should be inclosed. There was a good deal of land held by landed proprietors, in respect of which there was a common right of pasture, and he believed it would be of great public advantage to permit the inclosure of that land, and to give to each proprietor his own separate allotment. But when they came to the question of enclosing commons in the neighbourhood of towns, with respect to which the poor inhabitants of those towns were interested, he, for one, should look with very great jealousy at a bill which gave too summary a power as to these inclosures. In the first place, he thought it was a great public object to have near towns (he was not speaking of great towns like Glasgow or Manchester, but towns of 3,000 or 4,000 inhabitants) an open space accessible to all. He thought it would be very unwise to apply the rigid principles of political economy, and to say that by inclosing these spaces, a greater quantity of vegetable produce could be procured. He thought you had a perfect right to set considerations of health, of innocent recreation, of moral improvement, against the mere considerations of pecuniary gain; and if you were to prove that by the inclosure of the land for a certain period of time, there would be a demand for labour, and ultimately and apparently an increase of produce, these facts would not be considered by him as conclusive; he would consider the other question, whether or no you were interfering with the healthful amusements and recreations of the people. He could conceive many cases in which, unless there were precautions taken — unless you gave the poor the means of protecting their interests, you ran the risk of doing great injury, and of having all these spaces, not merely near towns, but near villages, totally lost to the public. Take the case of a public common accessible to all the inhabitants, and where the right of soil is in the corporation. It may be a great public object that it should continue uninclosed, not only for the sake of those who have a right of common, but for the sake of the poorer classes of the community, who have an open space which, because it is uninclosed, they can go upon without committing a trespass. The very circumstance of its being uninclosed, although it destroys the right of property, gives a right of enjoyment of the free air, which you diminish if you give the right of inclosure. The land belongs to the corporation, but every person who rents a house has a right to turn something or other on the land. Suppose it be thought proper in the corporation to inclose it; they exercise a considerable power over each householder; they persuade them not to be pertinacious in their opposition; an appeal is made to the Commissioners; the corporation is benefited; but he should like to know what were the poor to do? He was speaking of men who had no right but that of the privilege of access. As to the actual right, the House must be cautious how they dealt lightly with these rights. It might be a question of feeling. Hon. Members had their feelings, and the poorer class of the community had feelings on this subject. The right of common connected them with the soil; the right of turning a goose on a common made a man feel interested in the tenure of the land. It might be more beneficial to a tenant that he should accept 2*l.* or 3*l.*; but recollect that you were not dealing with the rights of the individual, but with that of his successors. Therefore, the more you could multiply this feeling on the part of the poor, the more you strengthened the foundations of landed property. Recollect that what was done was irrevocable. These towns might increase; and that was an additional reason why they should not permit too hasty an interference with those uninclosed lands. There was only one other part of the Bill on which he wished to make a remark — viz., that which gave a power of exchange. That was very beneficial in certain cases, but it appeared to be perfectly unlimited, [Lord Worsley: Equitable exchange.] To the present possessor it might be equitable, but there ought to be most minute inquiries whether or no it was for the benefit of his posterity that the exchange should take place. A power to convey 2,000 or 3,000 acres by the mere act of the owner was a very high power indeed, and he hoped the noble Lord would apply some restriction to the power of exchange. Lord Worsley would wish shortly to explain some of the points which had been referred to by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House. Some observations had been made with respect to the rights of the poor to commons in the neighbourhood of towns. Now, the measure before the House provided that all care should be taken that the people should not be unnecessarily deprived of any of their rights of recreation. If hon. Members would look to the twentieth clause of the Bill, they would see that it provided that the Commissioners, upon the application of two-thirds of the interested parties, "shall proceed to inquire into the expediency of such inclosure, having regard as well to the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants of any neighbouring cities, towns, villages, and populous places;" and then in the following clause it was provided that in case persons interested in the land, to the amount of one-fourth of its value, or persons to the number of one-tenth part of the male population of the parish, should give notice to the Commissioners of their intention to apply to Parliament to put a stop to the proposed inclosure, then the Commissioners should not proceed further with the inclosure, until six weeks after such notice, if Parliament be sitting; or until six weeks after it has met, if it be not assembled at the time. He would submit to the House that the question might be raised when the Bill went into Committee. Now with regard to the 48th clause, it would be seen on reference to it that the charge which had been made did not apply to it, for it gave a power of reserving portions of land for public purposes. The clause said,

"Be it enacted, that when the Commissioners or Assistant Commissioners acting in the matter of any inclosure, shall have determined such claims as hereinbefore directed, and in case any doubt or difficulties shall have arisen respecting the boundaries of the land proposed to be enclosed shall have determined and set out such boundaries, they or he shall determine what part of the land proposed to be enclosed shall be set out and appropriated for such public purposes as hereinafter mentioned, or any of them; that is to say, for the formation of public roads and ways for supplying stone, gravel, or other materials for the repair of the several roads or ways to be made over such land, and of the other roads and ways within the parish in which such land shall be situate for the formation of such public drains, water-courses, or embankments, as may conduce to the health or advantage of such parish or the neighbourhood; for a place of exercise and recreation for the inhabitants of the neighbourhood; for the formation or improvement of public ponds, wells, and watering places; and for a supply of fuel for the poor or other inhabitants of the parish; for land for any burying-ground, or enlarging any burying-ground."

He knew that it was stated, that they ought not to interfere with open places in the neighbourhood of large towns; but he should say, in reference to that statement, that it would be a great service if a proper system of drainage were adopted in many places of that description. He had seen some of these spaces in the neighbourhood of large towns, where it would have been of the greatest importance to establish a good system of drainage, and beneficial to the health and comfort of the inhabitants of the towns situated near those open places; and if a sufficient number of persons in a town opposed the inclosure of such a place—if one-tenth of the inhabitants refused to agree to it, they might find in many such cases that it would have been better for the health and comfort of the inhabitants if a better drainage were established. The 70th clause made further provision for public uses—it provided

"That the valuer acting in the matter of any inclosure shall and may, in pursuance of the directions of, or in any manner inconsistent with the directions of the draft, award, set out, and allot such part of the lands to be inclosed as by such draft or award shall have been directed to be appropriated as a place of exercise and recreation for the inhabitants of the said parish and neighbourhood."

He agreed perfectly with the right hon. Baronet, in the opinion he expressed with respect to the importance of taking care that the inhabitants of large towns were provided with proper places of recreation; for he thought that such means of amusement were calculated to keep persons out of the beer-shops and such places, he thought it would consequently be of great advantage to have public walks in the neighbourhood of populous places. He thought the Bill was one calculated to produce great benefit to the public, and he could assure the House that it had been framed with a due regard to the rights of the poor as well as of the more wealthy classes. He brought it forward on public grounds solely, and he looked on it as a measure which would give considerable employment to the poor, and would be of great public advantage.

The House divided on the question, that the word 'now' stand part of the question:—Ayes 70; Noes 23: Majority 47.

Bill read a second time.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS' BILL.] On the Motion that the Masters and Servants Bill be committed,

Sir James Graham said, that he agreed in the object of the Bill, but he thought the means that were taken for attaining that object were inexpedient. It recited five or six Acts of Parliament, and proposed to amend certain parts in each of those Acts. Now he would suggest as a better plan that the Act should repeal those former Acts, and then it might contain all the portion that was really valuable in those Acts, whilst it would be infinitely more clear and precise.

Mr. Miles would act upon the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet. Those Acts were recited in order that hon. Members might more clearly see the Acts which it was desirable to amend. He believed, however, that the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet would be found preferable to the mode adopted in the Bill, and he should move that the Bill be committed pro forma, with a view of acting on that suggestion.

CLERKS TO JUSTICES.] Lord Worsley rose for the purpose of moving for a Select Committee to enquire into the mode of appointment, the duties, and the present system of remunerating the Clerks to Justices at Petty Sessions in England and Wales, and to report the evidence and their opinion thereon to the House. The noble Lord said that the reasons which principally induced him to desire an enquiry into the operation of the present system of remunerating Clerks to the Magistrates at Petty Sessions were, that he had seen it frequently stated in the public papers, and he had frequently found in his experience as a Magistrate, that there was a great apparent injustice in the disproportion between the fines levied on persons convicted before the Magistrates at Petty Sessions and the costs that accompanied those fines. It often happened that persons were brought before Magistrates for small offences—such for instance, as stealing part of a fence, or committing a trifling assault—and in those cases the Magistrates would be anxious to inflict a small punishment, such as would be effected by a trifling fine; but they saw that a fine of 2s. 6d. or 5s. would often inflict a much heavier punishment than the Magistrates would desire to inflict, by the addition of fees and costs to an extent that in many cases obliged those persons to go to prison in default of payment. He moved last year for a return of the fees to clerks at petty sessions, with an account of the number of fines inflicted, and persons sent to prison in default of payment of costs or fines. But the return which had been made was not, by any means, as full and conclusive as he felt to be required. However, from the manuscript returns he had been enabled to collect many instances of very large costs having attended the infliction of small fines, and consequently, that a great deal of suffering had been inflicted on poor persons by the amount of those costs and fees. In Cardiff county gaol a man was imprisoned for non-payment of costs amounting to 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, when the fine was only 1*s.* In another case, the costs on as small a fine were 2*l.*; and in another case the costs on a very small sum were 3*l.* 10*s.* In a hundred in the county of Hertford, a man was fined 2*d.*, was charged with fees amounting to 14*s.* 6*d.*, and was sent to prison for non-payment of that sum. The cost to the county of sending him to gaol was 1*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, and the expense of keeping him in gaol was 2*s.* 4½*d.* a day, so that the whole expense to the county from the infliction of a fine of 2*d.*, with costs of 14*s.* 6*d.*, was no less than 3*l.* 14*s.* 4½*d.* Thus in one case, there were costs of 14*s.* 6*d.* added to a fine of 2*d.*; in another the fine was 3*d.*, and costs 14*s.*; in another, fine 1*d.*, and costs 11*s.* 6*d.*; in another case, fine 2*d.*, and costs 11*s.* 6*d.* Again, a case of a fine of 1*s.* 2*d.*, costs 18*s.* 6*d.*; and costs no less than 14*s.* 6*d.* were added in another case to a fine of 1*d.* He saw also a case where the fine was 2*d.* and costs 16*s.* 6*d.* In another instance, a party suffered imprisonment for three weeks in default of payment of the fine and costs. He could multiply such cases if necessary, but those he had referred to were sufficient to show the disproportion in many cases between the fines and the costs, and the great suffering such a system must inflict. Parties were sent to prison, not because a fine was inflicted of a serious nature, or one that indicated a desire on the part of the Magistrates to visit the person convicted with severe punishment, but they were sent to prison for the non-payment of fees and costs, superadded to those small fines. That was a great evil, and one that might be avoided by adopting a different system of paying the Clerks. If they were paid regular salaries out of the county-rates, the system would work better than the present one. He believed many of those Clerks were very honourable men; however, the tendency of a system under which they were paid from fees must naturally be to increase the number of summonses. It was high time that an alteration should be made in the system, and this mode of paying the Clerks would effect that alteration. If there was a fixed salary allowed them, they would have no interest in the increase of business at their courts. He hoped the attention of Government would be directed to the subject, and if he had an assurance that they would take up the subject during the present Session, he had no desire to press his Motion. He hoped Government would give an assurance that they would, during the present Session, introduce a Bill to remedy the defects he had stated. The Clerks, he thought, might be usefully employed as public prosecutors. He should conclude by moving for the appointment of a Select Committee.

Mr. M. Sutton thought, that what had fallen from the noble Lord was deserving of great consideration. He understood the noble Lord's objections to be directed against the system, and not the personal conduct of the Clerks of the Peace. It was not necessary for him to go through all the noble Lord's observations. He could give the noble Lord the assurance he was led to expect, that the attention of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of his department had been called to the subject, and that a Bill was in preparation which would, he believed, be in a short time introduced. Under these circumstances, the noble Lord would not, probably, press for a Committee.

Motion withdrawn.

NEW SOUTH WALES.] Mr. Scott said, he rose to move for the production of certain papers, relative to the condition of licensed occupiers of Crown Lands in New South Wales, with a view to establish their claim to pre-emption of the lands they held and had improved. He said they were a class of men, of whom, perhaps, little might be known in this country, but who were, nevertheless, a most important and influential body, both in the colony and in the commerce which is carried on with Great Britain. The rapid increase of colonial imports, their value, and the consumption of exports from this country, is in a great measure owing to these men. At present that colony, with a population of about 150,000 persons, consumed annually the almost incredible proportion of from 10*l.* to 12*l.* per head of British exports. It was a wonderful example of an infant state, at the distance of 16,000 miles, in which 150,000 persons take two-fifths of the amount of exports taken by the thirty millions inhabiting the states included in the Zollverein of Germany, and send two-thirds of the whole quantity of wool that is sent by the same states to this country. This result, within the last ten years has been mainly produced by the licensed occupiers beyond the boundaries. It was now about ten years since the ground within the limits of the colony of New South Wales became so fully stocked that it was necessary to seek for land without. To find space for their herds, enterprising parties went in quest of favourable localities on which to form sheep establishments. Exposed to every privation, their men frequently killed, their huts plundered, their flocks carried off to the amount of thousands in a single night, such were the hardships endured by the squatters of New South Wales. The Aborigines gradually retired, crops sprung up in what was formerly a desert, roads or tracts were formed, the progress of location continued beyond them, and the country assumed the appearance of civilization. It is to these men, the real surveyors of the country, that the Government and this country are indebted for the discovery of the land, the acquaintance with its mountains and its rivers, the knowledge of its resources, the acquisition of its territory, and more especially for the addition of its wealth, for the colony must have remained comparatively insignificant had its resources been confined to the limits of the nineteen counties. Originally only colonists, their numbers received large additions subsequently from other quarters. Want of employment both for capital and individuals at home, and expectation of advancement abroad, carried out vast numbers to New South Wales. Amongst these were many men of character and education; but he could best describe the class by referring to the words of Sir G. Gipps, in a despatch dated December, 1840. He said—

are the wealthiest of the land, occupying with permission of Government, thousands and ten thousands of acres; young men of good family and connections in England, officers of the Army and Navy, graduates of Oxford and Cambridge, are also in no small number amongst them.” (He further states, that) “The system they have pursued has been fostered and encouraged by successive governors of the colony, and by successive acts of the Legislature; and this had been done in the conviction that such easy occupation of Crown land is essential to the prosperity of the colony, and because it is wise to sanction and regulate that which the Government has no power to prevent, even were it disposed to do so. “As well might it be attempted (he continues in another place) to confine the Arabs of the Desert within a circle traced upon their sands, as to confine the graziers or wool-growers of New South Wales within any bounds that can possibly be assigned to them; and as certainly as the Arabs would be starved, so also would the flocks and herds of New South Wales, if they were so confined, and the prosperity of the country be at an end.”

Such is the testimony of the Governor of the colony respecting the enterprising class of men occupying the Crown Lands, and such are the sentiments entertained respecting the benefits they confer upon the colony. In these opinions he fully concurred, but not in the statement that they had either been fostered or encouraged. Had they been either fostered or encouraged, they would neither be in the position in which they now are nor would they be seeking for redress of the grievances of which they complain. The House would recollect, that when these men go into the pastures, they go into a wilderness. Residences must be raised for themselves, and their shepherds; sheep-pens, barns, and wool-sheds erected, all the arrangements of a large establishment. These are absolutely necessary, in order to make their flocks a source of profit. And yet all these buildings are done in the most unstable manner; for the existing law, which he asked the House to reconsider, denies them a tenure which would enable them to give comfort to their dwellings, or stability to their farm buildings; the necessary expenses, however, cannot be estimated (says the Lieutenant Governor of Port Phillip) at less than 1,000*l.* on a station of a first class, and at 300*l.* or 400*l.* on one of the second order. Yet after this expenditure has been made, the Government reserves to itself the power of turning these men adrift at a moment's warning. The consequence is that no prudent man would lay out one farthing more upon the buildings on his station than he was obliged : hence we see men whose property is worth thousands, and who have been brought up in the lap of luxury, living in a wretched cabin of rough slabs of wood. He would not detain the House with an account of the settler's abode, of the bark but, the damp clay floor, the bed of sheets of bark, with perhaps a saddle for a pillow, no single article of furniture around him, his food of simplest and of rudest kind—the flesh of his flocks, the milk of his herds, cakes baked in the ashes on his hearth, being all his sustenance ; yet these hovels and this sustenance are the dwellings and the food of nine-tenths of those located beyond the boundaries. It is not the inability of these persons to supply themselves with the necessities and many of the comforts of life—it is the existence of the law of the Government, which by rendering it liable that that may be another's to-morrow, which is theirs to-day, renders it imprudent in them to raise buildings for another's benefit. They will not sow in order that another may reap ; they will not plant in order that another may cut down. They dare not build a house which, meeting the eye of envy or of covetousness, they may lose in consequence of having built it, they dare not build, because the Governor may of his own free will, deprive them thereof. And if these discomforts apply with force to their domestic life, they apply still more prejudicially to the public by affecting the management of the large establishments. The wool of New South Wales is equal in quality to German wool, but the greater part of it is got up in a very inferior manner—the reason is obvious. The great flock-masters—for those without the boundaries already send more wool than all the stockholders within the nineteen counties designated New South Wales—dare not erect proper shearing sheds, wool sheds, or washing pens for the purpose required. These would call for a very great outlay, and in their present state of insecurity no one will erect to-day what may be taken from him to-morrow. Nor does this apply less to the protection of his crops, or to the mills required to grind his corn. No mills are erected, consequently the whole grain beyond the boundaries is ground by hand, at an expense four times that at which it could be done by mills. It applies to all permanent improvements. This system of insecurity of tenure exists universally, and is universally ruinous. Nothing arrests energy so much as unceasing taint. Has uncertainty of tenure contributed to the prosperity of Ireland? Do you seek to perpetuate such a system there? If uncertainty of tenure be unjust and inexpedient in Ireland, you will hardly recommend its adoption or continuance in New South Wales ; nor do the evils of the system apply merely to the pecuniary circumstances of the parties. It affects them in every relation of life ; it affects their morality. These settlers lead a pastoral life, in all but the social comforts and domestic virtues. Nineteen out of twenty of the stockholders beyond the boundaries are unmarried, not that the married state there is a more expensive one, it is the reverse ; but in the dwellings they occupy, they cannot enjoy the comforts of social or domestic life, and they dare not, under the existing law, afford the risk of improvement ; and that which applies to the masters applies also to those whom they employ. With so uncertain a tenure, they cannot be at the expense of sending into the interior families of whose services they may be deprived to-morrow, by an act of the Government. The want of certainty retards civilization. The principle applies with no less force to our intercourse with, and our hopes of civilization of the aboriginal natives. Introduce what law, make what regulations you please, the civilization of the natives depends mainly on the amount and influence of morality of the settlers ; and nothing will contribute to this in a greater degree than the domestic virtues consequent on the introduction of wives into their families. Matthew Moreham, protector of the Aborigines, states that now the females are a frequent subject of quarrel between the blacks and settlers. The redress of these grievances, the remedy of these evils, the reform of these abuses, is the right of preemption. The right of the settlers to purchase, at the minimum government price, the lands which they have discovered almost as much as Columbus discovered America, and to which they, and they alone, have given the value they now have. This right has been given by America to those occupying lands in the interior. And he trusted that the Government may be disposed to take up the question, and to reconsider the law as it exists at present, and to grant to reason and to equity the indulgence which the inhabitants of New South Wales claim, and which they so fully merit, by the benefits they have conferred on the colony, and on the mother country. But if the condition of these settlers does not induce you—if the enumerated evils of uncertain tenure be insufficient—if the calls of morality and the claims of civilization do not appear to have sufficient weight—if you are unwilling to grant it for these reasons—do it on your own account. Consider the question in a commercial point of view. Is the House aware of the immense amount of increase in value imported from Great Britain into the colony, namely, from 409,344*l.* in 1832, to 1,837,000*l.* in 1841? and the whole of this amount is paid for in wool, of which the quantity imported in 1832 was 1,500,000 lbs., and last year was 10,500,000. Nor let it be forgotten that by far the greater quantity of the wool, of which the increase has been so surprising, and which goes to pay for the exports above enumerated, has been raised by the very men who live beyond the boundaries, and in whose behalf the question is thus brought before you, and is the only article in which they can pay you. You may object that their case has not heretofore been brought before you. But, then, dispersed as they must be whose occupation is grazing, in a country where from three to five acres are required to support a single sheep, they cannot so easily combine, and the hardships must both be pressing and of long duration before those who are reduced to so much suffering will raise a complaint. The House is aware of the wealth, of the importance, of the enterprise and intelligence of these men, and all these are so many and grave reasons for taking these complaints into consideration; but there is yet another and more grave:—There are no less than 1,000 stockholders who have licences beyond the boundaries, and about double that number besides, who hold stock running on the stations of licensed occupiers. Thus there are about 3,000 persons in and around the countles of the colony, comprising almost all that is distinguished from property, education, character, or energy, these men are powerful, but they are not contented. He had stated the number of flock masters. In 1839 Sir G. Gipps stated that they had 7,000 or 8,000 tenders, or shepherds, and he also gave the numbers of their stock, which he believed to be very much underrated at 1,334,000 sheep, and taking the average rate of increase since 1832, we are warranted in assuming that the present number of sheep amounts to nearly 3,000,000. They occupy a tract of country extending along 1,200 miles of coast, stretching around and beyond the colony, along the whole line of frontier and of sea-coast, from Portland Bay to the 25th parallel of latitude, and dipping about 300 miles into the interior, and making an average advance latterly of from fifty to seventy miles a year. He asked whether it would not be a stroke of wisdom and sound policy, as well as of justice, to conciliate these men by the concession of their reasonable demands, or by a recommendation to the Colonial Government to adopt measures for that purpose? England boasts of dominions upon which the sun never sets; her colonies are found in every quarter of the globe, so her commerce enters into every port, and her flag is respected in every sea. It is the establishment of colonies, and their encouragement in every clime, that has thus contributed to her naval strength and commercial prosperity, and upon their extension and continuance he considered that her greatness mainly depends. They are the roots which the tree has thrown into distant and newer soil, which at once strengthen and sustain the poorest stem and add fresh vigour to the branches. In the event, however remote, of some foreign power seeking to establish a rival dominion in the Pacific or the Southern seas, would it not be most desirable to endeavour to cement the affections of the offspring to the parent? Would it not be better that considerable men in the Colonies should be favourably disposed towards, and warmly attached to the Government? And would it not be next to madness to alienate the affections of so powerful a body—of a Colony which at once supplies our markets so largely, and takes so largely of our exports? He rested his application for papers, with a view to obtain the right of preemption of lands, and to bring the matter under the immediate consideration of Her Majesty's Government, on the basis of reason and of justice—he appealed on the ground of equity and of fairness, and on the interests of the Colony and the mother country—he ap-pled on behalf of the civilization of the natives and the morals of the colonists—he relied on the benefits which commerce would derive, on the principles of sound policy. He regarded the prospective security and safety to the Empire, but insisted more than all on the circumstance that the indulgence or act of justice which is asked would inflict no harm or injury on any one. If he did not believe that this measure would not hurt the wool-growers of this country, connected as he was with a county which supplies large quantities of wool to the manufacturers, he should be the last person in this House to bring forward such a measure; but, believing, as he did, that the competition is not between the home-growers and the colonial, but between the colonial and the foreign, he brought forward the question with the confidence that it would meet with the support of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. G. W. Hope had, on the part of the Government, no objection to the returns moved for by the hon. Member, but it must be distinctly understood that he did not admit the statement of the hon. Member to be a correct representation of the case. The Government did not agree in those views of which the hon. Member was the advocate.

Motion agreed to. House adjourned at nine o'clock.

THE CAMDEN TOWN DUEL.] Mr. W. O. Stanley said, that with the permission of the House, he wished to correct a misstatement which he had been led into with reference to the unfortunate duel between Lieutenant Munro and Colonel Lynar Fawcett. He then stated that he had heard it reported that on Friday, the day between sending the challenge, and the date of the duel, Lieutenant Munro or his second had consulted some of the officers of his own regiment. Since then he had received a letter from Mrs. Munro, which he would read with the permission of the House:—

"51 Cambridge Terrace, Hyde Park.

"Sir,—Observing in The Times of to-day a letter from yourself regarding the late melancholy duel, reflecting upon any advice offered to my most unfortunate husband from his brother officers, allow me to assure you that not one officer still holding a commission in our regiment was consulted on Friday, and the truth is this—that one officer of thirty years' standing was consulted, likewise a gentleman of much experience in such affairs. This gentleman consulted during the day, a general officer, and Lieutenant Munro consulted three military friends not in his own regiment, who all were of opinion that there was no other course to be adopted but the one he followed.

"I still linger in England to defend my unfortunate husband's case as far as in my power and I again beg to assure you that there is not the slightest blame to be attached to any of the officers of the Royal Horse Guards.

"By publishing this letter in answer to yours of this day, to do justice to the officers of the Blues in this lamentable occurrence, you will greatly oblige,

"Sir, your obedient servant,

"ELIZA MUNRO."

"W. O. Stanley, Esq., M.P."

THE AFFAIRS OF GREECE.] Mr. Cochrane rose, pursuant to notice, to move for copy of correspondence, or extracts from correspondence, between Her Majesty's Government and Sir E. Lyons, or the Courts of France and Russia, relative to the Affairs of Greece. He said, that since he had last the honour of calling the attention of the House to the condition of the kingdom of Greece, that country must have acquired fresh claims to their consideration; the occurrences of the last six months had exercised so important an influence upon her destinies, had so strikingly developed the character of the people and the resources which they possessed, that he was sure the House would pardon him for making a few observations upon events of such vast moment to a nation in whose welfare we ought to take the first interest, inasmuch as we were the first to recognise her independent existence. It was because that kingdom was the creation of the three protecting powers—because England had always taken so active a part in promoting her welfare, that he was anxious to learn what course Her Majesty's Government was prepared to adopt in our future diplomatic relations with that country. Prior to the 15th of September last Greece was suffering from all the evils incidental to a petty despotism—the energies of the people were depressed—the internal administration of the country was enfeebled—privileges the most dear to all the inhabitants—her municipal privileges—were trampled under foot—the Constitution so solemnly guaranteed by the protecting powers was denied to them; in the meanwhile, the Executive, blindly relying upon foreign aid and mercenary troops, took no precaution against the coming storm, while those who were best acquainted with the character of the people, who, like the hon. Member for Bolton (Dr. Bowring), had witnessed their gallant exertions, their indomitable perseverance during many years of unparalleled privation, could only anticipate a renewal of those scenes of horror which had already devastated that rich and fertile country. But upon the 15th of September, the people so long depressed—so broken—some thought so dispirited—rose like one man. No act of bloodshed—almost no act of violence—was committed. The Constitution was proclaimed—it was nobly accepted by the King. It was accepted by the Representatives of France and England, who, in this, anticipated the wishes of their respective Governments. And here he trusted he should be permitted to pay what he was sure the House—what he was sure Her Majesty's Government—would consider only a just tribute to the merits of that gallant officer, who was at present Minister at the Court of Greece, appointed by the noble Viscount opposite, and confirmed in that appointment by the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government. That gallant Officer had won golden opinions from all political classes, and he (Mr. Cochrane) was assured from many sources, that it was the common feeling at Athens, that to the able counsels, to the wise and conciliating policy of Sir Edmund Lyons, the country was indebted for seeing many evils averted which threatened it—and to the confirmation of that good understanding between M. Piscatory and himself, without which the future would, indeed, be fraught with danger. But he must appeal in that House against the term revolution, which had been applied to this unanimous expression of the national will. When the Assembly first met, one Deputy rose and said, "Those who make revolutions against the King and the Throne should be prepared to justify them;" but the Assembly replied with one voice, "It is not a revolution—it is not even a reform—we have asserted the truth." He thought that the House would agree with him, that all the circumstances attending this great assertion of principles were calculated to win admiration. The elections took place unaccompanied by any of those acts of violence which he was afraid were not uncommon on similar occasions, even in this country; and with the exception of one slight movement at Athens at the latter end of October, occasioned by some misinterpretation of an order from the Palace, nothing occurred to disturb the public tranquillity. The House should not forget the difficulties with which a constitutional Government so newly organized had to contend. The conflicting views and interests of parties—the small factions which, incapable of public spirit, could not be controlled by public opinion—the very ignorance of those forms which seemed so simple and were so easily understood when the representation of the people had been long established he thought that when all this was fairly considered, they must marvel at the tranquillity which had so universally prevailed, and believe that a nation so capable of appreciating the blessings of good government would be the last to compromise its existence. But there must always be in every state a certain number of individuals to whom anarchy was power, and who dreaded nothing more than the establishment of institutions, with all their guards and securities—such a party existed in Greece. Besides the House would not forget that in that country certain conflicting influences had been always operating. England, France, and Russia, each had their party, and these parties were represented in Greece respectively by MM. Mavrocordato, Coletti, and Metaxa. The Russian was the most powerful, and possessed eighty votes in the chamber—England and France together 102, and the republicans, under M. Riga Palamides, could command forty-five votes. To show the perfect cordiality which prevailed between France and England on the subject of Grecian Affairs, the House, would perhaps, permit him to quote one or two extracts from the despatches of M. Guizot and Lord Aberdeen. Extracts of the former appeared in the Journal des Débats—and M. Guizot said, “Now that these events are accomplished, it only remains for us to restrain them within due limits, and to regulate their consequences; the King may, perhaps, be tempted, and even among those who have not sustained his cause in the hour of danger, there may be found many who will advise him to adopt a very different course—who will counsel him to withdraw all he has promised, to overthrow all he has accepted; but such conduct we are profoundly convinced would be as imprudent as it must be considered dishonourable. The King will assuredly have many opportunities of exercising over the future Constitution of the State a legitimate influence—let him employ them without hesitation, without any arrière pensées—let him endeavour to uphold the monarchical rights, and all those conditions which are essential to a constitutional Government. If, on the other hand, King Otho should endeavour to retrace the past, to withdraw the concessions he has made—if he should enter upon a course of hesitation, secrecy, and duplicity—it is then we shall fear for him many trials, more bitter than those which he has experienced, and, for Greece, dangers more fatal than those from which she has escaped. MM. Coletti and Mavrocordato will unite their endeavours to establish a constitution in that country at once free and monarchical, and it is probable that this monarchical Constitution will be owing to the cordial understanding between the two Powers.

Lord Aberdeen writing to Sir E. Lyons, in November 29, said,—

“The King of Bavaria is desirous that the royal power should be established on a solid basis, so that the democratic principle should not be unduly extended; and that all unjust attempts against the throne should be averted. The French Ambassador concurs with us upon those principles, without which the Government of his Majesty cannot possibly establish a constitutional government, which will possess the elements of power and duration. It is the duty of the protecting Powers to watch over the progress and the fulfilment of the constitution. * * * This is, therefore, the manner in which her Majesty's Government desire that you, in conjunction with that of France, induce the leaders of the Greek nation to adopt that course which all men regard as the only sure means of confirming the new state of things; but at the same time you will miss no opportunity of impressing upon the King the necessity not merely of fulfilling his promises to the people, but also of avoiding every act and expression which could awaken a suspicion in the minds of his subjects; inevitable mischief would result from such conduct. On the other hand, you will use all your endeavours to prove the mischievous theories of the extension of democratic principles.”

It was, however, much to be lamented that Russia had never fairly accepted the revolution which had been accomplished, and that M. Metaxa, who represented the interests of that country, had latterly thrown some obstacles in the way of MM. Mavrocordato and Coletti. His object was, to direct the attention of Her Majesty's Government to some articles of the proposed constitution adopted by the State, but not yet ratified by the King, which, he much feared, would, if ratified, be fatal to the stability of the Throne, and the prosperity of the country. He wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government meant to support the ratification. What did Greece require? A free constitution capable of aiding the natural development of her resources—of securing the rights of her citizens—of putting a check upon the caprices of her rulers—for this the events of the 15th of September were accomplished. And they had been most loyally and frankly accepted by the King. Would Greece now leave the straight path into which she had entered? He trusted, he believed not—but for this what was required? Above all else, a Senate, if not hereditary, at least, nominated for life by the King, as a natural counterpoise to the Chamber, elected by the people. The Assembly might well be accused of want of due reflection, if, with the example of France and England before their eyes, and surrounded by governments purely monarchical, they should not be contented with the same amount of liberty as reigned in the constitutional governments of Europe. He would now merely glance at those articles of the constitution which had been adopted by the Assembly, but which he fondly trusted the good sense of the people would prevent their insisting upon. The 39th Article of the proposed constitution enacted that each successor to the throne of Greece, must be a member of the Greek Church. Now this was to fly in the face of the allied Powers, and to act in direct violation of the original Treaty, by which the throne was vested—in the event of failure of direct heirs, to the present King—in the house of Bavaria; and this would include his Majesty's brother, who was a Roman Catholic, and on whom the throne was entailed. Besides, it was directly opposed to the 37th Article of their own constitution, which reproduced the 8th Article of the Treaty in 1832, relative to the succession. He regretted much to see, by the papers which had arrived yesterday, that this 39th Article was adopted unanimously. But he did think the Assembly should be satisfied with an engagement from the King for himself and his children, and merely express the national wish that his successors should be members of the Greek Church. The 34th Article voted the Civil List for ten years only. But the 71st Article was the most objectionable of any, by which the Senate was nominated for ten years; and this was directly opposed to the opinion of France and England, and, if ratified, must infallibly sow the seeds of constant agitation and intrigue, and of anarchy, in that country. There were several other points of minor importance, but with these he would not trouble the House; the confirmation of the articles he had cited must prove fatal to the stability of the Government, and without such stability there could be no prospect of the revival of prosperity. He thought, therefore, that it was incumbent upon the allied Powers to urge, in the strongest manner, upon the National Assembly the danger of the course into which they were rushing. The circumstances of the Greek nation having obtained a constitution for themselves did not place them beyond the protection of the three Powers. This nation was only in the position it should have occupied in 1832, and it would be a most unjust policy in us not to use all our exertions to prevent a settlement which must lead ultimately to acts of outrage and violence. Any feeling in the Assembly opposed to a fair constitution, by which the legitimate powers were to be obtained for each part of the State, was the more to be lamented, from the circumstance that his Majesty had since the 15th of September in no degree been wanting to the State. When he had the honour of seeing Prince Wallerstein in Paris, the Prince assured him that both his Majesty, King Otho, as well as the King of Bavaria, were resolved to fulfil the conditions entered into on the 15th of September, and honestly and cordially admit the new order of things. In answer to the address presented to his Majesty by the National Assembly, his Majesty thus expressed himself:—

“ I receive with much pleasure this address. The assurance which it conveys to me, that my own sentiments are in accordance with yours gives me the deepest satisfaction. In this manner we shall happily accomplish the great work of giving a constitutional government to Greece, and thus I do not doubt that we all understand the 15th of September.”

It was not towards a Sovereign, who, whatever his previous faults, had now acted with so much honesty, that the nation should be wanting in reliance and faith. He did not believe his Majesty would fail in his duty. He would feign trust the Assembly would not fail in theirs; but it would be necessary for all who really had the welfare of their country at heart, boldly to follow enlightened patriotic men like M. Mavrocordato and Colletti. There were some, he feared, who supported the new Government, but were too much disposed to await events and see what course the world would take. But it was with the State as it was with religion—“ He that is not with me is against me.” Before he sat down, perhaps the House would permit him to make one comment upon some remarks which had fallen a few nights previously from the hon. Member for Pontefract. The hon. Member had accused him of inconsistency, because he advocated at one and the same time principles of legitimacy in old countries, and a constitutional Government in Greece. Inconsistency was a strange charge for the hon. Member to bring against any man—but in his case it was absurd. What! because he clung to hereditary descent, because he did not believe in the doctrine that kings ruled by the will of the people. In the first place, from a religious feeling; secondly, because he thought the principle of legitimacy was not only a security for our peace and happiness, but also secured us in our constitutional privileges. Nay, more; though he believed a despotism the government best adapted to Russia, was he, on that account, blind to the fact that a republicanism was suited to America? Was he, on that account, incapable of appreciating the vast blessings of constitutional government? and was he to be accused of inconsistency because he would vindicate our national faith by obtaining such privileges for Greece? and thus fulfil the conditions entered into with that country when she accepted King Otho? They must remember, that institutions adapted for one country, another was not ripe for; another, perhaps, too ripe; and he was but a shallow reasoner who would apply the same principles to all nations and to all climes. We could but use our best endeavours to obtain that great end, for which each citizen sacrificed a part of his national liberty. We must scatter in his path as many flowers as we could gather, so that he might find, in the happiness and the enjoyment of life, some consolation for the shortness of its duration. Might it be thus with Greece! In this spirit he had again ventured to bring her case before the consideration of the House, which he trusted would sympathise with him in the expression of his warm congratulations for the past, and in the fond anticipations with which he regarded the future. The hon. Member concluded by reading the terms of his Motion as stated above.

Sir R. Peel said, the hon. Gentleman's Motion was, "for correspondence, or extracts of any correspondence, between Her Majesty's Government and Sir Edmund Lyons, or the Courts of France and Russia, relative to the recent events in Greece." With that Motion he was not prepared substantially to disagree; but he hoped that the hon. Gentleman would permit Her Majesty's Government to exercise a very large discretion in withholding such portions of the correspondence, which, as responsible Ministers of the Crown, they might think it advisable, for the interests of the State, and from the duties they had to perform, not to produce. The question of the principle and details of the constitution of Greece was at present under discussion by the constituted authorities of that country; and the Government of England had united with that of France in offering some advice upon the general principles connected with the formation of such a constitution. He thought the House and the hon. Gentleman would give the two Governments credit, at least for good intentions, when he said that those instructions and that advice had been influenced by the purest motives and the sincerest wishes to establish in Greece a popular representative and constitutional government, combined, at the same time, with such institutions as should secure the existence of a limited monarchy. He thought that the correspondence which he meant to lay before the House would fully prove the truth of this assertion. But he should feel exceedingly unwilling to lay before the House at present any correspondence with regard to the details which are now under consideration. He thought we ought to be very cautious how we dictated to a free people any thing with reference to their government. He thought that the mode in which the National Assembly and the constituted authorities of Greece were proceeding, was calculated to inspire and was deserving of public confidence, and that we could better depend on those institutions which might be established by their own free-will, after full deliberation, and free discussion—he thought that institutions so established would be more likely to be permanent than if they should appear to have been unduly influenced by the dictation, or even the advice of foreign powers. He would mention one single circumstance to show how important it was for him, in the position in which he stood, not to be premature in offering opinions or communicating papers with respect to the matters, now under discussion in Greece. If the hon. Gentleman had at four o'clock to-day, (it was a little after five when Sir R. Peel said this) asked him what was the decision of the National Assembly of Greece as to one of the points under discussion, namely, the duration of the tenure of office by members of the Council, he should not have been able to inform him. He was now, however, able to say, that accounts had been received from Greece in the course of the present day reporting the result of the discussion on that measure. A division had taken place upon it, in which the number were equal, ninety-eight being for the limitation to ten years, and ninety-eight for its extension during life. Another division however, was expected on the next day, which might have a material bearing on the question. Now, he thought the House would see, that while this subject was abso-

lately under the consideration of the constituted authorities of Greece, it would be extremely unwise for the British House of Commons to enter into any debate or discussion upon it. He, therefore, deprecated the continuance of the discussion on the present occasion; there would be plenty of opportunities for free discussion and the free expression of opinion, without prejudicing the subject by a premature consideration of it. As he had before said, he would be happy to give the hon. Member the communications made at the commencement of the proceedings—communications which he was satisfied would show the dispositions of the British and French Governments, and satisfy the House that they had done that which was becoming in them, and calculated to induce the constituted authorities in Greece to secure the blessings of free institutions, together with a limited monarchy. With respect to what the hon. Gentleman had said on the subject of the loan, he (Sir R. Peel) must be excused for at present declining to answer. Whatever might have been felt at one time as to the expediency of insisting on the repayment of the loan, he felt that the House would agree with him that those considerations would not apply to a people who were passing through such a crisis in their affairs as that which was taking place in Greece, and he trusted the House would rest assured that every attempt would be made, on the part of the Government, to reconcile the duty which they owed to this country as the guardians of the public purse, with what they felt due to a country placed in such a position as that which Greece now occupied. In conclusion, he begged to inform the hon. Gentleman, that in the course of a week or ten days he would be prepared to lay on the Table such portions of the public correspondence on the subject of Greece as it would be consistent with his duty to give.

Viscount Palmerston said, that undoubtedly the answer of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, to the speech of the hon. Member for Bridport was more encouraging and satisfactory than the state of the Treasury Benches when the hon. Gentleman began his speech would have led the House to expect. [Sir R. Peel: How so?] Because there was nobody present on those Benches. But he thought, under the circumstances, that the statement of the right hon. Baronet was satisfactory in regard to the Motion. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to give the papers asked for by the hon. Gentleman, and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman was justified in claiming to exercise a discretion as to the selection which he should make of Papers forming part of a correspondence still going on, and involving points of great delicacy, affecting the feelings of another and an independent nation, in regard to the details of the constitution they had under deliberation. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would give as large a selection from the correspondence as he could consistently with the present position of the affair, and the feelings of the people of Greece in regard to it. He concurred with the hon. Member for Bridport that the change which had lately taken place in Greece did not amount to a revolution, but was only a measure taken for the assertion and maintenance of rights which had been conceded to the Greek nation by Treaty; therefore, the manifestation made by the Greek nation, could not with propriety be called a revolution. Their conduct during that event, in his opinion, did them the highest honour. Persons had been in the habit of saying that the Greeks had been so many centuries under slavery and oppression, that they were not yet fitted for the enjoyment of a constitutional form of government. The event had proved how undeserving they were of that opinion. Greece had by her acts given a convincing disproof to such notions, and had afforded an evidence of the soundness of the position that all nations were fitted for the enjoyment of a constitutional Government if it were given to them; and for his part he believed that if any nation should be found not fit for constitutional Government, the best way to fit such nation for it would be to give it them; but if nations were to wait until the enemies of popular institutions pronounced them fitted to receive them, he feared they would have to wait long enough. Nothing could be more honourable to the Greek nation than the mode in which they had brought about the establishment of their constitution; and he thought, also, that the conduct of the King of Greece, during this trying state of things, had been infinitely honourable to him. Many people had thought, knowing the repugnance which he had evinced to a popular constitution, that His Majesty would have endeavoured to have escaped from the practical adoption of that constitution which had been forced upon him; but, on the contrary, he appeared to have acted throughout with the utmost sincerity and good faith in so fulfilling the engagements which he had entered into with the Greek nation in September last. He sincerely hoped, that both His Majesty and the Greek people would continue to follow up what was then done in the same spirit. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that great delicacy and discretion ought to be exercised by the Governments of France and England in any advice they might think it right to offer to the Greek nation in regard to the details of their constitution. Although he admitted that they might advise, yet the utmost forbearance in advising ought to be shown. But he agreed with the hon. Member for Bridport, that the attention of those Governments ought to be directed to that article in the Greek constitution which provided that the Sovereign should be of the Greek religion. It was settled by the Treaty of 1832, that if the succession should fail in the line of King Otho, the Crown should pass to his younger brother Leopold, and to his male descendants. Now, these princes would of course be of the Catholic religion, and, therefore, this article of the constitution would, in such a case, become incompatible with the Treaty of 1832. He trusted he should not be told that this incompatibility might be got over by the adoption of the Greek religion by the Catholic successor to the Throne of Greece. He trusted that neither England, nor France, nor the Greek people, would expect that a person brought up in one religion, should change it merely to mount a throne. Upon this ground it would be inconsistent with the treaties by which the succession to the Throne of Greece was regulated to ratify that article of the constitution. But there was another objection to this article, collateral and contingent; for if all the branches of the House of Bavaria should fail, and if that article which required the Sovereign to be of the Greek Church should remain in force, where would the Greeks be obliged to go to find a successor to the Throne? They would be driven to the Royal Family of Russia, one of the three parties to the alliance by which the independence of Greece was established and it was a fundamental condition of that alliance that neither of the three Royal Families should give a sovereign to the Throne of that country. It was one of the fundamental principles upon which the union of the three contracting parties was based, that Greece should be made independent of all and each of these three Powers; therefore it was another objection to this article of the constitution, that it would in a possible contingency drive the Greeks to choose a successor from the Family of one of the contracting parties to the Treaty. He trusted, therefore, the Governments of England and France would use the influence they were entitled to exercise to obtain a modification, of this article. He was glad to hear the testimony that had been borne by the hon. Member for Bridport to the conduct of that distinguished officer and diplomatist, Sir Edmund Lyons. Throughout all the transactions in which that officer had been engaged in Greece, his conduct had been equally honourable to himself and advantageous to the country. He felt particularly gratified at this, because that gallant officer had been appointed to this diplomatic post by the Government to which he had had the honour to belong, and they had appointed him, he was aware, under considerable responsibility. Though Sir E. Lyons had previously distinguished himself as an able naval officer, he had never before been engaged in the diplomatic service. He was glad that the result of that appointment had justified the opinion of the Government as to the gallant officer's abilities, and that he had acted not only to the satisfaction of the Government which had appointed him, but also to that of their successors. In conclusion, he could only again say that he was glad that the right hon. Baronet had agreed to give the papers moved for, and he thought that the hon. Member would exercise a sound discretion in leaving the Government to make such a fair selection as they considered might be presented to the House, without detriment to the interests of the public service.

Sir R. Peel begged, after what had fallen from the noble Lord, to say a few words in explanation. He trusted that the House would not draw any inference from his silence on particular points of the Greek constitution. The religion of the successor to the throne of that country was a point that had not escaped the attention of the Government. It had occupied its full consideration, but he believed the noble Lord would concur with him in considering it to be one of those points upon which it would be unwise to enter into a discussion at the present moment. He was sorry that he had not been present at the commencement of the speech of the hon. Member for Bridport, or he should have been happy to have borne his testimony to the admirable conduct of Sir Edmund Lyons, in the important duties which had been entrusted to him. The noble Lord took credit to himself, and justly so, for the appointment of Sir Edmund Lyons; but he hoped that the noble Lord would admit that the present Government was entitled to some credit for having retained in office that gallant officer, and reposed in him that full and entire confidence to which he was entitled. It was an honour to the profession to which he belonged that the gallant officer had discharged his duties with such discretion, fidelity, and ability.

Sir Howard Douglas entirely concurred with his right hon. Friend, the right hon. Baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government, that it was extremely unwise for the British House of Commons to enter into any debate or discussion upon the details of the proposed Constitution of Greece, whilst that subject was under the consideration of the constituted authorities of that kingdom; and, though possessed of ample materials, he (Sir H. Douglas) would reserve himself for future discussions upon the affairs of Greece, and abstain from giving any opinion in detail as to the merits and tendencies of the new Constitution, until it shall have been completed. All he would say in the mean time was, that he entertained no very favourable expectations of a wholesome result from a movement which had commenced with one of those military pronouncements of which we have lately heard so much, and which have produced such disastrous effects elsewhere. He (Sir H. Douglas) would therefore confine his observations to one most important, and most decisive circumstance, which entirely forbade every expectation that the present movement in Greece would effectuate what the Greek people fought for in their revolution, and which the whole civilized world desired they might accomplish, namely, their entire and absolute independence, spiritual as well as temporal. He (Sir H. Douglas) concurred with the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton in the opinion he expressed, and the apprehensions he entertained, as to the probable consequences of that article of the Greek Constitution, which provided that all future sovereigns of Greece should be of the Greek religion. But the noble Lord did not refer his objections to what was, in fact, a primary and a decisive step in that direction, leading inevitably to the result which, in the event of King Otho having no children, the noble Lord had indicated; and which, taken altogether, he (Sir H. Douglas) had a very strong impression exhibited what the main spring was, of the action of those, who had been mainly instrumental in bringing about the late movement at Athens. The great object of the Greek people in their memorable revolution, and for the accomplishment of which the civilized world felt most anxious for their success, was, that they might not only acquire political independence, but their complete spiritual separation from the Patriarchate of Constantinople. This was accordingly provided for, at the elevation of King Otho to the throne of Greece, by solemn acts, copies of which he (Sir H. Douglas) held in his hand, namely, Protocols of the meetings of the Prelates, convoked at Nauplia, for the purpose of declaring the entire independence of the Church of Greece; and a solemn act, decree, and proclamation, of the entire independence of the Hellenic Church, the first article of which declares, that the Orthodox Eastern Apostolic Church of the Kingdom of Greece acknowledge no Spiritual Head, but the Founder of the Christian faith, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Now the second article of the proposed Constitution, rescinds that declaratory act, so far as to declare, that the Greek Church, instead of acknowledging no Spiritual Head but our Saviour Jesus Christ, is inseparably united with the Great Church of Christ in Constantinople. The noble Lord must be well aware of the serious inconvenience and dangers that have resulted, and must result from the Spiritual influence of the Patriarch of Constantinople, in connection with certain temporal Powers, extending over and interfering with the internal affairs of independent states. When the Ionian Islands came under British protection, it was a great omission not to separate the Ionian Church from the Spiritual Dominion of the Patriarch of Constantinople, as effected with respect to Greece, by the documents to which he (Sir H. Douglas) had referred. And he would prove the dangers that must result to Greece from the alteration now proposed, according to the new Greek Constitution, by adverting to the serious and dangerous interferences of the late Patriarch of Constantinople with the internal affairs of the Ionian Islands, and the obstructions thus interposed to the improvements and ameliorations in the laws and internal affairs of the Ionian Islands, proceeding under British Administration. So dangerous did the intrigues of the Patriarch become, from the exercise of this spiritual influence, under that of the temporal Powers with which it was connected, that the noble Lord, the Member for Tiverton, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, found it absolutely necessary to instruct Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, a noble and distinguished personage, of whom he (Sir H. Douglas) would speak in terms of the highest respect and regard, and with a strong sense of the ability and vigour of that noble Lord's conduct, to demand the deposition of the Patriarch, as the only way of averting the very serious evils that must have ensued, had that influence not been effectually counteracted. So, unquestionably, will it be, if that influence does not remain effectually excluded from interfering in the affairs of Greece. And he would fearlessly say, that all the blood which has been shed in the cause of Greek freedom, will have been shed in vain; all the expectations entertained by the British people in particular—all the great objects of the Powers which mainly brought about the independence of Greece, will be disappointed, if the Church of Greece be restored, in any degree, to spiritual subjection to the Patriarch of the Turkish capital. The noble Lord had clearly pointed out what would happen, in the event of King Otho dying without an heir, or the Crown becoming vacant. The proposed Constitution provides another vehicle for facilitating this, by the article, which, in such events, makes the monarchy elective; and, as the noble Lord has well said, there is but one royal family, from which a Prince could be selected, in whose person and persuasions all these foreboding Articles, relating to religion, in the new Constitution, may be accomplished.

Sir R. H. Inglis certainly thought it was desirable, that the Church of Greece should be entirely independent; but he did not think it was convenient that the House should discuss the details of the Greek constitution at a moment when they were under deliberation by the constituted authorities in that country. He could not agree with the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, in the sweeping proposition which he had enunciated, that in any country whatever, even China or Japan, it was only necessary to introduce free institutions in order to fit the people for their enjoyment. He thought this was a proposition which, coming from the authority which it did, should not be tacitly assented to by the House. He thought, that without previous cultivation and preparation, the sudden introduction of free institutions amongst nations generally would only lead to increased barbarism, and eventually to actual anarchy. With respect to the appointment of Sir Edmund Lyons, looking at the conduct of that gallant officer, which had been most excellent throughout, he was prepared to say that no appointment had ever been made by the noble Lord which was so wholly unobjectionable. In his opinion, Sir Edmund Lyons was entitled to represent England and its interests, not only on account of the diplomatic abilities which he had displayed, but from his having throughout united the high character of an English gentleman with that of an eminent officer. The noble Lord had said that Greece was entitled to claim a constitution. More than that, the King himself had ten years ago promised to give a constitution, and it was by virtue of that pledge he continued to govern that fine and glorious country. Yet he believed that a grosser system of tyranny had been exercised in that country during those ten years than in any other country in Europe for a century. He would not stop to inquire whether what had happened on the 15th of September were worthy of the name of a revolution, but it was of such a nature as to recommend anything even bearing that name to him. He could not go along with his gallant Friend near him (Sir H. Douglas) in saying that it was merely a military movement. He believed the revolution was prepared by the scarcely endurable despotism of the King, and that the soldiers shared, but did not lead the feeling of the country.

Sir H. Douglas explained, that what he said was, that the movement in Greece, commenced with a military pronouncement; and he thought no good could come of that. The gallant General concurred most cordially, in the respect and esteem, in which Sir Edmund Lyons was most deservedly held.

Mr. Cochrane, in reply, said that he did not for a moment imagine that the absence of the right hon. Gentleman at the commencement of his observations had arisen from any disregard of the interests of Greece; but he at the same time regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was not present during the whole of his speech, as there were some other points which he thought the right hon. Gentleman would have replied to. But, at all events, he was delighted to find that the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been called to that article of the Constitution which referred to the religion of the successors to the throne of Greece, and also that he bore such ample and honourable testimony to the ability of Sir E. Lyons, who, he believed had not once left Athens since his appointment by the noble Viscount, now nearly ten years since. The gallant Officer behind him (Sir H. Douglas) had called this a military movement in Greece. It was, on the contrary, the unanimous movement of a free people. As for what the gallant Officer said about waiting for the ratification of the Constitution by the King—however valuable the gallant Officer's opinion might be—it would never be too late for him to give it. He regretted his right hon. Friend near him (Sir R. Inglis) had alluded to the King's past conduct. Whatever that might have been, he had behaved admirably since he had accepted the Constitution. As for the loan, he thought every possible delay should be given to the nation under the circumstances of the case. He did not think it necessary to divide for the papers, as the right hon. Gentleman had promised to exercise a large discretion. He trusted the term "large" applied to the number of the papers which were to be laid on the Table.

Motion, as qualified by Sir R. Peel, agreed to.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION IN THE LEVANT.] Mr. Monckton Milnes rose pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the present state of Criminal Jurisdiction over British subjects within the dominions of the Porte. Within these dominions a considerable number of British subjects resided; Maltese and Ionians principally, and a few Englishmen. The Maltese being totally dependent on the coasting trade they carried on with the Levant and the opposite coast of Africa, the consequence was that many of them had settled in and formed a large portion of the population of Smyrna, Beyrout, Constantinople,

Tunis, Tripoli, and Alexandria. There were no means of calculating accurately the number of Franks resident in those places; but he believed he was not overstating the fact when he said that in Alexandria alone there were 2,000 Maltese British subjects; 2,000 in Constantinople, and 1,500 in Smyrna; and such was the anomalous state of the law, that murder or any other crime might be committed by any of these people almost with impunity, for there were no means of bringing them to punishment. We had, in fact, thrown this large number of British subjects into the dominions of the Porte without providing any consular code of laws for their government, and for the punishment of crime. It might be supposed they were subject to the laws of the country in which they resided, but that was not the case, and certainly when they remembered that the Turkish law was almost purely ecclesiastical, and regulated by the Koran, it would be most unfair and unjust to commit Christian settlers to its jurisdiction. Accordingly from the time of Charlemagne downwards, in every treaty entered into with the Porte and Christian countries, it had been expressly provided that the Christian subjects of those countries should be independent of the Turkish law; and in all our treaties with the Porte we had insisted on the abstraction of our subjects from the jurisdiction of the Turkish tribunals. But though we had insisted upon this, and on vesting in criminal cases the whole jurisdiction in the Consul of the Christian nation to which the Christian criminal belonged, strange to say we had left our own Consul without the power of taking cognizance of such crimes. On the contrary, when the Consuls had exercised some authority, and imprisoned refractory seamen, they were threatened with proceedings in this country for false imprisonment. And in some instances these Consuls felt it necessary to remain voluntary exiles from their country, fearing the liability which, for having interfered to repress or punish crime in British subjects residing in their respective consulates, they were subject by the law as it now stood. He would state an instance of the defective state of the law. A very atrocious murder had been committed at Smyrna by a Maltese upon a Dutch woman. Application was made to the British Consul to bring the criminal to justice, and he wrote to the Foreign Office for instructions. The case was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, and they reported that, as the law stood, the only mode of dealing with the culprit was to send him to England to be tried at the Central Criminal Court. To do this, it was necessary not only to bring the guilty party, but several witnesses to substantiate the case against him; and the House would see that to bring that man to trial for his offence, must have cost a very large sum to the country. Again, in the case of any injury being inflicted by an Englishman on a Turkish subject—though, according to the letter of the stipulations of certain treaties, he might be given up to be judged by the Ottoman courts, those stipulations were overruled in practice, and under no circumstances of criminal cases were English subjects submitted to the jurisdiction of the Ottoman courts, at least in the countries immediately under the jurisdiction of the Sultan. For a long period this was the anomalous position of the law; but in the course of the last Session of Parliament a Bill had been passed which gave to the Government full powers of remedying the evil, if they chose. He alluded to the Foreign Jurisdiction Bill. Lord Aberdeen, in writing to the Consuls in the Levant in reference to that Bill, informed them that by it they were relieved from those consequences in this country, on account of acts done by them in imprisoning refractory seamen, to which they had been previously subject; but giving no instructions—no suggestions to govern them as to the future, and providing no remedy for those great evils which he had described. He would mention another case as showing the insufficiency of the powers with which the Consuls were vested, in regard to lesser criminal matters. Mr. Larkin, the Consul at Alexandria, had informed him that on his return to that place, after a short absence, he found that one of his servants, a Maltese, had during his absence sold all his wine and plate. The man had not absconded, and upon being threatened, told Mr. Larkin that he knew very well that he could do no more than get the consul to imprison him for a week or two below in his dining-room. As he had said, the Government, knowing the necessity of the case, obtained a Bill from Parliament last year, and had subsequently issued an Order in Council informing the authorities that that Bill had passed, but they had taken no steps to carry out the objects in view, and had left an evil, which was a disgrace to any Christian country, precisely in the state in which they had found it. Under these circumstances he felt it to be his duty to move an Address to the Crown upon the subject, and he hoped the House would show its sense of the evil, and its conviction that a remedy should be applied without delay, by agreeing to the Motion with which he would now conclude—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty representing to Her Majesty the present anomalous state of Criminal Jurisdiction over British subjects within the dominions of the Porte, and praying that Her Majesty will be pleased to establish with as little delay as possible, some such Jurisdiction as shall protect the lives and property of Her Subjects in those countries, and remedy the lawless disorder resulting from the absence of any such Jurisdiction.”

Mr. G. W. Hope said, as he had brought in the Bill to which his hon. Friend had referred, perhaps he should be the best able to reply to his observations. He concurred with his hon. Friend as to the evils which had formerly existed, but those evils the Bill of last year had been brought forward to remedy. His hon. Friend had not noticed the fact that, notwithstanding the complexity of the Maltese law, there was yet a jurisdiction which could take cognizance of criminal acts, known by the name of the Custom of the Levant. That custom had been for a long time in operation in the East; it was known and recognised. The only doubt was as to its legality—and that custom had been legalised by the Bill of last year, and by the Orders in Council which, in consequence of that Act, were issued on the 2nd of October. That Custom in future would be legalised by the Order in Council, so that this branch of the complaint was completely met. The next complaint was, the expense incurred in bringing criminals here, the necessity of obtaining voluntary witnesses, and of paying their expenses; and his hon. Friend, alluding to a particular case, asked why provision had not been made for trying that criminal at Malta? But no such provision could have appeared necessary till the case arose. And when his hon. Friend asked what was legalised, his answer was, that what was legalised was well known, and it might as well be asked of him what was the common law of England. The code of the Levant was a similar code to the common law code of England; and it did not follow that because it could not be strictly defined here, that those who were accustomed to administer it did not understand it. It extended not only to civil but to criminal cases, and came daily before the Consuls abroad. His hon. Friend did not see why this law should not have been codified, and why the full machinery of Government should not have been put into play to carry it out, as soon as the Act to which he had referred passed. But the fact was, that questions of great technical difficulty had arisen—questions which had been referred to the law officers of successive Governments,—and there was the greatest difficulty in reconciling the maintenance of the liberties of British subjects, combined with a due control over their excesses and their crimes in all parts of the world, with the very summary jurisdiction exercised by the Oriental and despotic States, and by some barbarous nations; and the only way occasionally to deal with it appeared to be to place the parties under the absolute control of the Representative of the Crown. The powers of the Consuls and the powers which the House had entrusted to the Government must be exercised with the greatest responsibility. It would be extremely difficult for that House to legislate on the question—it was equally difficult for the Government then to issue Orders in Council which were to stand in the place of legislation; and until Parliament had lately granted very extensive powers to the Crown, it was difficult to take any step at all. After obtaining those powers, before hastily and in ignorance proceeding to legislate, it was requisite to obtain a full statement of the laws and customs prevailing in the various parts of the world which would be affected by that Act. His hon. Friend complained that no legislation had taken place; but he did not, and could not, complain that the materials necessary to found that legislation had not been asked for. The Government had taken the only safe step, by requiring and obtaining full information as to the laws and customs already existing without which they could not draw up any code, or legislate with any effect.

Dr. Bowring observed, that according to the confession of the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken, the state of things in the Levant at the present time was most unsatisfactory. Nothing could be less defined than the “customary law” which prevailed in the Levant. The customary laws of one locality differed widely from those of another. Those of Smyrna were as different from those of Alexandria as those of Alexandria were from the laws of Aleppo. The administration of these laws in each locality differed more widely still. Some Consuls had doubts as to their powers, were perplexed and embarrassed in the administration of their authority, feared to give due protection, and left the complaints of British subjects entirely without redress; whilst, in other cases, Consuls exercised their power with a most despotic and an almost intolerable authority. What was really wanting was a code, a simple code of laws, and an easily accessible Court of Judicature. He had understood that the Government intended to send out a Commissioner to inquire into the state of the regulations and laws at present subsisting, and he much regretted that they had not put that intention into execution. He thought it would be advisable to carry out that plan in order to obtain the best information, and he again strongly urged that no time should be lost in establishing some sort of judicial jurisdiction.

Sir Robert Peel apprehended that there was no real difference between his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and the Government upon the subject before the House. He considered the state of the law relative to British subjects in the Levant to be most unsatisfactory. But he must say that he believed that one of the chief causes of the difficulty in providing a remedy had been that tenderness which a British Minister must ever feel as to interfering with the forms of our criminal jurisprudence. They were not in this respect dealing with British subjects, in the strictest sense of the word, but with Maltese and Ionians, who had been included in the term, and who were not bound—and this much increased the enormity of the evil—by those moral considerations which generally influenced British subjects, strictly so called. The crimes committed were frequently of the most atrocious character, and cases often occurred in which the severest penalties of the law should have been inflicted. There had, indeed, been crimes committed by British subjects in the ports of the Levant which would have fully justified the infliction of capital punishment. But, to give proper effect to such punishment, it should be inflicted on the spot where the crime had been committed. The trial ought also to take place there; but he thought that a British Government was justified in pausing before they committed to a Consul—to one man—frequently unacquainted with legal subjects, and without the aid of a Jury, the absolute power of passing sentence of death. That was one of the difficulties which did for a long time, and which did still exist. In the case of a murder committed at Rhodes, where was the use of bringing the criminal to Malta, and trying and executing him there? The execution ought to take place where the crime was committed; it added to the repugnance which they naturally felt at running a man up to the yard-arm, at a place distant from that in which the crime was perpetrated, and long after its commission, when they reflected that the example would not produce that benefit which might, under other circumstances, be expected to arise from it. Let them depend upon it, too, that if any single act of possible injustice should be committed in the name of the law, the example of the Government of England in tolerating such a system would be productive of the most prejudicial effects. It would induce other Governments to act upon the same principle, and to discard those securities for human life which the English law was careful to throw around the prisoner. But he was willing to admit that the subject required consideration, and he could state as a fact that two days after the Bill referred to became law, his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary addressed a despatch to Sir Stratford Canning, enumerating the objects to be considered in the appointment of Assessors to aid the Consuls at different parts in the execution of their duties; stating the various difficulties which presented themselves, and which it was yet necessary to overcome, and requesting him to give his opinion upon various matters connected with the subject. As no answer was for some time received to that despatch a second was sent, and in the course of a few weeks at farthest from the present time he apprehended that they would receive from that most intelligent and competent judge, who had himself frequently represented the unsatisfactory state of the law at present, that answer to the communications made to him which might be most important, as enabling them to decide upon the course the most proper to be adopted. He deprecated undue haste in acting with reference to this matter. Ample consideration would be given by Government to the subject; but it was better to use great deliberation in the formation of a code reducing to enactment that which depended on custom and usage. But by acting with too much precipitation, they would be afterwards compelled to make changes in any regulations which might be introduced. He hoped that he had said enough to show that the subject had occupied the attention of Her Majesty's Government. They were deeply sensible of the extent of the evil, and when they could frame such a code as it might be suitable and fitting that this great country should establish, his hon. Friend near him and hon. Gentlemen opposite might depend upon it that no time would be suffered to elapse ere it was put into execution.

Viscount Palmerston agreed with the right hon. Baronet as to the great importance of the subject, and he could say, in corroboration of the right hon. Baronet, that if no satisfactory arrangement had been made by the late Government, it was not in consequence of the subject not having occupied their most anxious attention. They had referred it to their law-officers, who bestowed upon it their most deliberate consideration, but they were unable to suggest any practical measure which the Government thought it expedient to adopt. When the law-officers were asked to form a code for the guidance of consuls in the Levant, they replied that this would be to codify the laws of England. It was a Herculean task, which, if undertaken at all, should be undertaken for the use of the kingdom at large. The right hon. Baronet had stated one great difficulty incidental to this matter—the impolicy of executing a criminal at a distance from the place where his offence was committed. By so doing all that was advantageous in capital punishment was lost—the very grounds on which its expediency was founded disappeared. The capital sentence of the law was not inflicted so much as a punishment to the individual, as for a warning to deter others. And if a culprit were to be executed at a great distance from the place where he committed his crime, and in another country, almost all the benefit of example would be lost. Well, then, again—there was a great difficulty as respected trial. It was very difficult, in most instances, to establish upon the spot where the offence was committed a Tribunal satisfactory to our notions of justice. A Jury could not always be empanelled, nor could a Judge be found possessed of sufficient legal knowledge. As to the remedy proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract—namely, that the trial should be conducted by means of affidavits—a practice adopted in numerous continental countries—that a man should be tried for his life at Malta upon affidavits made by witnesses who were remaining at Smyrna—that was a proceeding so utterly repugnant to the practice and notions of this country, that he was sure the British public would never acquiesce in the infliction of capital punishment in pursuance of a condemnation founded upon such evidence. By such a course of procedure, they would divest the accused person of the security afforded by the viva voce examination and cross-examination of witnesses. Then, again, as to persons having held consular offices, who were stated to be kept out of the country by apprehensions of prosecution for false imprisonment, he must say, although he was only speaking from recollection, that he believed there had been cases in which the powers of consuls had been exerted in a somewhat arbitrary manner, in which imprisonment had been inflicted, when the circumstances had not justified its imposition; and if he was not mistaken, it was the apprehension of legal proceedings for such overstrained exercise of power, that prevented the individuals alluded to from returning to this country; and even if the power of the consuls were to be better defined and legalized, still in any case of an excessive and unjustifiable exercise of such power, the functionary so misconducting himself would be liable to answer for acts before a tribunal of this country. He must admit, that the whole subject was environed by difficulties; but he thought that the Government had taken the right course in relation to them. The power which Parliament had given the Government was the most expedient mode of coming to a good arrangement, and he thought that the steps which they had taken were in the right direction. The House must feel obliged to the hon. Member for introducing the subject to their notice, but he must say, that Government was not justly chargeable with undue delay. It seemed to him, that they had acted with that prudence and circumspection which the importance and the difficulty of the subject required. He hoped that the inquiries which they had instituted would lead to some satisfactory arrangement.

Mr. M. Milnes replied, that with reference to what had been said as to punishing offenders without all the formalities of the English law, he thought that was better than to allow crime to remain unpunished. Great objections had been made to the system of trial by affidavit, but other nations had adopted it; and if Englishmen did not approve of it, the Maltese had no objection. When he regarded the kind manner in which the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had taken the suggestions which he had thrown out, and the satisfactory reasons which he had given for the delay which had taken place in carrying the Bill passed last Session into practice, he would not press the Motion to a division.

Sir R. Peel remarked, that although they might be entitled to try a Maltese at Malta, according to the laws existing there, yet he would not try a Maltese at Smyrna by a new and different system. He should protest against making any distinction between an English and a Maltese offender. It would be no answer to say that the Maltese had no objection to be hanged on affidavit. He should not consider it worthy of a Government to establish such a distinction, in foreign jurisdiction, between a Maltese and an Englishman.

Motion withdrawn.

DUELLING.] Mr. Turner rose for the purpose of moving the following resolution:—"That Duelling is immoral in its tendency; that it brings into contempt the laws of the country; is contrary to divine command; and ought to be abolished." He most sincerely regretted that the Government had not given to the question he put to them some time ago such an answer as would have rendered this Motion unnecessary. He had, indeed, hoped, from what had passed in another place, when a noble Lord moved an Address to Her Majesty in answer to Her Most Gracious Speech, that the Government would have taken this subject under its own protection, and have brought in a measure for the effectual suppression of Duelling. In 1713, in consequence of the Duel between the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun, which had proved fatal to both, a Bill was brought into that House to restrain such contests; but, although it was recommended by Her Majesty, it was lost on the second reading, and no other measure had been introduced. The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government on a former occasion told the House that he was disposed to do everything to suppress the practice; but he (Mr. Turner) very much lamented that the right hon. Baronet, with the great power he possessed, had stopped short of doing the good which he had the means of effecting. The new regulations which had been mentioned referred only to the army; but civilians ought to be dealt with as strictly as officers in Her Majesty's service, and he hoped that there would not be much difficulty in so simplifying the law as to make it understood, and consequently obeyed. He was not aware of any law upon the Statute-book, or any document under the sanction of the Government, certainly none under Scriptural sanction, which said that Duelling was lawful in any shape; and, therefore, if authority could not be found for its toleration in society, then, as a Christian House of Commons, they were bound to look out for some remedy against it. It was said the other day by an hon. Member, that Duelling had been created by public opinion, and that public opinion would destroy it; but public opinion was a plant of very slow growth. Any Act, however, of the present Government would not have the same difficulty to contend with, it would be quick and effectual, and greatly would it tend to the honour of the Government to bring in a law, brief in its object and positive in its effect. He should not despair of seeing the Government propose a measure that would be satisfactory to the country. What did that eminent writer Paley say on the practice of Duelling?—

“Murder is forbidden; and wherever human life is deliberately taken away, otherwise than by public authority, there is murder. The value and security of human life make this rule necessary; for I do not see what other idea or definition of murder can be admitted, which will not let in so much private violence as to render society a scene of peril and bloodshed.”

That was language the force of which all the eloquence of the right hon. Baronet would not be able to remove. There was a curious document in reference to this subject, which he would just mention to the House; it was a document written by Colonel Thomas, dated the evening before the Duel in which his life was sacrificed. He said,—

“He was seriously opposed to duelling; it neither proved a man a gentleman nor brave; nor did it give satisfaction for insult; almost any man could raise physical courage enough to fight a duel, but few, alas! possessed sufficient moral courage to stem the tide of public scorn.”

Turn wherever they might, and read

whatever they would, nothing stared them in the face but the extent of this great calamity. In the churchyard of the little village of Charmouth, in Dorsetshire, there was a tombstone raised to the memory of an officer, who, after having been preserved through eighteen engagements in the service of his country, had fallen the victim of Duelling. But means had of late been taken to abate the practice, and the public who were not perhaps so fully aware of the fact as they should be, ought to know that there was a society which had done great honour to itself, because it was composed of officers of high rank in the Army and Navy, and civilians also of high station, instituted for the purpose of suppressing Duelling. This Society was composed a short time since, of 349 members; among these gentlemen, were 13 Admirals, 67 Field-officers, 36 Captains in the Army, 32 Captains in the Navy, 17 Lieutenants in the Navy, 31 Noblemen, 141 civilians, 16 Members of that House, and, he regretted to state, only one Clergyman of the Church of England. The noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) informed him that the Clergy had not joined the Society for particular reasons. Such a Society ought not to be, and could not be, long hid from public notice; but he had conversed on this subject with twenty Members of this House who were ignorant of the existence of such an Association, and he believed that very few hon. Gentlemen were aware of its establishment. The gentlemen who composed that Association were eminent for their high moral character. Hon. Gentlemen would readily admit that such men as the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire (Lord Ashley) the hon. Member for Oxford University (Sir R. Inglis), who were not now present, the noble Member for Chester (Lord R. Grosvenor), and the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper), who had the manliness to state the other evening in that House, that nothing would induce him to accept a challenge—would not connect themselves with any association whose object was not most praiseworthy and beneficial. He was aware that the authorities which might be brought against him, in support of the practice of duelling, were such as would have great weight in some quarters; but he would make a statement of facts which could not be controverted. It had been stated by Her Majesty's Government, that they found it extremely difficult to frame a law for the suppression of the practice of Duelling; but it had not been difficult in former times, and in other countries, to abate this nuisance. Measures had been taken in other countries which, if adopted in this, would sooner or later, and he believed very speedily, put an end to the practice. If in this country a duellist were convicted of murder, the punishment inflicted by our laws was, he conceived, far too severe; and, in consequence of this excess of punishment, Juries were very unwilling to convict parties of such offences. Not many years ago capital punishments were abolished in the case of an offence then very common in this country: he alluded to forgery. A very strong feeling was manifested by the nation against the application of so severe a punishment to offences of that class; capital punishment was abolished, and a much milder punishment was substituted. He thought a similar course might be very advantageously adopted with respect to Duelling. He conceived, that not only ought parties to be punished who engaged in such encounters, when a fatal result ensued, but that provision should be made for the punishment of all persons who sent or accepted challenges. He had strong reason for believing that the general feeling of the people of this country was favourable to the entire abolition of the punishment of death in cases of fatal duels; and he conceived that a measure to effect this object would be attended with most salutary effects. Juries would no longer hesitate as to the verdict they should return; Judges would be relieved from the painful duty which, in cases of this nature, they might now be called upon to perform, and which to them must be extremely distressing; and offences of this kind would be certain to meet a just measure of punishment. He wished that Her Majesty's Government would take this question into their most serious consideration—whether an alteration of the severe punishment now attached to Duelling, might not be most beneficial. He would venture to assert, that a course which, in the case of forgery, had tended to a material diminution of offences of that class, would effect the same results in the case of Duelling. His opinion was, that when convictions took place for Duelling, the capital punishment should not be imposed, except where parties fought without seconds, and then he conceived the extreme punishment would be justifiable. The public at large had a duty to perform with relation to this subject; and, unless they took some means to put the Government in possession of their sentiments on the question, it was next to impossible for the exertions of hon. Gentlemen in that House to be successful. He did not allude exclusively to the religious communities; for one great advantage in mooted this question was, that it was entirely unconnected with sectarian or party feeling. But he would call the attention of the House to the nature of the laws which had been enacted in other countries for the suppression of Duelling. By the law of Switzerland, any person who killed another in a duel, became liable for the debts of the deceased. He was sanguine enough to believe that, in high life, in this country, even the adoption of such a law as this would produce a most excellent effect. The law of Switzerland also provided that an action should lie for damages against the nearest of kin. In 1752, the Emperor Joseph—and to this he called the special attention of the right hon. and gallant Officer (Sir H. Hardinge)—declared, "I will not suffer Duelling in my army; I despise the maxims of those who pretend to justify it, and who kill each other in cold blood." These observations referred to a case in which two officers had fought a duel; and the Emperor proceeded—"Let a court-martial try these officers, and examine the subject of their quarrel; and let him who is guilty submit to his fate, and to the rigour of the law. I am resolved this barbarous practice shall be suppressed and punished, should it cost me half my officers." It was somewhat extraordinary that the right hon. and gallant Officer had applied to the practice of Duelling the very same term that was used by the Emperor—he had characterised it as a "barbarous" practice. He found it stated that, many years ago, Duelling was denounced in France as "a detestable custom, introduced by the Devil for the destruction of soul and body." He was sure no individual would contend, in the face of that House, or of any other great national society, that this language might not with equal propriety be adopted now. In France Duelling was prohibited; the goods of duellists were confiscated, and they were excluded from Christian burial. Why were such regulations made against the practice? Because it was regarded in its true light—as cold-blooded and deliberate murder. His conviction was, judging from history, that imprisonment and exclusion from Government offices had ever been found the most effectual means of preventing the practice of Duelling. Two Proclamations had been issued in this country on the subject—one in the reign of Queen Anne, and the other by James I. The latter proclamation elicited the opinion of the eminent Lord Bacon on the subject of Duelling—an opinion which he thought would command the respect and attention of those Members of Her Majesty's Government who were present on this occasion. Lord Bacon said:—

"I must acknowledge that I learn out of the King's last Proclamation the most prudent and best-advised remedy for this offence that the wit of man can devise. This offence, my Lords (addressing the Lords of the Star Chamber) is grounded upon a false conceit [of honour, and therefore it should be punished in the same kind. The fountain of honour is the King; to be deprived of his favour, and to be banished from the Royal presence would be a fit punishment."

He believed, though he should be unsuccessful in his Motion, there was a growing feeling on the subject of Duelling prevalent in the country, which would eventually demand the attention of Parliament to some legislative measures for its prevention. But if he might judge from the present appearance of the respective sides of the House, he thought he would be able to carry his resolution. If he did succeed it was his intention to propose a short Bill, which he hoped would provide a remedy for the evil of which he complained. He might state, that he had received many hundreds of letters on this subject and he had selected one from a distinguished officer holding high rank in Her Majesty's service—another from a civilian—and a third, he believed from a clergyman. As he had been favoured with so many letters, he had been unable to acknowledge their receipt in a formal manner. The writer of the first letter to which he had referred had not given his name; but he believed he was acquainted with the handwriting, and if his supposition was correct, a braver and better man than the writer did not exist. That writer said, as one of his constituents, and as an officer in the Navy, that he was a decided opponent to the practice of duelling. The writer begged him to push the Government on this subject, in order to induce it to consent to the abolition of the practice. His correspondent also suggested, that the Government should issue a public notice to the Army and Navy, to the effect that any officer taking part hereafter in a duel, either as a principal or as a second, should be removed from Her Majesty's service, and that if he persisted in fighting a duel, and should fall, no pension should be granted to his widow. Once issued such an order, and there would be an end to the practice, and he did not think that any officer would be found who would for the sake of gratifying a spirit of revenge run the risk of depriving his widow of that pension to which she would, under other circumstances, be entitled. He had avoided, until he had read the sentiments of the correspondent whose letter he had just laid before the House, alluding even indirectly to the case of Mrs. Fawcett, who had been deprived of her pension in consequence of her husband having been killed in a duel with Lieutenant Munro. On that subject he must state to the House that he cordially agreed with what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland the other evening. He trusted that the circumstances which had been stated to the House with reference to the condition of Lieutenant Munro would have the effect, in mitigating public opinion with regard to that individual. Another correspondent urged him to push Her Majesty's Government on the subject—to urge them to take a comprehensive view of the matter. The writer said—

"Why not promulgate a notice to the effect that any person, either as a principal or as a second, would be considered ineligible to hold any office in the Army, Navy, Colonial, Foreign, Home Department, Horse Guards, Admiralty, and (he thought the writer said most wisely) the Privy Council?"

Persons high in station and in society had sanctioned the practice of Duelling. He wanted no more than that common justice should be done to the cause he was advocating. He believed that many who had formerly sanctioned the practice of Duelling regretted, as much as he did, the imperious necessity that had compelled them to send or accept a challenge and fight a duel. It had long been his opinion that the public press of this country ought to advocate the abolition of the practice of Duelling. He held in his hand rather a singular document with regard to the press of this country. Before he made use of any argument deduced from the article in question he must state that many hon. Gentlemen appeared to be of opinion that the practice of Duelling was fast drawing to a close in this country. He at one time was disposed to entertain the same opinion; but he found upon examination that such was not the fact. He was compelled to go back again to the reign of George III. He found that during the reign of that Monarch no less than 172 duels had been fought; out of the 172 how many did the House imagine were convicted upon trial? At that period, as at the present moment, the feeling of Juries and Judges were in favour of the parties who suffered. Of the 172 persons who fought 91 were killed, and two persons only were subjected to punishment. They were executed. Had the persons who fought been punished by being transported for a period of 14, 17, 21 years, or for life, much good might have resulted. At the present moment the nominal punishment was positively a premium on the practice of Duelling. It encouraged it in every possible shape and degree. In fact, Juries went so far as to sympathize with the parties who fought duels. They certainly went through the ordeal of a trial, but they were not convicted for the offence. If guilty, the parties escaped in consequence of the asperity of the law. During the year 1838, four duels were fought in this country, and four in 1839. It would be found that the average number of duels during the last three years was greater than what had occurred in the reign of George III. In the year 1838, an article on the subject of duelling appeared in the Standard newspaper, having reference to a particular case that occurred at that period. The writer of the article to which he referred, said, "that there existed no necessity for sanctioning the practice of Duelling,—that a person who killed another in a Duel was as much guilty of murder as the highwayman who took away the life of a fellow-creature, and the law made no distinction between the two cases." The writer of the article in the Standard asked, with very good sense, "Is this tyranny to be endured?" He did not believe that the Standard went so far now on the subject of duelling as it did formerly when that article appeared. It went now halfway on the subject—in fact, as far as the Government went—but not so far as he wished to go. Before he sat down he considered it to be his duty to call the attention of the House to what Earl Fortescue had done in reference to the suppression of Duelling during the time that distinguished nobleman held the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. That noble Earl issued an important document on the subject. It went much further than the Government appeared disposed to go, if he judged of the intention of Government by the contemplated alteration in the articles of war. He should not be doing his duty to the noble Earl if he refrained from bringing the document under the consideration of the House—that document which had become a matter of history in this country. A particular circumstance had called Earl Fortescue's attention to the question of duelling, and that noble Earl, by command of the Government, and as the Representative of Her Majesty, on the authority of the Crown, issued on the occasion the document referred to. He had no doubt that the right hon. and noble Lord opposite would find the document in the office to which he had access. The hon. Gentleman read the proclamation, which set forth that, from circumstances which had recently been brought before the Lord Lieutenant, it was his desire that it should be signified to Her Majesty's forces in Ireland, that it was the Lord Lieutenant's firm determination to punish with immediate dismissal any officer who should give or accept, or be concerned, either directly or indirectly in giving a challenge, under any pretext or under any provocation whatsoever. Now, he asked, was it possible, after this condemnation of the practice by Her Majesty's late Representative in Ireland, that it could be sanctioned by the present Government, the conservators of the peace of the country? Unless he had put a wrong construction on this Proclamation, the meaning of the noble Earl was, that the officers over whom he had control were not to fight duels, and not to accept challenges; and that accepting a challenge would disqualify the party from holding office under Government. He would again allude to the letter of Lieutenant Munro, and he would declare that Lieutenant Munro's language in that letter was such as made him (Mr. Turner) believe, that scarcely any punishment which a jury of his countrymen could have inflicted would have surpassed what he was now undergoing; for he thought that his letter manifested his feelings to be most acute. He thought that letter was calculated to bring over the sympathies of the country very much in Lieutenant Munro's favour. Lieutenant Munro had attempted, and very nearly, he believed, succeeded in convincing the House that he was not the great criminal that had been supposed, and under these circumstances he put it to the Government, whether some act—which he was sure would be well received by the public—could not be devised which would give something like comfort to both these parties—he meant Lieutenant Munro and the widow of Colonel Fawcett? He would pass an act of oblivion on all matters of this kind that up to the date of the act had taken place. He would grant the widow her pension as an act of grace, and not as an act of right. The country had seen an Act passed, and that lately, where the circumstances of the parties were taken into consideration, to relieve those parties from the penalties they had incurred. Why should not some law of the like nature be passed, which would embrace both these cases? and when that was done then let them alter the law, and make the punishment not only certain, but let that punishment, whatever it were, quickly follow the offence. If that were done, as he was sanguine enough to think sooner or later would be done, the law would be an honour to the Government, which should pass it, and a credit to the House of Commons who supported and sanctioned it.

Mr. Ewart seconded the Motion. It appeared to him there was a necessity for practical legislation on this subject. Judging from the maxims which were delivered in general by hon. Members who had spoken on it, there was hardly one, he thought, who would deny the evil of the practice. In fact, the expression of opinion had been so general, that it amounted to a resolution of the House to put down Duelling. Waving all vain declamation, he wished to state the question, which was, as he conceived—could they put an end to this practice they all detested? He had endeavoured to glean from what had fallen from the hon. Mover what the punishment was which he intended to establish, and he gathered that the hon. Mover would enact the punishment of transportation in general, retaining, however, capital punishment for one species of Duelling, viz., in the case of Duels without seconds. In that, he must say, he differed from the hon. Gentleman, because he was one of those who were against all capital punishments whatever. But, besides that, he doubted whether there was justice in the hon. Gentleman's plan. The law of England considered manslaughter as a less crime than murder, the latter being accompanied by circumstances of malice and forethought, of which the former was devoid. The truth was, the man who went out with seconds after a deliberation of two or three days, perhaps, committed a greater crime than he who hastily went out to fight, on the exasperation of the moment, without seconds. Seconds did not diminish the crime. He differed, therefore, from the hon. Gentleman on this point, and he thought the remedy would not come up to public opinion on this subject. Besides, its effect would be to increase and extend capital punishments; for he believed that since the case of Colonel Campbell in 1808 no execution for Duelling had taken place. With respect to the sentiments of Her Majesty's Ministers, he understood that they had reflected maturely on the question. They had stated so. He would ask them, therefore, whether it were not possible to put down the crime of Duelling by inflicting a proper punishment, inflicting no punishment however equivalent to capital punishment? For his part he would venture to introduce a Bill to inflict a punishment of from two years imprisonment to fourteen years' transportation, at the discretion of the Judge. He believed that would agree with public opinion, and it was manifest that they wanted some punishment which would accord with the present state of public feeling; but before he (and he believed other Members) could take any practical step in the matter, he wished to ascertain what were the intentions of the Government; and he thought, that from the statements of the Government the other night, the House had a right to claim some information of their intentions.

Mr. Comper said the subject branched into two divisions, the moral and the practical, and it was to the latter only that he wished to address himself, namely, the possibility of Legislation. The hon. Members who had moved and seconded this Motion seemed to think that legislation could only act by punishing. He could not help thinking, that legislation might do more; for, could they look to this practice, which all admitted to be wrong, to be absurd, to fail of attaining its proper object—the prevention of insult, and inquire why it had continued so long in this and other countries, and not be satisfied that it was owing to some deficiency on the part of the law? He considered the blame of duelling to rest not so much with the individuals, as with the state of the law. The practice arose in barbarous times, when men were so rude and unskilful in the sifting of evidence, that they could not in a dispute discover who was right and who wrong, and in their ignorance they turned to their superstitions, and appealed to the sword to point out where lay the right. The root of the evil consisted in the law leaving one class of offences utterly unprovided for by any regulation whatever; for, with regard to offences against the honour, the law provided no adequate protection whatever. It would not do to try and get over this by pretending that these insults and offences against the honour were no injuries at all. There certainly were very grave injuries of this kind for which the Law Courts provided no adequate redress. It was true, that a number of very trivial offences were brought under a cognizance of the arbiters of honour, but there were also very grave offences publicly proclaimed, imputations of base motives, false aspersions, unjust attempts to bring contempt upon character, which it was hard to expect a man to receive with impunity, and for which the law ought, in his opinion, to provide some remedy and redress; so that the injured party might disprove what was false, and re-instate himself in public opinion. The law, if it could be so styled, of honour, failed in the great object of all law, for it did not distinguish between the guilty and the innocent, but punished both alike. Courts of honour had been a subject of ridicule, he was aware, but they had been established, nevertheless, with good effect in some countries of Europe. In Russia no officer of the army would fight a duel, because the punishment was so severe; and in Bavaria and Prussia officers had recourse to the court of honour. He might state the opinion of Blackstone on this subject, who, after stating, that by law, killing in a duel was murder, both in the principal and second, went on to say,

"Yet it requires such a degree of passive valour to combat the dread of even undeserved contempt, arising from the false notions of honour too generally received in Europe, that the strongest prohibitions and penalties of the law, will never be entirely effectual to eradicate this unhappy custom, till a method be found out of compelling the original aggressor to make some other satisfaction to the affronted party which the world shall esteem equally reputable as that which is now given at the hazard of the life and fortune, as well of the person insulted as of him who hath given the insult."

So that Blackstone contemplated the possibility of establishing a tribunal which should give satisfaction in a true, a just, and reasonable sense and not that empty and miserable satisfaction which was attained by a man exposing his life and that of another. Duelling he believed, seldom took place now from revenge; parties were reluctantly compelled to go out, generally from fear, from the dread of society, and of being degraded if they listened to their conscience and their better feelings, and refused to imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow-creatures; but if another alternative were given, if a court were constituted which would ascertain which party was in the wrong, and give a proper satisfaction to the injured, gentlemen might resort to it. Such a tribunal might enjoin the sort of apology which the party in the wrong ought to make, and so the injured party would have a real remedy. Whatever apology the necessity of the case might require, the Court could dictate the nature and terms of such apology, and that might be made public. Where the injury lies in being lowered in public estimation the adequate remedy consists in restoring the sufferer to the position to which he is fairly entitled, in general estimation. Some such measures as those, could, he thought, be adopted if the Government really wished to put an end to the practice. If they were to legislate, it required the talents and knowledge of a Government to enable them to do so, and he hoped that they would bring those talents and that knowledge to bear upon the question in an effectual manner. Persons appointed to decide questions relating to affairs of honour might be selected as nearly as possible from the same station in society with the parties concerned: and they would, therefore, be enabled to appreciate the feelings of those, respecting whose cases they might be called upon to adjudicate. It would then be likely that the judgments of such Courts would prove satisfactory. The principle of arbitration was one acknowledged in some cases, and he did not see why that principle should not be applied by law so as to become a substitute for duelling.

Sir R. Peel said.—The hon. Member opposite proposes that the House should pass a resolution to the effect, that Duelling is immoral in its tendency; that it brings into contempt the laws of the country; that it is contrary to the Divine command; and that it ought to be abolished. This is the resolution which the hon. Member has submitted to the House. Now, I really think that the House ought to pause before they proceed to deal with a question of this kind by means of a resolution. It appears to me that it would be establishing a most dangerous precedent if we were to take upon ourselves the office of interpreting the Divine commands. It might be a very compendious way of getting over a difficulty, but it is not the way in which I think that the House ought to encounter matters of this kind. We may by legislation prohibit any practice which we think ought to be prohibited, but I object to taking the initiative in the matter by means of a resolution; for unless this resolution should prove effectual, the consequence of adopting it would be to disparage the authority of the House, and to lower the influence of Parliament in public estimation. Suppose that we should agree to this resolution, how are we to enforce it? Suppose that the public totally disregard it, what means have we of making it obeyed? I am aware it has been said that the Crown ought to interpose its authority for the purpose of putting an end to this practice. I beg the House for a moment to consider the extent to which that authority reaches. In a matter of this kind the Crown can only exercise its influence over a very small portion of the community. The great mass of mankind are beyond the control of the Crown, and for this House to make a demand upon the Executive Government calling upon them to put down Duelling by such powers as we possess, would, I think, amount to a very noxious precedent; and it would be equally objectionable to call on us to pass any measure which we possess no reasonable prospect of being able to carry into practical effect. But, above and beyond all this, I must deprecate any proposition, the object of which may be to denounce certain Acts by means of resolutions. I have not forgotten that the hon. Member told the House that if we agreed to his resolution, he would then bring in a Bill for the purpose of carrying into full effect the principle set forth in the Motion; but I want to know why he need preface his intended piece of legislation by any resolution whatever? If the legislation of the hon. Member were calculated to be effectual, then his resolution is unnecessary. On the other hand, if he succeed in carrying his resolution, and does not prove successful with his measure of legislation, the House will find itself placed in a very awkward position; for there would stand the Motion without any means of giving it effect. Thus, whatever way we take the matter, neither the House nor the public would be any gainers. In making these observations, I am at the same time quite prepared to admit that the subject now brought before the House is one which is, in all respects, entitled to the most serious consideration. I quite agree, that if a legislative remedy can be devised, it is the duty of Parliament to lose no time in applying it. The hon. Member has told us that at some future time he will introduce a Bill for the purpose of giving effect to the principles and views which he has just stated to the House. I can only say that if he should do so, I shall not cast any impediment in the way of his introducing a Bill of that kind, of course reserving to myself a discretionary power of considering and deciding upon the proposed measure so soon as it comes regularly under the consideration of the House; but whenever the hon. Member asks for leave to bring in a Bill on the subject to which he has this evening called the attention of the House, I shall readily vote for the Motion for leave; but upon the nature of the hon. Gentleman's legislation must depend his chance of ultimate success. If the views of the hon. Gentleman were carried into effect, there should be two enactments, according to one of which there could be no capital punishment unless the parties engaged in a duel fought without seconds. See, now, the extreme difficulty of dealing with such a case. To declare that there should be one punishment for one species of Duelling, and another for a different kind of the same offence, would, in my opinion, appear like giving an implied sanction to that description of crime to which the lighter punishment was assigned. To this I must object, for I should be afraid of giving any such sanction to the practice. If the good sense and moral feeling of the community be opposed to Duelling, I do not think we ought to give it even an implied encouragement by any measures of legislation. This part of the question is really surrounded with difficulties that are almost insuperable. Suppose that two Gentlemen have had some cause of a quarrel—that they give way to their feelings—that in the heat of passion they fight without seconds—these persons, according to the hon. Member, ought to be

be put down by public opinion. There was a growing feeling against it. Duelling, capital punishments, and war, would disappear when Christian nations became nations of Christians. But he could not force people to adopt religious principles of action. He desired, however, to encourage public opinion favourable to humanity. True courage consisted in not being afraid of being thought afraid. If the Legislature interfered at all, unquestionably it should be, not by Resolution but by Bill. The defect of the present law was, that only if duels proved fatal they were punishable. Why, should it not be law that if any one fought a duel, fatal or not he should be liable to prosecution? Then the very provoking to a Duel should be criminally punishable; and certainly the law was never put in motion against those who did not happen to injure their opponents in duels.

Sir T. D. Acland added his request for the withdrawal of this highly inconvenient resolution. He frankly confessed that he could not negative it in any part of it as a proposition. Duelling undoubtedly was the crime, which, by some unhappy fatality, was allowed to exist, as if to brand by its barbarity, the character of an age and of a country so highly civilized, and to present a melancholy proof of the imperfection of our nature, in the inability of the noblest spirits among us to cast off a usage so cherished—still the last lamentable relic of a barbarous age. There was unquestionably, an insuperable bar to legislation; and whichever way the division went, if a division were persisted in, it would in its result be injurious to the cause all had at heart—the suppression of the odious usage. It would be most unfortunate by such an injudicious course to run the risk of giving the slightest check to the improved feeling of society on the subject. The law had done, it appeared, all it could. The difficulty was in getting society to put it into execution. The most honourable and estimable man—however grossly or wantonly insulted—would hardly have the moral firmness to go into a court of justice and expose his antagonist's conduct, encountering the obloquy attaching to such an appeal to another authority than that of a man's own sense of honour. The thing to be most desired, was the discouraging the preparatory steps in the progress of these unhappy affairs. Let some secondary punishment such as would really be inflicted, be imposed on those who sent, received, or carried challenges. At present it was alike unfortunate and unfair that society was quite passive during the progress of cases which served, though leading in themselves to no fatal results, to foster the feeling and perpetuate the practice of Duelling, society was silent while this custom was cherishing and continuing the apparent necessity for violating the law—so long as no fatal consummation was produced. But when some fatality occurred in some case, perhaps of far less malice, far less of revengeful feeling than others, but accompanied with circumstances of horror, then society rose up in alarm and in execration; and probably, under such circumstances, a man, animated by motives infinitely less malicious than those of others, who, not having succeeded in killing their antagonists, escaped almost unblamed, would hardly find a fair trial. Perhaps it would have a beneficial effect to exclude from the highest, the parent, and the most dignified presence in the land, those who had been concerned in duels fatal or otherwise. At all events, every man should sincerely assist in the discountenancing of this dreadful crime; and with that motive he had caused his name to be inscribed among those who had borne public testimony against the practice.

Mr. Turner declared, that while he consented to withdraw his resolutions he did so with the determination, in the event of the Government not undertaking the task, of proposing a measure to the House on the subject, the responsibility of which however, he deemed would more appropriately be assumed by the Government than by any individual Member.

Motion withdrawn.

PROBATE AND LEGACY DUTIES.] Mr. Elphinstone: Sir, I rise, in pursuance of the notice which I have given, to ask the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House for the purpose of considering the statutes which impose taxes upon the right of succession to personal property after death, in the hope that the House will see not only the propriety but the justice of imposing similar taxes on real estate. The House is probably aware, that, as the law now stands, the personal property of every person who dies worth more than 20*l.* is subject to two taxes, called Probate Duty and Legacy Duty. Probate Duty is an ad valorem tax imposed on the whole personal property of the deceased, which may be situated in any part of the United Kingdom, at the time of his death; and this is payable, in all cases, whatever may be the manner in which the personal property is left, whether the property be left to a near relation or to a stranger in blood. Legacy Duty is a second tax on personal property, in addition to the Probate Duty, which is levied on the party who receives the benefit. The amount of this duty varies according to the degree of relationship of the legatee to the deceased, and widows are exempt from its operation. Legacy Duties fall with great severity on strangers in blood, and in the case of natural children, who in the eye of the law are strangers in blood, are peculiarly severe. Administration Duties (which are the duties levied when there is no will) are of the same nature as Probate Duties, and are imposed on precisely the same description of property as Probate Duties. The rate, however, of Administration Duty is higher per cent. than the Probate Duty. I think this distinction is wrong in principle, because it does appear to be unjust that a widow or children are to pay a heavier tax to the state merely because the husband, either by accident or design, has preferred that his property should be divided according to the known order of law. There is this distinction between Legacy and Probate Duty, that while Probate Duty is never in any case charged on real estate, nor on any interest arising out of land, nor on land directed to be sold, Legacy Duty is, in certain cases, under provisions of 45 George III., c. 48, payable upon annuities charged on land, or on land directed to be sold. Land itself, however, whether it be left as a whole in one estate, to one person, or whether it be divided into different farms and left to different persons, is not liable to the Legacy Duty. With this trifling distinction between these taxes, however, the House may take it as the general rule, that while personal property is in all cases subject to these heavy taxes, real property, be it freehold or be it copyhold, is entirely exempt. Now, I must say, that I think this exemption in favour of freehold and copyhold property is most unjust to manufacturers and traders, to the great mass of the people, and to all the owners of personal property. This act of injustice has also given rise to the injurious imputation that, inasmuch as the majority of the two Houses of Parliament consist of the owners of real property, this exemption has been made by the Legislature on private, and not on public grounds. The present Legacy Duty was originally imposed as a war tax; and when Mr. Pitt introduced the existing Act, in 1796, he intended to apply its provision to realty as well as to personalty; and, though the landed interest were too strong even for that powerful Minister, it is perfectly well known that he stated, over and over again, that landed property ought not to be exempted from burthens to which personal property is subjected. Mr. Pitt said (Hansard XXXII., p. 658), in introducing the Legacy Bill—

“In a war for protection of property, it was just and equitable that property should bear the burthen. It was in the nature of things that landed property was the most permanent; it was fit that it should contribute accordingly. The Legacy Duty was not, however, to be confined to any species of property; it was to include both landed and personal.”

Mr. Pitt afterwards divided his Bill into two parts; the one relating to personalty, and the other to realty. The Bill for personal property passed the Commons without difficulty, and became the existing Act—36 George III., c. 52; but the Bill for realty was opposed at every stage by the landed Gentry of that day, and, after several very close divisions (in one of which the numbers were equal, and the Speaker was obliged to give a casting vote), Mr. Pitt carried the Bill by only one vote. On the following day he came down to the House of Commons, and reluctantly yielded to necessity, and, contrary to his own conviction of what was right, withdrew the Bill. The exemption which the law has given to real property is in many cases absurd, as well as unjust. Leaseholds for years are considered as personal property, and, therefore, are liable to probate duty; leaseholds for lives are real estate, and therefore not liable. There are towns in the north of England, in the borough of Sunderland, for instance, in which in one part the houses are held on leases for years, and are consequently exempt; in the other part the houses are on leases for lives, and consequently liable. On what principle of common sense or of justice are the inhabitants of one part of a borough to be liable to a tax from which the inhabitants of another part of the same borough are to be exempt? I ask, on what principle of justice can you possibly defend these mere legal distinctions? Why is the inheritor of a large property in a town, consisting of leaseholds, to be liable to taxation, when the inheritor of a copyhold estate is to be exempt? The sum paid annually by the owners of personal property is enormous. I find that, in the year ending January, 1844, the State received about two-and-a-quarter millions of money from the personal property of the United Kingdom; and the capital which produced this large revenue, and which in passing from the dead to the living became liable to this heavy amount of taxation, was no less than 43,000,000*l*.

I have little doubt but that, if Legacy and Probate Duties were imposed on real property, an income nearly as large as that derived from personal property would be obtained with the greatest ease and facility. In the absence of precise information, there are various ways of making this estimate. Mr. Gwynne, late Comptroller of the Legacy Duties, whose opinion is entitled to the highest consideration, estimated that about one-thirtieth of the whole personal property in the Kingdom is annually subject to the Probate and Legacy Duties. Sir Robert Peel, when he introduced the Income Tax, in 1843 assumed the annual rent of land to be 39,400,000*l*. Taking this at twenty-five years' purchase would make the value of real property to be 985,000,000*l*.; and then, applying Mr. Gwynne's principle, you would have a capital of about 33,000,000*l*. of real property annually subject to Probate and Legacy Duty. The capital of personal property which was subject to these duties in 1843 was 43,000,000*l*. This produced to the revenue, as I have already stated, about 2,250,000*l*. It is, therefore, only fair to estimate that land of the value of 33,000,000*l*. would, at the very least, produce 1,500,000*l*. as revenue for the use of the State. There is another mode of making this estimate. It appears by the accurate tables of Mr. Porter, in his able work, The Progress of the Nation, there are about 46,000,000 of acres of cultivated land in the United Kingdom.*

If we consider the large rents that are obtained near towns, in all probability the rental of these 46,000,000 acres cannot average less than 1*l*. per acre. If this estimate of the rental be nearer the truth than that of the right hon. Baronet, as I suspect it is, it would give us a larger revenue (if Probate and Legacy Duties were imposed on land) than is now derived from personal property. The House will bear in mind, that these estimates must be under the mark, as I have not taken into account freehold houses and other real property, which are now exempt. Whether, however, these calculations are too much or too little, it is clear that a very large revenue may be obtained for public purposes, and that land is now unjustly exempt from the payment of a heavy tax to which other property is liable. How unjust it is, how unfair it is, that while the property of a merchant who dies, leaving but a bare provision for his family, is subject to a heavy Probate Duty, the family of the rich landed proprietor, who dies possessed of freehold land and freehold houses to the amount, perhaps, of 1,000,000*l.*, is not called upon to pay one farthing; and the distinction between the property of a landed proprietor and of the manufacturer, is the more galling from this circumstance, that the very same land which, while it remains the property of the landed gentleman, is not liable to Probate Duty, becomes chargeable with this heavy tax the moment it is bought with partnership capital for the purposes of the trade of the manufacturer, because it is then considered to be personal property. On what principle of fairness does this House enact, that when a freehold estate is bequeathed by a rich proprietor to his rich heir, that this valuable inheritance is not to be charged with Legacy Duty, but that when the very same estate is devised to be sold in order to provide for the wants of a family, it is then to become subject to this Legacy Duty? The hardship on the middle classes is the greater in the case I have just mentioned, because in nine cases out of ten, where an estate is devised to be sold, it becomes liable to the Auction Duty, and in every case to a Conveyance Duty, from both of which taxes the heir-at-law escapes. If any distinction ought to be made as to the payment of Legacy Duty between land devised to be sold, and on land not devised to be sold, it ought to be in favour of the former, as land devised to be sold becomes liable to the two duties I have just named. A tax upon the transfer of landed property after death has, from the earliest time, been usual in all civilised countries. We all have read in history that by the Julian law imposed by Augustus Cæsar, a very large revenue, under the name of the twentieth penny, vicesima pars hereditatis, was derived from a tax of this nature on succession to real property. A similar tax is at this day levied in Holland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, and in some parts of Germany. I trust that the period is not distant when either a similar tax will be levied in the United Kingdom, or else that you will consent to take off those duties on personal property; they ought either to be levied both on realty and on personalty,—on both or on neither. In looking through the older Acts of Parliament on this subject, I have been struck with the anxiety the landowners have shown at all periods of our history to benefit themselves at the expense of others. There is a singular example of this in 2nd of Henry VIII. c. 5. Before this Act was passed (which is entitled “Fees for Probates”) land directed to be sold was considered as personal property, and liable to a probate fee: but by this Act land directed to be sold is exempted from paying a probate fee, and this exemption continues to the present day as such land (though subject to Legacy Duty) is not subject to Probate Duty. When this question was last discussed in the House, in April, 1842, while no one ventured to object to the justice of the principle for which I contend—namely, that of treating every species of property (whether real or personal) on a footing of equality—two specious objections were urged: the one relating to the burthens to which landed property is subject, in consequence of the Stamp Duties; and the other, that a Probate Duty on landed property would be easily evaded by putting the property into trust. With the indulgence of the House, I wish to make a few remarks respecting both these objections. In the first place, I find on inquiry (though there are no accurate accounts), from competent persons, that out of 1,600,000*l.* received for Stamp

Duties on Deeds, not above 400,000*l.* can by any possibility be considered to be paid by land (which is now exempt from Probate Duty), either in the shape of duties on conveyances, mortgages, settlements of landed property or leases of farms, or other matters relating to realty; the remaining 1,300,000*l.* are paid entirely by transactions relating to personal property, such as personal bonds, leases of houses in towns, mortgages of leasehold houses, and settlements of funded property, and other personal deeds of a similar nature. I also find in all the Stamp Duties relating to real property, that the principle is to favour the rich man and to make the poor man pay more than his fair proportion. Take the case of a mortgage—if a small farmer is in distress, and desirous to borrow 50*l.* on mortgage of his small patrimony, he has to pay a Stamp Duty of 1*l.* A wealthy landlord, with a large estate, wishes to borrow 20,000*l.* for the purpose of improving his property and adding to his income, he has to pay, not a duty of 400*l.*, which he ought to do if he paid at the same rate per cent. as the yeoman, but a Stamp Duty of only 20*l.*; so that in this case the rich man contributes 380*l.* less to the exigencies of the State than he ought to do. The same principle (though not to the same extent) pervades the duty on conveyances. The Stamp Duty on conveying a small property of 20*l.* is 10*s.*—the Stamp Duty on conveying a large property of the value of 100,000*l.* is only 1,000*l.* instead of 2,500*l.* as it ought to be if the Stamp on large property were in proportion to the Stamp on small. When a merchant under the right hon. Baronet's Tariff imports a large quantity of goods, this House does not exact that the wealthy merchant of Liverpool or of Bristol is to pay a smaller amount of Import Duty than the humble tradesman; on the contrary, this House, with perfect fairness, puts the large importer and the small importer on a footing of perfect equality, and makes each person pay at the same rate for the goods he imports. Then, if you act on this just principle in respect to trade and commerce, I want to know why are you to act on a different principle with regard to land? The greater part of conveyances in the course of the year are conveyances of small properties near towns, which belong to the middle classes; there can consequently be no doubt but the greater part of those very conveyance duties, for which a claim is now made upon us by the landowners, are paid by the middle classes, and not by the inheritors of large landed property. However, I am ready to admit, that these Stamp Duties on the conveyance of landed property are injurious to the landed interest—that they tend to lessen the value of their estates by increasing the expense and difficulty of selling their property. It was suggested by the late Mr. Tyrrel and by Mr. Stewart, the eminent conveyancers, that these duties on the alienation of land should be altogether abolished, and that, instead, a Probate Duty should be imposed. I am ready to adopt their suggestion. I can only say that, if the House agree with my proposition, I should willingly vote to relieve the landed interest from this 400,000*l.*, though I believe that the bulk even of this 400,000*l.* falls on the middle classes and on the small proprietors in the neighbourhood of towns. It was urged in the last debate by several hon. Members, that a Probate Duty on landed property would be easily evaded by means of putting it into trust, and that by this means the large estates would escape. This difficulty, however, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were really in earnest, might easily be avoided. At present, as the law now stands, personal property under trust, under certain circumstances, escapes Probate Duty; but it would be very easy to enact that, whenever the cestuique trust (that is to say, the person who has the beneficial interest) dies, that the tax should be levied on the next cestuique trust entering into the enjoyment of the beneficial interest, whether the interest were derived from personality or realty. Sir, I have purposely, on the present occasion, confined the Motion now before the House to Probate Duties, with the view of preventing the House being misled by any of the specious arguments which were used on a former occasion relating to the Legacy Duties. The right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by taking advantage of the fact that, in particular cases, certain interests arising out of land are liable to Legacy Duty, endeavoured, by confounding Probate and Legacy Duty, to induce the House to believe that land is liable both to Probate and Legacy Duty, and that owners of real estate do, in a large degree, contribute to those taxes. Such, however, is not the fact, and I defy the ingenuity of the right hon. Gentleman to show that, either land itself, or that any interest arising out of land (be it freehold or copyhold), is, in any single instance, liable to Probate Duty. Sir, I trust I have stated enough to the House to induce it to agree to this Motion. The people of England are lovers of fair play and honesty, and they cannot understand on what principle of justice Parliament imposes a heavy tax on the hard-earned savings of the working man, which he may have laid by for the support of his widow and infant children, when the property of the rich proprietor, which passes to the heir-at-law, utterly and entirely escapes taxation. I now beg to move,

"That this House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, on an early day, for the purpose of taking into consideration the Acts 36 Geo. III., c. 52; 45 Geo. III. c. 28; 48 Geo. III. c. 149; and 55 Geo. III. c. 184, with the view of imposing the same amount of Probate Duty on real estate as is now in similar cases imposed on personal property; and, likewise, of considering the expediency of imposing a Probate Duty in all cases on the death of the cestuique trust (whether the trust property be realty or personalty); in order to substitute such proposed Probate Duty on real estate for some of those taxes which now press most heavily on the productive industry of the people."

Mr. Trevelyan said: I rise for the purpose of seconding this motion. It appears to me that, considering the vast extent of the landed wealth of this country—a wealth not depending upon the industry of the landed class, but upon the abundance of our capital and the extent of our population—considering that immense portions of the soil of this country are in the possession of persons who can afford to contribute a small additional percentage to public necessities—considering that it was the intention of Mr. Pitt to extend to land the liability to which he had already subjected personal property; and, lastly, considering that the burthens borne by other classes are far greater in proportion to those sustained by land than those borne by the same classes in the most powerful continental states, the claim of exemption from Probate and Legacy Duties supported without injustice to the public at large. Much has been said, in rather vague language, about the exclusive burthens on land, and a Committee of inquiry set up by territorial proprietors cannot be into the subject was some time since proposed; but it was refused by Parliament, not, as malicious people say, because alarm was felt that the unreality of such burthens would be demonstrated, but solely from a modest apprehension on the part of landowners lest, on their full disclosure, the public should be induced to force upon them the acceptance of a largely increased protective duty on corn. Generosity, forsooth, is sometimes so pressing and imperative, that the most rigid disinterestedness can with difficulty repel it, and landlords dreaded being placed in a position in which, inspired by virtuous horror of the very semblance of legislation for a class (a horror which especially influenced their conduct with regard to the Gaming Penalties Bill), they would be forced to assume an ungracious demeanour towards a liberal and truly considerate public. And, yet, so much doubt of the existence of such burthens seems to have been felt in a landlords' Parliament, that a Committee of inquiry on the subject was refused lest the public should be convinced of their unreality. For my part, I believe that in general the only great exclusive burthen on land consists of the impolicy of the occupant. However, it is alleged that these exclusive burthens exist. What are they represented to be? Say some the charges on alienation, and expenses, such as marriage settlements for example. I thought marriage settlements had been represented to be the ground of protective duties on corn—they will, indeed, bear double duty, if they are also made the excuse for exempting land from the charges upon the descent of property in general. But, allowing the plea, let any one examine the list of charges on the transfer of personalty, and the expenses upon entering the learned professions, which ultimately fall on the public, and see if there is not an ample set-off against the alleged exclusive burthens referred to. Why, if a poor tradesman wants to borrow 50*l.* by way of mortgage, it costs him in stamp duty 1*l.* whilst, if a large landowner wants 20,000*l.*, the stamp duty only costs him 20*l.* whereas, to be proportionate, it ought to be 400*l.* It has been said that tithe is a burthen on land. What! when property was acquired subject to the liability? The portion of the value of land which becomes tithe is public property, and would certainly never, under any circumstances, return to the pockets of the landowners. Is the highway rate a burthen on land? Certainly not, unless we admit that carts, and ploughs, and other means of enhancing the value of land are really the instruments of its depreciation. Besides, is not the manufacturer compelled to invest large sums in the appliances of his art? Are not his gains uncertain, his speculations hazardous: May not the accident of a moment—a circumstance so seemingly trivial as the smallest alteration in the price of some commodity, frustrate the hopes of a life of care and anxiety? It should be remembered, too, that the landlords have exempted themselves from tolls for some of their own purposes, while the great high-roads which so much enhance the value of the land they approach were opened by possessors of capital, now represented by the holders of turnpike-trust securities. Then, as to poor and county rates, these make out no case for exempting land from the duties in question. House property, the bulk of which is said to be leasehold, and, therefore, personalty, together with mills and factories, has paid during the last century more than half what land has paid. At present, too, the charge on county rates is partly borne by the public in the payments made to the Consolidated Fund. But, even had this not been the case, where would have been the rent of land but for that increase of population, which, while it has increased the charge on land, has also increased a hundredfold the means of bearing it. But are church rates exclusive burthens on land? No; owners of house property are represented to pay two-fifths of the amount of those rates, that is, their full share, when we consider the proportion which the value of house property bears to the value of land. With respect to the land-tax, we all know how this country has been treated by self-elected legislators. We all know that feudal rights involved feudal services, which were commuted for certain payments to the public purse, intended to be proportioned to the value of land at the time being; whereas, in fact, the land-tax remains in the position in which it was settled in 1692, without having advanced, as it should have done, with the increasing value of land since that time. Talk of the special burthens on land! I would ask—and that at the risk of incurring the odium which most deservedly attaches to those who basely appeal to popular passions for private ends—what are the burthens on the labouring classes? How much will the toil of the labourer purchase for him? If he want a pound of tobacco, he must give for it an amount of labour which, were there no duty, would procure him nine pounds. If he want a hundred weight of foreign sugar, he must give, in addition to its price in the market of the world, fifteen days of severe toil, any three of which would kill a Member of this House, and all this over and above so much of the price he pays for coffee, corn, and other articles, as depends upon protective or other duties leviable on their importation. Not only must the labourer work all day, but he must reflect that two-thirds of his labour is wasted to the world—for this is always the case where the market for a particular commodity is only sustained by protective duties. The whole wealth of the state—the whole sum of its enjoyments, is not thus increased but diminished. To the reflecting labourer it cannot but occur, that he might as well, during two-thirds of his period of endurance, and as far as the wealth of society is concerned, climb the tread-mill for the diversion of his employers, as apply his labour in the false directions frequently assigned to him. He must say, within himself, “I could bear this if it benefited my employers; but why exact the pound of flesh when no use can be made of it?” The only intelligible motive of legislators—legislators!—in matters affecting trade, would seem to be a mere design (putting the ends of production out of the question) to keep labour out of mischief. Pity labour cannot now and then return the compliment! Take a large and economical view of all this, and what does it amount to? Simply to this—that the state (in other words, the landed interest—for it may truly say l'état, c'est moi), even when its conduct is most innocent—whilst it acts with the purest intentions, yet acts as if it intended to make the labouring classes work as long and hard as possible with the least possible return in the shape of food, clothes, and comfort, and then flippantly expends on improper projects the little their labour is allowed to raise. However, heavy as the duties on commodities are, whether we speak of the Excise or Customs, they, and not land, support the immense and almost incredible burthens of this country. Let any one examine the items of the public revenue, and he cannot fail to be satisfied of this. Why, sir, so exorbitant are the duties on commodities, and so long have they operated, that there is good reason to fear that hereafter, when they are removed, the people will have lost all taste for the articles taxed, and have forgotten how to use them, from their want of practice. With regard to corn, the only wonder is (especially when we consider how well protectionists reason in general) that they do not carry out their principle of enhancing prices by shortening supply, to its logical consequences, by limiting by law the quantity of acres to be cultivated—or following the famous precedent of certain Dutch colonists, by occasionally destroying a portion of the produce in order to raise the price of the rest! Sir, the last time this subject was discussed, the motion then made was resisted on grounds of repugnance to taxation in general—a part of that mere “ignorant impatience” (as it has been so well designated) which distinguishes some people at the bare mention of a tax, however valuable its purpose. It was said, “We are not going to heap up new burthens upon those which already depress the resources of the country.” But how does this very natural antipathy affect the question? Why, the very reason a burthen is unbearable often is its unskilful apportionment. If taxation has reached an intolerable limit, and if public security admit of it, reduce all the taxes, but do not render the aggregate less bearable by refusing an equitable adjustment of the portions of which it is composed. Again, the Legacy Duty was called a particularly offensive one; I see no reason for so regarding it. On the contrary, an abatement from an unexpected sum received is less felt than from a sum upon the full enjoyment of which a man has calculated, and from the loss of a portion of which he might derive much temporary inconvenience. But, even if it can be justly regarded as peculiarly offensive, whilst this objection might be good ground for withdrawing its operation from personal, it is no reason, when it is levied on personal, for refusing to extend it to real property. It cannot be denied that there is one great advantage in a Legacy Duty, that it cannot be avoided. Indirect taxation may be evaded by non-consumption of the articles taxed. Indirect taxation, too, has the inconvenience of disconcerting mercantile speculation, while a Legacy Duty draws from the fountain head, and partakes of the qualities of a property-tax without its objectionable circumstances, and more especially its inquisitorial character. In a speech of the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, on a former occasion, that right hon. Gentleman said, in effect, that a Motion of this sort implied only this—that real property should be subject to the Probate and Legacy Duties upon the same conditions as those upon which personal property was based; that personal property, the subject of settlement, was then exempted from those duties; and, consequently, that if the Motion were carried, and if the conditions on which it was founded were strictly adhered to, all large estates in the country, which were the subject of settlement, would be likewise exempted. But has this argument any force on examination? It is proposed to approximate to an uniformity in one branch of taxation by rendering a new class of property liable to a certain tax. The objection is, that absolute uniformity is unattainable. It is evident that the plea is logically inadequate, and has merely the effect of mystifying what is a little too plain to be pleasing. In every country care should be taken that no law should discourage, beyond what may be absolutely necessary, the influx of capital. The slightest unfairness towards the holders of moveable property re-acts upon the wealth of the State; and that, whether moveable property consists of labour or goods. And it follows from this, and from the fact that any diminution of the wealth and population of the country must operate in lowering the value of land, that the most perfect generosity towards other classes is the true policy of the holders of stationary wealth. It appears that one solid reason for taxing land in the way proposed is, that it would offer to the public some compensation for the disadvantage it suffers from the pertinacious maintenance of the Corn Law by the landed interest. The plan ought to be eagerly caught at by such landlords as are already convinced of the unsoundness of protective duties, and yet entertain a very natural dislike openly to surrender positions, once deemed so strong, as a graceful opportunity of contributing to the aid of those resources their unfortunate policy so materially impairs. And with regard to those landlords who affirm that the sliding-scale enhances the value of their property, who still repose faith in the saving virtues of protection, with what consistency could they refuse to add to the public income a small fraction of that wealth which they maintain protection has created, and protection will maintain? They admit they are exclusively enriched by protection. Can they grudge a fraction of their confessedly factitious wealth to insure the confidence of the public creditor, the security of the State, the conservation of their own order, privileges, and power? If protective duties are a source of wealth, why should it not contribute its quota to public wants? If, on the contrary, these duties are illusory or impoverishing, why not abolish them? Landlords may take which side of the disjunction they please, but one or the other follows from their own admissions. In conclusion, Sir, I must beg seriously to remind the House that it has a character to earn with the country. Its disinterestedness has been impugned, and it is incumbent upon it to take care that the charge receive from its conduct on this occasion a complete triumphant refutation. We must not forget the immense preponderance of landlords in this House; and though it may be admitted throughout the country that the protective measures, so many forms of which have, for considerably above a century, exercised the ingenuity of this House, have been discussed and passed under the influence of considerations of the interest of the public at large; yet, if it appear on inquiry that there are several cases in which there remain on the statute book laws bearing evident marks of favour and interest, and that interest, unfortunately, the interest of the preponderant class in this House, very natural suspicions of the singleness and purity of our views will prevail in the public mind, and possibly be the occasion of irresistible demands of organic constitutional change.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the Motion which the hon. Gentleman had submitted to the House, was one, he believed, that found no precedent on the Journals of that House, and one on which it might fairly be questioned whether a Motion of that nature could properly be made without (we understood the right hon. Gentleman to say) the consent of the Crown. He, therefore, noticed this in the first instance, because he thought it essential that the House should be guarded in the course of this proceeding how far they infringed upon the essential privileges of the Government. It was only in consideration of this resolution stating rather what the House should do on a future occasion, than what it was prepared to do at the instant, that he thought it admitted of his entering into a discussion which, under other circumstances, he should have thought had better be avoided; and, in discussing it, he would reserve the question of its being conformable to the rules or precedents of that House, upon which he had considerable doubt. As this subject had been twice discussed by him in the course of recent Sessions of Parliament, the House would expect as little novelty in the reply he was about to offer, as in the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had introduced it; but, with respect to the point of form, it would be desirable that the House should have the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair.

The Speaker said, the rule of the House was, that no Motion for a grant of public money could be put from the Chair without the previous consent of the Crown. The proposition, however, of the hon. Member was not of that description, but must be considered as a Duty or Tax to be imposed for the Service of the year. Now, such a Duty ought to be voted in a Committee of Ways and Means, and not in a Committee of the whole House; and it ought not to be proposed unless it could be shewn that the public exigencies required it. He could not call to mind any precedent exactly in point. But, although he was not prepared to say that it was such a Motion as could not be put from the Chair, it was, however, clearly an irregular Motion, and which, not being in conformity with the Rules of the House, the House ought not to entertain.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was extremely unwilling to place the House in the situation of having an irregular motion submitted to it, and discussed on a future occasion; and probably the better course would be (with every willingness to enter into the discussion) that it should be adjourned, to see how far the precedents, as regarded the business of the House, would affect this Motion. He would suggest, therefore, that the Motion should be postponed to some future day.

Mr. Elphinstone would consent most willingly.

Mr. Hume thought this was a matter of considerable importance, as involving a declaration, that the House was not now competent to enter into the discussion of the subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it a novel course. As the case was put it was simply this—that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on an early day. It happened every day that it was moved that certain Acts should be read, and that the House should go into Committee to consider them on an early day. The objection taken as to the Committee of Ways and Means might be such, because he supposed that his hon. Friend would propose the abatement of other taxes in proportion to the amount he proposed to raise in this way. The subject had been four or five times discussed in that House, and he had twice moved a resolution, to the effect that this duty should be imposed instead of other taxes which the Government were about to lay on—that was a perfectly legitimate course. But he was only supposing the House should go into Committee upon the question whether the House should not consider if they would prefer one tax to another. Having agreed to the imposition of certain duties, it would be wrong for them to add additional taxation; but it would be perfectly right for them to consider whether they should not have substituted one tax instead of another. He thought that was quite right, and he hoped the day was not distant when he should see the House resolving itself into a Committee to consider not only this tax but others. The taxes of the country were most unequal. The rich were favoured whilst the poor were oppressed; and the time he hoped was coming when all other taxes would be considered before a Committee of the House. There never was a tax which showed to the country more of class legislation than this. The House ought to know, that the taxation upon real and personal property was at first embodied in one Bill, but it was divided into two Bills, after considerable discussion. He had it from the individual who drew up the Bill during the Government of Mr. Pitt, that he took it from the model of Holland.

Sir R. Peel rose to order. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to discuss the policy of the Stamp Duties; and the question before the House was, whether or not the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Elphinstone) was competent to make the Motion in the particular form in which he had brought it before the House. It was of very great importance that the House should adhere to established rules. It might be said that this was an unpopular tax, but it did not diminish the danger of the precedent, because they selected a particular tax which they said was unpopular, and departed from the original rule. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might take advantage of such a precedent and impose burthens on the people without going through the regular form. He thought it most important that they should adhere to established rules with respect to the taxation of the country; to depart from the rules would be unwise, but to depart from them by evasion, would be worse than all; the evasion would soon become the rule for future action, and he hoped, therefore, in the first instance, in such matters as these, they would let their Motions be in conformity with the rules of the House.

Mr. Hume thought the right hon. Baronet had no right to call him to order. No man in that House was more anxious than he was to maintain the forms of the House. Although there were thirteen opportunities which every Member of the House had to oppose any motion, he defended so great a safeguard. He would concur with the right hon. Baronet, that they should not attempt in any way to evade the established rules of the House; but he thought this was an attempt to smother and get rid of a Motion of importance, and he was proceeding to state why it ought to be discussed, when the right hon. Baronet rose to order; but if they were to have another opportunity of discussing the question, he would be the last man to wish to detain the House by entering at greater length upon the subject then.

Mr. F. T. Baring thought that the House ought not to decide the question without due consideration. What the right hon. Gentleman opposite stated was quite true. There were certain rules with respect to taxation, to which it was extremely desirable the House should adhere. But let it not be understood that the discussion of this subject was thereby wholly stopped. The hon. Gentleman might have committed some irregularity in his mode of proceeding, but he had no doubt he would be able to bring the subject under the consideration of the House on a future occasion.

Mr. Elphinstone said, he was the last person who would wish to make a bad precedent. He would, therefore, propose that the right hon. Baronet should fix some day next week when this subject might be fully and fairly discussed.

Mr. Warburton thought it better that his hon. relative (Mr. Elphinstone) should move the adjournment of the discussion, and it was but fair that the Government should give him another night for it. His Motion was far more regular than a Motion on a former occasion, when there was a similar discussion—he meant in 1842. The Motion on that occasion was for imposing a Legacy Duty on the succession to real estates, of the same amount as on personal property, and that was more open to an objection, upon a matter of form, than the Motion of his hon. relative, for it proposed that whatever duty was raised upon the one should be raised upon the other; but his hon. relative proposed that they should retain the amount that was now paid on personal property, and impose the like rate on real property. The manner in which his hon. relative had worded his Motion was different; and he thought there could be no objection to an adjournment of the discussion.

The Speaker said, he had then the volume of the Journal of the House before him, which contained a report of the proceedings of the House when the duty was imposed; and it appeared that the Probate Duties imposed by the Acts of Parliament referred to in the hon. Member's proposition were originally voted in Committee of Ways and Means. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to read the Resolution from the Journal, and added that it was highly desirable that the House should pause before it established any new precedent with regard to Motions of this description.

Motion withdrawn.

POSTAGE STAMPS.] Mr. Wallace, in bringing forward the Motion of which he had given notice on the subject of Postage Stamps, begged to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to the Treasury Minutes, a copy of which had been laid on the Table of the House that very day. It would be seen from that Minute, that there were four different ways in which stamped paper was proposed to be used in the Penny Postage system. The forthcoming half-sheets was the third way of making use of the Postage Stamps, but the most important and most useful mode had not yet been carried into effect. The Resolution No. 4, in the Treasury Minute of 26th December, 1839, provided that Stamps should be struck on paper of any description which the public might choose to send to the Stamp Office for that purpose. That mode would afford additional facilities to business. A great number of persons engaged in paper-making and the stationery business had waited upon him and complained of the exclusive employment of Mr. Dickinson's peculiar paper for envelopes, and of the new form in which it was said that paper was coming forward. He disclaimed having had anything to do with bringing out the half-sheets; but he approved of the whole sheets which had been denied. Half-sheets would not give any advantage to the productive classes, especially the working classes; it would but continue that monopoly to the richer classes which they received by his peculiar paper being stamped at Somerset House for the special purpose of making envelopes. He believed the plan would fail; and he called upon Government to apply the fourth minute. There were various ways in which the expenditure at Somerset House might be much better applied than now. One of them would be to give an additional per centage for issuing labels attached to paper by stationers and paper dealers in large or small towns. A vast quantity of small Paper Stamps would thus be used, and the object of increased facility of distribution effected. He begged to move,—

“That full effect be given to the Act, commonly called the Penny Postage Act, by the issue of postage free stamped paper, without restriction as to size or quality—in addition to the use of labels, postage free envelopes, and prepayments at post-offices, as at present.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persevere in his Motion. If he was not mistaken, the Treasury Minute to which the hon. Gentleman referred recommended, not that stamped paper should be issued in the first instance, but that simple Label Stamps should be issued, which could be affixed to the paper by the person making use of it. It was very doubtful whether there would be any advantage given to the public by the adoption of the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, equal to the inconvenience to which it would give rise. There was every disposition on the part of the Post Office authorities to accommodate the public; but they did not think it would be advisable to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member.

Captain Bernal could not allow that opportunity to pass without adverting to the objection which was entertained by his constituents, many of whom were paper-makers, to the issue of half-sheets of stamped paper. He could not understand why the hon. Member for Greenock was so anxious to press this matter on the Government. In his opinion, its only effect would be to create a new monopoly in the hands of particular individuals. The public were perfectly satisfied with Dickenson's stamped envelopes, and he hoped he should receive some assurance that it was not intended to issue the stamped half-sheets to any great extent.

Mr. F. T. Baring said, that when the late Government had come to consider a proposal for issuing stamped paper, they had found that the plan would give rise to great opportunities for forgery. They had felt greatly alarmed in consequence, and had declined to carry that plan into operation. He was sure that if the system were adopted, forgery might easily take place; in fact, there would be nothing to act as a discouragement to forgery, but the smallness of the sum to be paid. He did not think that the public were much inconvenienced by the present arrangements.

Sir G. Clerk said, that the Treasury had felt the full force of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman. They had felt that it would be impossible to adopt the system of having stamped sheets of paper generally circulated all over the country without running great risks of forgery. He believed, too, that some inconvenience might arise to the poor from the use of stamped paper, as they could not recover the penny for the paper on which they might have written, in case they should not, after the writing, think proper to avail themselves of it. As Mr. Dickenson's paper had already been used to some extent, he had consented to a proposal of allowing stamped half-sheets to be issued instead of being cut up into envelopes. The experiment, however, would be on a very small scale. With reference to the present motion, he would only add that, although many suggestions were received at the Treasury from various quarters, relative to improvements in the Penny Postage, the hon. Member for Greenock was the only person who advocated the issue of stamped sheets of paper.

Mr. Wallace said, that as the sense of the House seemed to be opposed to his Motion, he should not press it to a division.

Motion withdrawn.

LAND TAX COMMISSIONERS.] Sir G. Clerk moved the second reading of the Land Tax Commissioners Names Bill.

Lord Worsley said, he entertained a strong opinion as to the desirableness of avoiding, wherever it was possible, the putting of clergymen on the Commission of the Peace, but he had a much stronger objection to their being appointed as Land Tax Commissioners. In the list sent to him, he found there had been seventeen new names, ten of which were clergymen, and he wished to know from the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department whether it was competent for him (Lord Worsley), as a Member of Parliament, to put a Veto on that list. He did not wish to do anything invidious, nor had he any objection to the individuals referred to, but he thought persons might be found better qualified than clergymen for discharging the duties devolving on the Land Tax Commissioners.

Sir J. Graham was not quite prepared to answer the question of the noble Lord; but, speaking from recollection, he (Sir J. Graham) believed the Members for the county had no Veto on those lists, but were merely the channels of communicating them to the House of Commons, with whom the ultimate decision rested.

Mr. Hume thought the clergy had enough to do, without mixing themselves up with secular transactions, and, if he had the power, he should strike out their names when the Bill was in Committee.

Sir J. Graham did not believe clergymen were ambitious, or desirous of such an appointment; but it was for the interest of the public that they should act. Hitherto the fact of a gentleman being a clergyman was not regarded as a disqualification.

Motion agreed to.

IRISH NAVAL OFFICERS.] Mr. French moved for a return of the names of all persons appointed to command vessels in Her Majesty's service, from the 1st day of October, 1841, to the 1st day of March, 1844, specifying whether each person so appointed be a native of England, Ireland, or Scotland. During that period, he said, upwards of 100 appointments had taken place of persons commanding vessels in Her Majesty's service, and but one Irishman had been appointed. The late Government, who had been accused of favouring their political friends, never pursued such a line of conduct as this. He was sure that the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government would not sanction any intentional exclusion of Irishmen.

Mr. S. Herbert said, it was impossible to comply with the demand of the hon. Member for Roscommon, because it was not the nationality of the persons appointed, but their fitness for office, with which the Admiralty had to do. There was no means, therefore, of complying with the request of the hon. Member; but if he confined his Motion to "a return of the names of all persons appointed to command vessels in Her Majesty's service from the 1st day of October, 1841, to the 1st day of March, 1844," leaving out the specification, he had not the slightest objection to furnish that return.

Mr. Shaw was quite sure the First Lord of the Admiralty could not be suspected of being prejudiced against Irishmen.

Return, omitting the specification, ordered.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 15, 1844.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—1st. 3½ per Cent. Annuities; 3½ per Cent. Annuities (1818); Consolidated Fund.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By the Bishop of Hereford, from Deanery of Burford, against Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—From Stamford, respecting their Local Jurisdiction.—By the Earl of Haddington, from Schoolmasters (Scotland), praying for Better Remuneration.

RAILWAYS.] Earl Fitzwilliam said, a petition had been entrusted to him, which he believed he could not consistently with the usages of Parliament lay on the Table, but upon which he would beg to found a few observations. It was a petition from some of the inhabitants of Scarborough, against certain provisions of the York and Scarborough Railway Bill, now before the House of Commons. The particular points to which the petitioners objected were, that this branch Railway, which was forty miles in length, was projected by a company whose main line was only twenty-seven miles long; and the next objection, which was a more important one, was against the making this a single line. Many persons thought there was danger, but he was sure there was at least much inconvenience, in having a railway of such length as forty miles, consisting only of a single line. It was true their Lordships had last Session given their sanction to the construction of a railway about the same length in a single line, but he thought that was very injudicious, and hoped they would not strengthen the practice by repetition, for if they sanctioned such a principle no lines would ever be made double, because, of course, the single line was cheaper and more convenient to the projectors. He could not help expressing his strong wish that the Executive Government of the country would take into their serious consideration the whole question of the system of Railways throughout the country. He was satisfied that even now, after the number of Railways that had been made, the Government could most efficiently and usefully undertake the conduct of the others. His notion would be that they should issue a commission to survey the country, and to determine what were the points which required to be connected by means of railway communication, and then to lay down the lines, and after that to leave it to individuals to execute them. He was not desirous that the Government should undertake the formation of lines of Railway, but he thought enormous expense and a vast deal of ill-feeling would have been saved if they had originally undertaken the control of them to the extent

he had stated, for if a landowner residing in the country were told on the authority of the Government that a particular railway, though inconvenient to him, was of importance to the country, he would, if he had any good feeling, readily submit; but he was not likely to be so complaisant if the persons with whom he had to deal were speculators who projected railways, not for the interest of the public, but merely that they themselves might be able to gamble in the shares in the market. There was a line of importance now in contemplation—the line through Cambridge to the North of England, which would shorten the distance between York and London by twenty or thirty miles, but since that Railway was projected, there had been movements on the part of a great company to give to the people of Lincoln such a modicum of railway communication as would render them less anxious for that original line: such were the projected lines from Swindon to Gainsborough and Lincoln, and from Nottingham to Lincoln. He had no doubt the Committee now appointed in the other House had every desire to do what was right, but as the Government had the power to do whatever they pleased, he thought the appointment of such a Commission as he had suggested would be of great service.

The Duke of Wellington was understood to say that the whole subject would be taken into consideration, with a view to an inquiry into the means of increased accommodation to the public.

THE REV. HERBERT MARSH.] Lord Campbell said, he wished briefly to notice some observations which had, on a preceding evening, fallen from the right Rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough), relative to the case of the Rev. Mr. Marsh; and he did so for the purpose of setting the question right with respect to the law as it affected that case. The right Rev. Prelate had stated, that he could not interfere on account of the provisions of the Church Discipline Act, the operation of which was confined to offences committed within the diocese where the preferment held by the accused party was situated. He did not mean to refer to the general law on the subject, but he felt it necessary to point out what was the operation of the particular measure alluded to, because he had the honour of being Attorney General at the time it was enacted; and if its operation were such as had been stated, then he, and all the Members of both Houses of Parliament who had concurred in it, were liable to considerable discredit. One reason assigned by the right Rev. Prelate for not proceeding was, that if the offence were committed out of the diocese where the party held preferment, he was prevented from acting, and the offence might be committed with impunity. On referring to the Act it would be found that wherever the offence was committed, the Bishop of the diocese in which it was committed was authorised to issue a Commission to inquire into it; but it did not stop there, for by the 13th section of the Act, in every case the Bishop of the diocese in which the preferment lay might, if he pleased, refer the case to the Court of Arches, in the province of Canterbury, and to the Supreme Court, in the province of York, and if the right Rev. Prelate had considered this a fit case, he might by letter of request, have referred the case to Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, and evidence would have been taken upon it, whether the offence had been committed in the diocese of Peterborough, the diocese of London, or as he conceived, in any part of the world. He was glad to have an opportunity of stating that in this respect the Church Discipline Act was properly framed, and that the scandal which was supposed to have arisen out of the circumstances in question was not to be imputed to the existing state of the law.

The Bishop of Peterborough said, he was obliged to the noble and learned Lord for having stated what the law was on this subject; and for having shewn that there is a provision in the Church Discipline Act, by which a Bishop may proceed against an offence, though not committed in his own diocese. The statement which he had made in their Lordships' House was certainly the impression of his own mind on the subject. It appeared that he was in error on that point. When the subject was last brought to their Lordships' notice, he was, as it were, taken by surprise. The noble and learned Lord and the House would bear in mind that he (the Bishop of Peterborough) said, that the question of time was in itself conclusive, the Act of Parliament excluding all cases of offence committed more than two years ago; and the offence of Mr. Marsh had been committed four years ago. The opinions which he (the Bishop of Peterborough) had expressed, were entertained by many persons besides himself, who had not given the subject that deep consideration which the noble and learned Lord had done. As he had before said, the question of time—viz., four years having elapsed since the offence was committed—was one which of itself put a stop to all proceedings. Their Lordships would recollect, that he gave three different reasons, which, according to the Act, prevented his proceeding; namely, the time,—and the offence having been in another diocese, and the fact of the benefice being in his own patronage. He frankly admitted to their Lordships that he had felt something like an unwillingness to proceed against a clergyman when he was accused by a person of ill fame for an act committed four years ago. The fact of the accusation was all he knew of the case at first, and when further inquiries were made he was told that Mr. Marsh had paid a visit to this unhappy woman at Paris four years ago. Under these circumstances, while there was living in the parsonage an aged and excellent mother in a very precarious state of health to whom any agitation might have been fatal, he had felt thankful, and he was sure their Lordships would enter into his feelings—he had felt thankful that there was an opportunity given him to be backward in this case until something more came to light which would justify him in proceeding. Some persons seemed to think that he had known all that came out on the late trial; on the contrary, however, a great portion of it was altogether unknown to him; so much so, that he was perfectly astonished when he read the complete disclosure. The utmost he had been led to suppose that was laid to the charge of Mr. Marsh was described as “an occasional visit and intercourse” with this woman in Paris four years ago; but on his own confession it appeared that he was in the habit of visiting houses of the same description in London; and he now felt himself pressed by his right rev. Friends, by their Lordships, and by all who had regard to the character of the clergy, to proceed in a manner he did not feel before; and the noble and learned Lord had shown a method by which this might be done,—by bringing the case before the Archbishop’s Court. Still there was the great obstacle—the time. There were many difficulties in the existing state of the law. A Bishop might give a licence of non-residence to a clergyman for certain reasons, such as personal ill-health, the illness of a wife, or a very near relation; and supposing a person applied for non-residence whose case did not come under any of these heads, still a licence might be obtained by application through the Bishop to the Archbishop of Canterbury. Now, if a clergyman whose example in his parish was bad, and whose presence was altogether useless, applied, a Bishop naturally felt an inclination to give a licence for non-residence; whereas a person of character, performing his duty regularly and well, could not obtain it. There was certainly something in that case that seemed rather strange. Again, suppose a living was worth only 140*l.* or 150*l.* a-year, the curate might take it all,—and not too much; but suppose it were worth 900*l.* a-year, the non-resident might put the whole in his pocket, allowing the curate only 150*l.* But, however contradictory these things might appear, there was one great consolation he had in believing and knowing that such cases as that of Mr. Marsh were very rare. When this case came before the public, some people said, “See what things take place in the Church;” but the very excitement which had been caused, in this great town, and the attention which their Lordships had given to the case, showed that such cases were very rare. Such cases where laymen were concerned might occur and no notice be taken of them at all; and the notice they attracted when clergymen unfortunately were the parties to be blamed is itself an argument of their rare occurrence. Indeed, he thought it might fairly be urged as a ground for excusing the ignorance he had shown on the subject, that Bishops were so seldom called on to investigate such charges; and he believed if the offence had occurred in any other diocese, his right rev. Brethren would have happily been as inexperienced as he was. He certainly had been under the impression that it was only when the offence was committed within his diocese that the Act enabled a Bishop to interfere. Although a difference of opinion on some points of more or less importance might prevail among the clergy, yet immorality among them he believed to be rare; and he should feel indeed distressed if such charges could be brought before the public as at all affecting the general character of the clergy. Immorality had been the exception, not the rule; and, instead of the Church falling off, it was improving in its character and increasing in its efficiency every day, to which most important end the mode in which some of their Lordships had exercised their patronage had in no small degree contributed. He deeply lamented that such a case should have occurred, but he repeated it was a rare occurrence, and he trusted it would become still rarer. He should not have troubled their Lordships with this statement but for the observations of the noble and learned Lord, for whose explanations he felt most thankful.

Lord Lilford was understood to say that discussions of this nature, as far as they affected the character of a body, had better be suffered to sink into oblivion. But he wished to state the reason why he had taken the liberty of originating this subject. He had put a question to the right rev. Prelate, because he felt it important that there should be a denial of a report which he had seen in the newspaper of the day, and which was to the effect that "this man continued, and continues, with the connivance of his Bishop, to preach the gospel—to administer the sacraments, and to appear as the authorized representative of the English Church—the guardian of souls, the guide of consciences to an English congregation." He thought, after the explanation which their Lordships had heard, they would consider that the course taken by the right rev. Prelate was the only one that he could have taken, and he trusted they would acquit him (Lord Lilford) of any unnecessary interference.

House adjourned.

ECCLIASTICAL COURTS (IRELAND).]

Sir H. W. Barron wished to ask, whether the Government, after all the reports which had been made, and discussions which had taken place, for the last twenty-five years, was prepared to bring in any measure for remedying the gross abuses of the Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland.

Sir R. Peel said, that the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland properly belonged to the Lord Primate. But the Lord Primate had stated, when the vacancy occurred last year in the Judgeship of the Prerogative Court, that he was perfectly ready to waive his right to the appointment, and leave it to the nomination of the Government. When that appointment was made by the Government it was accompanied by a distinct stipulation that it was subject to any alterations that might be made in the constitution of the Court, and if there should be an increase of duties thrown upon that officer, he was not to be entitled to an increase of salary. That appointment was made towards the close of last Session, and that functionary was now in communication with the Government on the subject of projected alterations in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

IDOLATRY IN INDIA.] Sir R. H. Inglis would take that opportunity of putting the questions of which he had given notice, in reference to the measures taken by the British Government, with respect to idolatry in India. The House might recollect that he had put some questions, in the course of the last Session, with regard to the separation and disconnection of the European servants of the East India Company from all interference with Mahomedan mosques and Hindoo pagodas, and with the management of the lands belonging to them, and also as to whether steps had been taken to stop the pension or allowance granted to the idol of Juggernaut. The answer was perfectly satisfactory with regard to the Presidency of Bombay, and all but satisfactory with regard to that of Bengal. But it was not satisfactory with regard to that of Madras. What he wished now to ask was, whether all connection of the European servants of the Company with idolatrous or Mahomedan worship had been everywhere discontinued? Whether it had not been referred to the authorities in India, as to whether a pledge had or had not been given, when the territory became British, of continuing the allowance to the idol Juggernaut, and whether the answer were, that no pledge to continue that allowance had been given? He also wished to know, whether his right hon. Friend would have any objection to lay on the Table of the House the despatch which had been sent with the pamphlet of Mr. Strachan to the Governor General.

Sir R. Peel said the House might recollect that it was stated in the pamphlet of Mr. Strachan that 60,000 rupees were paid by the Indian Government for the support of the idol of Juggernaut in consequence of a stipulation to that effect, and he also stated, that the pilgrimages in honour of the idol were sanctioned by the Indian Government—and that the police were in the habit of forcing reluctant persons to assist in drawing the car of Juggernaut. A copy of the pamphlet was immediately transmitted to the Governor General. He had no objection to communicate the despatch which had been sent on the subject by the Court of Directors. On seeing the despatch, his hon. Friend would be best able to judge how the matter stood as far as regarded the British Government. With regard to the continuance of the assistance of the servants of the company at the pagodas, he had to state that in Bombay a committee was appointed, which took the management of the lands out of the hands of those who managed them before. The same rule prevailed in the Government of Bengal. He was not enabled to state exactly what had been done in the Government of Madras; but he hoped that the arrival of the next mails would enable him to inform the hon. Gentleman of the steps which had been taken by the Government of India on this subject. He should be prepared to lay on the Table all the correspondence relating to the subject.

EXCLUSION OF ROMAN CATHOLICS FROM JURIES.] Mr. Bellew rose to put the question to the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, of which he had given notice, on the subject of the exclusion of Roman Catholics from Juries in Ireland. In the recent trial in the county of Monaghan, of the "Queen v. O'Halloran, M'Kenna, and others," which was a charge of Ribbonism, there were twenty Jurors returned, of these eight, being Catholics, were challenged by the Crown. The result was, that of the twelve Jurors sworn, only one was a Roman Catholic, and the general impression on the public mind was, that the Catholic Jurors had been challenged solely on account of their religion. In that case, there was no question of Repealer or anti-Repealer; the case was one merely of Ribbonism. He wished to ask if the noble Lord could state why the Catholic Jurors had been thus struck off. He also wished to put a question respecting the employment of the Crown witness. It appeared that the the Crown witness had been employed as an approver before the late assizes. He had been out on bail, and during that time, and while he was in communication with the police, he had continued to attend Ribbon Associations, and he had admitted that he had taken an oath of secrecy at a meeting of a Ribbon Association since he had been in communication with the Law Officers of the Crown. He wished to ask the noble Lord how it happened that the Crown had excluded from the Jury all Roman Catholics except one, and how they could justify the employment, as the approver and principal witness for the Crown, of a person so calculated to bring the execution of the laws into disrespect?

Lord Eliot regretted that he was not in a position to give so full and satisfactory an answer to the hon. Gentleman's questions as he could wish. On the day on which the hon. Gentleman had given notice of his intention of asking the questions he had written to the Crown Solicitor on the North-Eastern Circuit on the subject. He had received an answer from that Gentleman stating that he was still on the Circuit, and had not the papers with him which would enable him to return a satisfactory answer, but that he should return to Dublin on Wednesday, when he would furnish the necessary papers; but he declared at the same time, as a Gentleman, that no Juror had been set aside solely on the ground that he was a Roman Catholic, but that he should be able to assign good and valid reasons for the rejection of every one that he had set aside. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that the instructions on this subject issued by Chief Justice Brady in 1839, and which had been laid on the Table of that House, were still in force, and the Attorney General for Ireland, and the other Law Officers of the Crown in that country, had addressed circulars to the Crown Solicitors on the various Circuits, requesting that those directions should be strictly adhered to; so that if there had been any deviation from those instructions the responsibility rested with the Crown Solicitor, and not with the Government. Mr. Maxwell, the Crown Solicitor alluded to, however, was a gentleman of high respectability. He had been appointed in 1831, by the Marquess of Anglesea, and had held the office ever since, having given satisfaction to the different Governments, and he would not believe that he had failed to exercise a judicious discretion in the present instance. With regard to the last question, as he had received no notice from the hon. Gentleman on the subject, he was not in a condition to return an answer.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE.] Mr. Wallace, in accordance with the notice he had given, rose to inquire of the right hon. the President of the Board of Trade: 1. Whether the proceedings of the Committee on Railways will show the House, by evidence or calculation, the average cost per mile at which passengers, goods, live stock, &c., may be conveyed in future on new lines of Railway, with a reasonable profit to the Company and justice to the people. 2. Whether evidence will be taken to show the present cost of conveying Her Majesty's Mails by Railway: and the cost at which these might be carried, were the Postmaster-General to send the Mail bags as luggage or goods, along with a guard in charge of them. 3. Whether evidence will be taken to determine, if the Postmaster-General were to provide an establishment of engines for conveying the Mails along Railways, together with carriages for passengers, as has been recommended in the sixth Resolution in the first Report to this House on Railways, which was printed March 28, 1838, there would be any difficulties made, or obstructions thrown in the way by the Directors of the great Railway lines having their termini near London, to the Postmaster-General following out the aforesaid recommendation. 4. Whether evidence will be taken to show why a Clause should not be inserted in each Railway Bill now before Parliament, empowering the Postmaster-General to command that passenger carriages shall be attached to every special train which he may require for the public service, with a view to lessen the charge which special trains cost the Post-Office department, when sent without passengers. 5. Whether it is intended, with a view to economy and regularity in the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails, to take evidence to show the detriment to the public service, and to the interest of the nation generally, which may arise from Railway Companies having the power longer continued, through by-laws or otherwise, to interrupt or altogether stop the traffic on Sundays. 6. Whether for the information of the public generally, and the Railway department of the Board of Trade especially, it has not become requisite to take evidence to show that all Railway Companies shall periodically in future, furnish to the Board of Trade a debtor and creditor account, drawn out on a simple but uniform plan, of their half yearly receipts and expenditure. His object was to obtain some information as to what was going on before the Committee up stairs.

Mr. Gladstone was aware of the anxiety which existed upon the subject; but was sorry that the rules of the House, as well as the convenience of the Select Committee themselves, did not permit a disclosure of their proceedings, while those proceedings were still going on. He could only, therefore, answer the hon. Gentleman's questions generally. If, however, it was consistent with the rules of the House to refer to what was doing in the Committee, he did not think their proceedings were likely to supply any answer to the hon. Gentleman's inquiries. That Committee was appointed not to examine all particulars in respect to the management of Railways, but to consider what amendments might be made in the Standing Orders, and what general arrangements and rules might be adopted for the public convenience, as between the Parliament and the Railway Companies. Now, with regard to the first question of the hon. Gentleman, it was not possible for the Select Committee to give the average cost per mile at which passengers, goods, live stock, &c., might be conveyed on future lines of Railway with a profit to the Company, because there was no general standard upon which such an average could be fixed on new or old lines of railway. The cost per mile at which the Company could be fairly remunerated must depend upon the particular circumstances of the line. Then as to the second and third questions, which referred to the Post Office Department, those were rather matters for the consideration of a Committee on that department than for a Railway Committee. The Committee on Railways had received the representations of the departments of the public service interested in the question, so far as the Post Office was concerned, and it was not likely that they would go further than that department of the Government might urge upon them. The fifth question fell under the same category:—whether it was intended, with a view to economy and regularity in the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails, to take evidence as to the detriment to the public service and to the nation resulting from Railway Companies having the power to stop the Sunday traffic? He could not say that the Committee had any such intention, and, so far as his own opinion went, he should be sorry, where there was any disposition on the part of the Railway Companies to make such regulations, for the House to interfere to prevent them. Then the hon. Gentleman asked him if it was not desirable that Railway Companies should furnish periodically a debtor and creditor account to the Board of Trade of their expenditure and receipts made up half-yearly? His answer to that question was, that he did not think it had become desirable that any such regulation should be made. Parliament had not yet adopted, nor was it likely to adopt, the principle that any public supervision of the amount of profits which parties who had embarked capital on the faith of Acts of Parliament were realising; so far as public opinion went, he thought the system of publicity which was now given to all matters of railway account was sufficient, and gave general satisfaction.

CLERKS FEES IN COURTS OF LAW.]

Mr. Escott said, it would be remembered that in the course of the previous Session he had called attention to a statement which had appeared, of certain illegal Fees, that were demanded and received by the Clerks of the Crown Courts, the Clerks of Assize, the Clerks of the Peace, and the Clerks of Quarter Session, in various parts of the country. Opinions were then given, and declarations made by his right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary, and the noble Lord, which he had hoped and expected would put an end to the practice. At the close of the Session, it would be recollected, that he had moved for a return of the amount of the Fees taken by those officers during the preceding year, and, from that return, it appeared, that in twenty counties the practice was abolished, but thirty-two still retained it to a greater or a less extent. The practice was this—the Clerks of the Assize and the Clerks of the Peace demanded a sum of money from every defendant who was called upon to plead, before they permitted him to plead not guilty, and take his trial. This practice was contended for on the ground, that because under an Act of Parliament, the Justices of Petty Sessions were empowered to retain the amount of the Fees to be demanded in all cases brought before them; therefore, they, the Clerks, were entitled to make these demands upon the defendants in every case. He was quite sure this practice never would have endured if its existence had been generally known. And when he called the attention of the House to the subject last year, he believed there was not more than one or two Members of that House who were aware that such a practice existed. The Members of the Government were ignorant of it, and the Law Officers of the Crown were ignorant of it; and he (Mr. Escott) believed that there was no case in which those Fees had been demanded and obtained from the defendant, that an indictment for extortion would not lie against the officer by whom the demand was made. What he wished on the present occasion was, that his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) would restate the opinion he had given last year against this abominable and unjust practice; and, further, that if it should continue to exist, that he would exert the executive power of the Government to put it down. For no legislation was necessary—the law as it stood being sufficient to free Her Majesty's Courts of Justice from this foul stain.

Sir J. Graham said, the practice to which his hon. and learned Friend had referred was without doubt most objectionable, but it was by no means a common one in the country. And his hon. Friend had truly stated, that if it were illegal there was a legal remedy against those Clerks of the Peace who persisted in it. He was not so presumptuous as to suppose that any opinion of his, on a point of pure law, could have any weight with the Court, but he did believe, that the practice was altogether at variance with the principles both of law and justice, that a defendant should be called upon to pay anything to prove his innocence, or be mulcted of any Fees, in order to his being tried by a Jury, and he was bound to say, that to levy any thing under such circumstances, did partake of the character of extortion. It was open for the Justices of Petty Sessions, to examine and regulate the Fees charged—but subject to the principle that the Fees claimed must be originally legal—and what his hon. and learned Friend had stated, that until he called attention to the subject last year, the Law Officers of the Crown, and Legal men generally, were ignorant of the practice, sufficiently proved that the Fees to which he had alluded were illegal.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.]
House in Committee on the Factories Bill.

On Clause 2, the interpretation Clause being proposed,

Lord Ashley rose to propose the amendment of which he had given notice.

"That, the word 'night' shall be taken to mean from six o'clock in the evening to six o'clock in the following morning; and the word 'mealtime' shall be taken to mean an interval of cessation from work for the purpose of rest and refreshment, at the rate of two hours a day, with a view to effect a limitation of the hours of labour to ten in the day."

The form of my amendment (said the noble Lord) requires some preliminary explanation. I move it in its present shape at the suggestion of my right hon. Friend and the Government, though I fear that in adopting that course I subject myself to some disadvantage. The House will allow me at the outset to explain my amendment. I propose that the word "night," in this Clause, shall be taken to mean from six o'clock in the evening till six on the following morning, that will leave twelve clear hours during which work shall cease, and I propose further, that out of the twelve hours of day, there shall be two hours during which there shall be a cessation of labour; but that no person shall be affected by this amendment, except those who, under Clause ten, are guaranteed against night-work, children, and young persons under thirteen years of age. If I succeed in this amendment it will be necessary to make some corresponding alteration in the eighth Clause. The tenth Clause I propose to leave, as that will afford an opportunity of giving some relaxation through the summer months. During the winter months, that is from the 15th of October to the 15th of March, hours of labour are not to exceed ten, two being for meals; but during the summer months, that is from the 15th of March to the 15th of October, the hours to be twelve and two for meals, making fourteen in the whole. Now, I would say with a view to conciliate opposition, that though I shall be ready to propose, as I intend to do, to limit the labour of all young persons and children to ten hours in each day, I am yet willing to obtain that object in parts and by degrees; that is, I propose to limit the hours of labour for such persons to eleven hours a day from the 1st of October in the present year, and ten hours a day from the 1st of October, 1845. Nearly eleven years have now elapsed since I first made the proposition to the House which I shall renew this night. Never, at any time, have I felt greater apprehension or even anxiety; not through any fear of personal defeat, for disappointment is "the badge of all our tribe;" but because I know well the hostility that I have aroused, and the certain issues of indiscretion on my part affecting the welfare of those who have so long confided their hopes and interests to my charge. And here let me anticipate the constant, but unjust accusation that I am animated by a peculiar hostility against factory masters, and I have always selected them as exclusive objects of attack. I must assert that the charge, though specious, is altogether untrue. I began, I admit, this public movement by an effort to improve the condition of the factories; but this I did, not because I ascribed to that department of industry a monopoly of all that was pernicious and cruel, but because it was then before the public eye, comprised the wealthiest and most responsible proprietors, and presented the greatest facilities for legislation. As soon as I had the power, I showed my impartiality by moving the House for the Children's Employment Commission. The curious in human suffering may decide on the respective merits of the several reports; but factory labour has no longer an unquestionable pre-eminence of ill fame; and we are called upon to give relief, not because it is the worst system, but because it is oppressive, and yet capable of alleviation. Sir, I confess that ten years of experience have taught me that avarice and cruelty are not the peculiar and inherent qualities of any one class or occupation—they will ever be found where the means of profit are combined with great, and, virtually, irresponsible power—they will be found wherever interest and selfishness have a purpose to serve, and a favourable opportunity. We are all alike, I fully believe, in the town and in the country, in manufactures and in agriculture—though we have not all of us the same temptations, or the same means of rendering our propensities a source of profit; and oftentimes, what we will not do ourselves, we connive at in others, if it add in any way to our convenience or pleasure. Look at the frightful records of the London dress-makers—for whom do they wear out their lives in heart-breaking toil? Why, to supply the demands and meet the sudden and capricious tastes of people of condition! Here is neither farmer nor manufacturer at fault, the scene is changed, and the responsibility too—we must ascribe it entirely to the gentler sex, and among them not a little to our own intimacies and connexions. And here it is just to state, that if I can recite many examples of unprincipled and griping tyranny, I can quote many also of generous and parental care, and of willing and profuse expenditure for the benefit of the people. If there are prominent instances of bad, there are also prominent instances of good men. I will suppose for the sake of argument, that all are the victims, rather than the causes of the system; but whatever the cause, the condition inflicts a great amount of physical and moral suffering. I know I am arousing a fierce spirit of reply; be it so—"Strike me, but hear me." I shall altogether leave to others that part of the question which belong to trade and commerce. I am neither unwilling, nor perhaps, unable, to handle it; but I desire to keep myself within the bounds that I have always hitherto observed in the discussion of this matter, and touch only the consideration of the moral and physical effects, produced by the system, on the great body of the work-people. (I am spared too the necessity of arguing the propriety or impropriety of interfering to regulate the hours of labour for persons under certain ages; the principle has long been conceded, and acted on by Parliament) our controversy can relate only to the degree in which it shall be carried out. I have never omitted an opportunity of asserting the claim I ventured to put forward nearly eleven years ago; and I return, therefore, this evening, to my original proposition. Sir, I assume as one ground of the argument, that, apart from considerations of humanity, which, nevertheless, should be paramount, the State has an interest and a right to watch over, and provide for the moral and physical well-being of her people; the principle is beyond question; it is recognised and enforced under every form of civilised Government. See what is done by the powers of Europe. Now, what has been determined by Russia in this matter? In a dispatch addressed some time ago by, I think, Count Nesselrode, to the then Secretary of State for Foreign affairs of this country—the noble Lord, the Member for Tiverton (Lord Palmerston), this subject is alluded to, and it is stated that, "the emperor admits the necessity of supervision—considering," says the memorandum by the Minister of Finance, "that the number of children occupied in spinning mills is likely to increase every year, the Imperial government deemed it indispensable to take such preparatory measures as will lead to legislative enactments hereafter." Then follow many regulations respecting the moral and physical treatment of the children. In Austria, "the hours of labour are cruelly long, often fifteen, not unfrequently seventeen hours a-day. The question of shortening the labour of children is under discussion." In Switzerland, the regulations are very strict: "In the canton of Argovia, no children are allowed to work, under fourteen years, more than twelve hours and-a-half; and education is compulsory on the mill-owners." In the canton of Zurich, "the hours of labour are limited to twelve; and children under ten years of age are not allowed to be employed. The clergy are the inspectors, and the system of inspection is very rigorous." In France a bill has been framed almost on the same principles as our own, with the same restrictions. The system is, however, but imperfectly carried out, on account of defective machinery, but the principle is recognised; there are 1,200 unpaid inspectors. In Prussia, by the law of 1839, no child who has not completed his or her sixteenth year, is to be employed more than ten hours a-day; none under nine years of age to be employed at

vs. luxury fare

all. Now, if foreign powers consider it a matter both of duty and policy thus to interpose on behalf of their people, we, surely, should much more be animated by feelings such as theirs, when we take into our account the vast and progressively increasing numbers who are employed in these departments of industry. (See how it stands: in 1818, the total number of all ages, and both sexes, employed in all the cotton factories, was 57,323. In 1835, the number employed in the five departments—cotton, woollen, worsted, flax, and silk, was 354,684. In 1839, the number in the same five departments was 419,590: the total number of both sexes under eighteen years of age, in the same year, was 192,887.) Simultaneously, however, with the increase of numbers has been the increase of toil. The labour performed by those engaged in the processes of manufacture, is three times as great as in the beginning of such operations. Machinery has executed, no doubt, the work that would demand the sinews of millions of men; but it has also prodigiously multiplied the labour of those who are governed by its fearful movements. I hope the House will allow me to go through several details connected with this portion of the subject; they are technical, it is true; but, nevertheless, of sufficient importance to be brought under your attention. In 1815, the labour of following a pair of mules spinning cotton yarn of Nos. 40, reckoning twelve hours to the working day, involved a necessity for walking eight miles; that is to say, the piecer, who was employed in going from one thread to another in a day of twelve hours, performed a journey of eight miles. In 1839, the distance travelled in following a pair of mules spinning cotton yarn of the same numbers was twenty miles, and frequently more. But the amount of labour performed by those following the mules, is not confined merely to the distance walked. There is far more to be done. In 1835, the spinner put up daily on each of these mules 820 stretches; making a total of 1,640 stretches in the course of the day. In 1832, the spinner put upon each mule 2,200 stretches, making a total of 4,400. In 1844, according to a return furnished by a practised operative spinner, the person working puts up in the same period 2,400 stretches on each mule, making a total of 4,800 stretches in the course of the day; and in some cases, the amount of labour required is even still greater. The House will now, probably, like to know how I have arrived at these conclusions. (The calculations on which they are founded, have been made by one of the most experienced mathematicians in England. At my request he went down to Manchester, and himself made the measurements and calculations upon the spot.) The measurements, I should state, were made in five different mills, spinning, respectively, yarns of the following numbers:—14, 15, 30, 38, and 40. In the mill spinning, No. 14 yarns, the least distance possible to be travelled over was seventeen miles per day; the greatest, possible, twenty-seven miles. In that spinning No. 15 yarns, the least distance was nineteen—the greatest twenty-nine miles. In that spinning 30, the least distance was twenty-four—the greatest thirty-seven miles. In that spinning 38, the least distance was fifteen—the greatest twenty-three miles; but this was a machine of an old construction. In that spinning 40, the least distance was seventeen—the greatest twenty-five miles. Now, the mules which are to be followed, advance and recede—as they advance the yarn is elongated;—and, by bearing this in mind, hon. Gentlemen may see how the calculations were made. The yarn is stretched in elongated threads, and the calculations were made thus:—In the first case, the least, the assumption is, that only one thread would be broken in each movement of the mule. In the second case, that which shows the greatest amount of labour, the calculation is made upon the assumption of four threads being broken. Now, it is almost impossible that only one thread shall be broken; and, on the other hand, it is very improbable that four threads should be in the same condition. We may, therefore, discard these extreme suppositions, and take the average of supposing two threads to be broken. (On this assumption, then, the following will be the distances travelled:—In a mill spinning No. 14 yarns, twenty-two miles; No. 15 yarns, twenty-four miles; No. 30 yarns, thirty miles; No. 38 yarns, nineteen miles (old machine); and No. 40 yarns, twenty-one miles.) While these calculations were in progress, the machinery was not driven at its full speed; it might have been impelled at one-third, at least, of greater velocity. But this is not all—there is another portion of the labour which is very oppressive, particularly to young persons—and to show its character, I will read a note made by the measurer upon the spot.

"I may also suggest that in estimating the fatigues of a day's work, due consideration should be given to the necessity of turning the body round to a reverse direction not less than from four to five thousand times in a day, besides the strain of continually having to lean over the machine and return to an erect position."

The House will be aware of the great strain requisite, after leaning over the machinery, in bringing the body back to an upright position—it often happens, indeed, that the body is bent forward in the form of a right angle. Now, in the fine mills, spinning for instance No. 100 yarns, the distance travelled will be far less. It will only be fourteen miles; but then the House must bear in mind that though the distance is less, the labour is equal, and in some respects greater. The exertion of leaning over the machinery is in these cases much increased, by reason of the more frequent breakages, and consequent toil in repairing them. Some of the measurements to which I have alluded were made in the mill of a gentleman named M'Connell, to whom I must express my obligation for the kindness with which he offered every facility to the gentleman who went down to the manufacturing districts for the purpose. Mr. M'Connell stood by the measurer, and made calculations simultaneously with him. At the close of the work, they compared notes; and it was found that Mr. M'Connell's measurements gave a less distance than those of the mathematician. But when they came to inquire into the reason of this difference, it was found that Mr. M'Connell had left out of his calculation all the diagonal movements. He had calculated only the straight movements, without reckoning the immense number of paces which the piecer has to make on either side. Now, these calculations are substantiated by those of several practical men. The hon. Member for Oldham has himself measured in his own mill the distances travelled by the piecers; and the results of his observations he published in a pamphlet in 1836. The distance laid down by the hon. Member, is twenty miles. But I have still another authority. I submitted the case to the operative spinners of Manchester; and I have a document here, signed by twenty-two of these men, in which they state that twenty miles is the very least distance travelled, and they believe it to be still greater. I have another document sent to me in 1842, by another set of operative spinners, confirming what I have said, and stating that the labour is progressively increasing—increasing not only because the distance to be travelled is greater, but because the quantity of goods produced is multiplied, while the hands are, in proportion, fewer than before; and moreover, because an inferior species of cotton is now often spun, which it is more difficult to work. Well, now, I know that the measurements which I have stated to the House, have been disputed by a mill-owner of great respectability—by Mr. Gregg, a very well-known gentleman, with large capital, who carries on one of the most extensive concerns of this kind in Europe. This gentleman published his contradiction to the statement which I have made, in which he estimated the distance at eight miles; and I submitted it to the same mathematician who made the original calculation. The moment he looked at it, he said, "It is altogether inaccurate; Mr. Gregg cannot know anything of the matter;" and after speaking of the details, he thus sums up the question:—"Referring the matter to scientific considerations, Mr. Gregg's table must either be the result of some strange and most grievous blunderings, or of a gross perversion of observed facts, which though extremely rude and ill-chosen for the object professedly in view, could not, by any possibility, carry a fair and judicious inquiry so very far away from the truth, as to give only about one-third of the real distance." Now this is the toil imposed upon a very large portion of the population of the manufacturing districts—this is the labour imposed in the spinning-room. In the carding-room there has also been a great increase of labour—one person there does the work formerly divided between two. In the weaving-room, where a vast number of persons are employed, and principally females; an operative, writing to me, states that the labour has increased, within the last few years, fully 10 per cent., owing to the increased speed of the machinery in spinning. In 1838, the number of hanks spun per week was 18,000; in 1843, it amounted to 21,000. In 1819, the number of picks in power-loom weaving per minute was sixty—in 1842 it was 140, showing a vast increase of labour, because more nicety and attention are required to the work in hand. Now, Sir, it is no difficult transition from such a statement of daily toil, passed as it is, in crowded rooms, heated atmospheres, noxious gases, and injurious agencies of various kinds, to the following statement of physical mischiefs to the workers employed. Since 1816, eighty surgeons and physicians, and three medical commissioners in 1833 (one of whom, Doctor Bisset Hawkins, declared that he had the authority of a large majority of the medical men of Lancashire) have asserted the prodigious evil of the system. The Government Commissioners themselves furnish a summary of particulars:—

“The excessive fatigue, privation of sleep, pain in various parts of the body, and swelling of the feet, experienced by the young workers, coupled with the constant standing, the peculiar attitudes of the body, and the peculiar motion of the limbs required in the labour of the factory, together with the elevated temperature, and the impure atmosphere in which the labour is often carried on, do sometimes ultimately terminate in the production of serious, permanent, and incurable diseases.”

Doctor Loudon states—

“I think it has been already proved that children have been worked a most unreasonable and cruel length of time daily, and that even adults have been expected to do a certain quantity of labour, which scarcely any human being is able to endure. (As a physician, I would prefer the limitation of ten hours for all persons who earn their bread by their industry.”)

Doctor Hawkins says—

“I am compelled to declare my deliberate opinion, that no child should be employed in factory-labour below the age of ten, that no individual under the age of eighteen should be employed in it longer than ten hours daily.”

When I was myself in the manufacturing districts, in the year 1841, I went over many of the hospitals, and consulted many of the medical men in that part of the country. The result is contained in a note which I drew up at the time, and which is as follows:—Scrofulous cases apparently universal; the wards were filled with scrofulous knees, hips, ancles, &c. The medical gentleman informed me that they were nearly invariably factory cases.

He attributed the presence of scrofula to factory employment under all its circumstances of great heat, low diet, bad ventilation, protracted toil, &c. Now the same evils are found to exist in other parts of the world where the same system is followed. A very admirable work was published a few years ago, by a French physician, Dr. Villermé, employed by the Academie des Sciences, to examine and report upon the condition of artisans. He states when speaking of factories in France, that

“In the operations of the cotton business, cough, pulmonary inflammation, and the terrible phthisis, attack and carry off many of the work-people; but numerous as are the victims of these disorders, their premature death seems to me less deplorable than the development of scrofula in the mass of our work-people in manufactories.”

Mark that: he considers death a less evil than the terrible prevalence of scrofulous disorder. Another effect produced by the system is an injurious affection of the eye-sight. Any person conversant with the cotton business knows how early in life the eye is apt to become so enfeebled as scarcely to be of any effective service. There is one more fact to which I wish to call the attention of the House. Those honourable Gentlemen who have been in the habit of perusing the melancholy details of mill accidents, should know that a large proportion of those accidents—particularly those which may be denominated the minor class, such as loss of fingers, and the like, occur in the last hours of the evening, when the people become so tired that they absolutely get reckless of the danger. I state this on the authority of several practical spinners. Hence arise many serious evils to the working classes; none greater than the early prostration of their strength, their premature superannuation, and utter incapacity to sustain their families by the labour of their hands. I will prove my assertions by the following table, from which you will observe that at the very period of life at which in many other departments of industry, men are regarded as in the prime of their strength, those employed in the cotton manufacture are superannuated and set aside, as incapable of earning their livelihood by factory labour. The ages above forty are seldom found in this employment. Now during the great turn out in 1831, from forty-two mills in Moseley

Ashton, and in other parts of Lancashire, out of 1,665 persons who joined in that turn-out, there were between forty-five and fifty years of age, only fifty-one. In 1832, it appeared by certain returns from mills in Harpur and Lanark, that out of 1,600 persons, there were above the age of forty five, only ten individuals. In 1839, the returns from certain mills in Stockport and Manchester, showed that the number of hands employed in these mills were 22,094—Now of all that immense multitude, how many does the House suppose were above forty-five years of age? Why, only 143 persons; and of these, sixteen were retained by special favour, and one was doing boy's work. I have in my hand also, a list of 131 spinners made out in 1841, only seven of whom were above forty-five years of age, and almost all of these people had been refused employment. Why? Because it was declared that they were too aged for labour! I have other authority, too, to prove the state of matters in this respect. I hold in my hand a letter from a person who went down to Bolton to make returns for me, in which he states—

"I have just seen fifty reduced spinners, two are more than fifty years of age, the rest will not average forty years of age. One man, T.E., worked for sixteen years at Mr. O.'s mill; he is forty-three years of age; he has frequently applied for work, but is invariably answered, he is too old."

The same evil exists in France, and other countries where the manufacturing system prevails. Dr. Villermé says:—

"There are few cities in which one meets with old people employed in manufactories, it is found to be more economical to pay younger workmen, though at a higher rate."

In the year 1833, a letter was addressed to me by Mr. Ashworth, a very considerable mill-owner in Lancashire, which contains the following curious passage:—

"You will next very naturally inquire about the old men, who are said to die, or become unfit for work, when they attain forty years of age, or soon after."

Mark the phrase, "old man," at forty years of age!

"As all spinners (he continues) whether young or old, are paid the same price per pound for spinning, the production of an old man is at greater expense by reason of the diminished quantity; this, and not ill health, may sometimes occasion his discharge." * *
"Old men of every description adhere to habits contracted in early life; hence they are troublesome to manage, and often disagree with the overlookers—this may sometimes lead to their discharge, but it appears not unfrequently that they become disinclined to work, when the earnings of their families are sufficient to maintain them."

Indeed! why, there cannot, I think, be a more alarming feature in the case than the last mentioned fact—that men of perhaps forty should be maintained in idleness by the labour of their families. [Loud cries of "hear, hear," from both sides of the House.] But I have the additional testimony of a Government Commissioner, Mr. M'Intosh, who in his report in 1833, says—

"Although prepared by seeing childhood occupied in such a manner, it is very difficult to believe the ages of men advanced in years, as given by themselves, so complete is their premature old age."

Now, Sir, I am the more inclined to rest my case with confidence on these Commissioners, because they were sent expressly to collect evidence against that taken by the Committee of 1832; and it is upon their reports, in considerable measure, that I will ground my appeal to this House. Now, let this condition of things be contrasted with the condition of agricultural life; and let us see how much longer is the duration of the working powers in that class of labour. In June, 1841, on an estate in Worcestershire, out of forty-two agricultural labourers, there were over forty-five years of age, twenty. Out of twenty-five on one in Lincolnshire, eleven exceeded forty years of age. At a place in Wales, out of thirty three labourers, twelve exceeded the age of forty, and seven were above sixty. (At another estate in Lincolnshire, out of sixty-two labourers, thirty-two exceeded forty years of age.) At one in Scotland, out of sixty labourers, twenty-seven were over forty years of age. Again, in England, out of thirty-nine labourers, twenty-nine exceeded forty years of age. On an estate in the Isle of Wight, out of eighteen labourers, there were found ten exceeding forty years of age. On another, out of seventeen seven were above forty years of age. On another farm, out of fifteen labourers, six were over forty years of age; and on an aggregate of farms in the neighbourhood, there were thirty labourers every one of them exceeding forty years of age! (So that the total shows, that of 341 labourers, 180 were above forty years of age.) Contrast the condition of these people with that of a multitude of 22,000, of whom only 143 were above the age of forty-five. There is yet another instance. On an estate in Dorset, in 1844, out of 427 labourers, 118 are above forty-five years of age. And these men may go on much longer; for I can appeal to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, whether they have not known agricultural labourers, at the ages of fifty, sixty, and seventy years, still capable of working, and of earning wages. You will, naturally enough, inquire what becomes of many of these worn out and superannuated spinners and factory hands. A few may retire to other businesses; those who have by nature, a more vigorous mental and physical constitution, may, in some instances, survive; but a large proportion sink into a state of pauperism and decrepitude. I hold in my hand a statement which will give the House some idea of the condition into which a vast mass of these people fall when it becomes impossible for them to earn their subsistence by factory labour. (It will be borne in mind that the present system has prevailed so long, and is of such a nature as completely to have destroyed every idea of thrift and economy.) The education both of males and females is such that domestic economy is almost wholly unknown to them; and it very rarely happens that they have the foresight to accumulate savings during the period at which they can work to subsist upon in the days of their old age. It will also be remembered that their strength is so wholly exhausted that they are unable to enter into any different active occupation when discharged from the mill; and that thereafter they sink down into employments, of the nature of which I will give a specimen to the House. In June, 1841, from a return which was presented to me, it appeared that in 11 auction rooms in Manchester, out of 11 common jobbers, as they are called, 9 were discharged factory hands. Of 37 hawkers of nuts and oranges, 32 were factory hands; of 9 sellers of sand, 8 were factory hands; of 28 hawkers of boiled sheeps' feet, 22 belonged to the same class; of 14 hawkers of brushes, 11 were factory hands; of 25 sellers of coal, 16 were factory hands—thus out of 113 persons pursuing these miserable occupations, 69 were discharged factory hands. I may add that upon a further examination being made, it was found that of 341 discharged factory hands, 217 were maintained entirely by the earnings of their children. In Bolton many discharged spinners were employed in sweeping the streets, and of 60 sellers of salt, and gatherers of rags, 50 were factory hands. In 1842 an inquiry was made in Manchester, and it was found that of 245 cast-off spinners, there were maintained by the earnings of their children 108. The rest were following such occupations as I have already alluded to, or engaged in begging, picking up dung, and other miserable avocations. With reference to these men I asked the question, how many may expect to be taken up on a revival of trade? The answer was, scarcely one; that the masters required young hands and unexhausted strength, and that they would rather take men of twenty-five than of thirty-five years of age—and Dr. Bisset Hawkins, one of the Commissioners in 1833, gives similar testimony, that

“The degree in which parents are supported by their youthful offspring at Manchester, is a peculiar feature of the place, and an unpleasant one; the ordinary state of things in this respect is nearly reversed.”

Sir, neither the existence, nor the consequences, of these destructive causes, have escaped the attention of continental writers and legislators. Their testimonies and their laws strongly confirm the opinions and statements of those, who, in this country, have so long urged, upon the public consideration, the perilous necessity of withstanding the further progress of such pernicious agencies. By the system we permit, the laws of nature are absolutely outraged, but not with impunity. The slow but certain penalty is exacted in the physical degradation of the human race, including, as it does, the ruin of the body, and the still more fatal corruption of the moral part. In the year 1840, a Commission was issued in France. A Report was made to the French Chamber of Peers, by M. Dupin, the Baron Charles Dupin, and to that eminent person I am indebted for the copy of the Report from which are taken the extracts to which I am about to refer. I hope the House will attend to the facts adduced by this Gentleman.

“We were desirous,” says the reporter, “of ascertaining the amount of difference in force and physical power, between the parties which have respectively attained the age of manhood in the parts of France most devoted to agriculture, and those where manufacturing industry is more generally diffused. The councils of revision in the recruiting department exhibited the following facts:—For 10,000 young men capable of military service, there were rejected as infirm, or otherwise unfit in body, 4,029 in the departments mostly agricultural; for 10,000 in the departments mostly manufacturing, there were rejected 9,930."

The reporter then proceeds to speak in detail.

"There were found," he says, "for 10,000 capable of military service, in Marne, 10,309 incapable; in the Lower Seine, 11,990 incapable; in L'Eure, 14,450 incapable."

Now what is the comment of the reporter on this? I will take the liberty of reading it to the House, because of the solemn warning it conveys to all governments and nations.

"These deformities," he proceeds, "cannot allow the Legislature to remain indifferent; they attest the deep and painful mischiefs—they reveal the intolerable nature of individual suffering; they enfeeble the country in respect to its capacity for military operations, and impoverish it in regard to the works of peace. We should blush for agriculture, if, in her operations, she brought, at the age adapted to labour, so small a proportion of oxen or horses in a fit state for toil with so large a number of infirm and misshapen."

Now, this is a return which I have once before quoted; but I quote it again, because it is so singularly adapted to our present position. We have no means of applying to our population the same test as that in France, because we have not the same courts for examination into the ability of people to carry arms; but if such Tribunals existed, I fear that they would set forth results far more distressing. If, for the comparatively short time that manufactures have been established in France, such terrible results are exhibited, what must be the case in England, where they have prevailed for considerably more than half a century? Just see what Dr. Villermé says. Dr. Villermé, having enlarged on the pernicious effects of factory labour, adds:—

"In examining men from twenty to twenty-one years of age, I found them physically unfit for the military service in proportion as they came from the working classes of the factory (classe ouvrière de la fabrique) at Amiens. 100 fit men required 193 conscripts from the middle class; 100 fit men required 343 conscripts from the working class."

Is this all? By no means—we have, if possible, yet stronger testimony from Prussia. The Sovereign of that country thought fit to enforce a law of protection, for all under sixteen years of age, against more than ten hours' labour in the course of the day. What was the reason assigned?—here is the document!

From the Official Gazette of Laws, 9th March, 1839.

"His Majesty was pleased to direct the attention of his Ministers to a Report from Lieutenant George Von Horn, that the manufacturing districts would not fully supply their contingents for the recruiting of the army, that the physical development of persons of tender years was checked, and that there was reason to believe, that in the manufacturing districts, the future generations would grow up weaker and more crippled than the existing one was stated to be—employed from eleven to fourteen hours daily, in excessive labour, frightfully disproportioned to the powers of persons from eight to eighteen years of age."

Then followed an inquiry very similar to our own, which fully confirmed every statement; and the document proceeds—

"The preceding facts show that urgent necessity for legislative interference, felt by the King, to put a stop to such premature, unnatural, and injurious employment of the young operatives in factories."

I need not detain the House by an endeavour to show, that similar or worse mischiefs must have arisen in our own country—I speak of those districts only where the manufacturing system has long and extensively prevailed; I know that the agricultural parts and hilly regions of Yorkshire and Lancashire still send forth a noble race of human beings. But let me here impress upon the House the necessity of deeply considering these important statements. The tendency of the various improvements in machinery is to supersede the employment of adult males, and substitute in its place, the labour of children and females. What will be the effect on future generations, if their tender frames be subjected, without limitation or control, to such destructive agencies? Consider this; in 1835, the numbers stood thus; the females in the five departments of industry, 196,383; in 1839, females, 242,296; of these, the females under eighteen, 112,192. The proportions in each department stood, females in cotton, 56½ per cent.; ditto worsted, 69½ ditto; ditto silk, 70½ ditto; ditto flax, 70½ ditto. Thus while the total amount of both sexes and all ages, in the cotton manufacture, in 1818, were equal only to 57,323, the females alone in that branch, in 1839, were 146,331. Now the following is an extract of a letter from a great mill-owner in 1842 :—

"The village of ——— two miles distant, sends down daily to the mills in this town, at least a thousand females, single and married, who have to keep strictly the present long hours of labour. Seven years ago, these persons were employed at their own homes; but now, instead of the men working at the power-looms, none but girls or women are allowed to have it."

But, Sir, look at the physical effect of this system on the women. See its influence on the delicate constitutions and tender forms of the female sex. Let it be recollected that the age at which the "prolonged labour," as it is called, commences, is at the age of thirteen. That age, according to the testimony of medical men, is the tenderest period of female life. Observe the appalling progress of female labour; and remember that the necessity for particular protection to females against overwork is attested by the most eminent surgeons and physicians—Dr. Blundell, Sir Anthony Carlisle, Sir William Blizard, Dr. Elliotson, Sir George Tuthill, Sir Benjamin Brodie, John Henry Green, esq., of Saint Thomas's, Charles Aston Key, esq., George James Guthrie, esq., Mr. Travers, Sir Charles Bell, Dr. Hodgkin, John Morgan, esq., of Guy's Hospital, Samuel Smith, esq., surgeon of Leeds, Doctor Young of Bolton, John Malyn, esq., Peter Mark Roget, esq., some time physician to the Manchester Infirmary. Here are some specimens of their evidence :—

"Is it not especially necessary to give protection from excessive labour to females when approaching the age of puberty?—Quite important, if they are afterwards to become mothers, quite essential."

This is an universal opinion. Many anatomical reasons are assigned by surgeons of the manufacturing towns, that "the peculiar structure of the female form is not so well adapted to long-continued labour, and especially labour which is endured standing." Mr. Smith, of Leeds, declares :—

"This (the operation of the factory labour) occasionally produces the most lamentable effects in females, when they are expecting to become mothers."

On the anatomical difficulty of parturition, he states—

"It is often the painful duty of the accoucheur to destroy the life of the child. I have seen many instances of the kind, all of which, with one single exception, have been those of females who have worked long hours in factories." "There is a foundation in nature," (says Dr. Blundell), "for the customary division which assigns the more active labour to the male, and the sedentary to the female"—"among savages, the woman is often the drudge."

George James Guthrie, esq. :—

"Have you not been a medical officer in the armies of this country for a considerable length of time?—Yes. Would you sanction, for a continuance, soldiers being actually under arms for twelve hours a day for a succession of days?—Such a thing is never done nor thought of; a soldier is never kept under arms more than five or six hours, unless before the enemy. Is the female sex well fitted to sustain long exertion in a standing posture? It is not. Is it not more than ordinarily necessary to protect females against excessive labour, when approaching the age of puberty?—Certainly it is." "The ten hours," (he adds), "you propose to give to the children in factories, is the work you would not give to soldiers, even when soldiers are employed in public works; they would not then be worked more than twelve hours, granting them time for their meals; and for the work they would have additional pay."

Now, Sir, mark the fearful superseding of adult workers; "the tendency of improvements in machinery," say all the inspectors, "is more and more to substitute infant for adult labour." Dr. Villermé, in his Tableau d'état physique et moral des ouvriers, urges the same results that "children and women are employed instead of men." In one mill (1831) adults, 70; spindles to each, 104; piecers, 305. In the same mill (1841) adults, 26; spindles to each, 223; piecers, 123; being one-sixth, instead of one-fifth as before, of the hands employed. In Bolton (1835) thirty-nine mills set up 589,784 spindles; the same mills set up (1841) 740,000 spindles; pieces to these spindles—(1835) 2,443; ditto in 1841, 2,426; spinners to them in 1835, 797; ditto in 1841, 727. Observe, too, the process of double-decking and self-actors—In 1831, twenty-three mills employed 1267 spinners (Manchester); in 1839, the same twenty-three mills employed 677 spinners; thus throwing out 590 spinners, without any abatement of productive power. In 1829, in Manchester, spinners, 2,650; 1841, in Manchester, spinners, 1037; thrown out entirely, 1,613. In 1835, 2,171 spinners worked 1,229,204 spindles: in 1841, 1037 spinners worked 1,431,619 spindles. Observe, too, that the labour is greatly increased upon children in all mills alike. In 1829, in the mill of Mr. —; spinners 70; spindles worked, 43,680; piecers, 230. In 1841, in the same mill, spinners, 26; spindles, 43,796; piecers, 134. In 1829, in a mill, spinners, 53; spindles, 23,800; piecers, 125. In 1842, spinners, none; spindles same number; piecers, 84. In 1829, in thirty-five mills, spinners, 1,088; spindles, 496,942. In 1841, in same mills, spinners, 448; spindles, 556,375; self-actors, 473, wrought by children and young persons only. A working spinner makes this statement, and it is a fair sample of the whole: "My wheels are trebled; the piecers reduced to eight; thus, two do the work of three.

'Self-acting greatly augments labour by the increased velocity of the machine, and the greater number of spindles apportioned to each piecer.' Here, Sir, pause to consider the multitudes of females on whom this system must exercise its influence, and their great increase since 1835,

"Mr. Orrell's mill, (says the inspector, and I will quote this as an example), "at Heaton Norris, is by far the largest in Stockport. We are employing (says Robert M'Lure, the manager) altogether, in that mill and in connection with it (as carters, gas-men, and others) 1,264 hands at this time, of whom 846 are females. The whole number of looms is 1,300 all standing on one flat, attended by 651 females, and twenty-one males."

But there is a reason for this substitution; I will show, by an extract from a letter dated in March, 1842, the motives that actuate some minds:

"Mr. E., a manufacturer, (says the writer), informed me that he employs females exclusively at his power-loom; it is so universally; gives a decided preference to married females, especially those who have families at home dependent on them for support; they are attentive, docile, more so than unmarried females, and are compelled to use their utmost exertions to procure the necessaries of life."

Thus, Sir, are the virtues, the peculiar virtues, of the female character to be perverted to her injury—thus all that is most dutiful and tender in her nature is to be made the means of her bondage and suffering! But consider again, I entreat you, what a multitude of females it is on whom this system has its operation. Just survey the enormous increase since 1835. This is the further testimony of the Sub-inspector Baker, in his report of 1843. There are employed in his district more than in 1838, 6,040 persons; of these, 785 males; 5,225 females.

"The small amount of wages," says inspector Saunders, "paid to women, acts as a strong inducement to the mill-occupiers to employ them instead of men, and in power-loom shops this has been the case to a great extent."

Now hear how these poor creatures are worked. Mr. Baker reports, as to

"Having seen several females, who, he was sure, could only just have completed their eighteenth year, who had been obliged to work from six A. M. to ten P. M., with only one hour and a-half for meals."

In other cases, he shows, females are obliged to work all night, in a temperature of from 70 to 80 deg. Hence Mr. Saunders (1843) deduces the necessity of a law protecting all females, up to the age of twenty-one; adding, medical men invariably declare the urgent necessity of protecting from excessive labour all females up to that period of life.

"I found (says Mr. Horner, October 1843) many young women, just eighteen years of age, at work from half-past five in the morning until eight o'clock at night, with no cessation except a quarter of an hour for breakfast, and three quarters of an hour for dinner."

They may fairly be said to labour for fifteen hours and a-half out of twenty-four.

"There are (says Mr. Saunders) among them, females who have been employed for some weeks, with an interval only of a few days, from six o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock at night, less than two hours for meals, thus giving them for five nights in the week, six hours out of its twenty-four to go to and from their homes, and to obtain rest in bed." "A vast majority," says Mr. Saunders, in January, 1844, "of the persons employed at night, and for long hours during the day, are females; their labour is cheaper, and they are more easily induced to undergo severe bodily fatigue than men."

Where, Sir, under this condition, are the possibilities of domestic life? how can its obligations be fulfilled? Regard the woman as wife or mother, how can she accomplish any portion of her calling? And if she cannot do that which Providence has assigned her, what must be the effect on the whole surface of society? But to revert to the physical effects. Mr. Saunders says in the same report:—

"The surgeon distinctly condemns such employment; though the effect may not be immediately apparent, it must have a tendency to undermine the constitution, produces premature decay, and shortens the duration of human life. No female," he adds, "ought to work more than ten hours, and that twelve hours produces severe injury to those in a state of pregnancy."

He often witnesses the effect of so much standing when parturition comes on; adding:—

"Work in the night is the most injurious; it is unnatural, and not adapted to the constitution of women."

Another surgeon of great experience, in Lancashire, writes to me that—

"After thirteen is the age when young women begin to be most susceptible of injury from factory work, and much more at this period of their lives than at the earlier ages. He proceeds to detail: "the effects of long-continued labour in factories become more apparent after childbirth. The infants are at birth below the average size, have a stunted and shrivelled appearance. I would take a score of factory births, and the same of healthy parents, and distinguish between them. Children are much confined by factory mothers to the care of others—opium administered to the infants in various forms—the quantity of this pernicious drug thus consumed would almost stagger belief—many infants are so habituated to it, that they can scarcely exist when deprived of the stimulus—immense numbers fall victims to hydrocephalus—mothers' milk becomes deteriorated—infants fed upon substitutes in her absence—hence internal disorders, of which the usual remedy is gin. Miscarriages very frequent, and all the physical and surgical mischiefs of mistreated pregnancy—varicose veins produced by the continued evil practice—aggravated greatly in pregnant women. Again, troublesome ulcers of the legs, arising from varicose veins, which, in some cases, burst, and bring on a dangerous and sometimes fatal hæmorrhage. The practice of procuring abortion is very frequent even among married women."

I have, moreover, the personal testimony of several females to the truth of these statements—they speak of the intolerable pain in their breasts by such long absences from children, and the suffering of returning to work within ten days of confinement. Look again to the effects on domestic economy; out of thirteen married females taken at one mill, only one knew how to make her husband a shirt, and only four knew how to mend one. I have the evidence of several females, who declare their own ignorance of every domestic accomplishment—the unmarried declare, "not a single qualification of any sort for household servants." The married; "untidy, slovenly, dirty; cannot work, sew, take care of children, or the house; cannot manage expences; perpetual waste and extravagance." But hear the history of their daily life from their own lips:—

"M. H., aged twenty years, leaves a young child in care of another, a little older, for hours together; leaves home soon after five, and returns at eight; during the day the milk runs from her breasts, until her clothes have been as wet as a sop." "M. S. (single) leaves home at five, returns at nine; her mother states she knows nothing but mill and bed; can neither read, write, knit, nor sew." "H. W. has three children; leaves home at five on Monday; does not return till Saturday at seven; has then so much to do for her children, that she cannot go to bed before three o'clock on Sunday morning. Oftentimes completely drenched by the rain, and has to work all day in that condition. My breasts have given me the most shocking pain, and I have been dripping wet with milk."

I will conclude this part with an extract from a letter, dated February, 1840, by Dr. Johns, Superintendent Registrar of the Manchester district; an important document, when we consider that it was written to controvert some of my statements respecting the mortality of those districts:—

"Very young children (says Dr. Johns) are by the existing system, not sufficiently taken care of by their mothers; as regards themselves, during gestation, and their offspring, after childbirth—the women during pregnancy, continue as long as possible at their work; and sooner than they ought, they again attend the factories, leaving their infants to the care of ill-paid and unsuitable persons, to take the oversight of the children in their absence; nor ought we to omit that soothing drugs—the well-known nostrum—Godfrey's cordial, are often had recourse to, with a view to lull the troubles of the little unfortunates, and hence, perhaps, may be attributable to the improper use of narcotics, the frequent deaths from convulsions. It is most desirable that mothers should not be, if possible, abstracted from their attention to their helpless infants, certainly not during the period of lactation and teething."

So much, Sir, for their physical, and, if I may so speak, their financial condition; the picture of their moral state will not be more consolatory. And, first, their excessive intemperance: Mr. Robertson, a distinguished surgeon at Manchester, says, in a published essay:—

“I regard it as a misfortune for an operative to be obliged to labour for so long hours at an exhausting occupation, and often in an impure atmosphere. I consider this circumstance as one of the chief causes of the astounding inebriety of our population.”

I read in a private letter from Manchester, 1843:—

“Intemperance is making progress; on Sundays there is more drinking than there has been for many years; the people who sell ale, &c., state to me that they never sold more on Sunday, nor as much as they now do.”

Mr. Bradley, when boroughreeve of Manchester, stated, “that in one gin shop, during eight successive Saturday evenings, from seven till ten o’clock, he observed, on an average rate, 412 persons enter by the hour, of which the females were 60 per cent.” Many females state, that the labour induces “an intolerable thirst; they can drink, but not eat.” I do not doubt that several of the statements I have read, will create surprise in the minds of many hon. Members; but if they were to converse with operatives who are acquainted with the practical effects of the system, they would cease to wonder at the facts I have detailed. I might detain the House by enumerating the evils which result from the long working of males and females together in the same room. I could show the many and painful effects to which females are exposed, and the manner in which they lament and shrink from the inconveniences of their situation. I have letters from Stockport and Manchester, from various individuals, dwelling on the mischievous consequences which arise from the practice of modest women working so many hours together with men, and not being able to avail themselves of those opportunities which would suggest themselves to every one’s mind without particular mention. Many mills, I readily admit, are admirably regulated, but they are yet in a minority—were all of such a description as several that I have seen, they might not, perhaps, require any enactments. But, to return, Mr. Rayner, the medical officer of Stockport, says:—

“It has been the practice in mills, gradually to dispense with the labour of males, but particularly grown-up men, so that the burthen of maintaining the family has rested almost exclusively on the wife and children, while the men have had to stay at home, and look after household affairs, or ramble about the streets unemployed.”

But listen to another fact, and one deserving of serious attention; that the females not only perform the labour, but occupy the places of men; they are forming various clubs and associations, and gradually acquiring all those privileges which are held to be the proper portion of the male sex. These female clubs are thus described:—Fifty or sixty females, married and single, form themselves into clubs, ostensibly for protection; but, in fact, they meet together, to drink, sing, and smoke; they use, it is stated, the lowest, most brutal, and most disgusting language imaginable.” Here is a dialogue which occurred in one of these clubs, from an ear witness:—“A man came into one of these club-rooms, with a child in his arms; ‘Come lass,’ said he, addressing one of the women, ‘come home, for I cannot keep this bairn quiet, and the other I have left crying at home.’ ‘I won’t go home, idle devil,’ she replied, ‘I have thee to keep, and the bairns too, and if I can’t get a pint of ale quietly, it is tiresome. This is the only second pint that Bess and me have had between us; thou may sup if thou likes, and sit thee down, but I won’t go home yet’” Whence is it that this singular and unnatural change is taking place? Because that on women are imposed the duty and burthen of supporting their husbands and families, a perversion as it were of nature, which has the inevitable effect of introducing into families disorder, insubordination, and conflict. What is the ground on which the woman says she will pay no attention to her domestic duties, nor give the obedience which is owing to her husband? Because on her devolves the labour which ought to fall to his share, and she throws out the taunt, “If I have the labour, I will also have the amusement.” The same mischief is taking place between children and their parents; the insubordination of children is now one of the most frightful evils of the manufacturing districts. “Children and young persons take the same advantage of parents that women do of their husbands, frequently using harsh language, and, if corrected, will turn round and say, ‘—— you, we have you to keep.’ One poor woman stated that her husband had chided two of their daughters for going to a public-house; he made it worse, for they would not come home again, stating, 'they had their father to keep, and they would not be dictated to by him.' This conduct in the children is likewise grounded on the assertion that the parents have no right to interfere and control them, since, without their labour, the parents could not exist; and this is the bearing of children, many of whom are under thirteen or fourteen years of age! Observe carefully, too, the ferocity of character which is exhibited by a great mass of the female population of the manufacturing towns. Recollect the outbreak of 1842, and the share borne in that by the girls and women; and the still more frightful contingencies which may be in store for the future. "I met," says an informant of mine, "with a mother of factory workers, who told me that all the churches and chapels were useless places, and so was all the talk about education, since the young and old were unable to attend, either in consequence of the former being imprisoned in the mills so many hours, and being in want of rest the little time they were at home; and the latter being compelled to live out of the small earnings of their children, and cannot get clothing, so they never think of going to churches or chapels. She added, 'when you get up to London, tell them we'll turn out the next time (meaning the women), and let the soldiers fire upon us if they dare, and depend upon it there will be a break out, and a right one, if that House of Commons don't alter things, for they can alter if they will, by taking mothers and daughters out of the factories, and sending the men and big lads in.'" But further, what says Sir Charles Shaw, for some years the superintendent of the police of Manchester—what is his opinion of the condition of the females of that town, and the effects produced, by the system under which they live, on their conduct and character?—

"Women (says he) by being employed in a factory, lose the station ordained them by Providence, and become similar to the female followers of an army, wearing the garb of women, but actuated by the worst passions of men. The women are the leaders and excitors of the young men to violence in every riot and outbreak in the manufacturing districts, and the language they indulge in is of a horrid description. While they are themselves demoralised, they contaminate all that comes within their reach."

This will conclude the statement that I have to make to the House—and now, Sir, who will assert that these things should be permitted to exist? Who will hesitate to apply the axe to the root of the tree, or, at least, endeavour to lop off some of its deadliest branches? What arguments from general principles will they adduce against my proposition? What, drawn from peculiar circumstances? They cannot urge that particular causes in England give rise to particular results; the same cause prevails in various countries; and wherever it is found, it produces the same effects. I have already stated its operation in France, in Russia, in Switzerland, in Austria, and in Prussia; I may add also in America; for I perceive by the papers of the 1st of February, that a Bill has been proposed in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to place all persons under the age of sixteen, within the protection of the "ten hours" limit. I never thought that we should have learned justice from the City of Philadelphia. In October last I visited an immense establishment in Austria, which gives employment to several hundred hands; I went over the whole, and conversed with the managers, who detailed to me the same evils and the same fruits as those I have narrated to the House—prolonged labour of sixteen and seventeen hours, intense fatigue, enfeebled frame, frequent consumptive disorders, and early deaths—yet the locality had every advantage; well-built and airy houses in a fine open country, and a rural district; nevertheless, so injurious are the effects, that the manager added, stating at the same time, the testimony of many others who resided in districts where mills are more abundant, that, in ten years from the time at which he spoke, "there would hardly be a man in the whole of those neighbourhoods fit to carry a musket." Let me remind, too, the House, of the mighty change which has taken place among the opponents to this question. When I first brought it forward in 1833, I could scarcely number a dozen masters on my side, I now count them by hundreds. We have had, from the West Riding of Yorkshire, a petition signed by 300 millowners, praying for a limitation of labour to ten hours in the day. Some of the best names in Lancashire openly support me. I have letters from others who secretly wish me well, but hesitate to proclaim their adherence; and even among the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, I may boast of many firm and efficient friends. Sir, under all the aspects in which it can be viewed, this system of things must be abrogated or restrained—it affects the internal tranquillity of those vast provinces, and all relations between employer and employed—it forms a perpetual grievance and ever comes uppermost among their complaints in all times of difficulty and discontent. It disturbs the order of nature, and the rights of the labouring men, by ejecting the males from the workshop, and filling their places by females, who are thus withdrawn from all their domestic duties, and exposed to insufferable toil at half the wages that would be assigned to males, for the support of their families. It affects—nay, more, it absolutely annihilates, all the arrangements and provisions of domestic economy—thrift and management are altogether impossible; had they twice the amount of their present wages, they would be but slightly benefited—everything runs to waste; the house and children are deserted; the wife can do nothing for her husband and family; she can neither cook, wash, repair clothes, or take charge of the infants; all must be paid for out of her scanty earnings, and, after all, most imperfectly done. Dirt, discomfort, ignorance, recklessness, are the portion of such households; the wife has no time for learning in her youth, and none for practice in her riper age; the females are most unequal to the duties of the men in the factories; and all things go to rack and ruin, because the men can discharge at home no one of the especial duties that Providence has assigned to the females. Why need I detain the House by a specification of these injurious results? They will find them stated at painful length in the Second Report of the Children's Employment Commission. Consider it, too, under its physical aspect! Will the House turn a deaf ear to the complaints of suffering that resound from all quarters? Will it be indifferent to the physical consequences on the rising generation? You have the authority of the Government Commissioner, Dr. Hawkins, a gentleman well skilled in medical statistics—

“I have never been, (he tells you) in any town in Great Britain or in Europe, in which degeneracy of form and colour from the national standard has been so obvious as in Manchester.”

I have, moreover, the authority of one of the most ardent antagonists, himself a mighty millowner, that, if the present system of labour be persevered in, the “county of Lancaster will speedily become a province of pigmies.” The toil of the females has hitherto been considered the characteristic of savage life; but we, in the height of our refinement, impose on the wives and daughters of England a burthen from which, at least during pregnancy, they would be exempted even in slave-holding states, and among the Indians of America. But every consideration sinks to nothing compared with that which springs from the contemplation of the moral mischiefs this system engenders and sustains. You are poisoning the very sources of order and happiness and virtue; you are tearing up root and branch, all the relations of families to each other; you are annulling, as it were, the institution of domestic life, decreed by Providence himself, the wisest and kindest of earthly ordinances, the mainstay of social peace and virtue, and therein of national security. There is a time to be born, and a time to die—this we readily concede; but is there not also a time to live, to live to every conjugal and parental duty—this we seem as stiffly to deny; and yet in the very same breath we talk of the value of education, and the necessity of moral and religious training. Sir, it is all in vain, there is no national, no private system, that can supersede the influence of the parental precept and parental example—they are ordained to exercise an unlimited power over the years of childhood; and, amidst all their imperfections, are accompanied with a blessing Whose experience is so confined that it does not extend to a knowledge and an appreciation of the maternal influence over every grade and department of society? It matters not whether it be prince or peasant, all that is best, all that is lasting in the character of a man, he has learnt at his mother's knees. Search the records, examine the opening years of those who have been distinguished for ability and virtue, and you will ascribe, with but few exceptions, the early culture of their minds, and above all, the first discipline of the heart, to the intelligence and affection of the mother, or at least of some pious woman, who with the self-denial and tenderness of her sex, has entered as a substitute, on the sacred office. No, Sir, these sources of mischief must be dried up; every public consideration demands such an issue; the health of the females; the care of their families; their conjugal and parental duties; the comfort of their homes; the decency of their lives; the rights of their husbands; the peace of society; and the laws of God—and, until a vote shall have been given this night, which God avert, I never will believe that there can be found in this House one individual man who will deliberately and conscientiously inflict, on the women of England such a burthen of insufferable toil. Sir, it is very sad, though perhaps inevitable, that such weighty charges and suspicions should lie on the objects of those who call for, and who propose, this remedial measure. I am most unwilling to speak of myself: my personal character is, doubtless, of no consequence to the world at large; but it may be of consequence to those whose interests I represent; because distrust begets delays; and zeal grows cold, when held back in its career by the apprehension that those, whom it would support, are actuated by unworthy motives. Disclaimers, I know, are poor things when uttered by parties whom you listen to with suspicion or dislike; but consider it calmly; are you reasonable to impute to me a settled desire, a single purpose, to exalt the landed, and humiliate the commercial aristocracy? Most solemnly do I deny the accusation; if you think me wicked enough, do you think me fool enough, for such a hateful policy? Can any man in his senses now hesitate to believe that the permanent prosperity of the manufacturing body, in all its several aspects, physical, moral, and commercial, is essential, not only to the welfare, but absolutely to the existence of the British Empire? No, we fear not the increase of your political power, nor envy your stupendous riches; “peace be within your walls, and plenteousness within your palaces!” We ask but a slight relaxation of toil, a time to live, and a time to die; a time for those comforts that sweeten life, and a time for those duties that adorn it; and, therefore, with a fervent prayer to Almighty God that it may please him to turn the hearts of all who hear me to thoughts of justice and of mercy, I now finally commit the issue to the judgment and humanity of Parliament.

charge any duty in this House which I considered at the same time more painful and more imperative. The pain, I must admit, is considerably increased by the eloquence of the address which my noble Friend has just concluded, and especially of the passage which marked the close of his speech. The noble Lord has asked whether any man will be found in this House to resist the proposal which he has thought it his duty to make, and he has appealed to considerations of justice and mercy, intimating, if not directly, at least by implication, that resistance to his Motion is inconsistent both with justice and mercy. I, on the other hand, having due regard to those sacred principles which my noble Friend has invoked, am bound, on my own part, and on the part of the Government, to offer to the proposal of the noble Lord my decided opposition. It will be necessary for me to trespass shortly on the attention of the House, although I do not intend to follow the noble Lord through all the details which he addressed to the House. If I thought it necessary I do not possess the information which would be required for that purpose; but I think it incumbent, on principle, to resist the noble Lord's Motion, and it is my duty, thus early in the discussion, to state the grounds which have produced my decision on the question. The noble Lord said, the time is come when, in his opinion, it is necessary to lay the axe to the root of the tree. Before we do this let me entreat the Committee carefully to consider what is that tree which we are to lay prostrate. If it be, as I suppose, the tree of the commercial greatness of this country, I am satisfied that although some of its fruits may be bitter, yet upon the whole it has produced that greatness, that wealth, that prosperity, which make these small islands most remarkable in the history of the civilised world, which upon the whole, diffuse happiness amidst this great community, and render this nation one of the most civilised, if not the most civilised, and powerful on the face of the globe. My noble Friend begs us also not to turn a deaf ear to the cry of distress from the working classes. I entreat this House, indeed I need not urge it upon them, having seen the attention with which they listened to the remarks which my noble Friend made—I entreat the House carefully to weigh the subject now brought under discussion. There never was a greater subject, as it appears to me, considered in this House—the comfort, the happiness, the physical and moral condition, as my noble Friend has justly put it, of a large portion of the working classes, come under our notice this evening. Their wrongs are entitled to redress, if we can redress them; their feelings are entitled to indulgent consideration, even though we may be unable to redress their wrongs. I am aware their feelings are excited on this subject and I am satisfied that it is due to their feelings that this question, should be fully, dispassionately, and temperately considered. My noble Friend endeavoured studiously to steer clear of irritating topics not immediately connected with the subject of debate. Something like a cheer indeed, fell from the other side, on one occasion, when he glanced at the importation of foreign corn. Now may I beg the Committee for this one evening to exclude all such topics from their remembrance. I do not deny that the question may be in some degree connected with them, but there will be many other opportunities for debating these, and this subject is sufficiently important to be discussed by itself. I have said, on the one hand, that the physical and moral condition of a large class of the community is now brought under discussion, on the other hand justice compels me to say, the question of the commercial prosperity and manufacturing industry of this country is to-night materially involved in the question upon which we are deliberating. It was with some astonishment, therefore, that I heard my noble Friend declare, that he would discard all commercial views on this occasion, and treat the question as one purely of morals and of religious obligation. Nay, my noble Friend must excuse me for saying that when I listened to his eloquent appeal, and to his statement of facts as bearing on infantile and female labour, I will not say I thought there was exaggeration — but I could almost have believed that the necessary consequence of that appeal and of that statement of facts must have been to lead to the conclusion at which he arrived with respect to mines and collieries, namely, that females and infants should no longer be employed in factory labour. Now, allow me to beg of the Committee to consider. I have said the matter is most important; but still allow me to recall to the attention of the Committee how narrow comparatively is the question we are called upon to discuss. It is not whether females shall cease to be employed in factories, nor whether children shall cease to labour there — it is whether females shall be employed ten or twelve hours in factories, and whether the period of infantile labour shall be eight hours in each day, or something shorter. At present, children cannot be employed longer than eight hours a-day; the proposition of the Bill now under discussion is, that instead of work in the forenoon or afternoon of each day, they may be employed ten hours on alternate days only, the others being vacant, or every day for six hours and a half. It is not, as my noble Friend in the earlier part of his speech justly remarked, a question of principle that we are now called upon to discuss, it is one of degree. I think it clearly unnecessary on the present occasion to enter at length into the principle. It was certainly a violation of principle that the Legislature should interfere in a case of this kind at all; that, however, was decided by the Legislature in 1833; and my noble Friend will excuse me for recalling to his recollection, and that of the Committee, that a very large portion of the facts he detailed, with respect to early superannuation, the evidence of deformity arising from infantile labour, and many of the cases of extreme distress most calculated to harrow the feelings, were facts collected by the Commission of 1831 and the Inquiry of 1833; and it was the statement of these very facts which led to the correction of the evils, and to the violation of principle I spoke of by the enactment of the existing regulations, which impose checks on the employment of the labour both of children and young persons. Though I do not wish to dwell on these details, I must notice some of the statements my noble Friend has made. In the commencement of his speech he alluded, with something like despondency, to his past labour; and at its close he answered some imputations upon his motives, which had been most unjustly thrown upon them. Sir, I believe my noble Friend's motives to be pure and benevolent in the highest sense. I do not believe that any public man ever laboured more honestly, more earnestly, with more entire singleness of purpose. So far from his having occasion to look back on his past career with anything like despondency, I think it is very much due to him that various mitigations of the most important kind have been sanctioned by the Legislature with respect to infantile labour, and that he has conferred a lasting benefit on the poor and helpless. I said that the original enactment was a violation of principle, made under the peculiar circumstances attending that labour, and I was a party to its enactment. There were several points to be considered, first, the close and constant inspection to which this labour is subject; next, the publicity of the reports, and the check of public opinion which is brought to bear on all branches of the system; then the limitation of time, most important even as it now exists, that no children under the age of nine shall be employed at all; and that between nine and thirteen no child shall work longer than eight hours; and that no young person between thirteen and eighteen shall work for a longer period, as it now stands, than fifteen hours daily, including one hour for dinner and two hours' cessation of labour, leaving twelve for the actual work. What is the general tenor of the measure which I propose, as it relates to children? A mitigation of time from eight to six and a half hours, a limitation of margin from fifteen hours to fourteen, still leaving twelve hours for work. My noble Friend has dwelt very much upon the improvements which have taken place in machinery, and the consequent increase of labour to the parties so employed. Allow me just to remark, in passing, that although the intention of the Factory Act was humane, and its operation has been partially such, yet I have no doubt whatever its practical effect has been to stimulate in the highest degree the improvement of machinery with a view to the displacement of manual labour. He described with great accuracy of detail, and in the most graphic manner, the working of the machinery—the self-acting mules, the double-decked system, and the distance to be travelled by each person, which he estimated at thirty-seven miles in twelve hours. My noble Friend behind me says, that is quite impossible; that was exactly the observation I was about to make. I do not think it possible that they could walk or run over anything like that space in the time mentioned, even if they chose their own ground. The hon. Member for Oldham, in one of his publications, arrived at the conclusion that the distance was nearly one-half less than my noble Friend makes it by his computation. My noble Friend made, in that part of his speech, a most important admission, which I call on the Committee carefully to bear in view. I have stated to the Committee that I am satisfied the reduction of hours in the Factory Bill, as it now stands, has had the effect of improving machines. I also think it had the effect of accelerating machines. Now, my noble Friend made a most important admission when he stated that even the present machinery, without further improvement, was only put at two-thirds of the velocity of which it was capable; in other words, that the speed might be increased by one-third. Mark, then, it is as clear as possible, if you reduce the hours of labour by one-eleventh or one-sixth, the machinery will be accelerated to counteract the reduction of the hours of work, and in point of fact the labour will be more intense and severe. My noble Friend refers to early superannuation. Now, in the first place, I decidedly admit, that there was an excess of infantine and female labour injurious to health, and until the Act of 1833 passed there was no legislative restriction. But there are now stringent regulations, and I am not disposed to call upon the House of Commons to increase them, because I believe they are quite sufficient. Just in proportion as by improvement in machinery you increase the speed of that machinery, so you do make a call for increased strength on the part of those you employ, even to the displacement of the labour of aged persons, younger and more active persons being required to perform the duties. Then if your legislation be such that you again increase the speed of your machinery—if you offer a premium, as it were, for the improvement of machinery, my belief is, that you will still further displace those not now considered superannuated, and thus you will augment the evils you desire to cure. My noble Friend drew a comparison between agricultural and manufacturing labourers, and he did not, I am sure, draw that comparison invidiously. I must, however, express some doubt as to the physical fact stated by my noble Friend. I believe, when you take into consideration the exposure to the inclemency of the weather, and other disadvantageous circumstances which fall upon the agricultural labourer, that it may very fairly be doubted, whether on account of the vicissitudes he encounters, the chances are not, upon the whole, against the agricultural labourer, on the score of health, as compared with the manufacturer. But the House will consider whether it be of any practical advantage to discuss that point now. We have arrived at a state of society when without commerce and manufactures this great community cannot be maintained. Let us, as far as we can, mitigate the evils arising out of this highly artificial state of society; but let us take care to adopt no step that may be fatal to commerce and manufactures. The noble Lord complains of want of thrift among the manufacturing operatives. I have received two deputations, one from the master manufacturers and the other from the operatives themselves; and with regard to the first, I am sure that the Gentleman of whom I am about to speak will not be offended by the allusion. One of the Gentlemen composing that deputation is a master manufacturer, a magistrate, and, I believe, one of the greatest mill-owners in England. By thrift and economy that Gentleman, to his own great honour, and to the honour of the country he has benefitted by his industry, has risen to the high position he occupies in Manchester, from the rank, if I am not misinformed, of an humble operative. I also received a deputation from the workmen; and in regard to one of the persons who composed it, I must say that I was much struck with his remarkable intelligence, the clear and admirable manner in which he stated his case, the perfect propriety of his demeanour, and the dispassionate manner in which he argued every point that made against his position. I said to this person are you still an operative? He replied—No; I was lately; but by saving I have been able to take a share in a mill, and I am now a mill-owner to a limited extent. Still I am trusted by those who were my fellow labourers and I am here to represent them. So much for the result of manufacturing industry as testified in these two deputations. My noble Friend stated, that the feelings of many of the master-manufacturers was in favour of his proposal. I for one must say, that I am discharging a painful duty in resisting my noble Friend's proposition. If I consulted only my own feelings, I should support it, for all my sympathies and wishes, as well as those of the great majority are with the Motion. I speak in the strongest manner for myself on this point, and if I could bring myself to believe that my noble Friend's proposition is for the good of the country, and for the good of the manufacturers themselves, I should not have hesitated to support it. The master-manufacturers give an honourable and willing consent to the additional restraint this Bill imposes upon their useful exertions. They acquiesced generally, because they placed reliance on the assurance of the Government, that with reference to the question of twelve hours for all persons above thirteen years of age, the Government, after full, fair, and deliberate consideration of the case, were resolved to stand firm. I was aware that the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester would have taken up the question if they had doubted that the Government, in the discharge of their duty, would have resisted this proposition. I believe that there is not that unanimity upon the point, even among his workmen, which my noble Friend supposes. I am assured, upon high authority, that adult labourers, stimulated by the honest desire of earning as much as they are able, because wages are generally paid by piece-work—so far from going to those masters where time is limited, invariably prefer the establishments where most work is done. This day I received three deputations from the working classes; one of them was in favour of the proposition of my noble Friend, but another was decidedly opposed to it, declaring even that the seventh clause, relative to the working of children, was objected to by many as inconsistent with their interests. My noble Friend stated that he would not enter into the commercial part of the question; but if I can show that the inevitable result of the abridgement of time will be the diminution of wages to the employed, then I say, with reference to the interests of the working classes themselves, there never was a more doubtful question before Parliament than this. The House will remember that the branches of manufacture affected by this Bill are dependant upon machinery. Such is the rapidity with which improvements are made, that no machinery can last more than twelve or thirteen years without alterations; and master-manufacturers have been obliged to pull down machinery that was perfectly sound and good to make the necessary alterations which competition forces upon them. Well, then, it is necessary to replace machinery in the course of twelve or thirteen years. You are now discussing whether you shall abridge by one-sixth the period of time in which capital is to be replaced, all interest upon it paid, and the original outlay restored. Such an abridgement would render it impossible that capital with interest should be restored. Then in the close race of competition which our manufacturers are now running with foreign competitors, it must be considered what effect this reduction of one-sixth of the hours of labour would have upon them. The question in its bearing upon competition must be carefully considered; and I have been informed that in that respect such a step would be fatal to many of our manufacturers a feather would turn the scale: an extra pound weight would lose the race. But that would not be the first effect. The first effect would fall upon the operative. It is notorious that a great part of the power of the mill-owners, a power which alone justifies such legislation as this, arises from the redundant supply of labour. It follows that when a master is pressed upon by your legislation, he will compensate himself by forcing upon those in his employ a decrease of wages. I believe the large majority of intelligent operatives comprehend that proposition thoroughly. I have seen many, and conversed with them, and they have admitted that the proposal involves a necessary decrease of wages. In the report presented in 1841 by my excellent Friend Mr. Horner, who has discharged with the most honourable fidelity the duty of inspector of factories, there is information upon this point, and with the permission of the House I will read a passage—a single passage only—but one which goes to the root of the whole subject. Mr. Horner said :

“I have made an estimate of the loss a mill would sustain from working eleven hours a day only instead of twelve, and I find it would amount to 850*l.* per annum. If it were reduced to ten hours, it would be about 1,530*l.* per annum. Unless, therefore, the mill-owner can obtain a proportionately higher price for the commodity, he must reduce wages or abandon his trade. I have made some calculations as to the probable reduction of wages, and of the whole loss that would be thrown on the operatives. I make the amount in the case of eleven hours a day to be 13 per cent., and in the case of ten hours a day 25 per cent. at the present average rate of wages.”

Now, I believe this to be perfectly accurate. The question then arises, whether you shall create in the manufacturing districts one sudden general fall of wages to the amount of 25 per cent.? I believe that the adoption of the Motion of my noble Friend would produce that effect. Though I am most anxious to take every precaution with regard to infant labour—though I am as firmly resolved as my noble Friend to urge upon the House to put a limit upon female labour, still, upon the whole, I cannot recommend the House to adopt an enactment which limits the labour of young persons to a shorter period than twelve hours. My noble Friend has referred to foreign countries, but in these countries, if I am not mistaken, there is no limitation, direct or indirect, of adult labour. My noble Friend spoke in decisive terms upon the failure of health in the manufacturing districts, and offered most important considerations to the House bearing upon that part of the subject. But if I am not misinformed, it will be found when there is full work, even to some excess, on the part of adults—when there is full work and good wages, that health in the manufacturing districts is in a satisfactory condition. On the other hand, when there is short time—shorter time than is proposed by my noble Friend—short time caused by the failure of the demand for manufactured articles, and reduced to eight instead of ten hours as occurred about two years ago, then disease is rife in the manufacturing districts; then is the time when immoral habits are generated, and disease is their inevitable result. I believe the proposition of my noble Friend to be most humane in intention, but the Bill, as tendered by the Government, holding equal the balance between the employer and the employed does not meet with opposition from the manufacturers, and is not disapproved of by the workmen; and I believe, in its present shape, it will pass into a law without any great difficulty. The Motion of my noble Friend will invert all this, and should it be carried, the Bill will be violently resisted and will produce the most fatal consequences. I believe, moreover, so far from being advantageous to the working classes, my noble Friend's proposition would be ruinous to their interests, and fatal to our commercial prosperity, and though my feelings and wishes are with him, my sense of duty never more clearly pointed out the course I ought to take, in reluctantly, but firmly, resisting his proposition.

Mr. Milner Gibson had received, he said, many communications respecting the Bill before the House, and although there was not a complete recognition of the soundness of the principle that had been adopted in it, there yet was, so far as his knowledge extended, a willingness on the part of both the masters and operatives to take the measure which the Government had submitted to the House. When he said “take the measure,” he did not mean that every matter of minute detail was fully approved of; but still, in reference to the important alterations proposed, as the reduction of the hours of labour for children from eight to six hours and a half, and the limitation of the hours of labour of young persons and women of all ages to twelve, the proposition had, he was informed, been received cheerfully by the master manufacturers, although he must admit without a full recognition of the principle of interfering with labour, which seemed to be adopted by many hon. Members. With regard to the proposition of the noble Lord, he could not say it was within his knowledge approved of by either masters or operatives. He had made it his business to ascertain to the best of his ability the state of feeling among the labouring people themselves upon this proposition of short hours of labour, and he had been told by many of the most intelligent and thinking operatives—men calculated to have influence with their class, and they considered that it would be an interference with the only property they had to dispose of, namely, their labour, and they could not agree to the proposition, whatever might be the urgency and necessity of working hard to earn a living, that they should be prevented from working twelve hours in a factory, if they found it fit and advantageous so to do. It might be thought that by preventing young persons, and women of all ages, from working more than ten hours, the labour of male adults was not interfered with. But that was not so. To enact that no young persons or women of any age should work more than ten hours was, in point of fact, to enact that no factory engines should be kept in operation more than ten hours. It was not simply dealing with the labour of women and young persons, but it was an interference with the labour of adults, and an interference also with that fixed capital so eloquently dwelt upon by the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for the Home Department. What was the cure? They were diminishing in that manner the effective production of all the great staple articles of manufacture no less than 20 per cent. If they destroyed the profit of a manufacturer by cutting off two hours of labour, they, in effect, deprived the labourer of the means of earning his subsistence; so that, acting from the most benevolent motives, they might be inflicting the greatest of all possible evils upon the very class they sought to benefit. As the right hon. Baronet had alluded to the argument of not destroying the profits upon manufactures, he (Mr. Gibson) would read some remarks upon that point by Mr. Senior, a gentleman whose name would be of great weight with hon. Members. In 1836 or 1837,

Mr. Senior, with some other gentlemen, went into the manufacturing districts with the view of ascertaining the effect of factory legislation, and making observations upon the factory population. Mr. Senior wrote a letter dated the 28th March, 1837, to Mr. Poulett Thomson to the following effect:—

“Under the present law, no mill in which persons under eighteen years of age are employed (and, therefore, scarcely any mill at all), can be worked more than eleven and a half hours a-day, that is twelve hours for five days in a week, and nine on Saturday. The following analysis will show that in a mill so worked the whole net profit is derived from the last hour. I will suppose a manufacturer of 100,000*l.*—80,000*l.* in his mill and machinery, and 20,000*l.* in raw material and wages. The annual return of that mill, supposing the capital to be turned once a year, and gross profits to be 15 per cent., ought to be goods worth 115,000*l.* produced by the constant conversion and re-conversion of the 20,000*l.* circulating capital, from money into goods and from goods into money, in periods of rather more than two months. Of this 115,000*l.*, each of the 23 half hours of work produces 5-115ths, or 1-23rd. Of these 23-23rds (constituting the whole 115,000*l.*) 20, that is to say, 100,000*l.* out of the 115,000*l.*, simply replace the capital—1-23rd (or 5,000*l.* out of the 115,000*l.*) makes up for the deterioration of the mill and machinery. The remaining 2-23rds, the last two of the twenty-three half hours of every day, produce the net profit of 10 per cent. If, therefore, (prices remaining the same), the factory could be kept at work thirteen hours instead of eleven and a half, by an addition of about 2,600*l.* to the circulating capital, the net profit would be more than doubled. On the other hand, if the hours of working were reduced by one hour per day (prices remaining the same), net profit would be destroyed; if they were reduced by an hour and a half, even gross profit would be destroyed. The circulating capital would be replaced, but there would be no fund to compensate the progressive deterioration of the fixed capital.”

It was clear that this principle of Mr. Senior's was sound, and if hon. Gentlemen would consider it carefully they would find it indisputable. The House would consider whether they would not, as the right hon. Baronet had expressed it, be affecting the safety and stability of the great staple manufactures, under the impression that they were legislating humanely for the working classes, while, in point of fact, the result would be that by the depreciation of manufactures, the greatest possible injury would be inflicted upon the operatives. The noble Lord had made a statement which had caused some surprise relative to the number of miles a piecer would have to travel in a factory, and had put forward calculations made by an eminent mathematician. But the noble Lord's mathematician had theorized upon paper only, while he (Mr. Gibson) had a statement made from actual counting and measurement of the number of steps made by a piecer. The same calculation and measurement had been made by several persons without concert, and they had all arrived at nearly the same result, which, however, was very different to that which had been come to by the mathematician quoted by the noble Lord. It was found that on a full day's work of twelve hours, the average number of miles traversed was not thirty-seven, but eight. The following was the passage :

"We caused, therefore, the number of steps made by the piecers to be counted, in a variety of mills, spinning every variety of yarn, from the coarsest to the finest numbers. As the experiment was tried by different people in Hyde, Stayleybridge, Manchester, Lancaster, Bolton, and other places, without any communication with each other, the general uniformity of result may be considered as a proof of accuracy."

With regard to the old persons, the same gentleman who had been alluded to by the right hon. Baronet had assured him (Mr. Milner Gibson) that he had on his own mill persons who had been in his employ for forty years ; and that some of the oldest persons he knew of in the neighbourhood had been factory operatives. The noble Lord would, he hoped, consider whether shortness of life might not be attributable to other causes than factory labour, and whether other influences connected with all large towns had not their share in producing the effect. In Manchester, and other large manufacturing towns, it would be found that the evil was attributable to other causes than factory labour, and that, in fact, the operatives themselves were the healthiest portion of the population of those towns. Habits of dissipation and other causes were to be considered, and he thought that the noble Lord had overrated the influence of factory labour in producing disease and shortness of life. He should be sorry to give expression to any heat on this matter, but he must complain of the noble Lord in one respect. While the noble Lord was depicting all the sufferings and evils endured by the unprotected poor in the factory districts—while he dwelt upon the total absence of all domestic comforts to the men, from the necessity of their wives labouring at unreasonable hours—and while he spoke of mothers dosing their children with opium, that they might themselves attend at the mills—while the noble Lord was urging these points, did it never occur to him to ask what was the cause of all this sacrifice of the domestic affections? How could the noble Lord reconcile the two courses he was himself pursuing—that of lamenting the necessity of the people to undergo all this protracted toil on the one hand, while on the other he espoused a law which limited the field, and consequently diminished the remuneration of labour? But the description of the poor man was not a new one. Mr. Horner had long since spoken of the labouring classes of this country as little better than serfs. He said that a labourer could not be considered a free man, because he had not the free disposal of his labour. Had the Legislature done anything to put the axe to the root of this evil? He (Mr. Gibson) was prepared to do so. It was not he who hesitated ; it was the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire. He (Mr. M. Gibson) was for increasing the field of employment, so that the labouring population might be able to take care of themselves, and not be driven to the necessity of working for such protracted hours. That appeared to him to be the right way in which the evil complained of by the noble Lord should be cured. He confessed, when he found hon. Members coming forward in that House, and expressing such great sympathy for the labouring classes, he was not quite ready to give them credit for sincerity on finding them, at the same time, so reluctant in making the least sacrifices on their own parts, in order to afford the people the enjoyment and advantage of a free market for their labour. Nothing was so easy as to sympathise and be generous at the expense of others. If the landed gentry really wished to gain credit for the welfare of the people, and for a desire to place the labourer in a better condition than he was in at present, they should come forward in a truly liberal spirit, and at once consent to a repeal of the Corn Laws. They should do their utmost to give full scope to the exertions of industry by widening the field of manual employment. With regard to the labour of children, to which the noble Lord had alluded, many of the evils which children were formerly liable to, were

young persons and women of all ages to twelve, the proposition had, he was informed, been received cheerfully by the master manufacturers, although he must admit without a full recognition of principle of interfering with masters. With regard to the noble Lord, he was within his knowledge a master or operatives business to ascertain the state of feeling people themselves short hours of labour by many of the operating fluence desired the or nam agr be hr

that the children under the age of thirteen years, Mr. Senior himself stated that the effect of the system had been to exclude children under thirteen, and they were thus driven to a worse description of labour. And what had been the result? Had their condition been improved, or their morals better preserved? On the contrary thousands of them were picked up in the streets by the police. The noble Lord would experience great difficulty in carrying out his own principle. The reports before the House, on the condition of many other classes of the people, showed that there existed as great a necessity for Parliamentary interference in respect to them, as any did in regard to factories. The case there of the young women employed by milliners and dress-makers most prominently presented itself to notice. Nay, if the system of inquiry were to be thoroughly carried out, he knew not a more likely case for investigation than that which might be furnished by the large establishment in Printing-house-square. Inspectors might fairly be appointed to inquire how many persons were employed in carrying on that great concern, and how many hours they laboured. By following up the principle, many of the strongest advocates of the present measure might become liable to a supervision and examination such as they would, he believed, be very unwilling to submit to. It was his impression that the end of this system of inspection would be to compel them to retrace their steps, and adopt the sounder principle of giving the labouring population the power of taking care of themselves. The noble Lord, the Member for Newark (Lord John Manners), visited the manufacturing districts last year. If the noble Lord were present he (Mr. M. Gibson) hoped he would tell the House what he witnessed, and what was the result of his own observation. He thought the noble Lord would say, that he found things better than he expected. Whatever evils might be ascribed to the drawing labourers from the agricultural

it would be found that once came from those towns, never wished to remain in their abodes. He knew of one instance where a man who had come from an agricultural district, declared, that after residing in a manufacturing town he would sooner be transported than go back to his parish. As the House had had a very painful picture drawn of the people employed in factories, he would just refer to what Mr. Senior, an inspector of factories, said on the subject. Mr. Senior, was a fair, impartial, and unbiassed witness. He was not a manufacturer; but was a scientific man. His words were:—

"The general impression on us all as to the effects of factory labour has been unexpectedly favourable. The factory workpeople in the country districts are the plumpest, best clothed, and healthiest looking persons of the labouring class that I have ever seen. The girls especially are far more good looking (and good looks are fair evidence of health and spirits), than the daughters of agricultural labourers. The wages earned per family are more than double those of the south. We examined at Egerton three of the Blidlow pauper migrants. Being fresh to the trade they cannot be very expert, yet one family earned 1*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*; another, 2*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*; and the other 1*l.* 16*s.* per week. At Hyde we saw another. They had six children under thirteen, and yet the earnings of the father and two elder children were 30*s.* a week. All these families live in houses to which a Gloucestershire cottage would be a mere outhouse. And not only are factory wages high, but, what is more important, the employment is constant. Nothing can exceed the absurdity of the lamentation over the children crowded in factories. Crowding in a factory is physically impossible. Bailey's weaving room, covering an acre of ground, had not space among the looms for more than 170 persons."

He only read this to show that the factory population was not in so destitute a condition as represented by the noble Lord. If they would by their laws make the system of competition so severe, as to impose the necessity on the working classes to work themselves almost to death, to obtain the means for a bare subsistence, what right had they to complain of the evils that must necessarily arise out of such a state of things? But that competition must necessarily result from the present system of legislation. Labour it was true, was the condition of existence with the great mass of the population of all countries. But what they had to consider more seriously in the present case was not whether the labour of the people was severe, but whether they as legislators were justified—considering the competition for labour, and as a matter of public policy—to prevent the people from working as long as it was necessary for them to work in order to satisfy their own wants. If the Legislature limited the period of labour to ten hours a day, while labourers on the Continent worked twelve and fourteen hours, how was it possible for the English labourer to compete with the foreigner?

Mr. John S. Wortley thought the object of his noble Friend had been misstated: he did not propose to place any restriction on labourers in factories; he merely proposed to apply a restriction to the time of labour of a certain portion of the persons employed. The hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House had alluded briefly to the Corn Laws. If he abstained following the hon. Gentleman on that topic, he trusted the House would not suppose that he admitted or admired the soundness of the logic of the hon. Gentleman. ["Hear, hear."] Hon. Gentlemen might cheer, but they were not warranted in the inference that he was afraid to enter into that argument on a fit occasion. But on the present question, he thought it right to adopt the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir James Graham), and to separate it altogether from topics of an irritating and party nature. He could not help expressing his deep regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to express himself so decidedly hostile to the Motion of his noble Friend. It was now eleven years since his noble Friend first pressed this question on the attention of the House. He supported it by such incontrovertible facts, by such circumstances, and by such strong proofs, as induced Parliament to depart from a principle to which, at all other times, it would be most anxious to adhere—the principle of abstinence from all interference with the disposal of labour. During the eleven years the statute had been in operation, it had given satisfaction to those concerned in its operation; and he believed, that if the question were now to be put to them, whether they thought that the Factory Act should exist, or whether the factories should be without any legal regulation at all, their opinion would be decidedly in favour of the operation of the present Bill. The real aim and object of his noble Friend was not to interfere with the disposal of labour in factories, but to bring the duration of that labour to such a point as might be considered fair and reasonable. It was impossible not to feel the unnatural state in which labour was now employed in factories. Male labour was superseded by the labour of women, and adult labour was superseded by the labour of children. The main objection to his noble Friend's Motion was, as to the extreme danger there was of its working prejudicially to the manufacturing interests of the country. There might be, perhaps, some plausibility in that argument; but did not the House recollect, that precisely the same argument was used before the passing of the existing Act? They were always told, that it would ruin the manufactures of this country, and destroy their power of competition with foreign nations. Still legislation did take place, and still English manufactures did flourish, and he believed that the law had produced a good effect without any injury to any party. Hence he was disposed to argue that they might now venture to take a further step in the right direction. The risk, he believed, would be none if it were properly taken. No danger need be incurred either to trade industry, or manufactures. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) had said, that this measure if adopted would control adult labour. So far as women were concerned, the law, as it now stood, applied to them; but it would not affect male adults. Another objection was on the ground that, by limiting the amount of human labour, a great acceleration would be given to the improvement of machinery. Even if that were so, he (Mr. J. S. Wortley) was not aware that any great injury would be done by it, because, in proportion as those improvements were introduced, was the probability that trade would extend, cheapness follow, and a greater demand in other branches of human labour be created. But, even supposing the measure of his noble Friend were to restrict in some degree the labour of the people, still they would not be without compensation from the effect it would have to lessen the duration of labour. The right hon. Gentleman spoke also of the reduction of the amount of wages as a serious objection to this measure. But the right hon. Gentleman and the Legislature had already been repeatedly told that even were there to be some reduction in the wages, there would still be on the part of the workpeople a readiness to face and encounter such a risk, and that provided for and protected against by the present law. Children under thirteen years of age did not undergo any of the evils mentioned by the noble Lord. They were protected by the existing Factory Bill. The noble Lord had argued that he must legislate upon this matter by degrees; but partial legislation had evils peculiar to itself. This piecemeal legislation entailed evils upon the people, which deserved the serious consideration of the Legislature. What had been the effect of legislation upon the children under the age of thirteen years? Mr. Stuart himself stated that the effect of the system had been to exclude children under thirteen, and they were thus driven to a worse description of labour. And what had been the result? Had their condition been improved, or their morals better preserved? On the contrary thousands of them were picked up in the streets by the police. Gentleman and the Legislature had already been repeatedly told that even were there to be some reduction in the wages, there would still be on the part of the workpeople a readiness to face and encounter such a risk, and that they would think themselves repaid by the relief they would experience morally and physically, in the curtailment of their hours of labour. If the workpeople were not opposed to this reduction of time, so neither were all those whose capital was embarked in manufactures. There was a large portion of master manufacturers who were favourable to the principle which his noble Friend was endeavouring to carry out. Two years since a petition was presented by himself from near 300 of the mill-owners in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in which they expressed their conviction that such a measure in no degree endangered the interests of the manufacturers. He hoped, therefore, that legislation would proceed further with this restrictive measure. Considering the circumstances and the state of society in the manufacturing districts, and the equity of the present claim upon the Legislature, he firmly believed that much time could not elapse before it would feel itself compelled to adopt a measure of this nature.

Mr. H. G. Ward: No man in this House has listened with deeper attention to the noble Lord than myself; and certainly I am bound to say, that all my feelings and all my sympathies have been in favour of the course which he has proposed. But when I come to weigh the consequences of that course—when I come to look not only to the interest of the one class whose cause the noble Lord is advocating, but to the interests of the many classes which this measure would materially effect—I feel that I cannot adopt the principle of interference advocated by the noble Lord—above all, to the extent he would carry it, without incurring the greatest possible responsibility as regarded the general welfare of the country, and, more especially, as regarded the whole manufacturing interests of the Kingdom. It is impossible to have listened to the argument of the noble Lord, and especially to the description he gave of the state of degradation and misery which existed among the labouring classes in the manufacturing districts, without wishing that it was in the power of Parliament to apply an efficient remedy. But will any body say, that this House can apply a remedy? Will anybody deny that we may most seriously aggravate the evils by attempting to cure them? The argument of the noble Lord, if legitimately carried out, goes against the system of manufactures by human labour altogether. It is not merely a question between a twelve hours' Bill and a ten hours' Bill, but it is in principle an argument to get rid of the whole system of factory labour. The noble Lord said that the system would become aggravated unless restrained. Where is that restraint to stop? Would a ten hours' Bill do it? Would an eight hours' Bill do it? Would any such system cure those domestic evils of which the noble Lord so feelingly complains? Will it restore the mother to her children, that might enable her to perform those maternal duties, the want of which now exposes those children to the evils of idleness, and to all the vices and immoralities that ensue from neglect? Would it stop the increase of the people? The noble Lord has pointed out evils—if there be any evils—arising from the manufacturing system altogether, and not merely arising from the time to which the labour of the workpeople extends. But if we interfere with one class of manufactures, how can we deny the duty of interfering with all? And if I can show 10,000 worse cases than those which the noble Lord has pointed out, how can the House escape the difficulty of either involving itself in general legislation upon the subject of labour, or in the inconsistency of legislating partially? I can show among my own constituents that there are descriptions of labour which are inevitably fatal to those engaged in them within a certain limited period; yet there are persons who feel themselves forced into it, and who incur all the danger, for the sake of the immediate advantages it brings with it, of death being its almost certain result. The hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House has exhorted Gentlemen on this (the Opposition) side of the House to abstain from mixing up the present question with any party or irritating subject. It is not because it is a party or irritating subject that we are opposed to it. We might with the greatest ease turn this into merely a Corn Law debate; but we have not come to do that. But when the noble Lord proposes a most important measure for regulating human labour, in consequence of many evils which he states to result from the excess of toil on the part of women and children, I, without wishing to mix the question up with any party or irritating subject; have a right to ask what is the cause of those evils which the noble Lord wishes to remove? What is the cause which obliges the people to labour to this excess? There is no inborn love of work within them. No man, except from necessity would devote himself to toil. Their lot, as it happens to be cast in the different ranks of society, does not necessarily deprive them of the love of enjoyment and of leisure. I believe that there is as much natural affection and as much desire to retain the woman in her own proper domestic circle among the working classes, as there exists among ourselves. No, it is not from a difference of nature that men and women and children toil during a long period of hours, but it is necessity that compels them to do so. Such is the pressure of that necessity upon the working classes, more especially, that you find men driven to do things, which, when we come to reflect on the consequences, strikes us as almost criminal, and as casting a blot on the social system; and then it is that we are induced to look to legislation as the means of affording some remedy for the evil. Poverty is enacted by the law, and then other enactments are necessary against the consequences which poverty compels men to resort to! If it be said, as it has been said, that no allusion ought to be made to the Corn Laws, the answer is, that by the admission of all parties they materially affect the demand for labour. It is upon the permanent demand for labour that the wages and the comforts of the operative classes depend. No doubt, it may be fairly argued, that one class of labourers may be injured by the repeal of the Corn Laws. The noble Lord (Lord Ashley) said, that even his motives had been doubted, and I thought it possible that he might allude to me; and as I never say out of the House what I am not ready to repeat in it, I will remark that much as I admire the beautiful benevolence of his character, and the touching sincerity of his humane feelings, yet I see him shrink from going to the bottom of the question, and he deals, therefore, rather with symptoms than with the disease. That is my conviction. I do not say that his remedy will not cure some evils, but I believe with the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham), that the first effect of this Bill will be produced upon wages. Where population is as redundant as ours—where such difficulty is often experienced in obtaining employment, and where at times, there exists such earnest anxiety to procure it, I believe that wages will be the first thing to feel the effects of this measure. As Mr. Horner says, labour is free in name, but it is not free in fact; capitalists can obtain a supply of it when they want it, and if, by any means, you sharpen competition, and render it necessary for the profitable carrying on of their trade, that they shall have everything at the cheapest rate, the first thing they will do will be to reduce the wages of those they employ. When I am called upon to examine the question as the noble Lord has brought it before us, I must look not only at what he says but at what others have said. There was a meeting the other day in Leeds, and a very enlightened and intelligent Gentleman, Dr. Hook, the vicar of Leeds, gave his view of a Ten-hours' Bill, and what did he state were the objects in view? If those objects, as he mentioned them, could be realised, we should have nothing short of an earthly Paradise in this country. Dr. Hook wished that women should be released from the necessity of labouring at all, and this would be a most desirable condition of things if it could be accomplished. Would to God that such a blessed state of things could be created!

"The business of women," said he, "is to make home happy and comfortable to man; after the man has earned sufficient for the support of his family, not by overworking, but by such moderate labour as may enable him to prepare his own mind and give instruction to his children, he ought to return to his cheerful and contented fire-side. These are the objects we have in view."

We may suppose such a state of affairs in a most prosperous community, where a man at the end of his moderate day's labour shall be able to repair to his family circle and spend the evening in the company of his wife and in the education of his children; but I do not know in what part of the world such a condition of society exists, and I am quite sure that it has never existed in any part of the history of this country. Dr. Hook and Mr. Oastler tell us that a Ten-hours' Bill is a panacea for all evils; but I will ask any man whether the noble Lord in his speech showed a single ground to make us believe that the measure now under consideration will contribute in any degree to the attainment of the end in view. I do not wish to go at all at length into the question; but I oppose the Bill from a strong desire to benefit the operative classes, and from a perfect conviction that interference of this kind will be utterly fruitless. No manufacturer can carry on his trade unless he can obtain a remunerative return for his capital; and admitting the truth of what was said by the right hon. Baronet, that a well-regulated self-interest is the great moving principle with the world, you cannot expect manufacturers to neglect it. I believe that the House could not enter upon a task more fraught with danger than to make an attempt unduly to restrict the hours of labour, since it is founded upon a false principle of humanity, which in the end is certain to defeat itself.

Lord Francis Egerton: I shall preface the few observations I intend to make by an avowal that I mean to vote for the Motion of my noble Friend. In my estimation he is an object of envy for the high character which his long, unwearied, and consistent exertions have earned for him in all parts of the Kingdom. He is the more an object of envy, from the perfect confidence and strong conviction he feels as to the result of the measure he has brought forward. I confess, that after having listened to his admirable speech with great attention, I have not arrived at the same confidence and conviction: it is often on a balance of probabilities, and on a balance of probabilities only, that we are compelled to act; and looking at the state of public opinion in the country, and at the laws triumphantly passed, adopting the principles of interference with labour, I have come to the persuasion, that what is now proposed will be more efficacious for good, than any other course we could pursue. The observations of my hon. Friend, the Member for Sheffield (Mr. H. G. Ward), are liable to this objection, that he goes on the principle of total non-interference. I am aware, that some persons of strong heads and clear understandings, whom nobody more respects than I do, have deprecated interference as bad political economy: this principle, however, has been departed from, and the question now is, whether we can revert to the principle, or whether another measure shall be added to the course of legislation in an opposite direction to that which we have hitherto adopted. The hon. Member for Sheffield asks whether the Bill of my noble Friend would obliterate the evils essentially connected with the system of manufactures? I am not aware that my noble Friend has declared any such unattainable object. To apply an absolute remedy to all the evils detailed by my noble Friend with so much feeling and ability may be, and very likely is, impossible; but surely it is possible to apply some mitigation to those evils. I for one should be glad if by any proceeding we could prevent a woman from ever entering a factory again; I know and acknowledge that it is out of the question, but at the same time it appears to me that by passing a law under which a woman shall be required to stand only a smaller number of hours in a factory instead of a longer, you gain at all events something, if not a material advantage. The hon. Member for Manchester, on the authority of a learned Friend of mine out of the House, has drawn what some think a flattering picture of the state and appearance of women, especially young women, employed in the factories. Of course their appearance varies in different localities; but I believe the statement is, in many respects, not inaccurate. I have myself been struck by the same thing and in my own neighbourhood. I have often had occasion to pass factories at the time when females have come out to take their meals by the side of the public road, and I may almost say, that I know no prettier sight. Certainly it was not such as to lead a stranger to condemn the factory system; but I think, if my learned friend, Mr. Senior, had followed them into their cottages, he might not have found his opinion always confirmed. Those who are engaged at work preserve an appearance of health and cheerfulness; but, on entering cottages, with the interior of which I am somewhat acquainted, I have seen girls, once of great strength and beauty, who, at a certain age, have one by one dropped out of the factory. I have asked them whether they had anything to complain of in their treatment, and they have answered no—that they had been well treated by their master, who had perhaps risen from their own ranks of life, and was disposed to pay them every due attention; he was a very kind and considerate man; but they added that they had been unable to stand at work for so many hours—that twelve hours had proved too much for their strength—that their chests had become affected, and that their mother had therefore been obliged to take them away. This was the case with two girls in the same family, and I am informed that it has continually occurred. A passing observer is not able to judge of the effects of labour upon young persons. My hon. Friend, the Member for Sheffield, says, that if we pass this Bill, it will be necessary to apply a remedy to the evils of other employments more injurious to health than factories. I think we should do so when we can; and the principle reason for a Factory Regulation Bill has been, that you are able to carry it into effect. I am aware that the labours performed by the fork-grinders in the town with which my hon. Friend is connected is most destructive of health. Others, who are better acquainted with the subject than I am may not agree with me, but I can hardly admit the right of a parent to train up his children to such an occupation. In this instance, if it were possible, we ought to apply such remedies as can be invented, so as to enable those who now die at thirty to live out the natural period of existence. I admit therefore, the principle stated by my hon. Friend. You ought, if you can, to extend your legislation to such cases; but we are in a great measure stopped by the impossibility of accomplishing the end. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department has opposed the Motion with great ability, and upon strong grounds. He has stated what I believe will most probably be the effect of the measure—the diminution of wages. At first visionary expectations were entertained upon this subject, and expectations which I think visionary, are still entertained. My hon. Friend (if he will allow me to call him so) the Member for Oldham told us formerly what passed between him and a body of men, during the Chartist outcry. He asked them what they wanted, and the answer was that they wanted twelve hours' wages for ten hours' work. I am afraid that this may still be one of the visionary expectations indulged, in connection with the Measure before the House; but I think that a diminution of wages will follow. I was prepared to believe that this consideration had been a good deal overlooked by some of the parties who desired the Bill, and I am bound to say that as far as my communications have gone, I have been undeceived upon that point. I never met with more rational or reasonable men than some of those I have seen upon this subject. They admit at once the probability of a reduction of wages; but they had balanced the probabilities, considered the evil, and were prepared to meet the consequences. It is partly upon that ground that I am disposed to consider the question in the light I view it. I admit that the present state of interference with factory labour is far from satisfactory, and I am very far from thinking that any sweeping measure, if you will have it, will be any great advantage. It is possible that the necessary diminution of wages, in the first instance, will be mitigated by additional activity and increased energy on the part of the operatives at the end of their day's work. I have always been told that when the hours are long, labour is carried on inactively and heavily, and perhaps better, if not more, work may be turned out with shorter hours. If I am wrong upon this point, I shall be glad to be corrected by practical men. The hon. Member for Manchester has spoken of the advantages factory labourers in some respects enjoy, and Mr. Senior supports this opinion; but I doubt if such be the fact in my own neighbourhood, especially during the depression arising out of the state of the American market, or, if you will, out of the Corn Laws. At all events, I am not of opinion that it can be said that factory labourers invariably have the advantage: on the contrary, a man in a good position on agricultural property, seems to me to have a better chance of permanent employment than a factory labourer. As to the great question incidentally introduced, I do not wish at all to dwell upon it, though I admit the right of hon. Members, if they think fit, to make this another Corn Law Debate. I do not, however, apprehend that the discussion of this Bill will derive any benefit from the introduction of so wide a question, but with the opinions held by the hon. Members for Manchester and Sheffield, it would certainly be too much to expect that they should not advert to it. They must act upon their own opinions with respect to the Corn Laws, and I must act upon mine, differing as I do materially from them as to the advantages of Corn Law Repeal. I am not aware that it is necessary for me to say more in explanation of the vote I shall give, and I know that it will be received with great dissatisfaction by some Gentlemen in the part of the country where I live, from whom I differ with great regret; and without undue egotism, I may be allowed to observe that I am not liable to the reproach of being a landed gentleman, standing up to deal with other interests but his own. If a diminution of wages be the consequence of this measure, I believe that nobody will be more directly sensible of the change than I shall be; even in an agricultural point of view, as far as I possess land, I am entirely dependent upon the manufacturing market. I have therefore felt, and shall feel again, any decrease of consumption. I have only indulged in this reference in order to rescue myself from the imputation of being opposed to interests because they are not my own.

Viscount Howick confessed, that since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, he had never known an occasion upon which he had experienced so much difficulty in making up his mind as to the vote he should give. He saw on both sides of the question considerations so weighty, that it had not been without very great hesitation, indeed, that he had arrived at the conclusion which he should endeavour to state to the House. On the one side it appeared that ten hours per diem was no inconsiderable portion of labour to require from women and young persons; for, if to that were added the time consumed in going to and from the mills, and the time necessary for meals, they could not reckon less than twelve and a half hours out of the twenty-four as being taken up away from their own homes—that was even in the event of the amendment of his noble Friend being carried. It certainly did appear that that was a very large portion of the day to be so occupied by women and young persons. Then, on the other side, it was perfectly true, that by agreeing to that amendment, wages might be reduced very considerably, and the parties for whose benefit this alteration was intended might in reality and in consequence be exposed to very great hardships. He was afraid it was also true, as had been stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, that though this Bill nominally applied only to women and young persons, yet that indirectly they were legislating for adults of the male sex, and that if they prohibited young persons from working more than ten hours they would render it practically impossible for the mills to be kept going beyond those hours. Then it was true as his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester had also stated, that if they adopted this principle in one trade it might be, with equal advantage, applied to others. There was no doubt that in many other trades and branches of industry abuses prevailed not less to be deplored than those then under the consideration of the House; but, in answer to that, he (Lord Howick) would remark, that the question was not whether they were to establish a principle of interference or not. He quite felt that that House was not, perhaps, very well qualified to decide upon questions as to the regulation of labour, but, on the other hand, they had adopted the principle; for, whether he voted for the amendment or for the Bill he equally took upon himself to decide what was the number of hours during which people ought to be engaged in labour.

Upon that part of the subject he could not help remarking that the whole of the arguments of the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of the Home Department, would have been quite as applicable if the question had been between twelve hours and fourteen, instead of between ten and twelve. He apprehended that the question had really resolved itself to this—having found it necessary to interfere, they had only to consider, knowing what they did of the capabilities of the human frame, and looking at all the authorities that could be obtained upon the subject, whether they should establish, as the term of labour in factories for young persons, ten or twelve hours. Upon the whole, when the question was put to him in that shape, he must say that he thought ten hours was as much as they ought, with propriety, to allow. He had come to that conclusion, under great apprehension as to what might be the result, and, after duly weighing the subject, he did think that the balance was in favour of shortening the long hours of labour. The hon. Member for Manchester had stated that, if they took that decision with respect to factories, they should be called upon to carry the principle farther. He was aware that such must be the case; for he did think that inquiries of late years had established the conclusion that they could not entirely rely upon the principle that men were the best judges of their own interests, and would always do that which was best for themselves. The reports which, of late years, they had had from various Commissioners had shown that there was great need for regulation. It was found that great abuses existed both as to the number of hours of labour exacted, and in other matters, against which neither masters nor workmen as individuals had practically any power of struggling. In the hope of increasing their profits particular persons were sometimes induced to extend unduly the hours of labour or to introduce some other objectionable mode of carrying on their business, by doing so they obtained so great an advantage over their competitors, that the latter were in self-defence compelled to follow the example that had been set, and thus abuses became established, which the great majority of those carrying on particular branches of trade might deplore, but none acting singly could venture to abandon. This he thought a very serious evil. Its origin was intense competition, and they could not hope effectually to remedy the evil unless by some means or other they could diminish that intensity of competition which was now animating the capitalist and the workman. That could only be effected by enlarging the field of their employment, by breaking down those artificial barriers and restrictions by which it was now hedged in and confined. Unless they were prepared to do that, they must expect to see that intensity of competition which he (Lord Howick) believed to be the origin of the whole of the evil, become daily greater and greater. He feared he could not expect that Parliament would now, (though ultimately no doubt they would) consent to adopt the step which was the only effectual cure for the evil; but it did not follow though they could not remove the evil altogether that they might not do something to palliate it; and it certainly did appear to him that, in the absence of that more complete remedy which he should wish to see applied, it might be advisable to take measures to check the abuses which under the stimulus of intense competition did arise in the mode of carrying on certain great manufacturing branches of our industry. With that view he was prepared to vote for the adoption of that measure, and, adopting that measure, he thought it would be more perfect in the shape proposed by the noble Lord opposite, than in the shape proposed by Her Majesty's Government. At the same time he could not help observing that this discussion, and every similar discussion made him feel more and more painfully how incompetent that House was to deal satisfactorily with questions of that description, and he could not help thinking that in adopting that Bill they were recognising principles which they ought to carry out further. It at least deserved the consideration of Gentlemen upon both sides of the House whether they might not, to a certain degree, meet the difficulty which they experienced of introducing the necessary regulations with regard to trade, and do something by which the parties interested should themselves choose the regulations which were required. It did not appear to him altogether impossible to form some body in which the interests both of the masters and of the men should be represented, which should have authority to frame regulations for carrying on those branches of industry which Parliament was confessedly incapable of itself framing with advantage. The guilds and corporate trades in the Middle Ages possessed a power of that kind, and though in the sequel, no doubt, they became liable to great abuse, they were in the outset of great advantage in encouraging the first seeds of trade and civilization. Similar bodies he believed might now be created with advantage, proper precautions being taken to guard against their degenerating into a mischievous monopoly, while a power might be committed to their hands for making regulations upon this subject. He was the more impressed with this idea when he saw how the trades' unions had flourished in this country, and had maintained themselves even in spite of severe laws against them, as well as when those laws were relaxed. That fact seemed to his mind to afford no slight ground for concluding that they had arisen out of a necessity for some system of organization of those trades and branches of industry; and it certainly appeared to him that it would be a very great advantage if for these unions not recognized, though very properly no longer prohibited by the law, and exercising a power really resting upon intimidation, they could substitute corporate bodies, having a legal authority, and composed not exclusively of one class, but of the two classes of the employed and their employers. Some such bodies might he thought be formed, all together, bodies whose powers should be strictly defined and regulated, and in which not only the working classes, but their employers should have a share of authority; the whole to be placed under the supervision of the Crown. Though this Bill might pass into a law, he trusted that, with reference to the future, some organization of the kind he had alluded to might be adopted, by which without bringing before Parliament details with which it was unfit to deal, regulations might be made not only with regard to factory labour, but that of other trades also; the subject was important, and he hoped would receive the serious consideration of some Gentlemen more able than himself to come to a practical conclusion upon the question, whether it might not be possible by some such means as he had suggested, to meet the difficulties of regulating the mode of carrying on some of the great branches of industry in this country.

Viscount Sandon would trouble the House with only a remark or two. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to ascribe the whole difficulty of this subject to the want of free trade in corn. But other countries, such as Prussia and the United States, which had no Corn Laws to complain of, were just as much compelled to protect the working population as we were, against the infliction of long hours. Again, this very question of the limitation of factory labour to ten and a half hours was proposed in 1815, by the late Sir R. Peel, a Gentleman competent to the subject beyond all others, before the present Corn Laws were enacted, or at least had come into operation. Resting on these two simple facts, he thought it was impossible for those who resisted legislation upon this subject to say that the evils to be remedied were caused by the absence of free-trade in corn. He conceived the course proposed by his noble Friend was an experimental one, but there was great reason to hope that it would be successful. He believed that with some of the great manufacturers of this country the principle of this Bill had been in favour for some time past. In Leeds he believed many manufacturers never worked more than eleven hours even now, while their neighbours worked from twelve to fourteen hours; still the manufacturers of Leeds were able to compete with their rivals. His belief was, that the Bill would have the effect of equalizing labour, so that instead of working by fits and starts, the labour would be extended over the whole year. That would be of an immense benefit to the factory labourers. It would be far better for them to get only 12s. a-week regularly, than to earn 16s. and 18s. now and then. Their houses and families would be better provided for and made more comfortable, while they would not have so much idle time to visit the alehouse at one time, nor would they and their wives and children be overworked at another. What he wished to see was the workers in factories placed on the same footing with regard to hours as all other workers. The agriculturists might be taunted because their labourers were not better paid, but not that they were overworked. The women went home an hour earlier than the men, and came later to work. The hours of labour for men were from six o'clock in the morning to six in the evening, except in harvest time, when extraordinary exertion became necessary. They only asked for legislation in favour of women and children, and they had no right to interfere with the labour of others, but, if the effect of this measure should incidentally be a reduction in the hours of labour to the adult man, he should not regret it. The House should recollect that they were dealing not with the ill-paid weaver, but with the well-paid spinner, whose wages could better bear some reduction if necessary for this great improvement in their condition. He believed that the manufacturers themselves would not suffer by this reduction; many, no doubt, were apprehensive of the effects; others not. A few in favour should outweigh many apprehensive,—their work would be better done. All men were apprehensive of the effect of changes forced upon them in their own business. Let them remember the alarms expressed on the occasion of the Tariff. Yet how much of that alarm proved to be ill-founded. He thought it most desirable for the House to come at once to a final settlement of this question, which had been long agitated, and would never cease to be agitated, for the working men could not be insensible to what was due to their wives and children. It was an agitation, which in its nature could never cease and never ought to cease. Steps must be taken to render the extension of our manufacturing system compatible, as it might be, with the best interests of order, society and religion. For these reasons he was prepared to go the length of the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire.

Mr. Bright said, it is with unfeigned reluctance that I rise to speak, having so recently addressed the House at some length, but being intimately connected with the branch of industry which is affected by the proposition now under consideration, and having lived all my life among the population most interested in this Bill, and having listened most attentively for more than two hours to the speech of the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire, I think I am entitled to be heard on the question now under discussion. I have listened to that speech without much surprise, because I have heard or read the same speech, or one very like it, on former occasions, and I did not suppose that any material change had taken place in the opinions of the noble Lord. It appears to me, however, that he has taken a one-sided view, a most unjust and unfair view of the question; it may not be intentionally, but still a view which cannot be borne out by facts; a view, moreover, which factory inspectors and their reports will not corroborate, and one which, if it influence the decision of this House, will be most prejudicial to that very class which the noble Lord intends to serve. The right hon. Baronet, the Secretary for the Home Department, who is, I presume, the promoter of this Bill, should have given the House some reason for the introduction of a new Factory Bill. No such reason has yet been given, and I am at a loss to discover any grounds on which it can with fairness be asserted that the Bill now in operation has failed in its effect. I know the inspectors affirm that it cannot be fully carried out. Every body who knows any thing of the manufacturing of the North, knew when it was passed that it could not be fully carried out; and the proposition now made, is to render this impracticable Act more stringent. In a trade so extensive, employing so many people, carried on under circumstances ever varying, no Act of Parliament interfering with the minute details of its management, can ever be fully carried out. I am not one who will venture to say that the manufacturing districts of this country are a paradise; I believe there are in those districts evils great and serious; but whatever evils do there exist are referable to other causes than to the existence of factories and long chimnies. Most of the statements which the noble Lord has read, would be just as applicable to Birmingham, or to this metropolis, as to the northern districts; and as he read them over, with respect to the ignorance and intemperance of the people, the disobedience of children to their parents, the sufferings of mothers, and the privations which the children endure, I felt that there was scarcely a complaint which has been made against the manufacturing districts of the north of England, which might not be urged with at least as much force against the poorest portion of the population of every large city in Great Britain and Ireland. But among the population of Lancashire and Yorkshire, where towns are so numerous as almost to touch each other, these evils are more observable than in a population less densely crowded together. I can prove, however, and I do not wish to be as one-sided as the noble Lord, I can prove from authorities, which are at least as worthy of attention as his, the very reverse in many respects of what he has stated as the true state of those districts. Now the Committee will bear in mind that a large portion of the documents which the noble Lord has quoted, have neither dates nor names. I can give dates and names, and I feel confident that the authorities I shall cite are worthy of the deepest attention. I must go over the grounds of complaint which the noble Lord has urged, and although I may run the risk of being a little tedious, yet considering that for two hours or more I have listened to the charges which he has made, I do think that, connected as I am most intimately with the population and the district to which the noble Lord has alluded, I have a right to an audience for the counter-statement which I have to make. Now, with respect to the health of the persons employed, and I will speak more particularly of the Cotton trade, with which I am more immediately connected, Mr. Harrison, the inspecting surgeon for Preston says:—

“I have made very particular inquiries respecting the health of every child whom I have examined, and I find that the average annual sickness of each child is not more than four days; at least not more than four days are lost by each child in a year in consequence of sickness. This includes disorders of every kind, for the most part induced by causes wholly unconnected with factory labour. I have been not a little surprised to find so little sickness which can fairly be attributed to mill work. I have met with very few children who have suffered from injuries occasioned by machinery; and the protection, especially in new factories, is now so complete, that accidents will, I doubt not, speedily become rare. I have not met with a single instance, out of 1,656 children whom I examined, of deformity, that is referable to factory labour. It must be admitted that factory children do not present the same blooming, robust appearance, as is witnessed among children who labour in the open air; but I question if they are not more exempt from acute disease, and do not, on the whole, suffer less sickness than those who are regarded as having more healthy employments.”

This was the statement of a man who had for a long time been inspecting-surgeon in a district where there are a large number of mills, and it may be taken as a fair criterion of the rest. In the analysis of the Factory Report, page 16, I find the following statement:—

“In conclusion, then, it is proved, by a preponderance of seventy-two witnesses against seventeen, that the health of those employed in cotton mills is nowise inferior to that in other occupations; and, secondly, it is proved by tables drawn up by the secretary of a sick club, and by the more extensive tables of a London actuary, that the health of the factory children is decidedly superior to that of the labouring poor otherwise employed.”

From the Factory Inspectors' Reports

in 1834, I have extracted the following testimony, and no doubt this evidence is quite as good as if it had been given this year; for from that time to this there has been a progressive improvement in everything relating to the management of the factories of the north of England.

"The general tenor of all the medical reports in my possession confirms Mr. Harrison's view of factory labour on the health of the younger branches of working hands. It is decidedly not injurious to health or longevity, compared with other employments." Then, in page 51, Mr. Saunders says, "It appears in evidence, that of all employments to which children are subjected, those carried on in factories are amongst the least laborious, and of all departments of in-door labour, amongst the least unwholesome," Mr. Horner says, "It is gratifying to be able to state, that I have not had a single complaint laid before me, either on the part of the masters against their servants, or of the servants against their masters; nor have I seen or heard of any instance of ill-treatment of children, or of injury to their health by their employment." And on the 21st of July, 1834, speaking on the employment of children, he says:—"And as their occupation in the mills is so light as to cause no bodily fatigue, they would pass their eight hours there as beneficially as at home; indeed, in most cases, far more so."

It was further proved in the evidence of the Factory Commission, that the height of boys and girls employed in agriculture, whilst it exceeds materially that of those employed in mines, does not sensibly exceed that of those employed in mills, and it was tried in the case of upwards of 1,000 children. As to other trades, the noble Lord alluded to the condition of the milliners in this metropolis. I have some extracts from the Report with respect to their condition, but at this late hour I will only detain the House by reading a few of them. It is supposed that there are about 15,000 young women employed as milliners in London; and I believe that is about the number of young persons employed in all the factories under the Factory Act. That Report says:—

"In some of what are considered the best regulated establishments, during the fashionable season, occupying about four months in the year, the regular hours of work are fifteen, but on emergencies, which frequently occur, these hours extend to eighteen. In many establishments the hours of work during the season are unlimited, the young women never getting more than six, often not more than four, sometimes only three, and occasionally not more than two hours, for rest and sleep out of the twenty-four, and very frequently they work all night." The Sub-commissioner says—"The protracted labour described above is, I believe, quite unparalleled in the history of manufacturing processes. I have looked over a considerable portion of the Report of the Factory Commission, and there is nothing in the accounts of the worst-conducted factories to be compared with the facts elicited in the present inquiry. I have also the evidence of Sir James Clark, the eminent physician, who says, "I have found the mode of life of these poor girls such as no constitution could long bear. Worked from six o'clock in the morning to twelve at night, with the exception of the short interval allowed for their meals in close rooms, and passing the few hours allowed for rest, in still more close and crowded apartments—a mode of life more completely calculated to destroy human health can scarcely be contrived, and this at a period of life when exercise in the open air, and a due proportion of rest, are essential to the development of the system." The Sub-Commissioner says—"The evidence of all parties establishes the fact that there is no class of persons in this country, living by their labour, whose happiness, health, and lives, are so unscrupulously sacrificed as those of the young dress makers. It may, without exaggeration, be stated, that in proportion to the numbers employed, there are no occupations, with one or two questionable exceptions, such as needle grinding, in which so much disease is produced as in dress-making, or which present so fearful a catalogue of distressing and frequently fatal maladies."

The protracted hours of factory labour, it has been said, arises from the working of machinery, and to some extent that is true; but here, where only the needle and thread are used, the hours are longer than in the worst-regulated manufactories in the north of England. On my way down to the House this afternoon I met a Gentleman well known to most of those I am now addressing. He communicated to me a fact on this painful subject which has come under his own knowledge within the present week. A girl, only seventeen years of age, with whom a premium of 40*l.* had been paid to a fashionable milliner at the West-end, for three-years' apprenticeship, has from this day four weeks only been allowed about two hours' rest out of the twenty-four. A week ago she worked from two o'clock on the Saturday morning to eight o'clock on the Sunday morning without any time of rest—a period of thirty hours. This Gentleman, who stood in the relation of guardian to the poor girl, has taken her away from her situation in consequence of the dreadful cruelty practised upon her, and which was also inflicted upon her unhappy companions. I will not name the Lady for whom the dress was made, in the making of which these poor creatures had worked for thirty hours; it would be matter of astonishment to the House and to her, and it would give pain to one to whom I would not willingly be the cause of suffering. But it is important that you should know that these things are so; and however much you may be disposed to interfere with labour in the Factories, yet be assured there are circumstances most grievous and calamitous which are pressing upon the labouring population of this Kingdom, and which this House will do wisely to inquire into. There is something even worse than working twenty-two hours out of the twenty-four, or none would submit to it—there is such a thing as starving to death, and all the horrors that arise from absolute want; and let not the House suppose that if they pass the Clause now before them, they will do more than plaister over the sores which their own most unjust legislation has created, instead of endeavouring to renovate the constitution and going to the root of the disease, which is as well known to the Queen's Ministers, and to many hon. Members on that side of the House as to the Gentlemen by whom I am surrounded. I come now to another part of the question, to another of the fearful catalogue of charges brought against our manufacturing system. The noble Lord has drawn a terrible picture of the loss of limbs and of life in the factories. I ask honourable Members opposite to listen attentively to the statements I am about to make, for I am persuaded that on this subject the most extraordinary mis-statements and the grossest exaggerations have been received for truth. The noble Lord has mentioned Mr. Greg, and a higher authority on these questions cannot be appealed to. I have received a letter from that Gentleman, from which I will read an extract :—

“It is difficult to understand how the belief of serious accidents, much less fatal ones, being so common in mills, as to justify special legislation, can have arisen. I believe it to be not only unfounded in fact, but contrary to every body's experience. In our own mill, at Quarry Bank, which has been now in action seventy years, and employs 400 hands, we have never had but one single limb lost (and that by play), and not one single life lost inside the mill, whilst no less than four fatal accidents have happened, in my own recollection, within twenty yards of the mill in play hours. I have no hesitation in saying that a single carter is exposed to more danger than 500 persons in a mill. I hold a farm in Hertfordshire, and had not been in possession two years before one of my carters was killed. Indeed, I may truly say, that upon my two farms, together 600 acres, I have had as many fatal accidents in three years, as in all our mills, with 2,000 people employed, in all my experience.”

The noble Lord has stated that he could bring from infirmaries and dispensaries accounts to justify his statements. These accounts are most uncertain, for they do not state how the accident occurred, but only what was the occupation of the person to whom the accident had happened. Mr. Greg, for instance, told me that two men who worked for him had quarrelled at a public-house, and each man had a leg broken, and these men were entered at the infirmary as factory hands. Mr. W. R. Greg, the brother of the last gentleman, after sending me some documents, says :—

“In confirmation of the result to which these papers point, I may mention that in my factory at Bury, we have had only two fatal accidents during the seventeen years it has been running, one of these was our carter, who was run over by his own cart on the high road. The other was a dresser, a man of fifty or sixty years of age, who was found drowned in one of the reservoirs adjoining the mill. It is capable of proof—in fact, proofs have been laid on the table of the House, that factory labour is less injurious, and less liable to accident, than almost any other known. Forty people were swamped in one coal mine the other day: and last year more persons were killed in one moment in the Government powder works at Waltham, than in all the factories of Bolton and Stockport in two years.”

Another letter, from Mr. J. R. Barnes, of Bolton, states—

“Our establishment was commenced fourteen years ago, and we have had no fatal accident, and but one serious one, from a young man's hand being so injured by a main shaft, that amputation was necessary.”

I have also a statement from Mr. Samuel Ashton, a large manufacturer, and brother of the gentleman to whom the right hon. Bart. (Sir J. Graham) has referred. He says, that from 1819 to 1830, he employed 400 hands; from 1830 to 1835, 900 hands; from 1835 to 1844, 1200 hands; and that amongst all these no fatal accident has occurred during the whole of this period. Mr. Thomas Ashton says, that from 1817 to 1824, he employed 400 hands; from 1824 to 1830, 800 hands; from 1830 to 1835, 1200 hands; and from 1835 to 1844, 1400 hands, and that in all this period only two fatal accidents had occurred, one of which was in the case of an overlooker, and neither of which could any possible precaution on the part of the proprietor have prevented. Messrs. J. Howard and Co. state that from 1820 to 1844, they have employed 560 hands, and only one fatal accident has occurred, and that in the year 1820, none since then. Mr. A. W. Thorneley has for many years employed from 600 to 1000 persons, and has had no fatal accident in his mill, but has had one carter killed. In the concern with which I am myself connected and which has been at work for thirty-five years, and now employs upwards of 500 persons, only one accident has occurred which terminated fatally, and that cannot fairly be charged upon machinery, and during the whole of that period no other serious accident has taken place. The reports of the coroners in the districts of Manchester and Stockport, fully bear out these statements of private individuals. From these reports, it appears, that from February, 1842, to February, 1843, in the Manchester district, not one person has been killed by anything connected with shafting in a mill, and only two by machinery in factories; and in Stockport, during the same period—in fact, during the last two years—no person has been killed by machinery, and only one by shafting, although this district includes twenty-eight townships, and is a principal seat of the cotton trade. When the House considers how many mills there are in these districts, and the tens of thousands of persons employed in them, I think no Member can leave the House this night with an impression that there are more lives lost in cotton manufactories than in other employments; on the contrary, he must, I feel assured, be convinced that there are fewer, and that the statements of the noble Lord and his party are gross and unfounded exaggerations. Amongst carters there are far more fatal accidents than from all the factories of the United Kingdom. I could bring facts which no man could dispute, from all the manufacturing districts, to support these statements, and it appears to me to be merely trifling with legislation to establish a public prosecutor, as is intended by this Bill, for accidents occurring in mills, when it may be proved beyond dispute, that, considering the numbers employed, there is a smaller loss of life in them than in any other mode of employment open to the great mass of our population. Now I will not detain the House with more than a single remark about the cruelties which it has been alleged are practised by millowners on their workpeople, for the absurdity of such a charge must be manifest to all who take the trouble to reflect. In the Factory Report, the Commissioners state, that,—

“To the charge of cruelty brought against the mill-owners, they can give the most decided and unqualified denial. It is not only not true, but cannot generally be true. That individual instances of ill-usage do occur, is doubtless true; and they will occur so long as man is actuated by human passions; but they are exceedingly rare, more rare, indeed, than in any other occupation in which children are employed.”

It is notorious, that the persons employed in mills, and in cotton mills especially, obtain a higher rate of wages than most others of the operative classes, and if they are thus better paid they must necessarily be more independent, and more able to resist aggression; and as they work generally along with their parents or relations, they have an additional security against ill-usage of every description. The charge of immorality produced by factory labour is as groundless as that of cruelty inflicted, for, in page 201 of the Report, it is stated :—

“As to the immorality said to be engendered by the factory system, the whole current of testimony goes to shew that the charges made against cotton factories on this head are calumnies.”

On a former occasion the noble Lord brought a charge against the character of the working population of the town of Leeds. Were his statement a fair one, the condition of that town must be horrible in the extreme. Happily the charge was a most unfair one; and in a letter dated June 13, 1843, and referring to that charge, the then Mayor of Leeds says,—

“In the appalling statement made by Lord Ashley of the degraded moral condition of Leeds, he quoted a passage from the Statistical Report of the Town Council, to shew how many juvenile offenders were brought before the Magistrates for the borough, and by implication how immoral must be the general character of society in Leeds and similar large towns. This passage is an extract from a

Note which I myself appended to one of the tables on 'Crime.' I am well acquainted with the moral condition of the people, and you have my authority for stating that the inferences attempted to be drawn from that paragraph are entirely unwarrantable. That in a considerable community like Leeds there should be a large number of young delinquents, must be at once admitted. Most of them are the children of idle and profligate parents, who are attracted to a large town by the various resources which it offers to enable them to escape regular labour. They do not belong to the working population of the district. They pursue chiefly a life of vagrancy, or adopt such eccentric modes of obtaining a livelihood as serve only as a covering for various acts of mendicancy or petty theft. Their children form no proportion of the juvenile population of the borough, nor of the aggregate amount of children employed in factories. To refer to these unfortunates as a type of the whole community of young persons, is as absurd as it would be to select as specimens of the physical vigour of the rising generation of operatives, the feeble and stunted children of a parish workhouse, who for the most part are the offspring of vice, and the heirs of disease.

"Lord Ashley also quotes the evidence of an active police-officer, Mr. Child, in support of his dark picture of the moral condition of our town. No one can be better informed as to the worst features of our social state than that useful functionary: but to select his testimony in illustration of the general inquiry as to our moral condition, is obviously unreasonable and unfair. The particular facts stated by him are no doubt painfully true, but they furnish no information, as to the moral circumstances of the entire community, much less of that particular class of it, the young people employed in factories.

"Why did not these impartial Commissioners inquire from other parties, besides police-officers, as to the tendency of factory labour upon our youthful population? Why did they not advance from the constable to the Magistrate, or to the Magistrates' clerk? If, indeed, the latter had been examined in relation to this important investigation, a very different result would have transpired. You have my authority for stating that the young people employed in factories are seldom brought before our local police tribunals; and the criminal youths so prominently referred to by Lord Ashley, as an important part of our local population, are not those who have been educated in our Sunday-schools or are trained to labour in our factories, but the miserable and neglected children of the most reckless members of society, who have had the most imperfect education, and who have been at an early period initiated in the habits of indolence, profligacy, and vice."

The noble Lord on this occasion has not said much about the education and religion of the manufacturing districts. From his speech one would suppose such matters were altogether unheard of there. It may therefore be worth while to mention a few facts bearing on this. It has been ascertained that more churches and chapels have been erected, in proportion to the population, in the manufacturing districts than in the city of Westminster, or in the whole of this metropolis. The returns shew that places of worship in the manufacturing parts of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire, afford sittings for 45 per cent. of the population, while in the metropolis it is only 30 per cent. In the northern districts the increase of population from 1800 to 1841 has been 127 per cent. while the increase of sittings in places of worship has been not less than 219 per cent. I can also refer to educational efforts and progress in connection with several of the large manufactories. One of these at Darwen employs 1382 persons,—619 males and 763 females,—of whom 912 can read well, 435 can read a little, and only thirty-five cannot read. In another manufactory at Rawtenstall there are eighty-one boys and seventy-five girls in a school supported by the proprietors of the works. In the schools on the premises of my friends, H. and E. Ashworth near Bolton, there are 316 children attending the day-schools, and 615 in the Sunday-schools. It would be well for the landholders to look a little at these and many similar cases, and to take example from them, rather than engage in the work of throwing obloquy on the manufacturers of the north. On this point I will read to the House an extract from a letter from a Gentleman of the first respectability, and which I have received to-day. It refers to a meeting recently held in the town of Ashton-under-Lyne on the subject of education:—

"The meeting to which you refer was composed solely of the friends and members of Dissenting congregations in the town of Ashton, who were desirous to aid in the effort now being generally made to promote the great cause of education among the labouring classes. On that occasion 2,007*l.* was subscribed by the parties present, 200*l.* of which was from the operative classes,—vis. spinners, weavers, and other hands employed in mills. Subscriptions are still proceeding amongst those members who were unavoidably absent, and the whole amount will reach 3,000*l.*, of

Now, can the noble Lord, or any one else, produce a similar case from the agricultural districts? I venture to say that no such case can there be found. For the character of the manufacturing population I may also refer hon. Members to the Report of the Commission sent down to Stockport in the month of January, 1842. I will read the concluding paragraph of that Report, and anything more conclusive as to the merits of the working classes of that town, I cannot hope to discover.

"In the course of these enquiries, the general character and condition of the operatives employed in the cotton trade have been peculiarly the objects of our observation. We have seen that, in an ordinary state of the trade, those of the operatives who are employed, (as the mass of them are), in connexion with steam-power machinery, appear to command, by the value of their labour, the means of enjoyment of the comforts of life to an extent and degree unknown to a large portion of the population of this country; and there is little doubt, that persons so circumstanced must consume, in a degree which far exceeds the proportion of their numbers, the natural produce of this and of foreign countries, thereby contributing largely to the prosperity of other classes of their countrymen, as well as to those sources of revenue by which the national liabilities are in a great part sustained.

"We find, in connexion with the large earnings of this class, industrious habits of no common stamp, regulated and secured, in great measure, by the peculiar nature of their employment; and a degree of intelligence already much in advance of other classes of the working people, and still growing with the general growth of popular education. It appears, also, that when in the enjoyment of prosperity they avail themselves, to a great extent, of the advantages of Provident Institutions, and that, partly through this, and partly through other circumstances, equally creditable to their character as a working people, they avoid almost altogether dependence upon Poor rates. On the recurrence of general distress, we find them neither a pauperised mass, nor readily admitting pauperism among them; but struggling against adversity, beating far and wide for employment, and in many cases leaving their country for foreign climates, rather than depend upon other resources for subsistence than those of their own industry and skill. Those among them who have not been able or willing to leave a place, where at present their labour is of little or no value, have been found enduring distress with patience, and abstaining, sometimes to the injury of health, from making any application for relief; while others, who have been driven reluctantly to that extremity, we have seen receiving a degree of relief sufficient only to support life, often with thankfulness and gratitude, and generally without a murmur or complaint. We feel assured that the sufferings of a population, whose general character and condition are such as we have endeavoured to describe them, will meet with sympathy and consideration from all classes of their fellow subjects; and that the interests of that branch of trade which has furnished such a population with employment, will be held entitled to peculiar attention from the Legislature of the country."

And in drawing the attention of the House to this remarkable extract, I affirm, fearlessly, that if the Commissioners say no more than the truth, the statement of the noble Lord can only be considered as a most unfair and exaggerated picture of the factory districts and the factory population. I have also in my possession a note from Mr. W. Chambers, of Edinburgh, one of that distinguished firm from whom so much that tends to inform and to elevate the artisans of this country has proceeded, in which he states, that of 85,000 copies of their "Chambers' Joyrinal" sold weekly, not less than four-fifths are disposed of in the manufacturing districts. Lanarkshire and Lancashire afford the greatest number of readers, the latter county alone taking more than 20,000 copies, while to Dorsetshire probably not fifty copies are sent. But in making these statements to the House, I am not about to deny the sufferings and the wrongs of the manufacturing population. Before I had the honour of a seat in this House, I was one of a deputation that more than once had an interview with the right hon. Baronet on the subject of those sufferings and those wrongs. What I contend for is this, that as respects the remuneration for labour, and the state of society, and the general comfort of the population, the cotton districts may stand a comparison with any other in the kingdom. I could give ample proof of this, but I will confine myself to only a few facts. It has been stated that a large proportion of the females employed in mills are married, but the returns to which I will ask your attention will shew that this is not the case. If all the noble Lord said on this point were true, if the cases he stated, but for which he gave no authority, were the rule, instead of being, as I am sure they are, the exception, such a state of things would go far to justify interference of an extraordinary description on the part of the Legislature. The first case to which I ask the attention of the House is that of the concern in which I am a partner, and I have no reason to suppose that it presents a more favourable view than that of my neighbours. We employ 518 persons, and their ages and amount of wages are as follows:—

Males.		s.	d.
13 to 16	69 employed.—Average
	Weekly earnings	6	6
17 to 21	69 " "	8	10
21 & upwards	131 " "	16	0
Females.
13 to 16	84 employed.—Average
	Weekly earnings	6	3
17 to 21	106 " "	8	3
21 & upwards	59 " "	11	11
Total.	518 persons.—Average
	Weekly earnings	10	1

Thus it will be seen, that whilst between the ages of 13 and 21 years, the females are 190, and the males only 138, yet that of those above 21 years of age, 131 are men, and only 59 are women: thus proving beyond dispute, that after that period, which may be termed a marriageable age, the women are to a very large extent withdrawn from factory employment, and remain at home engaged in their domestic duties. I have another case which gives nearly the same result. From an establishment near Bolton, belonging to H. and E. Ashworth, I have the following statement. They employ 675 persons above the age of 13 years, and 98 children under 13 years, working short time; in all, 773.

Males.		s.	d.
	weekly earnings	4	8½
17 to 21	97 " "	9	5½
21 & upwards	136 " "	21	2½
Females.
13 to 16	113 employed.—Average
	weekly earnings	4	8
17 to 21	135 " "	6	7
21 & upwards	68 " "	8	9½
In all	675 persons.—Average
	weekly earnings	9	5½

Of the 98 short time hands, 49 are boys, and 49 are girls; their average earnings for the half week's work being 1s. 6d.

Here again we have between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one years, 223 males and 248 females, whilst above twenty-one years, there are 136 men and sixty-eight women, shewing that at twenty-one years, or thereabout, the women are withdrawn from factory employment, and betake themselves to household and family duties. But the rate of remuneration is a subject well worth enquiring into; and how do we stand in this respect? I allude to the concern of which I am a partner from no wish to boast, many establishments in the trade being superior to ours in almost every particular, but because I am well acquainted with the facts I now produce. We have near our premises fifty-one cottages, whose fifty-one families are all employed by us. In these fifty-one cottages there are 314 persons, and of these 166 are employed, being about 6½ individuals, and 3¼ workers in each cottage. The average weekly earnings of each of these 166 workers are 11s., and the average weekly earnings of each family are 35s. 9d., and the average annual income of each of these families is 92l. 19s. The account furnished me from other mills is equally favourable, and I am quite sure equally true. H. and E. Ashworth's statement shews a list of sixty-nine families; the average number of individuals in each is 5½; the average number of workers in each is 2½; being in all 228 individuals, and 115 workers. The average weekly earnings of each worker are 11s. 4½d.; the average weekly income of each family is 33s. 4d., and the average annual income of each family is 87l. 7s. 3½d. From Messrs. Whitehead and Brothers, of Rawtenstall, I have the following returns:—These Gentlemen employ 342 persons, and I may remark that in this case there is the same withdrawal of women from factory employment above the age of twenty-one years. In thirty-two cottages there are in each, on the average, six individuals, and 3½ workers. The average weekly income of each of these families is 33s. 0½d., and only one of these heads of families has received parochial relief, and that one a widow, whose means of living were for a time taken away by the destruction of a mill by fire. Of the 342 persons they employ, the average weekly earnings are 9s. 6½d. I know that to read over these details is tedious to the House, but they are facts most important for this House to be acquainted with, and I cannot with a due regard to my duty as a Member of it, and towards that vast branch of our national industry with which I feel it an honour to be connected withhold them. From Messrs. Eccles, Shorrock, and Co. of Darwen, I have the following statement:—They have 54 families, including 396 individuals, and 230 workers; the average number in each family is  $7\frac{1}{2}$ , of workers 43. The average weekly earnings of these 230 workers are 10s. 7d.; the average weekly income of each family is 45s. 1d.; the average annual income of each family is 117l. 7s. 9d. From J. R. Barnes and Sons, of Farnworth Mills, near Bolton, I have the following statement:— They have 81 families, including 442 individuals, and 197 workers. The average weekly earnings of each worker are 12s. 9d.; the average weekly income of each family is 31s.; the average annual income of each family is 80l. 12s. Now, very few of all these families have ever received parish relief; from enquiry made in the case I have given from Rawtenstall, out of 32 families, only one has received such relief, and out of the 51 families I have mentioned connected with our own concern, I believe only three have received such relief; and these are cases in which distress of no ordinary kind has driven honest independence to this resource, and when my brother made the inquiry necessary to enable me to state these facts, he was careful so to make the inquiry as to avoid wounding the feelings of those, by whom a character for honest independence is held in the utmost esteem. What a contrast does this present when compared with the state of things in Dorsetshire, and some of the neighbouring counties, where one in seven or eight of the whole population, including nobility, gentry, clergy, bankers, professional men, farmers, merchants, and traders, and labourers of every class, is almost invariably receiving parochial assistance. I will now call the attention of the House, and especially of the Members for the county of Suffolk, to a fact which I trust will silence the cry of injury done to farm labourers by a removal to the manufacturing districts. My friends, H. and E. Ashworth have been slandered over and over again, because they engaged some of these labourers, for whom in their native counties the only choice was the Union house or starvation. Let us see how the case really stands. One of these labourers, Samuel Rudlen, came from Suffolk in the year 1836. His family then consisted of 10 persons; his earnings as farm-labourer were 8s. per week; his eldest boy, about 14 years of age, 2s. per week; next younger (cow boy), 12 years, 1s. per week; parish allowance one peck of flour worth 1s. 4d.; 10 persons to 12s. 4d., or

1s. 2d.  $\frac{1}{2}$  per head per week. Now his family consists of 11 persons, and they earn altogether 55s. per week, or 5s. per head per week. Several families came from the south about the same period and under similar circumstances but the chief part of them, having so far improved their circumstances as to enable them to remove to other mills or localities have done so whenever they saw a chance of receiving a higher rate of wages. Similar cases might be afforded with regard to labourers from Buckinghamshire and other counties. I think I have now said enough with regard to this part of the subject—apparently too much for hon. Gentlemen opposite, who appear only anxious to hear and applaud one side, and many of whom have not even heard that. But notwithstanding all these facts I admit there are evils, serious evils, and much distress in the manufacturing districts; many are still out of employment, and in many branches of trade wages are low. We have violent fluctuations in trade, and periods when multitudes endure great suffering and it becomes this House to inquire why do these fluctuations occur, and what is the great cause of their suffering. I attribute much of this to the mistaken and unjust policy pursued by this House, with respect to the trade and industry of the country. Hitherto manufacturers have had no fair chance: you have interfered with their natural progress, you have crippled them by your restrictions, you have at times almost destroyed them by monopolies, you have made them the sources of your public revenue, and the upholders of your rents, but at your hands they have never to this moment received justice and fair dealing. I do not charge the noble Lord with dishonesty, but I am confident if he had looked at this question with as anxious a desire to discover truth, as he has to find materials for his case, he would have found many subjects of congratulation to counterbalance every one which he would have had reason to deplore. The noble Lord and hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they view from their distant eminence the state of the manufacturing districts, look through the right end of the telescope; what they see is thus brought near to them, and is greatly magnified; but when they are asked to look at the rural districts, they reverse the telescope and then everything is thrown to the greatest possible distance and is diminished as much as possible. That great hardships were once practised in the manufactories of this country cannot be denied, but a most gratifying change and improvement has taken place since the time when the respected father of the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) was so largely connected with them. But this change has not arisen from legislation in this House; it has sprung from that general improvement which is observable throughout all classes of the community. The treatment of children in schools is now rational and humane,—formerly it was irrational and cruel; the treatment of lunatics in our asylums was once a disgrace to humanity,—now, how great is the change; the prisoners in our gaols feel the influence of this growing sentiment in favour of gentler treatment; and the spread of civilization and consideration for each other among the people has done infinitely more for the weak and helpless than all the laws which this House has ever passed. I do not charge the noble Lord with being actuated by feelings of malice in his conduct towards the manufacturers of this country, but I do believe him to have been, and to be now, grossly imposed upon by the persons upon whose information he relies. I can tell the noble Lord that he will never obtain credit for the statements he makes, unless he can obtain them from more honest characters than those he has hitherto employed. I know that one of these individuals has published many statements respecting the manufactories of the north, some of which are wholly false, and most of which, I believe, are grossly and malignantly exaggerated. I have in my hand two of these publications one is “The Adventures of William Dodd the Factory Cripple” and the other is entitled “The Factory System,” and consists of letters addressed to the noble Lord,—both books have gone forth to the public under the sanction of the noble Lord. I do not wish to go into the particulars of the character of this man, for it is not necessary to my case, but I can demonstrate, that his books and statements are wholly unworthy of credit. Dodd states that from the hardships he endured in a factory, he was “done up” at the age of thirty-two, whereas I can prove that he was treated with uniform kindness, which he repaid by gross immorality of conduct, and for which he was at length discharged from his employment. I have in my possession letters written by this individual, in which he states that the noble Lord and his party had used him as long as they could get any thing out of him. He said also, that the noble Lord had given him dinners at his own house, and that when he applied for a small balance due to him, the noble Lord had written him an angry letter, recounting the dinners he had eaten at his table. He had also stated that the noble Lord had shown him to his visitors as a cripple, as a specimen of what the factories were doing for the population employed in them. I do not wish to dwell upon this point, but I am free to tell the noble Lord, that unless he employs agents more respectable his statements and his professions of benevolence will ever be viewed with suspicion by the manufacturers of the north and I may add, that others who are thus employed, are in no degree more respectable or more creditable than Dodd. I beg the House to remember that Lancashire, the seat of the cotton manufacture contains a larger population than any other county in the United Kingdom. It has a population of 1,600,000, of whom not less than 900,000, or 56 per cent. on the whole, are in employment and in the receipt of wages, and without doubt a larger number are there employed than on any other equal surface in any part of the globe. The labourers employed in the cotton trade are more steadily employed and better paid than in any other trade in this country. I admit this people have suffered severely, but they have struggled manfully with the adversity which has overtaken them, whilst we have been foolish enough to permit the existence of monopolies and injustices, enough to have destroyed for ever the energies and the prosperity of an ordinary people. In addition to these monopolies, we have taxes most oppressive and unequal. The tax on raw cotton alone amounts to 50*l.* to 100*l.* per week on many manufacturing establishments; that with which I am connected being thus burthened to the amount of 75*l.* per week; and as four-fifths of all these manufactures are exported, and compete with foreign manufacturers who pay no such tax, the whole amount of it must come out of the profits and the wages of those engaged in the cotton trade. The noble Lord, the Member for Liverpool, says, he is most anxious to improve the condition of the working classes; he points to more education, a higher state of morals, better food and better clothing, as the result of the adoption of the proposition now before the House. But there is one thing that noble Lord has failed to prove; he has failed to show how working only ten hours will give the people more sugar. The noble Lord is the representative of the sugar monopolists of Liverpool, and, after voting to deprive the people of sugar, he is perfectly consistent in denying them the liberty even to work. The people ask for freedom for their industry, for the removal of the shackles on their trade; you deny it to them, and then forbid them to labour, as if working less would give them more food, whilst your monopoly laws make food scarce and dear. Give them liberty to work, give them the market of the world for their produce, give them the power to live comfortably, and increasing means and increasing intelligence will speedily render them independent enough and wise enough to bring the duration of labour to that point at which life shall be passed with less of irksome toil of every kind, and more of recreation and enjoyment. It is because I am convinced this project is now impracticable, and that under our present oppressive Legislation, it would make all past injustice only more intolerable, that I shall vote against the proposition which the noble Lord, the Member for Dorset, has submitted to the House.

Lord Ashley: I think the House will feel that in some measure I have a right to make one or two observations on the remarkable speech of the hon. Gentleman: I will thank the hon. Gentleman to explain that charge against me which he has insinuated, and which he said he would not pursue. I will not allow it to pass. I therefore throw myself on the indulgence and on the protection of this House; and I do request all hon. Gentlemen present to exert their influence, as members of this House and as gentlemen, to make the hon. Member for Durham pursue his charge, and state his case.

Mr. Bright: What is the charge the noble Lord alludes to? I told the noble Lord, that the instruments he carried on his operations with were not worthy of his cause or of him. I am prepared to maintain that assertion. I make no charge against the noble Lord: I tell him that I think he is much misled by these men. I am prepared to prove that those agents of the noble Lord are of a character, that I would not take their evidence with respect to agricultural matters; and I think it is not fair that it should be taken with respect to manufacturing matters. If the noble Lord wishes to have information respecting manufacturing affairs, nineteen out of twenty, nay, all the respectable manufacturers in Lancashire would be willing to give it him.

Lord Ashley: What, no charge? No "unpaid balance," I suppose! No "cripple paraded for exhibition!" Well, if the hon. Member says he has made no charge, and, if before the assembled Commons of England he is prepared to assert that he made no charge against me, I can assure him with satisfaction, that the matter may there rest. But those who heard the hon. Gentleman's statement, can best judge whether a charge were made; and those who hear me can best judge whether the hon. Member had the courage to maintain it. But let me appeal to the House: I ask, did I in the course of a long speech which the House was kind enough to listen to, say anything to provoke personal feeling? Did I utter one single sentence calculated to exasperate a single individual, or throw into the discussion of this great matter sentiments or expressions unbecoming so sacred a subject? If the hon. Gentleman thinks that his course of proceeding is the way in which he can maintain his own case, I must say that I am extremely sorry for it, because I think it is not suited to the dignity of the subject, not suited to the assembly in which we sit, and not suited by any means to that most respectable society of which the hon. Gentleman is a member.

Mr. Bright: The noble Lord is entirely mistaken. I say the noble Lord is entirely mistaken if he supposes that I judge of his character by the character of the men in whom I tell him to put no trust. I tell the noble Lord plainly, that I have letters in my hand, which will prove all that I have stated. I will hand them to the noble Lord with pleasure. I will go further, and tell the noble Lord, that the individual who wrote the letters I hold in my hand, offered, for a sum of money, to sell a friend of mine a large number of other letters, which that friend of mine was, as I think, too fastidious to lay hold of. I tell the noble Lord not to trust these men. I have always thought that the noble Lord was honest in his convictions. I have always said so, both in public and in private; but I repeat that the instruments that he has worked with are not worthy of him or his cause. That is all I have to say. [Cries of "Read."] Here is the first extract. It is from a letter bearing date

" As I had strained at a gnat, it was clear to them that I should not do to swallow a camel. In other words, had I allowed their ill-feeling to vent itself, and come before the public under my name, I should have wrote a very different book from that which I produced, and even that I am almost ashamed of."

[An hon. Member : " What has that to do with it ? " ]

" This is the manner in which I was taken hold of to serve party purposes, the work I was employed on, the hopes and expectations held out to me, the insignificant wages I received, and, now that they have got all out of me that they can, the manner in which I am cast off for ever."

In the same letter there was this passage :—

" In order that you may know what sort of a man he is (a person of the name of Jowett, and connected with Lord Ashley), I will tell you what were the orders I received from him previous to visiting your place last year. He told me—' You must go to Turton and get all the information you can concerning the works of Messrs. Ashworth—they are show mills. The Ashworths are deep, cunning people, and you must take particular care not to come into contact with them or their people.' Thus you see I was to stroll about the vicinity of your mills, and get into the company of your people, and by treating them with beer or by other means, was to get the information I required, and if from one whom you had cast off, so much the better."

In another letter there occurred this passage :—

" In my necessity I wrote to Lord Ashley, stating my circumstances, and asking for a remittance of a small balance due for services rendered."

Here (said the hon. Member) I beg it to be understood that I don't believe a word of this. Why, would I convict the noble Lord upon evidence which I do not credit, and which I would call upon him not to believe if it was used against myself?

" Due for services rendered—and in reply I received a very angry letter, saying,"—these words (said the hon. Member) are in inverted commas—' saying that I had no claim on them—that my employment was a mere matter of charity—that I had received so much money,' and he even recounted the dinners I had received at his Lordship's table, and told me of the condition I was in at the time he took notice of me, and other matters equally galling. It is clear that party only used me as a tool, and having made all the use of me they can, send me about my business. If I was clear of the party I could a tale unfold, but, circumstanced as I am, this would be my ruin."

" Now, mind," said the hon. Member, " I bring no charge against the noble Lord of intentionally doing wrong. I say so sincerely. My friends know that in private I have always spoken of the noble Lord with respect, and I can assure him that it was with sorrow I learned that he was employing agents who were not trustworthy. There are other letters from a man named Jowett, which he offered to sell for 35*l.* to a particular friend of mine, but my friend refused to buy them; and I can tell the noble Lord circumstances with respect to other persons, which would lead him, I am sure, to form the same conclusion, that they are not trustworthy. And now I only hope that it is clearly understood that I have not said one word that is derogatory to the character of the noble Lord. I repeat, I have much respect for the noble Lord, but I am as much interested in this question as he can be, and I thought it better for the cause, and fairer to the noble Lord himself, that I should state these things to the world from this place, than that I should write a letter to the newspapers, or publish the statements in a pamphlet. I regret it if in stating these things I have said a word that could be considered derogatory to the character of the noble Lord. I know I am of a warm temperament, but I mean no personal insult; I desire merely to state facts."

Lord Ashley: It is high time, I think, that this sort of interlocutory matter should cease. I assure the hon. Gentleman on my part that I willingly accept his explanation. I am ready to believe that he meant nothing that was personally offensive. It is perfectly true that I was acquainted with Dodd, and it is perfectly true also that he called on me in London. I received a letter from him in which he stated, that he had been injured whilst working in a factory. He afterwards called on me, and certainly I never saw a more wretched object. He had lost his hand, and I may say had almost lost his shape. He hardly looked indeed like a human being. I certainly assisted him, and as far as refreshments went he had them, not with me, but I told him that if he chose to come when the servants dined he might have some dinner with them. He afterwards went down into the manufacturing districts, and from there he wrote me some letters; but I assure the hon. Gentleman that I never except once quoted a single fact from any one of his communications. Certain facts regarding him have since come to my knowledge, and I am certainly inclined now to think that he was unworthy my kindness.*

Mr. Warburton said, that the matter seem to have taken a new shape. He therefore would move that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed. — Committee to sit again.

House adjourned at one o'clock.

* The following are extracts from the letters referred to by Mr. Bright. In a letter to Messrs. Ashworth of Bolton, under date September 26, 1842. Dodd writes:—

"You are, Gentlemen, from personal observation, acquainted with my unhappy situation, you are also, I have no doubt, aware that my case has been laid hold of by Lord Ashley and his party in furtherance of their own views and objects; that I have been held up to public view by these philanthropists (?) as an object of charity, and as an instance of the cruelty of the manufacturers, and you will be surprised when I say that after all this fuss, I have been extremely ill-used by them. I have no blame to attach to Lord Ashley, except being misled, and induced to act contrary to his promises, by a man of the name of Benjamin Jowett, the man of all work for the ten hours' Bill party, and he is also the author of a pamphlet called 'The Conspiracy,' in which work your name and that of Mr. Greg, of Ashton, is prominently set forth. This man Jowett is not the friend of the working classes, and he deserves to be shewn in his true colours. He has injured me to a great extent. I should most willingly undertake to show the factory operatives and the public, that he and his party are not to be relied on; and was I to state the facts I am in possession of, it would, in my opinion, disperse the junta of which he is the organ; but this exposure would destroy my present source of living, and my future prospects, by setting all my friends against me, and without I was protected by some other parties, it would involve me in inevitable ruin."

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By the Bishop of Bangor, from several places, against Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—From Cornwall Medical Association, for Medical Reform.—By the Marquess of Exeter, from 55 places, for Protection to Agriculture.—By Earl Fitzwilliam, from Glasgow, respecting Ireland.

SLAVERY IN THE UNITED STATES.] Lord Denman wished, he said, to address a few observations to their Lordships on a subject that had been referred to by a noble and learned Friend of his a few nights before; who had stated that there had been in Louisiana the capital conviction of a person for promoting the escape of a slave; but when the subject had been brought before their Lordships, there appeared then to serve party purposes, the work I have been employed upon, the insignificant wages I have received, the hopes and expectations which have been held out to me, and now (when they have got all out of me they can) the manner in which I have been cast off, even by Lord Ashley himself, without assigning any reason, and refusing to listen to my claims, all this would form a pamphlet as large as that of Jowett's, which I inclose."

"I could then expose this Jowett, who has taken so much pains, as you will see by the inclosed pamphlet, to cast a stigma on your firm and others. In order that you may know what sort of a man this is, I will tell you the orders I received from him, previous to visiting your place last year. 'You must go to Turton and get all the information you can concerning the works of Messrs. Ashworth, they are show mills. The Ashworths are deep, cunning fellows, and you must take particular care not to come in contact with them, or their people.' Thus you see, I was to stroll about in the immediate vicinity of your mills, and get in the company of any stray person I might see, and by treating them with beer or by any other means, get all the information I required—if the person was one that you had cast off, so much the better."

"My name having acquired a notoriety in consequence of the manner in which my case has been held up to the public, I have had an offer to write articles on the Factory System, for a low weekly paper; I have already wrote one as a trial, but it is much against my feelings, only it supplies me with a dinner when, otherwise, I might probably be obliged to go without."

"November 2, 1842.

"You will perhaps be surprised to hear, that in my necessity, I wrote to Lord Ashley, stato be no great reason to fear that the sentence passed would be carried into effect. The probability then was, that the law being once declared, denouncing the heaviest punishment against offences of this description, that declaration would have been thought sufficient—that it was not likely, or credible, that a law like this would have been carried into execution. But, unfortunately, since that time a document had been published in the public papers, with respect to the authenticity of which no doubt could be entertained, and by which it appeared that on the 25th April one of their fellow-creatures would undergo the punishment of death for having promoted the escape of a slave! Now, nobody could be more sensible than himself that it was the duty, the right of all States to lay down rules which were to guide the conduct of all their people; and the duty of all other States to abstain from interfering with them; but from the deep respect which they entertained in this country—and he spoke, he might say, in the name of the whole judicial body—for the manner in which justice was administered in America, the humanity and legal knowledge which guided its proceedings, and inspired the eminent men who presided in the courts, and communicated their decisions, that he was induced to advert to this subject here, entreating of all in authority, in the name of humanity and of justice, to pause a moment, and consider whether such a sentence ought to be ling my circumstances, and requesting the remittance of a small balance due to me for services rendered, and received a very angry letter, saying that I had 'no claim upon them, that my employment was 'a mere matter of charity,' that I had received so much money, and even recounted the dinners I had received at his Lordship's table, and told me the condition I was in at the time he took notice of me, and other matters equally galling. It is very clear that the party has all along considered me only as a tool, and that having made all the use they can of me, I may now go about my business. I am sorry that I am not in a situation in life as would enable me to speak my mind freely; was I in a good business and entirely independent of the party, I could "a tale unfold," but this, circumstanced as I now am, would be my ruin."

"EXPLANATION.

"Sir,—I have numbered the letters, &c., from one to thirteen, for the purpose of enabling you more easily to comprehend their contents, and hope you will have no difficulty in understanding the whole affair; but lest anything should appear doubtful, I have given the following explanation which will assist you a little. These are but a few of the papers, but they will be sufficient to shew you the nature of the business they wanted me for.

Had I allowed Mr. Jowett to put forth his statements under my name, I should not have received this letter, neither would I have been cast off without a hearing in the presence of Mr. Jowett, my accuser, as I have been. In this letter there are many erroneous statements, which I could contradict if I had an opportunity."

carried into effect. He believed that no such event had ever happened before, and he believed that every consideration of self-respect would induce them to forego the intention. The State of Louisiana was remarkable for being one of the first in which the sanguinary code of former times was mitigated. Many years ago, Mr. Livingston drew up a code much less severe than that which had previously existed, and all the nations of Europe, including our own, had been proud to take a lesson of humanity from it, and had found the benefit of it in a diminution in the amount of aggravated crimes. Neither the general question of Slavery, nor any abstract question was involved; but he would respectfully ask how far a punishment so disproportioned to the offence should be carried into effect, as a matter of expediency. He knew that some persons might apprehend that a public avowal of sentiments of this kind might, when conveyed across the Atlantic, give rise to a degree of jealousy and irritation, increasing the probability of the sentence being carried into execution; but, from the best inquiries he had been able to make on this subject, it was his most decided conviction that he incurred no danger of this sort; that some benefit might be produced, and that it was quite impossible that there could be any injury from those opinions being stated. Indeed, it required but a moment's consideration to be perfectly convinced that, in a civilized state, no motive could be afforded for carrying such a law into effect by the expression of opinion in any part of the world. It was, therefore, with a deep feeling on his part, with the same feeling on the part of some of his learned brethren, though they felt that as a body they were precluded from coming forward, that he thus publicly called attention to the subject. He hoped that those to whom his appeal was made would feel that the devoting a fellow-creature to death, for a crime such as this man had been convicted of, was throwing back the cause of civilization, and risking the protection of the property which the law was intended to defend. He had given no notice to Her Majesty's Government of his intention to bring this matter forward, being fully aware that it was utterly impossible for the State to interfere in any way. He did not ask for any answer. It was only from the probability that this sentence might be mitigated by the expression of public opinion, that in the few hours which he could take from the circuit he had given up a portion of that time to call for a reconsideration of this matter on the ground of the general principles of humanity and expediency; for every man who thought must know, that on the respect which attends the execution of the law, its efficiency must depend.

[THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENTS.] The Earl of Ripon proposed the second reading of the Three-and-a-Half per Cents Bill. The object which they had in view was to reduce the interest upon those annuities from Three-and-a-Half per Cent. to Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. in the first instance, and ultimately to Three per Cent. His Lordship described the mode in which it was proposed to effect this object, as detailed elsewhere by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and congratulated the House on the fact, that the state of the actual resources of the country enabled them to make this important change, and give the public the benefit of this great saving, without adding to the permanent debt of the country.

Lord Brougham expressed his entire approval of the measure as being one of vast public benefit, and said, that the operation testified to all Europe the solidity of the resources of this country and its untouched credit, a reputation which they owed to their having religiously abstained on this side of the Atlantic—that was, the European English had abstained from doing anything that might have a tendency, or the shadow of a tendency, to impeach the right of the creditor to be paid by his debtor. The manner in which this measure had been planned and carried into execution deserved the highest praise. Instead of effecting this reduction of interest by giving a bonus, or by any other plan by which the capital of the public debt would be increased, there had been a careful avoiding of making any increase to the capital of the debt. Such a proceeding must give additional confidence to the country and to the friends of this country in the stability of its resources.

Lord Monteagle said, the change was a very important one, and if he differed with the mode in which it had been carried into effect, it was as to details only. With the general mode in which the proposal had been carried out he entirely concurrent. The measure was one of unexampled magnitude, affecting an immense mass of capital, yet there had not been the slightest alarm caused by it, although there were no less than 81,000 holders of stock whose dividends were under 10%. This was to be attributed to the great confidence those holders had in the resources and in the good faith of the country. The arrangement was the more satisfactory, because it was not made by any undue tampering with the credit or currency of the country. It was effected on sound and rational principles. If they had a large surplus revenue with which they could effect the reduction, the operation could not be considered unjust, when there was a great reduction in the interest of money throughout the country at the same time. It was not then a question of choice, but of paramount duty to take that step. Whatever might be the pressure on individuals, it was the bounden duty of Government to propose the reduction for the purpose of assisting the credit of the country. The great reduction of interest on money was not altogether an unmixed benefit. The lowering of the value of money tended to increase speculation in the same ratio, and this had, on former occasions, been attended with great public inconvenience and mischief. There were some evils from which they were somewhat protected at present. Formerly the low rate of interest induced people to invest their capital in all kinds of foreign securities; but he believed the experience of what had happened within the last ten years tended very much to guard against the recurrence of that evil. They found in the end that the British Funds were the best and safest. If they looked to what occurred in the Old and the New World in that period, it would prove the importance of maintaining public credit. If the American States had maintained their credit, they would now feel the advantage of the employment of British capital, their territory would have afforded us the best market for our products, and the advantages would have been reciprocal. In 1824 there was a great abundance of money; that was followed by the subsequent over-speculation and calamity of 1825 and 1826. He believed, that there was still a tendency to such exaggerated speculation, and there would be some danger of it in the trade recently opened with China; he understood this trade had been carried to a great excess and consequently the profits would be found far from remunerating. This was a great reduction, and it proceeded on just and sound principles. It would add to the public revenue no less a sum than 1,200,000*l.* per annum. He, therefore, hoped on this, as well as on other grounds, that they should obtain a remission of the Property and Income Tax at the time originally fixed. He also hoped that the opportunity would not be lost for a revision of the taxation of the country. The country was much obliged to the Government for the changes they had introduced into the Customs' Laws last year, and he trusted they would in justice to themselves explain in that House and the other House of Parliament the effect which those alterations had produced, because he believed they would find that in proportion as they applied those principles which ought to regulate Financial and Customs' legislation, they had profited by those measures. He could not sit down without observing, that the diminution in the charge of the Public Debt made by the country since the close of the war had been greater than the most sanguine prophet could by possibility have anticipated. The reductions made, and which might be made within a period which many of their Lordships might expect to live to see, were as follows:—

Annuities for terms expiring between 1841 and 1864	.... £2,506,529
Annuities for lives	..... 831,665
	<hr/> £3,338,194
Bank of England dead weight annuity	..... 585,740
	<hr/> £3,923,934
Saving on interest of funded debt from 1822 to 1850	.... 2,700,000
	<hr/> £6,623,000

The success of the experiment proved the credit of this country to an infinitely greater extent than if they had kept up an immense amount of taxation for the purpose of keeping up a Sinking Fund. If they had kept up a Sinking Fund of 5,000,000*l.* or 6,000,000*l.* a-year, they could not have operated such an amount of reduction with the same certainty. He objected to the guarantee that was given, as it was often an inconvenience—a Government being thus tied down by the acts of its predecessor, and he must say that upon principle it was to be desired that a somewhat longer notice had been given to the holders of stock. The Bill would not receive the Royal Assent until Thursday, and the time for giving notice was to expire on Saturday. This would operate as no practical grievance, he admitted, in this instance, because it would not be for the interest of the holders to object to the terms; but still he thought that on principle a longer period should have been allowed.

The Earl of Ripon was glad to find that the noble Lord's objections were confined to the details of the measure. With regard to the notice it had been limited, and he admitted that it might have been advisable to have given a more extended notice, as they had done on similar occasions; but when they dealt with a subject of this magnitude, it was important that the transaction should be closed at as early a period as possible, and as no essential injury to the parties interested could ensue, he must confess that as a matter of principle he did not feel that the Government were called upon to give longer notice. His noble Friend had alluded to the guarantee. He did not object to the principle, that it was, in general, inconvenient for a Government to tie itself up in this manner for a series of years; but it must be granted that in this case the holders of the stock were entitled to some bonus. They had received no bonus by any increase to their capital, and when it was considered that there were 81,000 holders of this stock, whose income did not exceed 10*l.* a-year, as they had no bonus in their capital, it seemed but fair and reasonable that they should have such a bonus as that which was granted to them by this measure. In respect to what his noble Friend (Lord Montea<sup>g</sup>le) had said touching the diminution of the Public Debt, that statement was, no doubt, an accurate one, and afforded a strong proof of the high character and credit of this country. In the year 1829 he had himself called the attention of their Lordships' House to that subject. Between the year 1815, when that charge was at its highest, and the year he had just referred to, the diminution of this charge had not been less than 4,000,000*l.*, representing a capital of 120,000,000*l.* Since that period other reductions had taken place; and, making allowance for the 20,000,000*l.* required to carry into effect the measure for the abolition of slavery, the reduction in the charge for the funded and unfunded debt was considerably more than 4,000,000*l.* annually. This showed most clearly and satisfactorily, that while they scrupulously respected good faith, they were enabled from time to time to get rid of some portion of their debt.

Lord Montea<sup>g</sup>le said, there was one part of the scheme which had scarcely been remarked upon, but for which he thought the Government deserved particular credit—he meant the equalization of the dividends. There was, perhaps, no measure apparently so small from which greater benefit might be expected to flow.

The Bill was then read a second time, as was also the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. (1818) Annuities Bill, and (the Standing Orders being suspended) both Bills passed through Committee.

Ordered to be read a third time.

THE CHURCH—(IRELAND).] Earl Fitzwilliam said, he had a petition to present to their Lordships, signed by the chairman of what he understood to have been a very numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Glasgow; and the petitioners prayed the consideration of their Lordships of the several points to which they alluded in the course of their petition. They referred, for the grounds upon which they exercised their right of addressing their Lordships, to the state of that country, which they said exhibited a great number of features indicative of a very unwholesome state of the body politic in that country, and one very eminently calculated to excite the utmost alarm; exhibiting an absentee and non-resident Gentry, an uneducated and discontented pauper population, inveterate religious animosities, insecurity of person and property, a contempt for the existing laws and institutions, and a growing hatred of all connexion with Great Britain. Making a little allowance for the exaggerations which were likely to prevail at meetings of large bodies, where the feeling of each individual tended to excite the feeling entertained by others, there was no doubt that the points to which the petitioners referred, were of the greatest possible importance. The petitioners concluded their statement of the grounds upon which they founded their petition with one remarkable proposition, upon which he should take the liberty of addressing a few words to their Lordships. They stated that one of the principal grievances of which Ireland had to complain, was the existence of the Established Church, which was not only exclusive and intolerant in its spirit and character, but was opposed to the consciences of the great body of the people, who viewed it as a tool of political faction, and subversive of general tranquillity; and that such an Establishment (and this was the important part of their prayer)—that such an Establishment did not admit of being amended, but that, in order to obtain the pacification of Ireland, it must be wholly abolished. It sometimes happened that when a noble Lord presented a petition to that House, he agreed in all the sentiments which the petition professed to convey, but his opinion on this section of the present petition was entirely different from that of the petitioners. He was by no means of opinion that the Church of England ought to be abolished in Ireland; on the contrary, he thought that the Established Church ought to be rendered more effective for the only true purposes for which it could be designed, namely, the administration of spiritual and religious comfort to that portion of the people to which they were adapted; but he thought the Government of this country had been guilty of a great crime in not providing for the administration of spiritual and religious comfort to the people of Ireland. The great offence of the Legislature of this country was, that for 150 years they had proscribed the Roman Catholic priesthood, and deprived the great body of the people of any legal right to the administration of religious services. He did not apprehend that there would be any such great difficulty in removing that evil. The difficulty complained of was not the difficulty of the matter itself, but it arose from the prejudices of those who had influence in the government of Ireland. When he spoke of those who had influence in the government, he did not of course mean the half dozen gentlemen who sat on the opposite side, but the great governing power of the general British community; because those who sat upon the opposite bench were only the representatives of that public feeling which they professed to govern, but which all who governed must follow in some degree in order that they might draw it after them. He was told that the Roman Catholics themselves would not consent to anything like an endowment from the State, while such a measure would be distasteful to the English people, and excite the hostility of the Dissenters, and of the whole North of Ireland. But, however distasteful to the people of England such schemes might be—although such schemes might be distasteful to the Protestants of England and Ireland, yet he must remark that those who passed through life were exposed to many disagreeable things from the hour of birth to the hour of death, and that nations were not exempt from the lot to which individuals were subject. We might be obliged to submit to many things which were disagreeable to us: the Scotch Presbyterian might be obliged to submit to things that were disagreeable to himself; the English Dissenter might be obliged to submit to things that were disagreeable; and the Irish Catholic might be subjected to things more distasteful still, if he were not inured to what was disagreeable by the legislation of England; ay, and what the Church of England herself might be reduced to feel sometimes doomed to abate some little of that authority—some little of that dominance—which with all the merits of those who administered her functions, had been a stain upon her character; and the heads of that Church might be brought to feel that there was something even more disagreeable still than the being brought to give up a small portion of that which had hitherto appertained to that sect, of which they were the ministers and the ornaments; for notwithstanding a rebuke which he had once received from a right reverend prelate, who did not often deal in rebuke, and to whom he was sure it must have been disagreeable to administer any medicine of that kind—he must, nevertheless, persevere in maintaining that even the Church of England itself was a sect. That was only one sect: the Roman Catholics of Ireland were another sect; the Presbyterians of Scotland were another; and the Independents of England constituted another. These were all different sects, and it would perhaps be a bitter pill to that sect which had hitherto been dominant to feel that the time was not far distant when some portion of those resources which had hitherto been devoted exclusively to the services of their own religion must be given up—as they ought to be given up, if the object were to act justly to the people of that country—for the maintenance of other religious establishments. He would be bound to say that if the experiment were tried—at least he had a little suspicion that if something in the nature of an Establishment were offered to the Irish Roman Catholic, he would not be disposed to reject it. But let him warn their lordships against any attempt at making the Irish Roman Catholic priesthood a stipendiary priesthood or pensioners upon the Government. That would not do. He had heard—and he supposed there must be some truth in what was stated, although of the details he knew nothing—but it was rumoured that the Government had not been entirely asleep on this question, and that they had some plan floating in their minds—something under consideration with respect to the maintenance of the priesthood in the sister island. He had not heard the details of those plans, but what he protested against was the principle of maintaining the Catholic priesthood as pensioners and stipendiaries upon the will of the Government. If any thing was to be done—and Ireland had great claims for something—the Protestant rector and the Roman Catholic priest must be placed upon precisely the same footing—they must both be made to feel that they had an interest in the soil; one must not be taught to consider himself to be a superior, and assume the airs of a superior, while the other felt himself an inferior, and felt all the shame and degradation of his inferiority. Far be it from him to wish that there should be recommended to Parliament any system which should not recognize the perfect equality of the two great sects into which that country was divided. For his own part he saw no great difficulty in accomplishing it; but if men, instead of being sectarians, would only be Christians—if they would recollect that some 150 years ago, the whole of the ecclesiastical property of Ireland was confiscated and torn from those who had been its original possessors, and appropriated to other purposes, he apprehended there was no man in that House so visionary—however successful the experiment might have been if tried at a former period—but he believed there was no man visionary enough to contend, that after six or eight generations had passed away, there was any tendency in the maintenance of the Established Church, to convert the Irish Papist to Protestantism. If ever that vision had presented itself to the mind of any man—and that it had prevailed at the close of the seventeenth century, he entertained no doubt—if that vision had ever existed, it must long since have vanished. Years had rolled over, generations had passed away, and not the slightest inroad was made upon Catholicism in Ireland. On the contrary, while of course the absolute numbers of Roman Catholics in that country was greater, he believed that in proportion they were more numerous than they had been. A noble Friend of his near him said there could be no doubt that the proportion of Roman Catholics to Protestants was increased. If any inference was to be drawn from that fact—he did not draw the inference—but if any was to be drawn, it would be that the existence of the Protestant Church in Ireland, so far from tending to extend the boundaries of the Protestant Church, was rather calculated to extend those of the other sect. He said he did not draw that inference—he did not desire to draw it—but this he would say, that justice to Ireland—justice to the people of Ireland—justice to the religious people of Ireland, required that the whole ecclesiastical property of Ireland should no longer be taken and applied to the service of one sect only, and that sect the most wealthy, and, consequently, the best able, even if it were not endowed with ecclesiastical property, the best able to provide means for those ministrations of religion to which the ecclesiastical property of a country ought to be adequate. He wished, therefore, to see the ecclesiastical property of Ireland applied to the maintenance of the priesthood—if he might be allowed to use the term priesthood—of both sects. To hear some persons speak of Ireland, one would suppose that there was nothing but Roman Catholics in Ireland; and to hear others you would think there was nothing but Protestants; and perhaps those who argued as if there were none but Protestants had the best justification for their error, because they had only to read the Acts of Parliament which constituted that penal code which was the disgrace of England—they had only to read those acts to find that the Legislature of this country not only wished to annihilate the Catholic religion in Ireland, but had proceeded upon the assumption that there did not exist such a creature as an Irish Papist, and, therefore, they were perhaps more justified in their reasoning than if in talking of Ireland they represented that there was nothing but Catholics there. But some one would say, "Oh, but this won't be done this session." No, he did not suppose it would be done this session, nor perhaps next session, but their Lordships might depend upon it that the people of this country who were most prejudiced against an alteration must make up their minds to something being done. This might be a Roman Catholic question in another form—indeed it was a Catholic question in another form. Twenty years might pass away, but it was as sure to be done as when the Union was carried it was certain that Catholic Emancipation must follow. There were wisacres who said that that question ought to have been settled—in the other House he had heard wise men say that it ought to have been settled soon after the Union, whether the Roman Catholics were to carry their point, or to remain in their hopeless and degraded state—that this ought to have been settled. Why, there were some sorts of questions which could only be settled in one way. There were some which you might settle in one way or in another way, but there were some questions which you could settle only in one way, and the Catholic question was one of them, and the question upon which he was now addressing a few words to their Lordships was another. They might depend upon it that they could not maintain an exclusive Church in Ireland. The day was gone by for that. Far be it from him to entertain a wish that the Protestant Church in Ireland was gone. So far from that, he wished to see the Protestant Church maintained—he wished to see every Protestant parish maintained—to see the property of every parish maintained, and all parochial property applied parochially. He would have nothing to do with spoliation, or with taking away the property of minor communities, and throwing it all into one hotch-potch, for the Government to dispose of as they thought proper. That was not the way to deal with the sub-communities. That was a system of centralization which would be contrary to equity, to justice, and to sound policy. It was one of the maxims of civil government not to embrace all the property of minor communities in one fund, and he would have nothing to do with such a species of centralization. It was essential to liberty—it was essential to freedom that the minor communities should be maintained; and it was therefore essential that the parochial property of Ireland and of England should be maintained, and not rendered to be doled out by the ministers—he meant the religious ministers—in the way which the administration for the time being might think fit. He was sanguine on this subject, although he did not expect to see his desires accomplished very soon; but he was sanguine in the belief that the object could be very easily effected if men would shake off their prejudices. That, perhaps, was one of the most difficult things for a man to do, but he entertained a hope that the people of England and of Scotland would not furnish an argument in favour of Repeal. He did not wish for a repeal of the Union; then let not their Lordships furnish the strongest arguments in its favour, by showing that they were insensible to the wants of the Irish people, and were too prejudiced to govern them as they ought to be governed. Let them show that they were not prejudiced—let them act upon the principles of justice to all—not surrendering everything to one party, but giving to each what each ought to have. These might be difficult things to accomplish, but they were difficult because we surrendered ourselves to our prejudices, and were not disposed to govern others on the principles upon which we desired to be governed ourselves. Disagreeing, as he had said he did, from one very important part of the prayer of the petition, he had felt it necessary to explain how far he was disposed to go—not in abolishing the Church of England in Ireland, but rather in strengthening its foundation and enabling it to resist those attacks which their Lordship's might depend upon it would otherwise be directed, and which, if they trusted to the experience of other times, they must feel would be not unsuccessfully directed against it.

The Duke of Wellington. My Lords, I must say, there can be nothing more inconvenient than the discussion of such large questions as the noble Lord has entered on in the speech which he has just delivered upon the mere presentation of a petition. My Lords, those questions related not merely to the topics contained in that petition, to the state of the Protestant religion in Ireland, or to the compacts that were entered into for the maintenance of that religion in Ireland, but they referred to the very foundation of the Reformation in this country, and the noble Lord has propounded to your Lordships a something, neither the nature of which, nor the period at which it is to be carried into execution, is he himself exactly certain of. Something or other must be done; to that something this country must make up its mind; the noble Lord does not state what it is to be; but it is, at all events, to involve the repeal of those laws upon which the Reformation in this country has been founded. My Lords, I have already taken opportunities of warning your Lordships against the assertion of such doctrines in this House, and I must again express a hope that you will observe and beware how they are introduced into it, because you may rely upon it, that there is not an individual in this country, be his religious opinions what they may, be his position what it may, who is not interested in the maintenance of the Reformation. Not only our whole system of religion, but our whole system of religious toleration, in which so many people in this country are interested, depends upon the laws on which the Reformation was founded; and I therefore entreat your Lordships to give no encouragement to doctrines that might induce a belief that there existed in this House any indifference upon the subject of those laws. With respect to the Church of Ireland, I beg of your Lordships to recollect that the Protestant Church in Ireland, has existed in that country for a period of nearly 300 years; that it was maintained in that country during a century of contests, rebellions, and massacres; that during a contest for the possession of the Crown, the Protestants of that country encountered that contest and kept possession of their Church; that during another century it was maintained through much opposition, and under difficulties of all descriptions; and that at the period of the Union the Parliament, who had the power either to consent to the Union, or to refuse their consent, stipulated that the Protestant Church in Ireland should be maintained, and maintained on the same footing as the Protestant Church of England in this country. My Lords, the Parliament of Ireland had, under the auspices of the King of this country, the power of either making or not making that compact. Your Lordships entered into that compact with the Parliament of Ireland, and I entreat you never to lose sight of the fact. I entreat you not to suffer yourselves to be prevailed on to make any alteration in, or to depart in the slightest degree from, the terms of that compact, so long as you intend to maintain the Union between this country and Ireland. It is the foundation upon which the Union rests—it is a compact which you entered into with the Parliament of Ireland, and from which you cannot depart without being guilty of a breach of faith, worse than those which had been referred to in other countries; worse than those pecuniary breaches of faith which have been alluded to in the course of the discussion which took place in your Lordships' House this evening upon another subject. I entreat you to listen to none of these petitions or speeches which tend to the injury or the destruction of the Church in Ireland. Do what may be necessary—do what it may be proper to do, in order to render that Church more beneficial to the people of that country—but I entreat you to adhere strictly, in spirit and according to the letter, to the compact you have made, and not permit it to be supposed in any quarter whatever that you entertain the most distant intention of departing, in the slightest degree, from that arrangement. The noble Lord says, that the feeling of this country at the present moment is in favour of that arrangement. I sincerely hope that it is so, and that as long as there is a spark of honour in the country the same feeling will continue to be evinced in every part of it. The noble Lord has also stated, and truly, that before the mind of the country can change so far as to induce it to depart from that compact, it must first be made up to undermine the foundation of the Reformation in this country. While waiting for the scheme which, according to the noble Lord, is to be carried out—God knows when—I must again entreat your Lordships not to think of violating the compact into which you have entered for the preservation of the Church in Ireland.

Earl Fitzwilliam said, the noble Duke had a little misstated what he had said in representing him to have expressed a desire to subvert the laws on which the Reformation was founded. He had never said any such thing. He had never thought of any thing of the kind. What he had said was, that tithe and other ecclesiastical property in every parish might be devoted to the payment of the Catholic as well as the Protestant clergy, and how that had anything to do with subverting the laws of the Reformation he was at a loss to conceive. But the speech of the noble Duke reminded him of speeches he had heard in the other House of Parliament; and he dared to say similar speeches had been made in their Lordships' House some twenty-five or thirty years ago, with respect to the Coronation Oath, and other fine subjects, which were not to be touched; and he would venture, with all submission, and with that high respect which he entertained for the noble Duke, to place his speech of to-night in the same category. He had no doubt the time would come—precisely when, he did not know—when, notwithstanding all the warnings given by the noble Duke, whether the noble Duke himself, or somebody else following his example, or the noble Duke, following the example which he himself had set in 1829, he had no more doubt than that he was then standing on the floor of that House, that, by some one or other, some arrangement would be proposed—it might be better or it might be worse—for the establishment and payment of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland, and giving them an interest in the stability of Christian Churches in that country.

The Bishop of Exeter begged to tender to the noble Earl his sincere thanks for having contributed so largely to the stability of the Church of Ireland, to the confidence of the Protestants of that country, to the gratification of the Protestants of England and all Christendom, by having drawn forth the most valuable speech of the noble Duke; and yet, while he rejoiced at that declaration, he must say, the subject had come upon him quite by surprise. The notice given by the noble Earl was merely of the presentation of a Petition from Glasgow, on the condition of Ireland, and he did not imagine, therefore, that any of their Lordships had been prepared for the matters which had been brought forward by the noble Earl. He had no wish to detain their Lordships for any length of time, but he desired to make a few observations on one or two points referred to by the noble Earl. The noble Earl had said, with much emphasis, "I will have nothing to do with spoliation;" and was perfectly amazed that his speech should be characterised as tending to destroy the principles of the Reformation; and the noble Earl had appeared somewhat entertained, either with his own wit or what had fallen from the noble Duke. What explanation had the noble Earl given? Only this, that spoliation would be to take the parochial property and centralize it. The noble Earl said:—"I'll have nothing to do with that—the ecclesiastical property of a parish should be employed for the ecclesiastical purposes of a parish, and should be divided between the Roman Catholic priests and the Protestant clergymen;" the meaning of which was, that the Protestant rector must give up such a portion of the Church-property as would satisfy the noble Earl, in order to endow the Roman Catholic priest. And the noble Earl wished their Lordships to suppose, that such a proceeding would not be spoliation. [A laugh from Earl Fitzwilliam.] The noble Earl seemed quite amused at the notion of spoliation; but possibly spoliation might, in the course of events, assume a form much less amusing to the noble Earl. Suppose the Church to be robbed of the property which it held, on the most sacred principle and sanction, how long would other sorts of property continue safe? Suppose, instead of the proposition in hand, the lay lords who had been enriched with vast possessions in that country by confiscations, of which the noble Earl had said something, were to be forced to disgorge that property in order to meet the wants of the poor in the parishes where it was situated; if he (the Bishop of Exeter) were to advocate such a proposition as that, he should be doing that which was opposed to his notion of common honesty; but, if he were to suggest it, he should certainly adopt the language of the noble Earl and say—"I will have no carrying off the property to distant places; oh, no! I will have no centralization: but I will confine the distribution of the money so acquired to the parishes whence it arises, and not let it be lavished by thousands and tens of thousands upon noblemen who spend it in Yorkshire or London." No, he (the Bishop of Exeter) should say, after the manner of the noble Earl:—"We divide the money among the poor of the respective parishes, who would certainly have as much right to it as the Church of Rome had to the property of the Church of Ireland." Was the Church the only body that despoiled, to use the language of the noble Earl? Portions of the lands forfeited to the Crown had been granted to the Church. But were the ecclesiastics of Ireland the only persons that built palaces, and fattened on the produce of the confiscations of former days? The noble Earl himself held property of that description, and so did another noble Earl near him, who so largely employed his property in benefiting the country whence it was so largely derived, and who resided amongst the people of that country. He should not have said so much on the subject, had not the observations been drawn from him by what had fallen from the noble Earl. A noble Marquess near the noble Earl was much in the same position as to the possession of property forfeited in the rebellions of two centuries ago. These three Noblemen alone held a larger amount of such property in Ireland than all the revenues of the Irish Church in any three counties that could be named there. It was not the way to do justice to Ireland to deprive the Church of the property which it held there on the security of the same laws which enabled these noble personages now to enjoy the fruits of the spoliation which had operated in their favour several centuries ago. He could not feel that the noble Earl had acted safely, prudently, or judiciously, in making the remarks he had put forward. Perhaps the noble Earl might consider it patriotism; if so, let the noble Earl give practical proof of his patriotism, by disgorging the confiscated property which he himself had so long held, and his ancestors before him; let him do this tardy justice, for justice he must consider it, if he thought the principles sound which he had enunciated as to the confiscated property held by the Church. The noble Earl had acted as a monitor on the present occasion; nay, he had gone further, and actually turned prophet. Perhaps the noble Earl would also allow him (the Bishop of Exeter) to turn prophet for the nonce, and, so permitted, he would venture this prophecy, that if the noble Earl's plan should take effect in Ireland, there would be a very short interval indeed, between the distribution of the Church property, which the noble Earl suggested, and the spoliation, as he would call it, of lay property. He begged to offer his heartfelt thanks to the noble Duke for the declaration he had made. Providence had enabled the noble Duke to confer great services on his country, and not the least had been conferred on the present occasion.

House adjourned.

THE VICTORIA PARK.] Sir W. Clay, who was almost inaudible, asked the noble Lord at the head of the Board of Woods and Forests some questions respecting the acquisition of the land for the new Victoria Park, and also as to the progress which had been made in laying it out.

The Earl of Lincoln said, that the intended site for the Victoria Park extended to 262 acres, of which 179 acres were in the hands of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The remaining eighty-three, which belonged to six proprietors, remained unpurchased, because the Commissioners were of opinion that the price demanded was an extravagant one. The usual steps, however, would be taken to ascertain the value by a jury. They did not think it advisable to commence the formation of the Park till the whole of the land was in their hands. It would be in their possession before autumn, when the necessary steps would be taken.

LAW OF SETTLEMENT—REMOVAL OF IRISH PAUPERS.] Sir V. Blake called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Home Department, to some circumstances of hardship detailed in a letter which he had received from Hull, relative to the removal of Irish Paupers, and asked the opinion of Government on the subject.

Sir J. Graham understood the document which the hon. Baronet had read, to have reference to that portion of the Poor Law which caused the removal of poor Irish who had not acquired settlements in parishes in England to Ireland, where they had no settlement, and complaining of such a state of things. He had already stated, that he thought there was considerable hardship arising out of this state of the law; and he begged to add, that the subject was one which would be taken into consideration under the proposed New Poor Law Bill.

Sir Walter James asked the hon. Baronet whether he had taken pains to authenticate the statement which he had read to the House?

Sir V. Blake said, he had received his information from a Gentleman of the greatest respectability, whom he had known for several years, and of whose accuracy he had not the slightest doubt.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES—
ADJOURNED DEBATE.] House in Committee on the Factories Bill.

The second Clause, with the Amendment proposed by Lord Ashley, having been read,

Mr. Warburton said, he should not, on Friday last, have moved the adjournment of the debate, and prolonged the discussion on this question, but for the intimation that had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, who had admitted, that if ever a grave question had been discussed before the House, involving as it did the prosperity of the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country, it was the question then under consideration. The right hon. Baronet had also admitted, that to deputations of master manufacturers that had been with him at the Home Office, he had declared that the Government, on this question, intended to stand firm, and to adhere, in its main provisions, to that printed Bill which had been circulated for a long time throughout the manufacturing districts. Those deputations, it appeared, had quitted the Secretary of State with the full belief that the Government did intend to be firm in resisting the ten hours' clause. But for these circumstances he would not have moved the adjournment. He trusted to the assurance which had been given that, in regard to the main provisions of the Bill, the question was to be taken up as a Government question, so far as their adherents were concerned, and not left an open one. Not that he considered the Government Bill unobjectionable; for it violated, to a certain degree, the principles of free competition which he advocated—but of two evils he was prepared to accept the least; and when he found a Bill brought in by the Government containing a provision for twelve hours labour, and an Amendment moved to limit the hours of labour to ten, he chose the original proposal as the least mischievous; and he trusted the whole influence of Government was to be exerted to resist a provision which, in their opinion, would prove ruinous to our manufacturing prosperity. He felt some difficulty in arguing the question, not knowing whether to address himself to the premises of the noble Mover of the Amendment, or to his conclusions. The conclusion to which the noble Lord's premises tended, involved no less than the suspension of the whole of the factory labour now carried on by women and children in this country. The actual conclusion, however, as embodied in the Amendment, fell so very short of the premises, that they must be considered as independent of one another, and argued separately on their own respective merits. The noble Lord, in a considerable part of his speech, inferred an increase in the severity of the labour of the manufacturing classes from an increase in the productiveness of that labour. Now, unquestionably their labour had of late years been rendered more productive, by calling to its aid improved machinery, to a marvellous degree; but was the severity of the labour which had been so aided, to be measured by its increased productiveness? Upon that ground they might argue that the man who used a spade or a plough, toiled more severely than he who scratched up the ground with his fingers. This conclusion was most illogical. The noble Lord had referred to the insubriety of the air in factories, this was true only of a small number, and was incorrect, if generally applied. A Commission had reported on the state of the dwellings of the operatives, both in London and the provincial towns. Some of the worst cases reported lay within a quarter of a mile of the House. Would this be a proper ground for prohibiting the inmates of those insubrious dwellings, from labouring more than a certain number of hours? Each sort of handicraft employment had its own peculiar sufferings. Treatises had been written by learned physicians, one especially by an Italian physician, on the diseases peculiar to certain artists and manufacturers. It was not difficult to draw highly-coloured pictures of the miseries to which each description of art is and was peculiarly liable; and thereon to found an argument for discontinuing those employments which could not be carried on without some alloy of evil. To what description of labour would not such a rule apply? The noble Lord had referred to the opinions given in 1833 by certain medical men, examined before Mr. Sadler's Committee; who stated that young children and females, if employed during a certain number of hours in certain descriptions of work, would necessarily be subject to serious physical consequences. That might be all very well as matter of opinion; but if the noble Lord would refer to the Report of the medical actuary, Dr. Mitchell, employed by the Commission of 1834, to draw up, from actual returns, a statement of the effects of factory labour, on the health of women and children, he would find a very different view of the case embodied in the following summary:—

"Taking, all in all, from the documents brought before me, I have seen no grounds for warranting me in believing that factory-labour, in any material degree, differs in its effects on health from any other labour; and, at all events, the results ascertained from this long and laborious investigation appear to me to afford unanswerable evidence that the laudatory and condemnatory exaggerations of both parties are alike unfounded in truth."

When Dr. Mitchell drew up that Report, he was aware of the opinions of the medical men, given before the Committee of 1833. The noble Lord had endeavoured to show that the duration of life with regard to persons employed in factory labour was much less than it is with regard to persons engaged in other descriptions of labour; and in proof of this, he had adduced the early period of superannuation in factories. Now, this conclusion was attained by taking the ages of those persons who at the time were actually working in factories. This was a fallacy which Dr. Mitchell and the Commissioners had exposed. They said, that it was on account of the cheapness of the labour of young persons, as compared with that of adults, and also because young persons, from their greater activity of body and greater delicacy of touch in handling delicate fibres, were more suited to the labour required of them, that they were preferred to adults in factories. Of the females, a large proportion, when they arrived at marriageable state, ceased to work in the factory; and with regard to male adults, the noble Lord had himself complained of their staying at home to take charge of domestic affairs, while their wives and children were employed at the factory. This would partly help to explain the low standard of age of the persons actually employed in this department of industry. But there was another point to be considered in reference to this part of the subject. A wonderful increase in our cotton manufacture had taken place since the year 1814, that is to say, during the last thirty years. That this was the case they might gather from the vast quantity of cotton-wool brought into home consumption at the present time, as compared with the quantity in 1814. The accounts given of these quantities did not quite agree, but taking a mean estimate, he found that in 1814 the quantity of cotton-wool brought into home consumption was 60,000,000lbs.; whereas the quantity now consumed annually was about 500,000,000lbs. In the cotton manufactures, therefore, they could not take the increase in the last thirty years at less than six-fold. This, he thought, would go far to explain the great proportion of young persons employed in these manufactures; for taking the mean between zero and thirty, they would have fifteen years to add to the age at which children first entered the factory, to determine the mean age of the persons now actually labouring in the factory. These reasons would go far to explain why the average age of the existing factory operatives was not great. Another particular allegation was, that the females in factories were so injured in their health, by the nature of the employment, that they were not prolific. But medical men practising in the very places where manufactures were carried on, utterly denied the accuracy of that statement. Discarding therefore presumptive proof, and dealing only with facts as they existed, they really must not take it for granted, that the condition of the persons employed in factories was so desperate as the noble Lord would have them to believe. They had agents in 1833, in the employ of the Government, Commissioners of the Poor Law, and sub-Commissioners, who then made searching inquiries into all these matters. Under their agency at the period referred to, great exertions were made in certain parishes to induce agricultural labourers, for whom work could not be found in their own districts, to migrate with their families to manufacturing districts where the demand for labour was greater, and the wages were higher. These Commissioners in their first Report, stated the rate of wages in the manufacturing districts, for a family consisting of three or four members, to be at least double the best wages that a family of the same description could earn in the southern agricultural counties; and further, that the demand for labour at these wages was steadily increasing. A migration took place, in the first year to which he had referred, to a very considerable extent. Dr. Kay in his report had described the result of this migration both to the parishes from which it took place, and to the emigrants and their families; it proved most beneficial to both. The same thing went on for a series of three or four years, till about the year 1837, the year which was the commencement in the manufacturing districts of that stagnation of trade, and distress, of the reality of which the House and the country were fully convinced. He would describe the condition, after the tide of prosperity had turned, of some of the families that migrated. He would quote the words of a landlord residing in an agricultural district, and formerly a Member of that House, in preference to quoting the words of the Commissioners or sub-Commissioners themselves; because it might be said, that as they had encouraged the migration, they might think too favourably of its effects. The gentleman to whom he alluded was Sir Harry Verney, a resident in Buckinghamshire, who, in the year 1837, went himself to Wolverhampton and Manchester to examine into the condition of some agricultural labourers, who had migrated thither from his own parish. He states—

“The farmers are no gainers, in a pecuniary point of view, by the loss of those who desire to go, who are usually their best men. The gainers are the men themselves and the manufacturers who want them. I went myself to Wolverhampton and Manchester, and found my own poor labourers gaining three times what they obtained at home.”

“Two of them came to see their friends, and I need not say that their visits stimulated others to desire to obtain similar situations.”

He might quote a variety of other passages from the reports of the Commissioners and the sub-Commissioners bearing out the same conclusion, and corroborating the statement made on Friday night last by the hon. Member for Durham, as to the rate of wages in the manufacturing districts. He found from those reports that the average weekly earnings of 100 families who had migrated under the superintendence of the Poor Law Commissioners themselves, had been in the first year 1*l.* 9*s.* 4½*d.*; second year 1*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, third year 1*l.* 19*s.* 4½*d.* This confirmed the statement of the hon. Member for Durham, that the wages of the families in his employ ranged from 80*l.* to 100*l.* a year each. And with this increased rate of wages as compared with their previous earnings in the agricultural districts, no one could doubt that the condition of those who migrated was greatly improved. The noble Lord had dilated at some length on the moral condition of the manufacturing classes, and, no doubt, when large masses of people were congregated together, whatever their occupation and wheresoever their dwelling, their morals would, in some respects, be found to be less strict than the morals of a people usually are when the population is less dense. If, however, they subjected other occupations to the same searching examination as they had bestowed upon the factory operatives, they would find, taking all matters into consideration, results not very dissimilar. Take the case of the sailors, and the females with whom they associated—subject their lives to strict examination—will their standard of morality be found to range very high? His right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham), formerly First Lord of the Admiralty, could tell the House something of the morality of Portsmouth Hard, if he chose to be communicative on so delicate a subject. Yet no one, because the morals of sailors were lax, and those of their female associates abandoned, proposed a Commission to scrutinise and lay bare their frailties. No one came forward to expatiate on the accidents and hardships of a sailor's life, and argue, from events inseparable from that mode of existence, that the axe must be laid at the root of the tree, and, that, unless we can lessen the hazards which our mariners run, and refine their habits, the present state and condition of nautical affairs must be abrogated. Why this abstinence from such attempts? Because all men knew the paramount importance of keeping up the Navy, and that our commercial and political greatness depends on our maintaining it. They tolerate a certain amount of evil for a greater amount of good; and who would say, taking the aggregate of good and evil that fall to the various states of existence, that the good did not in the main predominate. There was not a great building erected, a new Reform Club, or new House of Parliament in this city, that did not occasion fatal accidents; but no one argued from that that men should not become carpenters or masons, and called upon the House of Commons to pass a sumptuary law to force men, in the houses they build, to rest satisfied with what is low and humble. The appeal to our feelings in the case of the factory operatives might be more touching, involving as it did the case of females and children. The improvidence and extravagance said by the noble Lord to prevail among factory-people, must not be attributed to their being congregated together in factories. In the evidence taken by the Commission on the hand-loom weavers, the Rev. Mr. Brian, speaking of the Spitalfields' weavers, observed that from their manufacture being carried on entirely in their own homes, it might be expected that they would present a rare example of domestic felicity; but, on the contrary, from the unsteadiness of the employment, depending as it did on fluctuations in commerce and the caprices of fashion, no where were prudence and economy less habitually exercised than in the cottages of these weavers. Let them not suppose, therefore, that improvidence belonged exclusively to the inmates of factories; but compare their lives and habits with those of the other inhabitants of large towns, and the comparison will not be to their disadvantage. The noble Lord had asked, ought they not lay the axe at the root of the tree, and abrogate the system? What system? That of employing females and children in factories. This was his appeal to the House:—

"It is a perpetual grievance," (said the noble Lord) "constantly recurring among the complaints of the workmen, in all times of difficulty and distress. The system disturbs the order of nature and the rights of the labouring man, by ejecting the males from the workshop and filling their place with females, who are thus abstracted from their domestic duties, and exposed to the most insufferable toil, for half the wages that would be assigned to the males for the support of their families. "Every consideration sinks into nothing compared with the moral mischiefs which this system engenders and sustains. Education is all in vain, there is no national or private system which can supersede the influence of parental example and parental instruction. Such a system ought not to continue."

And the hon. Member for Yorkshire also had said, "By this system the labour of the adult is superseded by that of children, and the labour of males by that of females." Were they prepared to follow these arguments to their legitimate conclusion, and to prohibit women and children from working in factories altogether. Or would they be content, as, to his astonishment, (after such arguments), he found the noble Lord would be, to diminish by one-sixth the hours during which women and young persons should be permitted to work in factories. Having considered the noble Lord's premises, he would in the sequel, confine himself to the Amendment, and endeavour to trace what if the Amendment were carried, would be its practical effects. Every Member who had hitherto spoken, seemed to have admitted, as the witnesses examined by the Commission of 1833 had done, that if they limited to ten hours the labour of women and children, the effect would be to limit to ten hours the labour of adult men. There was little difference of opinion upon this point, for that must be the inevitable consequence. The noble Lord was actuated by humane motives in endeavouring to restrict the labour in factories to ten hours, and expected nothing but good from his proposed restrictions; but would it not be as well to look into the arguments of the operatives themselves in favour of a ten hours' Bill for the purpose of discovering what consequences they anticipated from that measure? Those arguments were in evidence in the Report of the factory Commissioners of 1833, who say—

"It appears to be the general opinion of the operatives, that though wages may in the first instance fall, from reduction of the hours of labour, the artificial scarcity of commodities thus occasioned, will effect a rise of prices, and a consequent rise of wages, as well as an increase of work for hands which are now partially out of employ, by occasioning the erection of new establishments to supply the deficiency of production caused by the diminution of labour."

They then quote the evidence of some of the operatives themselves, one of whom stated it as his opinion, that—

"The reduction of hours will operate as if you took away two men out of every twelve; and the effect would be to make labour scarcer. Within three months of passing the Bill, they would get the same amount of wages for the ten hours as they now got for twelve, with this further advantage to the community at large, that if the same demand for goods produced continued that exists now, it would call the unemployed into employment, and lessen the amount of Poor-rates." "That is my sole motive for supporting the thing." "I do not contemplate herein a rise of wages; but the same wages for a less degree of toil."

Another operative said—

"If it should be found, when the hours are brought down to ten for all, that many are still out of work, the hours should be brought down to nine or eight, so as to give employment for all. It is better that all should work for eight hours, than that half should work for sixteen. I mean that twice the quantity of machinery should be used. Bringing down the hours to ten will rather raise wages than lower them. It would continue in the same way if it was brought down to eight hours. I think it would hold all through if you brought it down to one hour. The shorter time a man works, the more he will get for his labour in proportion. Certainly, it would be a greater expense to the masters to lay out money for more machinery than now, if they were working for such short hours. As soon as a master found that did not answer, he would give over buying machinery, and let the labour be done by hand. I conceive, in that way, machinery would find its level. Our Bill would not touch those who work by hand; and so he might get liberty to work more hours than those who work by machinery. I do not think this Bill would stop the progress of machinery much; it must be a shorter hours bill than this that would do that. When machinery had found its level in this way, the prices of goods must rise; there is plenty of room for that. I think that would be the end of it; because it has just been the reverse, that prices have lowered, while we have been working long hours. I do not think it would take as many customers out of the market as it would bring in from amongst those who (now) cannot afford to buy. There are various opinions; but I think this is the general one among us that I have told you."

As many as twenty operatives who were examined before the Commissioners, gave evidence to the same effect, that they expected to receive twelve hours' wages for ten hours work. He could not conceive arguments more fallacious than those which he had just cited. In the first place, they all proceeded upon the assumption that the country had no foreign competitors. No doubt, if Europe was in the state in which it was in 1814, the addition of one-sixth to the value of labour, would produce comparatively only a trifling result. Prices would rise in proportion nearly to the diminished productiveness of labour, and extension of fixed capital; and neither capitalist nor workman would suffer to any extent. But now that many civilized countries were competing with them as manufacturers in every foreign market, they would be running a great risk in adopting the course recommended. They should consider in how short a time a country could rise to manufacturing eminence, how brief a period was sufficient to effect a revolution in commerce. At the close of the last war hardly any cotton was manufactured in France. This country then manufactured 60,000,000lbs. of cotton wool. What was the weight of the cotton-wool manufactured in France in 1840? Why, more than twice the amount manufactured in this country in 1814, at the close of the war. It was 150,000,000lbs. In the opinion of several of the manufacturers examined by the Commission of 1833, the immediate effect of a limitation of the hours of labour would be to raise prices in the market of the world, though not to the extent of the additional cost of production in this country, occasioned by that limitation. The foreign manufacturer, having the command of labour not subject to any restriction, would reap exclusively a higher profit than usual from this temporary rise. This would be followed by an extension of manufacturing works both at home and abroad. The next result would be a fall to at least the former level of prices after the works thus extended had come into operation, and then would arise a contest between the capitalist and the labourer which of the two should bear the burthen of that fall. As a certain consequence, the greater part of the ultimate loss would fall upon the receiver of wages. Mr. Ashworth, who was examined before the Commission in question, stated—

"The adoption of such a course would add to the profits of foreign manufacture, but nothing to our own. It would greatly stimulate the production of machinery to supersede human labour. The consequence would be decreased wages and want of employment; the ultimate effect would be a fall of wages."

If this country, actuated by motives of humanity, made regulations for limiting the hours of labour at home, they could not expect that foreign countries would follow their example. What better prognostic could we have of the future conduct of foreign countries respecting factory labour, than by looking to their conduct respecting the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade? The country with the most free institutions in the world, continued the system of slavery, and persecuted the men who advocated its abolition. The noble Lord stated that he would not consider this as a commercial question; but unless the noble Lord did so, he would not be considering it as a statesman. If they followed the principles of the noble Lord, and imposed restrictions upon cotton manufacture, what would become of the population of 931,000 dependent in Lancashire alone on manufacturing industry? The consequences would be most disastrous did they put down manufactures in that county to ever so limited an extent. The result of such a course would be also severely felt in the agricultural districts. Not less than 343,000 of the population of Lancashire, were persons not born in that county, attracted to it from agricultural districts by high wages, and depending on its manufacturing prosperity. How will pauperism increase in all the neighbouring agricultural districts, if you deprive the population of those districts of this source of employment? They might tell him that by diminishing the manufacturing population, they would diminish vice and immorality. It might be so; but he was confident of this, that if they diminished the number of persons who were raised above the necessity of supporting themselves by daily labour—if, by introducing distress amongst the manufacturing counties, they diminished the number of those who lived in affluence—although they might have less vice—yet, in a far greater proportion they would have less virtue. But if they restricted the manufacturing power of the country, how would they maintain the great colonial dependencies of Great Britain? Every day they had some new colony rising up and calling to them for support. The exports of cotton woven fabrics, taking them at their declared value, amounted in the year 1842, to 21,670,000*l*. Was it not obvious, that it was by the profit on the labour to which activity was given by the employment of manufacturing capital that the country was enabled to bear the great amount of taxation which the maintenance of its vast possessions required? If they discouraged manufactures in this country, other nations would quickly take advantage of the mistake, and obtain that pre-eminence in the civilised world which Great Britain, by her commerce and manufactures, had acquired. And if they once lost their commerce, and with it their naval superiority, he would ask how they were likely to be treated by their neighbours? They would be bearded, as they had formerly been, in their own bays and harbours by hostile fleets. The comforts of the people depended in no small degree on our supplying manufactures at a low cost. In what way but by offering these in exchange, are even tea, coffee, and sugar, once considered as luxuries, but now become necessities of life, introduced into the cottages as well of our country peasants, as of manufacturing artisans? There were many minor considerations which entered into the question, and which had been adverted to by the Commissions of 1833. Contracts had been entered into between master and man, spinners had been engaged for fixed periods of service, and leases had been entered into by manufacturers, in the confidence that good faith would be observed towards them, and that no steps would be taken which would render the large investments which they have made unprofitable. The noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland, seemed to have his eyes open to the evil results of the measure now recommended by the noble Mover of the amendment, but he also seemed to think, as we had begun in an evil course of legislation, that there was no alternative but to pursue it. The Bill before them, as introduced by Government, was inconsistent with the principles which he had ever advocated; but of two evils he would choose the least; and if he could not arrest the progress of impolitic legislation altogether, he would try to defeat the amendment before the Committee, as a proposal pregnant with danger, in the best way he could. But the noble Lord had gone further with his alternative, and not satisfied with the ten-hour clause, believed that we must ultimately come to appoint local boards of trade, to settle differences between masters and men in different parts of the country. He did think that the House ought to pause ere it sanctioned a course tending to the establishment of so great a nuisance as a multitude of petty legislatures. He had omitted to notice one defence which had been made of the ten-hour clause. It had been urged that, although it would reduce the number of hours, as much work might be done in ten hours as in twelve, by increasing the speed of the machinery. But, then, what became of the humanity part of the question? If the labour was already so severe, that the number of working hours must be reduced, by requiring as much work to be done in ten hours as was now done in twelve, the intensity of the labour must be much increased. The more rapid the motion of the machinery, too, the more suited would the work be to the light activity of young persons, and the greater the number of that class which would be brought into the factories. Besides, other countries might work their mills with the same rapidity; and for twelve hours instead of ten; and then what became of the argument. The late Government had referred a question, akin to the present one, the condition of the hand-loom weavers, to a Commission, of which Mr. Senior and Mr. Jones Lloyd were members, and they considered it their duty to state their opinion, what effect the laws prohibiting the importation of articles consumed by the operative classes had upon the comfort of those classes. They stated their opinion upon that subject; and he thought that they then, and he himself now, were justified in entering upon it, as the great question at issue, in either case, was what could be done to amend the condition of the working portion of the manufacturing population. The Commissioners stated that the effect of the Corn Laws was to raise the price of corn 20 per cent. And seeing that the labouring classes consumed one-half their wages in the purchase of bread, the Corn-laws taxed those wages to the extent of 10 per cent.; and by thus taxing wages, those laws also operated to the prejudice of manufacturing industry, by diminishing the power of the whole mass of the labouring community to consume manufactures. The committee stated, that

"An increased supply of food would enable the weaver to subsist with rather less exertion on his own part, and to enforce rather less labour from his family."

Why, this was the very object of the amendment now under discussion before the Committee. The report continues—

"The weaver might then shorten the long hours of labour, and allow his wife more time to devote to her domestic concerns."

Why that was the complaint made of the present system by the noble Lord, that it did not allow of the wife performing her domestic duties. The report continued to state, that an increase in his means of subsistence would enable the weaver to "delay the age at which his children would be sent to the factory"—the precocious age at which children enter the factory, is one of the evils to the root of which the noble Lord would lay the axe. The report went on to state that, "on the other hand, the whole labouring population being required to spend less in food, would be able to spend more in clothing." A relaxation of the import duties on food, then, was what was recommended by those gentlemen who had full authority to investigate, and who did investigate, the whole subject. There were other suggestions made by these Commissioners for improving the condition of the operatives. One of them he would give the present Government the credit of having adopted. It was a measure which he had long advocated—namely, an abolition or reduction of the duties on foreign timber, the Commission recommended it, as conducive to the improvement of the habitations of the poor. Other questions to which the Commission had directed the attention of the Government, the Government had not yet dealt with, such as our trade with Brazil—our trade with the United States of America—our trade with those States of the North of Germany included in the Zollverein; they had recommended that we should put our commercial relations with these countries on such a footing as to create a mutual exchange of commodities to as large an extent as possible. They condemned, in general terms, the practice of impeding the importation from foreign countries of articles of consumption, and especially of corn; because such impediments restricted the consumption of our manufactures, increased the irregularity of the demand for the article to be imported, and tended to produce mischievous derangements of the currency.

To remove those restrictions, was the way to prevent the operative classes from pressing on the Legislature measures so impolitic as that now recommended, and to absolve them from the necessity of adopting that further evil, threatened by the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, that of committing the business of legislating on the regulations between masters and workmen to local, selfish, and monopolizing boards of trade.

Viscount Howick rose to explain. His hon. Friend had misrepresented what he had said in the most incomprehensible manner. The hon. Gentleman had stated, that he (Viscount Howick) had maintained, that having adopted an impolitic course in 1833, they should, therefore, continue to persevere in it now—that Government having carried a measure involving a certain degree of evil, he (Viscount Howick) thought it therefore expedient, upon the whole, to sanction a measure involving a still greater degree of evil. Now, anything more utterly unlike what he did say it was impossible to conceive. What he said, was in answering the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, and it was this—that he could understand arguments like his against interference with labour at all: that he could understand that it might be thought advisable to abstain from any such interference, but that that was not at present the question. He had continued to say, that the inquiries conducted by Commissioners and Committees of the House had gone to establish a real necessity for interference; that that was a necessity which existed in the opinion of Government as well as in his own—that a bill was founded upon that principle of interference, and that the question between the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire and the Government was, whether the proper number of hours of labour to require from women and young persons was ten or twelve hours a-day. He stated how difficult he found it to pronounce a satisfactory judgment upon this point, but that, if he were obliged to come to some decision, he thought—knowing what he did of the strength of the human frame, and the amount of fatigue proposed to be inflicted upon it—he thought that ten hours, making allowance for the additional time required in going to, coming from the mill, and taking meals—was as long a period of labour as women and children should be called upon to submit to. If they made a law to fix the maximum period, it would virtually fix also the minimum period of labour; thus, if they made a law, enacting that women and children should not labour longer than twelve hours, its virtual effect was, that they should not labour for a shorter period. But his hon. Friend had maintained that he had proposed to establish monopolising boards all over the country, with the view of passing local regulations as to the relationship between masters and workmen. Now, all that he had said about the matter was this—that in former times, incorporated bodies of tradesmen, or guilds, had been found to produce advantageous effects on commerce and manufactures. He had stated, too, in glancing very briefly at the subject, that he thought that if they determined to create corporate bodies of this description, a power of revision should be given to the Crown, as in the case of municipal corporations, over their acts. He did think that some authority of this nature would prove an efficient check to any disposition to rear up systems of monopoly which might be manifested by any such bodies.

Mr. Beckett could not help expressing his surprise, that the discussion on this subject should have become one of profit or loss. He thought the question was whether there was cruelty, oppression, and evil in the system of factory labour, for without that the Amendment of his hon. Friend could not be entertained. The House could not interfere with the rights of trade or the freedom of labour, without some such accusation could be established. It was lamentable to have listened to the melancholy tale told by his hon. Friend; but at the same time he thought they were under deep obligations to his noble Friend for proposing a practical remedy, which almost every practical man agreed would have the effect of remedying the evil. How had the statement of the noble Lord been met? Had it been denied, excused, or palliated? It had been palliated by an excuse unworthy of that House to receive. It had been palliated by an excuse that the agricultural labourer was as badly off. Was that an excuse? The factory labourer was the only labourer within the power of legislation at present. By showing how they would treat him the House would show their opinion how labourers ought to be treated, and he would ask whether such an excuse, or palliation could be alleged as a reason why the House should not interfere in the case before them? The late restrictions had acted well, notwithstanding the outcry made against them, and they were now advocated by the great majority of the owners of machinery. The evils of factory labour were not disputed, but it had been said that the remedy proposed by the noble Lord would lead to great evils. The right hon. Baronet said, that the terms of labour were settled in 1833, and that it was not right to re-open that settlement. If that were the case, how did the right hon. Baronet himself justify the alterations which he made in the present Bill? The right hon. Baronet spoke of the violation of a principle; but if there were such a principle, it had already been violated, and the question was now one, not of principle, but of degree. The right hon. Baronet contended that twelve hours labour was requisite for the profitable employment of the factory. But the right hon. Baronet had taken very futile grounds for his calculations. He had spoken of machinery as lasting only fifteen or sixteen years, and that if the House reduced the hours of labour, there would be no profit or return on this employment. But he would appeal to the manufacturers of this country whether any of them had ever had any experience of machinery being worked for fourteen or fifteen years for twelve hours together? Such an employment for machinery was never heard of; and when the right hon. Baronet spoke of the remuneration for capital, which meant, of course, the interest for money, did the right hon. Baronet mean to take the year 1841, when the interest of money was 6 per cent., or in 1844, when it was not worth much more than 2 per cent? Or did the right hon. Baronet apply his proposition to new machinery, or to old machinery that had been fifteen or sixteen years at work? Such was the difference between different descriptions of machinery, and such the continuous alterations, that it was utterly impossible for the right hon. Baronet to found any calculation upon it. Why, there was a mode of combing wool recently adopted in France, and by a new invention the same work that was formerly done by forty men now required only one. It was, therefore, utterly impossible to make such a calculation as the right hon. Baronet attempted. The value of machinery depended upon the power of production, and the value of money upon the rate of interest. With respect to the main question, he regretted the course taken by the right hon. Baronet. He had applied to seventy firms in Leeds, and out of seventy no less than forty had signed a declaration in favour of a ten hours' Bill. The remainder were, generally speaking, in favour of an eleven hours' Bill; but there was not one which advocated a twelve hours' Bill—and of the Clergy in that town, out of 181 individuals of all denominations, there was not one who supported a twelve hours' Bill. The current of public opinion in that town, as elsewhere, was tending generally to a shortening of the duration of ten hours of labour. In Barnsley, there was not a man who worked more than ten hours. In Bradford, the same; and in Sheffield, in consequence of the absence of some moderate interference on the part of the Legislature, the Trades Unions had taken up the question, and the hours of labour were reduced to six; and he warned the right hon. Gentleman that, if the Legislature did not take some step, they might fear some evil consequences from the steps self-taken by the men who thought themselves degraded and oppressed. As to the main question, though he was a decided opponent of a twelve hours' Bill—indeed, he could not contemplate its passing, it would be disgraceful—yet he was not prepared at once to vote for a ten hours' Bill. So sudden a change might disrupt too violently commercial combinations; but (and the noble Lord had himself assented to it) he thought it would be better to have an eleven hours' Bill for a year or two previously to the restriction to ten hours coming into operation, so as to give the House an opportunity of judging of the effect of the restriction, and of interposing if it should appear to be injurious.

Sir G. Grey said, that as most of those hon. Members who had preceded him in the course of the debate on his own side of the House, had addressed it in opposition to the Amendment proposed by his noble Friend, he would as shortly as possible state the reasons which induced him to concur in the Amendment. In adopting that course he could assure the Committee that he was very far from being insensible to the difficulties which surrounded the question, and which, to his mind, rendered it one of very serious doubt and embarrassment. He was bound also to admit, that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite against the Amendment of his noble Friend were entitled to great weight, and he was not prepared altogether to deny the force of the observation, that the arguments of his noble Friend, and the facts upon which he based his proposition, were such as, if carried out to their full and legitimate extent, would lead to a more comprehensive conclusion than that which was involved in the proposition for which he asked the assent of the Committee. But, if that were so, he was bound to say that on the other hand he could not but perceive that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman himself and of the other hon. Gentleman who had addressed the House, in opposition to the Amendment of his noble Friend, and especially those of his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal, were directed much more against any legislative interference—against the principle of affording protection to any class of labourers in factories by legislative restrictions—than against the limited, and, as he thought, reasonable proposition now submitted to the House by his noble Friend. They were warned as to the danger, in dealing with this question, of crippling the manufacturing energies, and impairing the commerce of this country. The force of that argument he was ready to admit, for the interests of those classes whom his noble Friend was anxious to benefit were intimately bound up with the commercial prosperity of the country; but he could not see a shadow of an argument to prove that the charge of involving our commercial interests in danger was only applicable to the Amendment of his noble Friend and did not apply to the principle of the Bill submitted to the House by the Government—a principle which had long ago been decided by the Legislature and acted upon for a series of years; even now, when a Bill was brought into the House to amend the law upon this subject, it was open to all hon. Gentlemen who held the views of his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal to take the opportunity of objecting to the second reading of that Bill, or of raising a discussion upon it on the question that the Speaker leave the Chair in order to reconsider that principle, or to ask the House to reverse its former decision. No such course, however, was taken, and he thought, that in the present state of the proceeding it would be unfair to raise that general question. He had a right, then, to assume that, in the opinion of the Legislature, some legislative protection was necessary for the operative classes now working in factories. And the real question was, how far ought that legislative interference to be carried—how far it could be carried consistently with safety—and how far for the interests of the operatives on the one hand, and the interests of the country on the other, it was requisite that they should carry it, and at what point they should stop. As to the main subject, there was at present no difference between the noble Lord and the Government. His noble Friend did not ask the House to go beyond the Government, and to comprehend other classes in the Bill not already comprehended in it, and the simple question upon which they were now called upon to make up their minds was the question, whether the period during which young persons between thirteen and eighteen, and women of every age were to be employed should be twelve hours, or ten hours, exclusive of the period of going to and from the factory, and exclusive of the time for meals. Upon that question an important observation was made by his noble Friend, the Member for Sunderland, who stated that this act practically fixed the maximum of actual labour in the factories, and the question then was whether that period should be ten hours or twelve hours for women and young children. Now, in favour of ten hours they had a host of facts, if facts were necessary to prove what he should think was a self-evident proposition—viz., that twelve hours in the cases of women and young children was a period of excessive labour. He was far from maintaining that factory labour was in itself more destructive to health, or tended more to shorten life, than the other ordinary occupations in which the labouring classes were employed. He rested his vote upon no such supposition. He was very far from imputing to the mill-owners a disregard to the interests of those who were in their employment, and he was glad to hear the facts stated the other night by the hon. Member for Durham, which proved in a variety of instances that, under good management and proper conduct, health and comfort were secured in connection with that employment; but they were now called upon to legislate for the mass, and to say whether, when asked to fix a limit to the labour of women and young persons throughout the factories of this country, that limit should be ten hours or twelve. Could any one deny that the period of twelve hours' labour, from day to day, amounted in fact to an absence, on the part of those so employed, of from fourteen to fifteen hours from their own homes, calculating the time they were going to and coming from the factory. Was there a single authority that did not say that the present amount of labour was injurious? Look at the report of the Factory Inspectors—those gentlemen, whose opinions were laid before the House for its information, and were entitled to great respect and attention, from the extensive experience they had had in these matters, and the honesty and integrity, evinced by their reports, with which they had discharged their duties. What said Mr. Horner, in one of his reports?—

“The subject has been repeatedly mentioned to me by some considerate and humane millowners who know the evil of such a system, and wish to see it put down, and they have urged me to represent to the Government the propriety and necessity of preventing by law that women of any age should work more than twelve hours a day.”

Those were the observations made by Mr. Horner to the Government: and what did Mr. Saunders say upon the same subject in his report of the 20th October, 1843?

“I am equally well satisfied that persons are employed as adults for very long hours, physically unfit for the work they are called upon to do, and often unwillingly on their part.

In this remark I refer principally to females who have just completed the age of eighteen."

And in his further report of the 15th of January, 1844, he distinctly spoke of cases in which factories had been overworked, and referred to medical opinions on the subject, some of which had been quoted by the noble Lord. He said,

"The question of reducing the hours of labour generally for all young persons to eleven in each day, and limiting the working hours to seven o'clock in the evening, instead of eight o'clock, has been freely and frequently canvassed. Its advocates increase in number, and in the strength of their desire to see it carried out. It would be impossible for me to express too strongly my conviction of the ultimate advantages to be derived from it."

That was Mr. Saunders's statement in the most unqualified terms against this Bill, which would render twelve hours the period of work for young persons. But he also expressed his decided opinion that further protection was indispensably necessary to females working in factories. And when they looked to the fact of the very large number of women, and that number still, he feared, increasing, employed in factories, they must bear in mind how materially their withdrawal from the performance of all social and domestic duties must affect, not merely those individuals employed in factories but also the great mass of the population of the manufacturing districts. The arguments and facts adduced by his noble Friend showed the great extent of that evil. It might be alleged that his proposal would fail to apply an adequate remedy; but it was not because they could not entirely eradicate the evil, that they were not to endeavour to diminish it. Were they by a legislative enactment to declare that excessive labour was necessary to the continuance of our commercial greatness, for it was clear that no other plea could justify it? The noble Lord's proposition would withdraw those individuals for two hours more from the factories and to transfer them for that time to their homes, and could it be doubted that that would be a great mitigation of the evil, which no one denied to exist under the present system, and which would be continued under the sanction of the Bill now before the House? He thought that in connexion with other physical and moral ameliorations of the condition of the people, the proposal of the noble lord would produce most beneficial results, and he seriously apprehended that without it all other means of amelioration with respect to this large class of the population would be comparatively useless. The right hon. gentleman had expressed a strong apprehension of the probable danger that might arise from the proposition of his noble Friend. He thought that apprehension of danger was entirely conjectural, and, though he had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with all that attention that was due to what fell from him, and he had heard every argument that had been addressed to the Committee on the same side, yet he had not heard the slightest reason alleged, which would lead him to conclude that interference was perfectly safe up to twelve hours, but that the moment you passed that limit everything was fraught with danger. They had the opinion of the Inspectors of Factories that twelve hours were too much. There might be some medium between that and ten hours, and he understood the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Leeds, to have proposed a gradual approach to ten hours. To this he should not object, but he thought it would be unwise to depart from the proposition of the Government and adopt eleven hours unless a further reduction was afterwards to be made to ten hours. Such a course would leave the subject open to all the agitation that now existed upon it; and might perhaps equally dissatisfy the mill-owners, and those who were represented by the noble Lord. He thought it of great importance, in dealing with this question, that they should look to the reasonable wishes and feelings of the great mass of operatives, who were deeply interested in this subject. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had seen a deputation from the manufacturing districts, who were anxious to support the noble Lord's proposition, and a counter-deputation of delegates from operatives, who were anxious to see it rejected. He (Sir G. Grey) had also seen persons from the manufacturing districts on this subject, and he supposed that other hon. Members had done the same; and, from all he could learn, he believed that there did pervade the great mass of the population an anxious desire to see the proposition of his noble Friend carried into effect. From a conversation which he had had with four persons who represented the wishes and feelings of the operatives upon this subject, he was of opinion that they were fully competent to take a just view of the question and did not entertain those wild and extravagant opinions which may have been advocated by others, and which some ascribed to them. He put to them distinctly the question of wages. They said they were prepared to meet it, and considered that the diminution of wages if it took place, would be amply compensated by the advantage which this proposition would give them. But there was one consideration which, he confessed, weighed more with him than any other on this question; he referred to the growing opinion of the mill-owners themselves. His noble Friend stated, that above 300 mill-owners were advocates of the proposition which he now submitted to the House. He could not believe, looking to the vast interests those gentlemen had in this subject—he believed the noble Lord said that some of them were owners of some of the largest establishments in the country—that they would be in favour of the proposition of his noble Friend, if it did involve all the serious risk and danger which it was alleged would be involved in it. Their opinions weighed greatly with him. And when he remembered that the noble Lord the Member for South Lancashire, who was not peculiarly liable to be influenced by any sudden popular impulse, and who represented a large manufacturing constituency, after having given his deliberate attention to this subject, was decidedly in favour of the proposition of his noble Friend, it was impossible for him to conclude that the proposed amendment must be rejected on the ground of its certain tendency to injure the manufacturing interests of the country. With regard to the argument—the chief one against the noble Lord—the argument that his plan was fraught with risk and danger, he must refer to a valuable pamphlet published by Mr. L. Horner in 1840, with a view to show that foreign countries had followed our example with regard to factory legislation. He stated distinctly in the outset of that pamphlet, that in the year 1833 those very same arguments were used almost precisely in the same terms as now against the legislative interference then suggested. It was said at the time, that ruin must be the necessary consequence of any legislative interference. That interference, however, took place; and he took upon himself to say that that prediction had not been verified. And what was the inference Mr. Horner drew from that? He said, let the House in future receive with caution these prophecies of risk and danger, when they are called upon to legislate. He did not say that these predictions were to be altogether disregarded; but let them not be deterred by vague apprehensions of danger, which might be alleged against all change whatever, from satisfying themselves whether the proposition of his noble Friend could or could not be safely carried into effect, and whether the interests of the operatives might not be reconciled by those means with the interests of the country at large. Then again, the period of twelve hours appeared to be entirely arbitrary; whilst the period proposed by his noble Friend for the work of the young persons and women, was the period ordinarily observed in other occupations in which the great mass of the operatives of this country were engaged—not by virtue of any legislative enactment, but by virtue of arrangements existing between the masters and those who were employed with reference to the interests of both, and to the ordinary powers of the human frame. He was fully sensible of the objection that, by placing this restriction on the period of labour of women and young persons, a Ten Hours' Bill would be enacted for the whole working population. All he could say upon that was, that between the noble Lord's proposition and the Bill of the Government there was in this respect, no difference of principle. Their Bill professed to include the same classes whom the noble Lord asked protection for; and, therefore, if the noble Lord's proposition was a ten hours' Bill for the whole population, the right hon. Gentleman's Bill was a twelve hours' Bill for the same population. It was not, however, absolutely certain that such would be the consequence. On this subject, Mr. Saunders, in his report, said—

“Instruct male adults in the business, and employ them whenever the necessity of night-work is forced on you. If the trade is not profitable enough to enable the mill occupiers to do this, and whatever restriction is imposed be applied equally on all in the trade, I do not doubt that a remedy will be found, and the demand for goods so equalised over the year, as to make it desirable to erect a little more machinery for the purpose of meeting that demand.”

He did not attach much importance to the objection he had mentioned; but it applied in principle to the Bill of the Government as much as to the amendment of the noble Lord. At the same time he should be sorry to see any direct interference with the right which the adult male population had to carry their labour to the best market. As he had said, this question was one of considerable difficulty; the course which this debate had taken, showed that it was not one of a party character. It was a question on which each individual must make up his own mind, and decide on his own conviction of what was best. He must, however, add, without any intention of saying anything on a subject foreign to this debate, that the difficulties by which this subject was surrounded, were very much increased by the unwise and impolitic restrictions on trade, which were persevered in by the House, at once limiting the field of labour, and raising the price of the first necessities of life to the operative population. He had come to the conclusion which he had adopted after much consideration, and though he might not feel the same degree of certainty with regard to it which had been expressed by others more conversant with the subject—he was satisfied that the evidence greatly preponderated in favour of the proposition of his noble Friend, and to that proposition, accordingly, he would give his support.

Sir J. Graham: I am particularly anxious to trespass on the indulgence of the Committee for a very short time, in order to explain the view I am compelled to take of this question, especially after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. If the House will give me credit for the sincerity of the expression of any wish, I cannot state too strongly my desire to exclude from this discussion anything of a party nature, but at the same time it is my bounden duty, with reference to this subject, and especially after the speech just concluded, to bring certain facts to the recollection of the House. It might be supposed from what had been said in the course of this evening's discussion, that the proposition contained in this Bill—that the labour of young persons in factories should be limited to twelve hours—was a new one, originating with Her Majesty's present advisers; such is not the fact. It has been inferred, and I frankly admit the inference, that twelve hours will also be the limit for the labour of adults as well as young persons. The right hon. Baronet who has just sat down says, that Mr. Saunders has thrown some doubt on the question whether the limit imposed on the labour of children and young persons is practically the limit for that of adults.

If there be any question with respect to its being incidentally a limit on the labour of adults, in frankness I must say, that the proposition I have now made on the part of the Government, absolutely limits the labour of females to twelve hours. If there be any doubt that a limit on the labour of the young will be a limit on the labour of adults, there can be no doubt that this Bill, enacting a limit with respect to females employed in all the great branches of manufacture, will practically impose a limit on the labour of grown persons generally. This it must be observed, is a most important point in the argument, and I wish to explain what fell from me the other evening, inasmuch as it may seem to have been inconsistent with this admission. I then stated as a fact, that wherever labour beyond the limit of twelve hours could be obtained in factories wrought by machinery, there, both men and women, actuated by the love of gain, had manifested a most earnest desire to avail themselves of the opportunity to labour beyond that time. This may appear at variance with the admission I have just made as to the practical limitation of working; but it is explained in this manner;—The great staples of manufactured articles, especially of cotton and worsted goods, are wrought by machinery, requiring for their production the conjoined labour of grown persons and young persons. But there are purposes for which this joint labour is not indispensable, and the fact is, that in that portion of the work which can be performed without the labour of young persons, when a part only of the machinery is worked, precisely in this portion, both men and women have shown great avidity to be employed. If it were not for legislative interference, the natural desire of gain, the great moving power of human exertion, will lead both men and women to exert themselves to a degree far exceeding that which is proposed, namely, the limit of twelve hours. But now, to turn to another part of the question. It is one of the evils of a departure from principle, that when once this has taken place, the ground of principle is no longer tenable. I admit to the hon. Member for Leeds, that the question of principle has been already decided, and we are now arguing a question of degree. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said, why choose twelve instead of ten, and he has spoken as if the House were now about to make a choice for the first time; his argument, if unanswered, may produce an impression on the public mind as if the limit has now been capriciously selected. I am sure the Committee will pardon me if I very shortly trace the progress of legislation on this subject, as it is not unimportant to the question before us. Before 1802, there was no limit whatever with respect to the labour in factories of children, young persons, and adults. The first legislative enactment applying to the subject, bears date in that year. The Act of 1802, deals only with apprentices, and by that it is provided, that apprentices in factories shall not work for a longer period than twelve hours. This is the first exercise of what may be termed an arbitrary discretion on the part of the Legislature; it interfered, for the first time, in behalf of the most helpless part of workers in factories; and, therefore, those who most required its protection—parish orphan apprentices. Proceeding on the necessity of the case, it interposes for the purpose of fixing a limit of twelve hours out of every twenty-four, as the maximum for the labour of apprentices. Thus the law stood from 1802 to 1819, a period of seventeen years, when an Act was introduced to make further provision for regulating cotton-mills. The Act of 1802 applied only to apprentices; the Act of 1819 went further, and provided that no children should be employed under nine years of age, and that persons between the ages of nine and sixteen, should not be allowed to work more than twelve hours a day, preserving the limit of twelve hours out of the twenty-four, but extending protection from apprentices only to children under the age of nine. Six years afterwards an Act was introduced for the regulation of cotton-mills, and it provided, that no person under sixteen years of age, should be allowed to work more than twelve hours, on five days of the week, nor more than nine hours on Saturdays. Twelve hours were the precise limit, then, as now, but the limitation of working nine hours on Saturday was then introduced for the first time. So the law remained, until 1831, when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Nottingham (Sir J. Hobhouse) actuated no doubt, by the most humane motives, sought to extend the protection of the former Act, and provided that no person under twenty-one, should work in the night, that was, between half-past eight in the evening, and half-past five in the morning, putting an end to working by double spell throughout the night. The right hon. Gentleman also provided that no person under eighteen years of age should work more than twelve hours, again retaining the limit of twelve hours, with one and a half hour for meals, the hours of work being exclusive of meal time—that is to say, twelve hours to be the fixed limit for labour, with one and a half hour for meals, the factory to be open for fourteen hours, and children under nine not to be employed at all, and to be allowed, when above nine years, to work for twelve hours. I have now traced the changes of the law from 1802 to 1831. In 1833 the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire, for the first time, proposed the limitation of hours from twelve to ten. Let it be observed, so far from twelve being a capricious arbitrary limit, I have shown, that from 1802 to 1833, it had been invariably preserved, and it was never proposed to alter it until my noble Friend, in 1833, introduced a measure for the limitation of labour to ten hours. At that time, I had the honour of being one of the advisers of Her Majesty, with several noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen whom I now see opposite. The Ministers deliberated on that proposition, and gave it their best attention. The late Lord Sydenham was then Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and represented that department in this House. Again, no one will assert that a more humane man than Lord Spencer, who was then at the head of his party in this House, could be found in the community, or one on whose nature the harrowing statements of the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire, were more likely to produce a strong effect. I know how anxiously Lord Spencer deliberated on the question at that time; but, the identical proposition now before the House being then brought forward by the noble Lord (Lord Ashley), Lord Grey's Government had to determine whether they would acquiesce in it or not; and, on referring to the Debates, it will be found that Lord Althorp, then the head of the Government in this House, in conformity with the decision of the Cabinet, resisted the Motion of the noble Lord; and Mr. Poulett Thomson, then representing the Board of Trade, urged in the strongest manner precisely the same arguments against the measure which I addressed to the House on Friday last, when I spoke on the subject. That right hon. Gentleman pointed out, that although the intentions of the noble Lord were most humane, though the facts on which he rested his conclusion were most distressing, yet, taking a dispassionate view of the policy of the proposition which he had introduced—considering not merely what concerned the replacement of the capital embarked in manufacturing establishments—though such considerations were not to be disregarded—but the more humane, the larger, the proper view on a subject of this kind, namely, the interests of the receivers of wages, the Government unanimously decided that the proposition must be resisted. My noble Friend took the sense of the House on the question, was defeated, and dropped the measure. My noble Friend, Lord Althorp, then took up the subject, and passed that law, which from that time to the present has regulated factory labour. The Noblemen and Gentlemen whom I see opposite, and who formed part of that Administration, did then concur in the opinions which I entertained, which I have ever since entertained, and the cogency of which I do not think can be resisted. It will, perhaps, not be inexpedient that I should trace the course of legislation since that period. The Act of 1833 placed the silk manufacturers on the same footing as the cotton, wool, and flax manufacturers, and in the following year a Bill was proposed by Mr. Poulett Thomson and Lord Howick to alter the provisions of the Act of 1833. It was, however, a measure of minor importance which dealt with silk, but there was no reduction in the hours of labour for cotton prepared. In 1835, however another Bill was brought forward of quite a different aspect by the hon. Member for Ashton-under-line (Mr. Hindley) and the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Brotherton), by which it was proposed gradually to reduce the twelve hours of labour for young persons by half an hour per annum till 1839, when the period of work would be limited to ten hours a-day. That was in effect the same measure as the proposition of the noble Lord. The right hon. Baronet, the Member for Nottingham, on the part of the Government, having previously dealt with the subject, and gone as far as he thought prudent in extending protection to the younger and more tender persons under eighteen, and in certain circumstances also from eighteen to twenty-one, said, that he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, but on the understanding that it was not to be proceeded with that Session, carefully guarding himself against being understood to assent to the principle of the Bill, either on his own part or on that of the Government. The Bill made no progress in that Session, and in the following year, I believe, it was not brought forward. But at this stage a most important circumstance occurred; another Bill was brought forward by Mr. Poulett Thomson and Lord John Russell, then the leader of the Government in this House, to explain and amend the Factories Bill. Now, would it be believed at that time there was no intention whatever on the part of the Ministers of the Crown still further to limit the labour of grown, or even that of young persons, but that the object of the measure then introduced was exactly the reverse? By the Act of 1833, which was to be brought into gradual operation, the hours of labour of children under the age of thirteen years were limited; but this limitation did not take effect till 1836. In that year, as I have stated, a Bill was introduced by Mr. Poulett Thomson and the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) to repeal that provision of the Act of 1833 to which I have just alluded, and therefore to permit children between the age of twelve and thirteen to work for twelve hours, notwithstanding the Act of 1833, which provided that after this year no person between twelve and thirteen should work for a longer period than eight hours. I am not stating this invidiously, and I do not know what is the intention of various hon. Members whom I see opposite, and who were then in the House; but it is quite clear that at that time they had not receded from the conclusion to which they arrived in 1833, that twelve hours were a reasonable time for the daily labor of young persons. There was a division on this point. I voted with the noble Lord, though then opposed to him, and the majority—a small majority—remained with the noble Lord, and those who were then his Colleagues; but, as it seemed, Government did not think it expedient to press the measure. So the matter stood until 1838, when a Bill was brought in by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere), then filling a high place in the Board of Trade, and Mr. Fox Maule, who was then Under Secretary of State, the noble Lord, the Member for London, being the Secretary for the Home Department. By this Bill it was proposed to enact that children were not to work more than nine hours a day, and young persons not more than twelve hours, still adhering to the accustomed limit, which had been kept up since 1802. In 1839, a Bill was again introduced by Mr. Fox Maule and Lord John Russell, which was almost identical with the Bill of 1838; young persons were to work twelve hours a day. In the Committee, the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, thought it necessary to make the same proposition as in 1833, and he moved that the blank in the clause be filled up with the words "fifty-eight," instead of "sixty-eight," which, practically, would make a reduction from twelve hours to ten hours a day. I cannot state more briefly or forcibly the objections to this Motion, than they were stated, where I find them on record, in the speech of the noble Lord, the Member for London, who, in 1839, the last time the question had been discussed, opposed the very proposition which is now before the House. The noble Lord's speech was so short that I may venture almost to read the whole speech:—

"It seemed to him, that the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) had not answered the question put by his hon. Friend, the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers) namely, whether, having reduced the hours of labour, the noble Lord could provide at the same time that the same remuneration should be given for the shortened hours of labour?"

Now, this is exactly the answer to the delusion which still prevails—that for ten hours' work twelve hours' wages will be given. This is an idea which has always prevailed among the working classes; and it is a delusion so gross that the House is bound to exercise its protecting care, and not to mislead them by a measure, resting on such false expectations, and which will most certainly be followed by such fatal disappointments. The noble Lord went on to ask, "Does the noble Lord mean to carry his principle to the extent of fixing wages by law, or does he not?" At that time it had not struck the noble Lord that it was possible to do what the noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland, suggested, that, though they could not be fixed by law, yet they might be fixed by local boards of trade, acting under the authority and control of the Secretary of State. [Viscount Howick: I never said they might fix wages.] I certainly understood the noble Lord to say that local boards might be appointed on the same plan as the Council of prud' hommes in France, with the sanction of the Executive Government, by which all questions of trade might be regulated, and I concluded of course that the most important which could be discussed between masters and workmen—that of the rate of wages—would not be excluded. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) in the speech I am quoting went on:

"If he did mean to do so, the Committee knew, of course, the impossibility of adopting such a course; and if he did not, the Committee must know that whatever shortened the hours of labour, and with the present high price of provisions, reduced the rate of wages, instead of being a proposition of humanity, would be a proposition of the greatest inhumanity. Therefore, as he thought the proposition, if carried into effect, would be cruel in its operation, he must vote against it."

Although I was at that time opposed to Her Majesty's Government I was present on that occasion and voted with my former Colleagues, maintaining to the utmost of my power the opinions so ably expressed by the noble Lord, the Member for London. I hope I may be permitted to read some of the names of those Gentlemen with whom I had then the honour of dividing, in a majority of 94 to 62. On that occasion I had the pleasure of voting with the right hon. Sir George Grey, with Mr. B. Hawes, who now appears inclined to support the proposition of the noble Lord, with the right hon. Sir J. Hobhouse, with Viscount Howick, with the right hon. Mr. Labouchere, with Viscount Morpeth, with Mr. F. Maule, who was one of the Tellers, and though last, the most important, with Lord John Russell.* I have now traced the course of legislation up to 1839. In 1840, a Committee was appointed, to investigate the question, and in 1841 another Factory Bill was introduced consequent on their report, according to which children were not to work more than seven hours a day, and young persons not more than twelve hours, thus strictly adhering to the old limit, deliberately sanctioned by five or six Parliaments, and as many Governments, and never yet departed from by any Administration; but which the right hon. Gentleman opposite, by his speech, would lead the public to suppose was now for the first time capriciously adopted by Her Majesty's Government. That Bill was brought in by Mr. F. Maule and Mr. Sheil. I will now briefly advert to some of the topics which have been discussed since I last addressed the Committee, and first, in this respect, the opinions of the Factory Inspectors. I place the greatest reliance on the authority both of Mr. Horner and Mr. Saunders. In the passage quoted by the right hon. Baronet, Mr. Saunders seems to be of opinion that a period of twelve hours is too long. I do not think any evidence of this kind can be produced as to the opinions of Mr. Horner; but I have felt bound in a matter of such vast importance, these gentlemen being persons of high authority in this matter, knowing well the feelings and interests of the working classes, on the one hand, and of their employers, on the other, to put the question to them, whether they believe the adoption of a ten hours' Bill will be conducive to the interests of the operatives and the manufacturers? and I can now state, on their authority, that the passing of a ten hours' Bill will have the worst effect on the interests of the working classes, properly considered. I am bound to admit that since I last addressed the House several great authorities have pronounced in favour of the Motion of the noble Lord; first there was one of the Members for the southern division of Lancashire (Lord F. Egerton) who expressed himself favourable to the proposition. Then came one of the Members for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. S. Wortley), and the noble Lord, one of the Members for Liverpool (Lord Sandon), has declared for it, and, in my estimation, by no means the least authority, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Beckett). But after all, this is a matter to be decided by reasoning, and not by authority, and I cannot persuade myself that anything which fell from those high authorities can countervail the weight of argument which appears to be against the proposition. My hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding, says the consent of the mill-owners of that division of the county is very generally given to the proposition, and the hon. Member for Leeds, stated that most of the mill-owners of the West Riding, connected with the woollen trade, are favourable to an eleven hours' Bill. Let me remind the Committee that the question now before it is, whether they will agree to a ten hours' Bill. It is right that this point should be clearly understood. With respect to a large branch of the woollen manufactures of the West Riding, machinery of a comparatively cheap and simple description is used, the workmen being paid by the piece, and his masters not being anxious to work a greater number of hours than is absolutely necessary for the demands of the trade. Thus to them the matter is comparatively indifferent. But, in the more expensive manufacture of worsted, where the higher species of machinery is in use, where great capital is vested, there will be found no great inclination among the mill-owners to reduce the hours to ten. The same observation applies to the great staple of the cotton manufacture. Speaking on the best information I can obtain, I believe the cotton manufacturers, who generally use expensive machinery requiring a great outlay, and from the constant improvements which are made in it, an early renewal, as well as the worsted manufacturers, will, ninety-nine out of one hundred of them, implore the House not to make this alteration. ["No, no."] The hon. Gentleman denies it. I have taken pains to inform myself, and I feel sure that what I have said is a fact. There is an hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fielden the Member for Oldham we believe), who was most favourable to a ten hours' Bill, and if it were possible for him to keep up in the race of competition, and work his people only ten hours a day, the warm feeling of his heart would prompt him to do so; but, as matters stand, that hon. Gentleman, I have been informed, avails himself now of the full privilege of the law, and invariably works his labourers twelve hours a day. I admit, that this is the effect of competition. I did not say as I appear to have been understood, that it is necessary for machinery, in consequence of improvements to be replaced once in every sixteen years, but rather once in twelve or thirteen years, and I quoted the opinion of Mr. Horner on the point. In that gentleman's report for 1842, at page 81, there is a statement made by one of the most extensive mill-owners in Manchester which I will read to the House. The passage is as follows:—

"The improvements in machinery are so constant and rapid, added to the changes in trade which render particular kinds of machinery entirely useless, that in the cotton manufacturing business the whole value of the machinery ought to be repaid to its owner in twelve or thirteen years at latest."

Now, whether it were in sixteen or thirteen years that the machinery will have to be replaced, there is a certain amount of dead capital embarked in that machinery; and if by the proposition of my noble Friend, we abridge one-sixth of the period in which this capital will have to be replaced, in proportion as we diminish the time in which the whole machinery is allowed to work, the period for its necessary renewal remaining the same, we demonstrate practically the fatal loss on the fixed capital embarked. I have before said, that I will advert to one, the only means of escape open to the master-manufacturer—the only means to prevent loss falling upon him, if the proposition of the noble Lord is carried which I hold to be the most important part of the argument. I am satisfied, in the present state of the market of labour, that the master-manufacturers, if the proposition is carried, will be able, under present circumstances, and at the present moment, to transfer the loss from themselves, the stronger party, to the labourer, the weaker party. The House, I know, dislikes calculations, and it is indeed difficult to state them with clearness and precision. I feel it, however, necessary to allude to one or two facts. On the former evening of the debate, I quoted some statements by Mr. Horner, which I verified to the best of my power, and I still believe that the immediate effect of assenting to the proposal of the noble Lord will be a reduction of 25 per cent. upon the wages of the operatives. Observe, then, if that be the state of the case, if some of these labourers are in that comfortable position I heard, with so much delight, stated by the hon. Member for Durham the other evening, whole families of them earning—as that hon. Member stated he knew of his own knowledge, for they were in his own works—93*l.* a-year, if I am right in the position of the decrease of wages consequent upon the noble Lord's proposition, what will be the effect of that proposition upon those very families of labourers now receiving 93*l.* per annum?—why their wages will be reduced to 70*l.* A more disastrous proposition than that can hardly be entertained. If I am right, it is our duty to pause; and all I ask on the part of the Government is, that the House should adhere to a law which has prevailed in the country for forty-two years—that twelve hours of labour shall be the limit. I will not encumber the argument by considering other and minor propositions as to restriction; but if I am right, and if the effect of the noble Lord's proposition will be to reduce those families now fully employed by the hon. Member for Durham, at an average rate of 93*l.* down to 70*l.* I ask what will be the excuse for such legislation. This House is probably the most highly educated assembly in the civilized world, we fully understand these matters in all their bearings, and all their consequences in this chain of cause and of effect: and as Legislators we are bound to weigh them well. It is the duty more especially, of every Government to weigh all these considerations; and every Government which has weighed them has taken the course I am now recommending to the House. In my estimation a fearful responsibility is connected with this question—the ruin of the country may be the speedy result of a wrong decision; and I, for one, am not disposed to share in the responsibility I should incur by supporting the proposal of the noble Lord. If the House will permit me, I will endeavour to trace the course of the argument by which, as I think, I can show that the inevitable effect of this measure of a ten hours' Bill will be a reduction of 25 per cent. on the wages of the operatives. I will first take a case mentioned in Mr. Horner's report for 1842, page 79, which was the estimate of the fixed charges of a cotton-mill at Manchester, employing 520 hands, and amounting to 1,914*l.* 8*s.* The statement was, that if a mill worked less than sixty-nine hours per week, there would be a loss to the manufacturer of 2*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* per hour. I will suppose the reduction proposed by my noble Friend to be from twelve to ten hours a day, in other words, sixty instead of sixty-nine hours per week and then multiplying the 2*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* by nine, will give 25*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* weekly loss upon this head. Mr. Horner's statement is, that in the mill in question, there are 170 operatives employed at 15s. per week, and 350 at 10s. per week. Thus, the weekly wages paid in the mill amounted, in the first class, at 15s., to 277l. 10s. and in the other class, at 10s., to 175l. The total weekly wages amounts, therefore, to 302l. 10s. The amount of weekly loss, therefore, on account of fixed capital, will be nearly one-twelfth of weekly wages; and, it is a conclusion that cannot be escaped from, unless the fallacy be adopted, which, I fear, has imposed upon many of the working classes, that twelve hours' wages will be paid for ten hours' work—that a reduction in wages must be exactly commensurate with the reduction in time, and that the master manufacturers must reduce wages to the extent of one-sixth. I will, however, put it at one-seventh, and let that point be recollected—a positive reduction in wages of one-seventh. The amount of weekly loss on account of fixed capital is as one-twelfth in proportion to wages. Add one-seventh to one-twelfth, and the total reduction of wages will amount to nineteen-eighty-fourths of the wages now paid equal to a little less than one quarter, but more than one-fifth, or to somewhere about 28 per cent. I believe, that the calculations on the subject irresistibly prove, that the practical inevitable effect of passing the proposition of the noble Lord, will be, in the present state of the commercial world, equal to a reduction in wages in the cotton and worsted trades, greater than one-fifth. In matters of this kind, hon. Gentlemen will admit that Mr. Poulett Thomson's opinion is of authority. Mr. Poulett Thomson said it would be better for the master manufacturers to have a duty of 2d. per lb. imposed upon raw cotton, than to have this proposition for a reduction of time from twelve to ten hours carried: and Mr. Poulett Thomson said, that in many cases such a proposal would inflict a loss of 100l. a week upon the master manufacturers. The hon. Member for Kendal has forcibly put forward the point urged by me, that the conclusions of the noble Lord are at variance with his premises. He ought not in consistency to stop short; he ought to prohibit female labour in factories. The noble Lord has absolutely prohibited female labour in mines and collieries, and the labour of any child under ten years of age. The noble Lord the Member for Lancashire felt the force of that sentiment when he exclaimed, "Would to God we could prevent females from entering the factories altogether." As a matter of wishes and of feeling, I may take the same view; but speaking practically of the state of the manufacturing districts, assuming that the position I have taken regarding the reduction of 25 per cent. upon wages from reduction of time is well founded, I am bound to ask myself the question—shall labour be reduced from twelve to ten hours, to be followed by the certain evil of reducing the wages, not only of the woman but of all her children, and of her husband 25 per cent. That is the consideration—that is the balance in which to weigh it. I am convinced a measure more injurious to the peace and blessings of civilised life in that community, and more fatal to the real interests of that class cannot be adopted. My noble Friend the Member for Liverpool has declared his object to be to equalise labour—that he is desirous to place labour on the same footing throughout the kingdom, and that ten hours' work shall be the limit of human industry. That is a most ominous warning. This is but a small step if indeed we are to deal with the whole labour of this great community. I must say, that a more disastrous course of legislation never has been entered upon. My noble Friend has said, he wished to equalise the distribution of labour, and that legislation had tended to that end. Now, any Gentleman practically acquainted with the subject will be able to say, whether, although the Legislature in 1834 might, to a certain extent, have protected children, and secured young persons against excessive labour, legislation had thereby tended to equalize the distribution of labour. I assert on the contrary, that it has had a directly contrary effect. The effect has been to drive children from that kind of labour which has been regulated by law to other labour in the immediate vicinity which has not been touched by legislation. I have been informed that 35,000 children are employed in calico printing; that they are worked without limitation of time, they begin to labour at six years of age, and they work fifteen hours a day, even night labour is not prohibited. So far, therefore, from the tendency of legislation being such as has been stated by my noble Friend, it has been directly opposite. There is a congestion of labour where there has been no legislation; there is a depletion of labour where there has been interference. In consequence of this very competition in infantine labour in branches of trade untouched by law, there is great difficulty and inconvenience in carrying the law into effect in those manufactures, with which we interfere. I have now gone through those various topics and I have troubled the Committee at much greater length than I could have wished, but I was desirous of showing to hon. Members and to the country, that Her Majesty's Government does not resist the natural wishes of a large body of the labouring classes without having given the fullest deliberation to the question or without sufficient reasons in their own minds for participating in the views of every successive Government, which on its responsibility, has attended to this important subject. I will now conclude with one or two general remarks. I think, that in politics, as in morals, there is a retribution inherent in the course of affairs which is clearly perceptible in matters of Government, and I have never yet seen an instance of a wide departure from the principle of sound legislation which has not, sooner or later, produced confusion and created inextricable difficulties. I am also decidedly of opinion that every such departure is not only calculated to create confusion and difficulty, from which there will be no escape, and for which it will be hard, if not impossible, to find a remedy, but that it will be fatal to the interests of those whom it was originally intended to serve. Above all, I must impress upon the Committee, that if the stringency of certain restrictions be increased it will be necessary to relax others; of a counter-vailing nature; the subject is delicate, it is like a house built of cards, from which one can not be removed without danger to the whole fabric, and evils may be created which I tremble to contemplate, but certainly, foreseeing those evils, I am bound with the whole power and influence of the Government to guard against them.

Sir G. Grey, in explanation, begged to observe, that nothing had been further from his desire or intention than to introduce party feelings into the present discussion, and he felt confident, that nothing which had fallen from him had exhibited any such intention as that which had been imputed to him. The right hon. Baronet who had just sat down had charged him (Sir G. Grey) with inconsistency in the course he now proposed to take as compared with that which he had taken in the year 1839. The right hon. Baronet ought to have some charity as to inconsistency, when he himself looked back at past events. But it could not be forgotten that upon the question now under discussion there had been a great deal of new information afforded during the interval which had taken place since 1839, and no regard to inconsistency should induce him (Sir G. Grey) to reject the light which had been thrown upon the matter. On looking at the division list of 1839 to which the right hon. Baronet had adverted, he found that the noble Lord, the present Secretary for Ireland (Lord Eliot), and the right hon. Baronet, the present Paymaster of the Forces, (Sir E. Knatchbull), both voted in favour of the motion of the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire.

Mr. M'Geachy: It is with considerable reluctance that I venture to trespass on the indulgence of the House; first, because I am fully aware of the great difficulties which beset this question; and, next, because I may appear to trench upon the province of the noble Lord, the Member for Dorset, who has for so many years devoted himself to this subject. Still, in the present posture of affairs in this country, I feel it is my duty to speak out upon this question. Sir, I deem the noble Lord of great value to the country at the present moment amidst the wretched materialism of the age. There he sits, a proof that principle does exist—that every man has not his price—there he sits self-excluded from office, because he deemed the acceptance of office inconsistent with that entire devotion of himself to the cause of the poor in which the best years of his life have been spent. I honour that noble Lord, because I believe that he is as ready to inquire into the condition of the Dorsetshire labourers as of the factory children; and I regret that the hon. Member for Stockport did not, on a previous evening, move for a simple inquiry into the state of the agricultural labourers without prejudging the case; though I cannot but congratulate the hon. Member on the altered tone of his remarks, a tone, which if truth, as I am bound to believe, be his object, will far more surely advance his cause, than that in which his remarks in this House are not unfrequently made. I greatly regret that the Government has not on this occasion introduced a 'Ten Hours' Bill — (more especially as three of its Members, if I am rightly informed, voted on a former occasion in favour of such an enactment)—instead of leaving it to what I trust will prove a majority of this House to bestow so great a boon on the operatives of this country. On one Member of the Government, at least, a 'Ten Hours' Bill has an hereditary claim. Five and twenty years ago the first Sir Robert Peel said before a Committee of the House of Commons in speaking of a 'Ten Hours' Bill:—

“Such an unlimited and indiscriminate employment of the poor, consisting of a great proportion of the inhabitants of the trading districts, will be attended with effects to the rising generation, so ruinous and alarming, that I cannot contemplate them without dismay, and thus the great effort of British ingenuity, whereby the machinery of our manufactures has been brought to such perfection, instead of being a blessing to the nation, will be converted into the bitterest curse.”

Sir, I cannot agree with the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to narrow down the question merely to one of two hours of time. The whole principle of interference is involved, and the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman are as potent in favour of sixteen hours of labour as in favour of twelve, and he appears in the position of one, who confesses that an error has been committed in interfering with labour at all; and that a right principle has been broken in upon. I have not risen on the present occasion, prompted by the desire of making a speech, but because I feel bound honestly to express the opinion I entertain on this difficult question. The present Government came into power in 1841 upon the shoulders of the people—no bribery—no corruption—could have given it so large, so overwhelming a majority. The Government, had it identified itself with the wants, the wishes, and the feelings of the people, might have been the strongest England has ever seen. But what has been their course? Vigorous and energetic in opposition, they have been most cautious in power. Last year, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, held out the olive branch in the shape of a Factories Bill, containing the education clauses, but it was received with scorn and indignation. The dignified apathy of the Church on the one hand, and what I must call, the fanatical intolerance of the Dissenters on the other, threw out the Bill, the factory children were abandoned to their fate—and were left without education, a standing proof of our most unhappy divisions. I do not blame the Government for their conduct with respect to that Bill, for although they might have taken a bolder course, I believe they acted honestly, uprightly, and to the best of their ability. Now, the Government has identified itself with the New Poor Law, and the right hon. Gentleman announces his intention of carrying out the principles of a law, which avowedly cannot be carried out in the manufacturing districts, and which recent disclosures shew can as little be carried into effect in the agricultural parts of the country. Now, in what I am about to say, I do not mean to allude to any one Government in particular, but I would ask, What lesson do Governments teach the people? What but this? the benefits of agitation! Since 1829, when the Roman Catholic Relief Bill was granted avowedly not a safe act of justice, but as a concession to intimidation—to the Reform Bill, when Ministers of State did not think it inconsistent with their duty to receive deputations from 150,000 political unionists, when Bishops and Peers were threatened by the Prime Minister—down to Welsh riots and Chartist insurrections, redress of grievances has followed agitation, and agitation will therefore press upon the Legislature. Is not this a painful state of things? The time, I think, has now arrived, when truth should be spoken. In the midst of unprecedented wealth, this country is steeped in suffering. The great masses of the people, for whom, as Christian men, we are bound to live, are unable by honest labour to gain a subsistence for themselves and their families. By the Poor Law they have been forced to fall back upon their own resources—with what effect the increasing pauperism of the country too plainly shows. The principle of amassing wealth has been indulged in, and has gone on, and what is the result? What is now the state of the people? Every inquiry that has been forced upon us shows the urgent necessity for legislative interference; and the people wait in hope. There is scarcely a part of the labouring population, that does not call for an inquiry into its condition. The people wait patiently, in the hope that something will be done, that inquiry will not be all, and I do solemnly call upon the Government, great as the task may be, to act, and to realize as far as it is possible, the just expectations of the people. And here I cannot but express my satisfaction at the observations which fell in the early part of this debate from the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, and which I think have been greatly misrepresented in the course of this discussion. However I may differ on political questions from that noble Lord, I cannot but admire the originality of his views, and the manifest honesty of his purposes. The organization of labour is the grand political problem of the day—and it is clear that if the present course is to be persisted in—if we are merely to let things alone—and to leave all to demand and supply—if one part of the community is to go on preserving profits, and improving machinery and to do no more—whilst another class is preserving game and improving breeds of cattle—the people meanwhile starving in the midst of plenty, the sport of capitalists and the slaves of reckless speculation, it needs no prophet to arise to foretell that such a state of things cannot last. It is because I believe that a ten hours Bill is a step in the right direction, and a remedy for a portion of the existing evils, that I support the motion of the noble Lord. I have listened with some regret to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who stated, as I understood him, that he had been waited upon by a deputation of mill-owners, who represented to him, that if Her Majesty's Ministers would consent to their proposition to oppose the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, they would withhold all opposition to the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. [Here Sir James Graham made some remark to the hon. Member, whose position was so immediately behind the seat of the right hon. Gentleman, that not a word could be heard even in the body of the House.] I should be very sorry to misrepresent anything that fell from the right hon. Gentleman; but I understood the right hon. Gentleman to express himself to that effect. Now what is asked by those who support the Amendment of the noble Lord is really very reasonable. They only ask that the day's labour of women and young persons employed in factories shall be reduced to the usual hours of labour in other parts of the country. I am at a loss to understand why it is perpetually referred to on this particular question, that the people employed in factories are under some mistake as to the object and tendency of this measure, and that they consider they are to receive as high a rate of wages for the diminished hours of labour as they receive at present. This is entirely a misstatement. In an appeal to Members of Parliament, issued by the delegates of the factory workers of Lancashire and Yorkshire, who are now in London, they state—

“ We have this morning (March 16th) carefully read over the debate, and considered Lord Ashley's speech, paragraph by paragraph, and we now affirm from our own knowledge, that every statement made to the House is substantially correct. Permit us to beg of you not to listen to the plea of a reduction of wages, which has been set up on our behalf by those who profess to be our friends. We are quite prepared to leave the question of wages to find its own level, and also to make the sacrifice—nominal as it must be for the sake of preserving the health and morals of our children and sisters. Shorter hours may produce a reduction of wages; and even if it does, we are prepared to show, that the increased domestic advantages, by which we should be enabled to take our meals at home instead of taking them to the factory, would fully compensate for the nominal reduction of wages, which it is said, a limitation of the hours of labour would produce.”

There is one thing very difficult to deal with, when arguing the question as to the diminution of wages. The argument assumes a double-faced character. It is a complete “ Janus Bifrons.” One day the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) describes the manufacturing districts to be far happier than any other portion of the kingdom—quite an Utopia—and the next he represents them as miracles of woe, and states, that if the Legislature were to enact, that no woman or young person should work more than ten hours, it would in effect prevent all factories from working more than ten hours; and the hon. Gentleman then draws the inference; and indeed asserts, that “ the effect of the noble Lord's proposition would be to stop the whole manufacturing processes of the country”—and those who support the noble Lord are represented as wishing to lower the condition of the operative. These certainly are very strong statements, and require investigation. I have looked into the Debates of the period, and I there find that just the same arguments were used, and the same prophecies uttered as to the ruin to our manufactures, when Mr. Sadler first mooted this question in Parliament. But now let the House say, whether previous restrictions on the hours of labour have operated to the injury of our trade, to such an extent as the hon. Gentleman seems to anticipate. I will quote for this purpose, a passage from a Report presented by Baron Dupin to the French Chamber of Peers in 1840.

"The first Act of Parliament, says Monsieur Dupin, that interfered with factory labour, was in June 1802. That date was very remarkable; for it was at that very time, that in consequence of the general peace Great Britain was brought into competition with the other manufacturing countries of Europe. But England did not hesitate to step forward, even at that moment, to prevent the continuance of such excessive labour of children; and that, too, in the most considerable branches of her industry—the woollen and cotton manufactures, which from that period constituted the largest proportion of her exports. Experience has proved, says M. Dupin, that in showing herself superior to the fears, and menaces, and sophisms of a sordid cupidity, and following the dictates of humanity, England in no degree sacrificed the future prosperity of those branches of industry which she then subjected to restrictions. The increase of her exports of cottons and woollens between 1800 and 1839, in spite of the effect of the protection afforded by law to the children (mark this) has been 155 per cent., while in all the other articles, taken together, the increase has been only 11½ per cent."

It appears to me, that those who oppose the Amendment of the noble Lord, go to the extent of opposing all restrictions on labour; for it is impossible to see where the line between interference and non-interference is to be drawn. The opponents of the noble Lord maintain, that all evil is to be cured by an extension of trade—this is surely but the old cry of commercial cupidity—give—give.

"Non missura cutem nisi plena cruoris hirudo."

With no corrective principle introduced, how is it possible that the extension of trade which has coincided thus far with the increased sufferings of the operatives, should prove a panacea for all the evils of which he complains? From 1814 to 1841, increase of trade and increase of suffering have been identical: one of the greatest evils of the present system is, that it works up the young, and casts out of employment the adults. The effect of the admission of children into a trade is to reduce wages. The number of children affords the best criterion of wages. This is a fact well known to the operatives, who find that according to the number of children employed in their respective trades is the amount of wages the adults receive, and in many trades care is consequently taken by the workmen to regulate by the admission of apprentices. At Sheffield, for example, in the Plated Trade, the proportion of boys to adults is 16 per cent. These men are, perhaps, the first class of operatives in the kingdom. In the Edge-tool Trade, the proportion of boys to adults 12½ per cent. Here also the men are well off and receive good wages, whereas in the Spring Knife Branch the proportion is 25 per cent.; where, except the best workmen, the men are very badly off. In the Glasgow Cotton Mills, the proportion of minors to male and female adults is 167 per cent. In the Lancashire Factories 158 per cent.; and in the Flax Manufacture the proportion is 425 per cent. There is one point with regard to the employment of agricultural labourers in the manufacturing districts, to which, as it has been adverted to by the hon. Member for Manchester, I wish briefly to call the attention of the House. It has been stated by the hon. Member, that those agricultural labourers who have migrated into the agricultural districts, are permanently employed; but I believe that the experience of the last half century will establish a very different conclusion for one of the great disadvantages of manufactures is, that they do not afford permanent employment. Take, for example, the Cotton Manufacture—now the great staple manufacture of the country; and observe its progress during the last half century. In 1788, there was a severe depression—from 1793 to 1799, the depression was such as to threaten its total destruction, again, in 1803, 1810, 1816, 1825, 1829, and in 1836, which continued up to last year. There were thus nine periods of depression in forty-eight years, lasting on the average about three years; so that in this the most prosperous branch of British manufacture, twenty-four out of forty-eight years have been periods of great privation and suffering to the operatives. The result, however, of our manufacturing system is curious. It has brought down the operatives to the lowest state of degradation and misery, whilst the Mill-owners have attained to a degree of wealth unknown in any other country in the world. I have now only to thank the House for the kindness with which they have listened to the observations which I have felt it my duty to offer; and to express my earnest hope, that a majority of this House will vote, as I find myself reluctantly compelled to do on this occasion, against the proposition of Her Majesty's Ministers, and in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire.

Mr. Labouchere never rose to address the House with feelings of greater pain and anxiety. It was painful to him to separate himself on this occasion from persons whose opinions he highly valued, and with whom he was accustomed to act. But it would be more painful still, conceiving the question before the House to be one of as great importance as could be discussed, and seeing the formidable opposition which had been raised against Her Majesty's Government for pursuing the same course which, whether in office or in opposition, he had himself pursued; it would, he said, be more painful still for him to shrink from giving the Government, both by his voice and by vote, all the support he could give them under the circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the speech by which he introduced this measure, divided the subject into two very distinct portions. The first consisted of a very lengthened appeal to those who sat on the Opposition side of the House, and more especially to those who belonged to the late Government. Now, he confessed if no other argument could be offered to him than that of consistency, he would at once throw it to the winds. If more mature reflection and subsequent information convinced him that he had been wrong in the course he had formerly pursued—and he was far from denying that subsequent information had been obtained—but if these things had produced on his mind the same effect which they had produced on the mind of his right hon. Friend, the Member for Devonport, and other hon. Members, he should feel it his bounden duty not to shrink from the avowal of that change of opinion, and of acting upon it. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir James Graham), after addressing himself to the consistency of hon. Members, afterwards resorted to the arguments of the question, and he must say, that those arguments appeared to his mind so convincing, that it was impossible for him not to concede to their force. This was no new question. It had been discussed and decided in various forms and manners in the House of Commons in Committee, and commented upon by Commissioners of the highest knowledge and most competent experience on questions of this description; and they had all uniformly come to this conclusion, that they recoiled from the measure which the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire, recommended. The point before the House was a very simple one, but it was as important as it was simple. It was this, whether they would take a step, nominally, by this Bill, of restricting the labour of young people and women to ten hours, but practically and really of diminishing the working of factory mills within that period. That was the question; one which had been frequently urged upon the Legislature, but which hitherto had, after mature consideration, been rejected. And after what he had heard he was not surprised that the Legislature, Commissioners and Committees, should have paused before they determined to take such a step. Some Gentlemen argued in this manner. They said, that we were not upon a new and untrodden path—that we had already sanctioned interference with factory labour, and therefore they seemed to think that we could not go on too rapidly in that direction. Now, he must confess that he drew a very different conclusion. He knew that they had entered upon a new, untrodden, and very perilous path; and it was therefore, that he wished to walk upon such a path with caution. It was not enough to ask him, whether he thought it right that a woman or young person should be employed twelve hours a day. He wished to God he could prevent it! He wished there was no necessity for such labour. He was satisfied it was not for the good of the person himself, if viewed as an isolated individual, and one separated from all other circumstances. But that was not the question. In all human affairs good and evil were mixed together; and the Legislature would act an unwise part, and be guilty of inhumanity towards those classes whose interests they were called upon to protect, if they did not take into consideration all the circumstances that were involved in this question. Some hon. Gentlemen had asked, was there such a great difference between a Ten Hours' and a Twelve Hours' Bill? You have (said they) already, by the Factories Bill, limited the working in mills to twelve hours a day; can it, therefore, be so very dangerous to limit it to ten hours? He would tell the House why he thought, in passing the Twelve Hours' Bill, they comparatively acted upon safe ground, while, in taking the course now asked for, they would be acting perilously. In 1833, it was found, practically, in well-conducted manufactories throughout the country, the people were not employed more than twelve hours a day. That being the case, and being convinced by experience, that factories could be conducted upon that principle, he was not unwilling to consent to an enactment, which so long as it did not interfere with that principle, should establish regulations with respect to the labour of children: such as working by relays, and adapting their work to a system which had never been established before. No doubt this, to a certain extent, increased the charges upon the manufacturers, but still there was no interference with the power of working their mills, if so pleased, for twelve hours a day. This, he would submit, was a very important distinction between the existing law and the proposition put forth by the noble Lord. In arguing such a question as this, they could not confine their views to this country alone. They must look abroad. It was a question not merely as it affected those engaged in the home trade, but as it also concerned those engaged in the vast manufactures that were designed for foreign trade, and who were subject at every step to severe competition with foreign manufactures. What was the case? He believed that there was no country in the world, where there existed cotton manufactures, in which the common period of labour was less than twelve hours a day. The noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, expressed his incredulity upon that subject. He should be glad to learn from the noble Lord whether there existed any law in any country in Europe, except in England, that prevented the mills working more than twelve hours a day, and whether, in fact, mills abroad were not worked twelve hours a day? He could mention one country, a very important country, and one of the most dangerous rivals the English manufacturers had in the cotton trade—he meant the United States of America. He would rather refer to the United States for the sake of his argument, because that was not a country where competition was so intense as to drive the population to subject themselves to an intolerable degree of labour. A very respectable Gentleman connected with the cotton manufacture in that country was asked what was the number of hours persons were employed in the mills. He answered, that the actual number of working hours averaged throughout the year at least twelve hours, in some seasons nearly fourteen hours, while in some little more than eleven hours. The House would from this perceive that they were incurring much greater danger in limiting the hours from twelve to ten than in fixing certain regulations for the work during the twelve hours. By the present proposition they would be going quite upon a new ground, and incurring a very different hazard from what they had hitherto incurred. The existing law merely regulated infant labour, taking care that there should be no cruelty to children employed in factories, and that opportunity should be afforded them to obtain education; but it left the mill owners full liberty to work the whole twelve hours. It was quite plain the effect of the proposition of the noble Lord would be a diminution of wages. No one who had any acquaintance with the manufacturing districts would undervalue that effect. The periods when distress and squalid misery pervaded the manufacturing districts were not those when men and women and children worked long hours, but when there was no employment for them. That was the time when disease was rife and when ruin abounded; and if by legislation they should produce permanent stagnation of trade and employment in this country, they would inflict more evil and misery in a week than any extra labour would inflict in the course of a year. They were told, that the manufacturers had no wish to be interfered with. They were, no doubt, much like other persons. Nobody liked to be interfered with. He was willing to admit that many apprehensions entertained and many opinions expressed by the manufacturers as to the effect of the present Factories Bill were unfounded. But that was no reason why their representations should be unattended to, if they were supported by reason and good sense. He could not regret, with the hon. Member for Kendal, that Parliament had ever undertaken to regulate factory labour. On the contrary, he was satisfied, as far as experience had shown, that Parliament had conferred a most important benefit upon labourers by enacting regulations in factories, and he believed that the manufacturers themselves were convinced that such had been the case. He also believed that the success of our legislation had been adopted as an example by other countries, and he for one could not give his assent that Parliament should turn back from the attempt to afford that protection to the infant population in the manufacturing districts which had hitherto been so successfully afforded to them. With regard to the effect of our example on other countries it was important that they should not take a hasty step on this subject. For if they took an unwise step in legislation on this matter, it was not very likely that foreign countries would adopt it. By previous legislation they only attempted to regulate labour. People congregated in masses admitted of the possibility of this, but that did not apply to other places; therefore, though successful in manufacturing districts, the same legislation would not be applicable elsewhere. But there were circumstances connected with manufacturing labour which ought to make them particularly cautious how they pushed the principle of regulation to an unwise and dangerous extent. He thought they ought to avoid the introduction of any subject upon which there might exist a difference of opinion, which might interfere with a dispassionate consideration of this important question; but there was one important subject he could not help adverting to. They had in this country established a system under various forms, and to different extents—he would not say whether wisely or unwisely—to protect different interests. But there was one interest they could not protect. It was the great manufacturing interest, which depended for its existence upon the export trade. If protection was a good, it was still a good which they could not extend to that interest. They had to struggle without protection against all foreign competition. This was a reason for acting with great caution before they interfered with that important interest. He would take the liberty of warning the House that if they passed this measure, and took this legislative step, they would have to pass many other measures, or else they would see injury and ruin follow to the interests of this country, which it would not be in their power to arrest or remedy. He would not follow the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) in dwelling upon the effect which the adoption of the proposition of the noble Lord would have upon wages, profits, and the general trade and interests of the country. But he found a statement made ~~so~~ably in the first Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into this question in 1833, that he would read a passage from it to the House. The Commissioners stated in the Factories Report of 1833, that,

“There might, indeed, if the restriction of the hours for working in mills where machinery was used in this country was adopted to the extent proposed, be, in the first instance, a rise in prices caused by a scarcity of manufactures, but that rise could not, in the nature of things, be of long duration. This temporary rise of price, combined with the competition with foreign manufactures, would necessarily produce extension of existing works and require new ones to be built. This increase of works, stimulated by an advance of price, would destroy the proportion of supply and demand, and the consequence would then be most disastrous to the manufacturers and their workmen. These events would be different in different descriptions of manufacture, but the ultimate result to all would be a great reduction of profits and wages.”

This short statement contained the whole of the case, which he would not weaken by any arguments of his own. He knew that those who took the course he was now pursuing were open to the charge that they did not act upon their own principles. He avowed it. He avowed that he had sanctioned interference with labour contrary to general and abstract principles under certain circumstances. Cases might be brought before them of so shocking a nature, and so outrageous to the feelings of humanity, that he would listen to any argument for affording a remedy. Nay, he would rather, in such cases, act from impulse than from reason. With that view he supported his noble Friend, the Mover of the present Amendment, the year before last when his noble friend proposed to prevent women being employed in mines. But while legislating in that direction, it behoved them to do so with the greatest caution; for in every step they took, there was the greatest danger that, with the best intentions, they might inflict the severest blow on the manufactures, trade, and prosperity of the country. Upon these grounds he was prepared to take the same course now that he had taken on a former occasion, and offer every opposition to the Motion of his noble Friend. He confessed that the arguments used by hon. Gentlemen in support of the Amendment had not been urged in so confident a tone, or with such clearness of view, or with so positive an assurance that in their judgment the greatest evils would not follow the adoption of the proposition of his noble Friend, as to relieve his mind from all anxiety as to the consequences of that course of procedure. Upon these grounds he must abstain from taking any share in the responsibility of supporting such a proposition, while he was quite prepared to submit to any degree of unpopularity in giving his opposition to it. He did it with pain, because he admitted many of the evils that had been set forth by his noble Friend, and to which he would be glad to apply a remedy if it could be done without the risk of incurring greater mischiefs in their stead.

Mr. Colquhoun said, the objections of the right hon. Gentleman, accompanied, as they had been, with such arguments as he had advanced, were sufficient undoubtedly to make one hesitate before differing from the conclusion which the right hon. Gentleman came to, especially when supported by so high an authority as that of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. But yet he could not help calling the attention of the Committee to an argument which fell from his right hon. Friend, when he stated that a blow was about to be struck at the manufactures of this country, if the proposition of the noble Lord should be carried; a blow which he described would take effect in two ways—first, by affecting the profits of the manufacturers, and, secondly, by reducing the wages of the labourer. Now, it was a remarkable circumstance, that, upon a question pregnant with so much danger to themselves, a great body of master manufacturers should have given their support to the proposition of his noble Friend. It must be admitted that the manufacturers were competent to understand their own interest, and yet they deliberately declared that they were anxious to support a reduction of two hours' labour daily in their factories. His right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) had said, that this representation came from the manufacturers of the coarser and plain description of woollen goods, but not from the manufacturers of the finer sort of fabrics of worsted and cotton. He assured his right hon. Friend that, amongst the 300 manufacturers there were at least 100 (and he had heard the number stated as high as 150), who were engaged in the finer woollen fabrics, requiring the more costly machinery, who had petitioned for a ten hours' Bill. He had asked the hon. Member for Frome, where the most expensive clothes were manufactured, what was the case in the town which he represented, and with which his family was connected? The answer was—"We have all along restricted our labour to ten hours, without injury to the capitalist, without suffering to the labourer, and with benefit to both." These practical facts he put in contradiction to the distinction drawn by his right hon. Friend. It would be presumptuous to attempt to follow minutely the deliberate calculations of his right hon. Friend; but it deserved remark that they were founded upon the authority of one of the factory inspectors. Now he had consulted another factory inspector of equal ability and means of judging, and he found that that gentleman considered the calculations of his colleague entirely erroneous. Therefore, if the object were to frighten the Committee, by such calculations, from the Amendment before the House, he would venture to re-assure the Committee in its confidence, and, upon data quite as sound and satisfactory, contend that the anticipated results would not follow. Another point pressed by his right hon. Friend, with his usual weight, was, that the loss felt in the first instance by the capitalist would ere long fall upon the labourer. Upon this point he (Mr. Colquhoun) begged to direct the attention of hon. Members to the opinion of a practical manufacturer of Bradford, a district where the woollen trade was carried on to a great extent, and in the finer fabrics. This opinion was contained in a letter addressed to the hon. Member for Leeds; and so far from expecting that the abatement, if this Amendment were carried, would amount to 25 per cent., he had arrived at the conclusion, upon the most deliberate and well-informed calculations, that it would not be more than 2 per cent. But whatever that abatement might really amount to, it was quite clear that the operatives of Lancashire and Yorkshire had calmly and attentively considered it, and they said that they were willing to accept a smaller annual income, on condition that they were relieved from an excess of toil which deprived them and their families of the bloom, vivacity, and vigour of youth. They preferred 75*l.* or 79*l.* a year instead of 89*l.* or 93*l.*, according to some hon. Members, because, with the lesser sum, they would be allowed some hours of reasonable rest and enjoyment. Was the House then prepared to say, "We will condemn these men, women, and children to a degree of labour exceeding their strength, for the sake of an income exceeding their wants?" If the operatives were willing to forego some of their comforts—to relinquish some of their simple luxuries, in order to avoid paleness in their children and premature age in themselves, was it for Parliament to assert that they should not be permitted to exercise a discretion—should not be allowed to relax from toil, but should be compelled to earn wages they did not demand? The interests of the operatives were linked with the fortunes and prosperity of England. He frankly confessed that in 1833 he had voted against the noble Lord; but after the experience of ten years, after the corroboration which the statements of the noble Lord had since received from Mr. Horner and others, he was prepared to say that the arguments of the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department were not sound, and that our manufactures and commerce by a ten hours Bill would not be exposed to danger. If, after ten years' experience, Ministers laid upon the table such a Bill as that now under consideration, it seemed to him (Mr. Colquhoun) to afford a conclusive argument in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord. The Bill fixed that the labour of females and children be limited to twelve hours; but in 1833 they shrunk even from that limitation, and yet it had been found that it might be adopted without danger to the operative, the manufacturer, or the trade of the Empire. When, according to the clearest evidence and to the analogy of other employments, ten hours' toil was fixed as the utmost of which human strength was capable, it required more than the baseless calculations of his right hon. Friend to show that an Amendment with that object ought to be rejected. He was satisfied that a result so necessary to humanity, peace, and social well-being would be attained by the Amendment, and for that reason he would vote in its favour.

Mr. Fielden said, the speakers opposed to the proposal of his noble Friend (Lord Ashley), to substitute six for eight in the clause under discussion, had all uttered the old story, that ruin would succeed to our commerce and manufactures if the reduction of the hours of labour from twelve to ten per day in factories were enacted, that was, if the hours of work in factories were made conformable to the hours worked in most other branches of employment. He denied that any such consequences would follow such a step; nay, he went further, and maintained that the manufactures of the country would be rather suspended and those engaged in them ruined by a continuance of twelve hours' labour per day, than by a reduction of the hours to ten. He went further still, and would say that eight hours would be more preservative than ten, and that the factory system of employment would not be what the steam-engine ought to make it, if it was to benefit mankind, until its use, where masses of human beings had to accompany its motions, was restrained to eight hours a-day. The speakers opposed to his noble Friend's Amendment all expressed their sympathy for the hard lot of the factory workers, but said, there was no help for them; that their condition would be worse if their prayers for shorter hours of work were conceded. The cry of ruin to manufactures and commerce had always been raised when it was proposed to abridge this slavery; and yet though it had been abridged, manufactures and commerce had flourished under the abridgement, if increase of production, increase of commerce, and increase of mills and machinery are its indications. All the efforts to curtail the hours of labour in factories had been met by this cry, and all had been falsified by experience. In the case before the Committee an act of humanity and of justice was sought to be obtained for the factory worker, and the objection to it, in his opinion, was dictated more by love of mammon than of mercy or sound policy. The hon. Member for Manchester had said that the master manufacturers of that town, and the most intelligent of the factory-workers were opposed to any restriction of the hours of labour below twelve per day. Was that so? He had great confidence in the working men, and he had in his hand a copy of a petition presented to that House last July by thirty two delegates, which he would read to the Committee. It was—

"The petition of the Lancashire Factory Operatives, in delegate meeting assembled, humbly sheweth, that your Petitioners, to the number of thirty-two, have met as delegates from the various factory districts within thirty miles of Manchester, to consider the provisions of the Factory Bill now before your honourable House. That your Petitioners submit to your honourable House that no Bill for the regulation of mills and factories will be efficient which does not prohibit all persons under twenty-one years of age from being worked more than ten hours in any one day, for five days in the week, and eight hours on the Saturday; and as it is desirable that an immediate abridgement of the hours of labour should be adopted, your Petitioners will not offer any resistance to any measure which provides for a reduction of the hours of labour. Your Petitioners humbly submit to your honourable House that they are resolved never to relax in their exertions until a ten hours' bill becomes the law of the land. That your Petitioners also submit to your honourable House, that as no child should be allowed to work in any such mill or factory until it has completed its tenth year, that your Petitioners implore your honourable House not to pass any law which would encourage or establish the working of relays of children against the adult workers in factories. Your Petitioners, therefore, pray your honourable House to pass such a Bill with as little delay as possible, and your Petitioners will ever pray.

"Signed, on behalf of the Meeting,

"THOMAS PITT, Chairman."

That petition spoke for itself, it contradicted the assertion of the hon. Member for Manchester, as to the feeling of the factory workers, and he (Mr. Fielden) believed that it embodied the sentiments of the greater part of the working people in factories. The hon. Gentleman considered the commercial part of the question, which his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) did not go into, to be the most important part of it, and he referred to Mr. Senior and others, who went down to Manchester in 1836, and who, in March, 1837, wrote to Mr. Poulett Thomson, to the effect that if the hours were reduced by one per day, the net profits would be destroyed, and if by one hour-and-a-half the gross profit would be destroyed; but the hon. Gentleman omitted to tell the Committee that Mr. Senior had qualified his assertion; that he said, "If, therefore—prices remaining the same—the factory could be kept at work thirteen hours instead of eleven, by an addition of about 2,600*l.* to the circulating capital, the net profits would be more than doubled. On the other hand, if the hours of working were reduced by one hour per day—prices remaining the same—profits would be destroyed." The Committee and the hon. Gentleman must see that Mr. Senior's conclusions were all based on the supposition of prices remaining the same, and that, if prices did not remain the same, his conclusions were good for nothing. Without attempting to prove that prices would remain the same, the hon. Gentleman concluded that the longer hours system was, on Mr. Senior's authority, essential to gaining any profit, gaining profit was essential to the existence of manufactures, and that the existence of manufactures was essential to enable the manufacturing population to gain their bread—conclusions that were incorrect unless it be true that prices would remain the same. But the hon. Member ought to have seen the incorrectness of these conclusions, for he said that, if the ten hours instead of the twelve hours was enacted, the production of manufactures would be diminished 20 per cent. He denied that they would be diminished by anything like that extent; but suppose they were diminished one-fifth, that is, suppose there were one-fifth less of goods manufactured, then, if there be any truth in the position so often maintained by the hon. Gentleman himself, and so often heard in Parliament, that prices depend on supply and demand, prices would rise; and, if the supply of goods, when lessened by one-fifth, was not adequate to the demand, manufacturing establishments would be increased, more people would be employed, and the demand for them would be greater. This would cause a rise in their wages, and increase their powers of consumption. As to the feeling of the master-manufacturers in regard to a ten hours' Bill, he received last year seven petitions from master spinners and manufacturers of Manchester, Oldham, Rochdale, Todmorden, Huddersfield, and their vicinities, alleging the importance and necessity of a ten hours' Bill, and praying the House to pass one limiting the labour of all between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one to ten hours a day for five days in a week, and eight hours on Saturdays. These petitions contained one hundred and ninety signatures, many of them being men whom he knew, and also knew were amongst the largest consumers of cotton in the kingdom. They anticipated no evil consequence resulting from such a measure, but, on the contrary, declared it to be their decided opinion that it would confer a great benefit not only on the working classes, but also on their employers and on the public; and amongst the names to these petitions was that of Mr. Jacob Bright, the father of the hon. Member for Durham, and of his brother, Mr. Thomas Bright. That the feeling in favour of a ten hours' Bill was rapidly on the increase he had no doubt. There was no "bit of a Parliament" now in Palace-yard, as in 1838, to oppose such a measure, therefore, those formerly opposed to it were at least quiescent, and the number of those in favour of it was increasing and was speaking out. He (Mr. Fielden) would call the attention of the Committee to a few extracts from a little pamphlet sent to him on the subject, entitled "Inventions and Hours of Labour," by William Kenworthy, dated Brookhouse-mills, Blackburn, Nov. 19, 1842. Mr. Kenworthy was partner with Mr. Hornby, of Blackburn, a brother of the hon. Member for that borough, in a cotton-spinning establishment, where, he believed, about 1,500 hands were employed. He was a practical man, and his opinions were entitled to great weight. Mr. Kenworthy said:—

"Englishmen are proverbially industrious; they cannot live in a state of idleness; yet occupation is wanted by a great number of hands who are willing and able to work; and this state of things exists, too, in the face of the lamentations of suffering thousands, who cry out, with all their voice, for relief and relaxation from excessive and too greatly prolonged labour in the noxious and contaminating atmosphere of our manufactories. The question has oftentimes been asked, What is to be the antidote to the evils of invention? The answer is plain and self-evident, viz., give shorter hours of labour to those at present employed, and we should then soon be enabled to find work for those who are idle. It may be said that shorter hours would necessarily increase the cost of the manufactured articles (the net weekly wages remaining as at present), and that thereby we should not be able to compete with foreigners. Let us not entertain such puerile notions; but let us rather fairly discuss and investigate the subject. The question will have naturally arisen—are the work-people to receive the same wages for ten-and-a-half hours labour per day as for twelve? To this we may reply, that the price of labour like all other commodities, is regulated by the supply and demand; and therefore labour, it may be said, will regulate itself; and, as shorter time will employ more hands, there is no reason to suppose that the price of labour would be lower. Let us suppose that, under the regulation which I now suggest, wages should remain as they now are, that is, that the same net amount of wages be paid for sixty hours as for sixty nine; and let us then ascertain the difference which would be made in spinning a pound of yarn, or in manufacturing a piece of calico. The cost of spinning a pound of cotton into yarn is now reduced to an almost incredibly low rate. Thirty-six's may be said to constitute the principal count for manufacturing shirting, printing cloths, &c., in this country; and it is well known that the cost of carding, preparing, roving, and spinning this count, including all wages, is reduced to about 1½d. per pound. The expense, interest, of capital, wear and tear, depreciation of machinery, &c., will amount to the same sum, making the net cost of spinning 36's amount to the enormous sum of 2½d. Many old concerns may not be able to spin at so low a rate; but, if we affix the amount at 3d., it will be within the reach of all. Therefore, if this be the rate of cost for 69 hours' labour and wages, interest, wear and tear, &c., are to remain the same for 60 hours as for 69, the cost must necessarily be increased in the same ratio that time is diminished; that is, the cost will be increased from 60 to 69—say 1-6th more. But the amount of wear and tear, oil, gas, &c., will be lessened in the same proportion. Taking these circumstances into consideration, we may safely assume that ¾d. per lb. will amply suffice for the difference in the cost caused by the adoption of short time. Again, a piece of good 9-8 66 36 inch cloth, of 25 yards, can be manufactured for 20d., including all wages, interest, wear and tear, depreciation, &c.; and, if the amount of wages and expenses is to remain the same under the system of working shorter time, we must add 1-16th, or say 3½d., to the cost; but, as before, the cost of power, oil, gas, wear and tear, &c., will be proportionably lessened; so that, if we say 3d. per piece more, we shall find it fully adequate to cover the increased cost of manufacture. Now, the cost of the yarn, as previously shown, would be ¾d. per lb. more than at present; and, as this description of cloth requires about 5lb. of yarn to the piece, the whole increase of cost would therefore be—on 5lb. of yarn, at ¾d., 1½d.; on 25 yards of cloth at 3d., 4½d. Let us, however, assume 5d. as the increased cost on the manufacture of 25 yards of cloth, which is less than ½d. per yard. Therefore, the difference of ¾d. per lb. on yarn, or ½d. per yard on cloth, is the mighty difficulty that we have to overcome, in order to afford to our factory hands that respite from physical toil which is so imperatively demanded, and to save our country from ruin by foreign competition! How abominably absurd and inconsistent it is that the suffering thousands, who have so often called and patiently waited for the redress of their grievances, should have their miseries protracted under the delusive notion of the dangers arising from foreign competition! Are we so near ruin, that an advance of one farthing per yard on our cotton cloth would irrevocably seal our fate? If so, how important an element of national prosperity, is the labour of these poor people! How praiseworthy is their exemplary patience under their complicated sufferings! But we are all conscious of, and daily experience, fluctuations in our cotton and cloth markets; and these often make a much greater difference in the cost of goods than that to which we have already adverted, as consequent upon a reduction in the period of labour. These fluctuations may be caused by speculations—by fabulous reports respecting the cotton crops—and by many other combinations of circumstances ; still, not a word is said about being ruined by foreign competition on these accounts."

To effect this object, Mr. Kenworthy says this:—

"To master cotton spinners, manufacturers, and millowners in general.

"As a commencement, let us unite, and with one voice, pray the Legislature for an Act fixing the maximum period of labour in our establishments at 60 hours per week, or at ten hours and a half per day from Monday to Friday inclusive, and seven hours and a half on the Saturday. By such an enactment those now unemployed would be placed in a position to procure an honourable and comfortable livelihood—cheerfulness and contentment would be restored to the domestic hearth—and with the enjoyment of an extended system of religious and secular instruction, a decided moral and intellectual improvement would be soon manifested in every manufacturing town throughout the land."

He thought he had now shown that the feeling of the masters and of the workmen was not faithfully described by the hon. Member for Manchester, and that a great many of those masters, with the writer of that pamphlet and himself, had no fear of the evil consequence of doing an act of humanity, which purely individual interest should not be allowed to frustrate. As for the hon. Member for Durham, nearly the whole of his speech consisted of what he thought an attack on his noble Friend (Lord Ashley), and the other parts of his speech, if they proved anything, went to show, that the comforts of those engaged in the cotton manufacture were such, that if a ten hours' Bill be conceded, and a reduction in the wages followed equal to the reduction in the hours of work, they would not be subjected to any hardship thereby, for he stated that their style of comfort was higher than that of any other class of work-people—that they were the highest paid. The hon. Member for Durham had stated, that the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) was completely deluded with respect to the state of the manufacturing districts, and that he took a one-sided view of the question, a view not borne out by the Reports of the Factory Inspectors. He was convinced that his noble Friend was not deluded, and he would take an instance to show that the delusion was on the side of the hon. Member for Durham, according to the showing of a Factory Inspector. Speaking of accidents that occurred in factories, the hon. Member attempted to impress upon the House a belief that five times as many occurred to carters as occurred by the machinery in mills, and amongst others, he alluded to the district of Stockport. In the Factory Commission which sat in 1840, the subject of accidents at Stockport was inquired into, and Mr. Trimmer, Sub-Inspector of Factories under Mr. Howell, in answer to a question on the matter, said:—

"I can give a return from the Stockport Infirmary. I have taken some pains in collecting for the last three years from the books of the Stockport Infirmary the number of factory accidents. The number of accidents from March, 1837, to March, 1838, in Stockport, was 120; from 1838 to 1839, 134; from March, 1839, to February, 1840, 86 accidents; out of which 36 were owing to their being caught, whilst cleaning the machinery, the machinery being in motion at the time. In the report of the Stockport Infirmary for the last year, there is the following passage:— 'The Committee cannot conclude their report without stating a fact which has painfully impressed their minds during the past year; they refer to the manner in which accidents generally occur in our cotton-mills. Almost all the accidents that have come under the notice of the Committee, have happened in consequence of the cleaning of machinery while it is in motion. It is earnestly hoped, that the owners and managers of our manufactories will adopt effectual means for the discontinuance of so dangerous a practice.' The practice has not been discontinued, because in the following year, when the cotton-trade was very bad, there were thirty-six accidents in Stockport, owing to cleaning machinery while in motion."

Mr. Trimmer was asked if he could give information of the character of the accidents? His answer was,—

"In some instances they have thrown the people wholly out of employment. They have lost their limbs, or their hands. In cases of children they have lost two or three fingers."

He was asked,—

"Are you aware of any accidents of the kind in which the millowner has maintained the person, and endeavoured to make every reparation in his power?"

His answer was,—

"I have heard of cases where they have given them a little money to buy a horse to go about with sand." "Have they also, during their illness, allowed them part of their wages?"—In one instance where a girl was caught by the hair, and scalped from the nose to the back of the head, the manufacturer gave her 5*l*. She died in the workhouse." "Don't you think that little children are exposed to a very great hazard, particularly female children with their flowing garments, in going round from one part of the mill to another?"—I think they are. There was a case occurred very recently at Stockport, where a girl was carried by her clothing round an upright shaft. Her thighs were broken, her ancle dislocated, and she will be a cripple for life."

He was asked,—

"What do you think would have been the cost of boxing off that shaft?"

His answer is,—

"A few shillings." "Would that have acted as an impediment to the due working of the machinery?"—"No."

Thus he had shown, that the hon. Member for Durham himself was deluded, at any rate so far as regarded Stockport. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) had told the Committee that he would give his decided opposition to the proposition of the noble Lord, not on the ground that the noble Lord asked for anything unreasonable, for the right hon. Gentleman declared that his feelings were with the noble Lord; but (and it surprised him to hear it) because the noble Lord's proposition would lay the axe to the root of the tree of the commercial greatness of this country; that to restrict the labour of females and young persons in factories to ten hours in the day would destroy the commerce of this great and civilised country. He was ashamed to hear this declaration from an English Minister of the Crown. He almost wished the declaration might not pass beyond those walls. Was it come to this? Did the greatness of England depend on suffering a continuance of the misery, cruelty, and depravity that the noble Lord had laid bare to the House in that debate? If so, he wondered the right hon. Gentleman could talk of the civilization or the greatness of our country. Surely the picture that the noble Lord had drawn was a picture of barbarism and decay. But the right hon. Baronet was much mistaken. He could assure him that no such consequences as he anticipated could result from acceding to the noble Lord's proposal. He had looked into the commercial and manufacturing results of the Acts to abridge factory labour step by step; and he found that increase of manufacture and commerce had always followed restriction, though that restriction had always met with the same opposition in the same terms as the present proposal. He would give figures to prove it. In 1819, when the labour of children in factories was reduced by Sir Robert Peel's Act to seventy-two hours a-week, the consumption of cotton was 109,000,000 lbs. In 1831, when the hours were reduced to sixty-nine hours a week, the consumption of cotton was 262,000,000 lbs. In 1833, when the labour of children under thirteen was reduced to forty-eight hours a week, the consumption of cotton was 287,000,000 lbs. In 1840, the consumption of cotton had increased to 458,000,000 lbs.; and, in the last year, the consumption had increased still more. The increase of power for turning machinery between 1835 and 1841 was 53½ per cent.; and the increase in the number of hands employed in the same period was 21 per cent. Those facts spoke for themselves, and they proved that the right hon. Baronet's argument was untenable. The right hon. Baronet had referred to a statement of his relative as to the distance travelled in twelve hours by male piecers, and he rebuked the noble Lord for having named thirty-seven miles, the calculation of a mathematician; but his noble Friend had given the extremes of that calculation, and had contended for the average. He (Mr. Fielden) had examined the matter for himself, and had been satisfied that the distance he named was correct, that was twenty miles in the twelve hours. This he still maintained, though Mr. Greg had arrived at a different result, as was said by the hon. Member for Manchester. The distance was one mile and two-thirds per hour, and a common observer, seeing one of the piecers at work, would not think he travelled a less distance in twelve hours; but was not the bare fact of their being on their legs for that period daily enough to convince any one that their labour was irksome and excessive? The right hon. Baronet had told the House, on a former occasion, that we owed an eternal debt of gratitude to the working people, and even on that occasion he said, that he reluctantly opposed the Amendment. His decided opposition to that humane proposal was a singular method of showing his gratitude. He (Mr. Fielden) trusted that the House would not be influenced by the right hon. Baronet's example, but that they would imitate the noble Lord, the Member for South Lancashire (Lord F. Egerton), the noble Lord, the Member for Liverpool (Lord Sandon), the noble Lord, the Member for Sutherland (Lord Howick), to all of whom he (Mr. Fielden) returned his sincere thanks for the support they had given to his noble Friend, whose steady perseverance in trying to lessen the hours of toil endured in factories entitled him to the thanks of his country, and he had great pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

Sir R. Peel : I think the Committee will be disposed to give credit to Her Majesty's Government for the motives which have induced them to adhere to the proposition of my right hon. Friend, and to offer their decided opposition to the proposition of my noble Friend. Of any personal interest in so doing, I apprehend that we shall not be accused, and with respect to party interests, if we wished to consult those interests we should have taken a different course. It is impossible not to feel that we are on this question allied to those who have generally offered to us upon principle the most decided opposition, and that we are opposed on the other hand, to those who have given the present Government a general and almost unvarying support. But there are occasions when it is the duty of a Government at all hazards to oppose measures which it believes to be inconsistent with the permanent interests of the country. It is the first duty of a Government to overcome the temptation of obtaining temporary party support, and of conciliating party favour by acquiescing in a proposition which it conscientiously believes to be injurious to the permanent interests of the country. And influenced by that motive, and by that motive alone, we now discharge the duty of the Executive Government, and oppose ourselves to the wishes of men whom we highly respect; but whose wishes we believe would, if complied with, be highly injurious to those by whom this measure is urged, and for whose benefit it is intended. There are, or at least there were, until the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fielden) spoke, only two propositions before the Committee—namely, the proposition made by Her Majesty's Government, which imposes restrictions upon the labour of children, which gives new facilities for education to those who have not the power of protecting themselves, and which also arrests the evil, where we find it, of the employment of female labour, prohibiting their employment in factories for more than twelve hours a day, but which imposes no restrictions whatever upon that which is the practical rule as to the employment of adults—granting twelve hours a day to be the rule as regards adults—that is in no respect interfered with by our proposition for preventing the extension of the evil, by preventing women being employed more than twelve hours a day. The counter proposition is, that we shall impose restrictions, nominally and theoretically, upon the labour of females and children, but practically and universally, that we shall prevent the labour of male adults, even with their own consent, for a longer period than ten hours. ["Oh, oh!"] The hon. Member who spoke last says, that proposition rests with no principle of humanity. I admit, in some respects, that the debate does not turn upon principle. We admit by our proposition the policy of restricting female labour, and of giving facilities to the education of children. But we do not interfere with adult labour. My noble Friend proposes to interfere with adult labour, but he by no means carries his interference so far as the hon. Gentleman opposite. The hon. Gentleman says there is no reason for ten hours; eight hours is a period which we ought to fix upon for the labour of adults and children, and therefore, there would be nothing to prevent hon. Gentlemen, if the ten hours' labour bill failed, from agitating for eight. The hon. Gentleman is a great authority on the question—he is practically acquainted with labour, and he says the time ought to be eight hours instead of ten. The day, he says, is divided by philosophers into three periods—eight hours for labour, eight hours for recreation, and eight hours for sleep; and he would have us carry out by our laws that division of the day. If the hon. Gentleman be right he would leave ample time for the mother to attend to her domestic duties, and so far he has some argument in favour of his restriction, besides that natural one arising from the division of the day. The hon. Gentleman thinks that no good will be effected for the labourer, in consequence of the rapid improvements in machinery, unless eight hours be the time adopted in this Bill. But I do not think it necessary that I should now discuss the proposal of the hon. Gentleman; and it will be my duty to argue between the proposal for ten hours and the proposal for twelve hours. Let us first, then, consider to what extent the restriction of the noble Lord is to apply. The proposal of the noble Lord is, to apply to all labour—in cotton, in wool, in worsted, in flax, and in silk. Now, the fact is, that at present, and for the last forty years, whenever there has been a demand for those articles, the time of labour has been sixty-nine hours a week. That is now the number of working hours in almost all factories, with the exception of certain branches of the woollen manufacture. [Mr. Hindley : The time does not exceed sixty-nine hours.] That is what I have said. The time is now sixty-nine hours by the law ; and I believe that the universal practice is to work sixty-nine hours a week in the cotton manufactures, worsted manufactures, flax and silk manufactures. There are, however, I believe, some woollen manufactures in which the work is continued for a lesser number of hours ; and I have reason to think that the same thing occasionally occurs in certain silk manufactures. But the general practice is to work sixty-nine hours a-week ; that is to say, twelve hours on the first five days, and nine hours only on Saturdays. My noble Friend does not wish to alter the present arrangement with respect to Saturdays. But he proposes that there should be two hours less of labour on each of the other days, or ten hours less in the week ; so that we should have fifty-nine hours instead of sixty-nine hours a-week of labour in those great branches of our manufactures, the cotton, the woollen, the linen, and the flax trades. I have seen the last returns of our foreign trade, which show the declared value of the principal articles of British produce and manufacture exported in the last year ; and, if I recollect rightly, the value was about 44,000,000*l.* for the principle articles. And what proportion do you suppose that the value of the articles you are now about to deal with bears to the whole amount of 44,000,000*l.* The value of your cotton manufacture, including yarns, amounts to 23,500,000*l.* ; the value of your linen manufactures amounts to 3,700,000*l.* ; the value of your silk manufactures amounts to about 664,000*l.* ; and the value of your woollen manufactures amounts to about 7,500,000*l.* ; making a total of 35,000,000*l.* out of the 44,000,000*l.* of British manufactures exported, or five-sixths of the whole. So that by the proposal of my noble Friend, five-sixths of the exported manufactures of this country will be subjected to a new law, which is to provide that it shall not be legal to labour at them for more than fifty-nine hours, instead of sixty-nine hours, a week. Now, to what extent would that proposal go ? There are about 304 to 306 working days in the year ; but I shall take the number at 300, in order to facilitate the calculation which I am about to make. The Saturday is to remain untouched, so that the proposal of my noble Friend would extend to 250 days a year, which, at the rate of two hours a day, would make 500 hours a year, which my noble Friend would take from the time now devoted to manufacturing labour. Those 500 hours would be equivalent to seven weeks ; and the result of the proposal would therefore be, that in all cotton, linen, silk, and woollen factories, there would be seven weeks a year less labour than at present. In point of time that is the effect. Your manufacturers, in their several branches exporting 35,000,000*l.* out of 44,000,000*l.* a year, are to enter under your new law into a competition with foreign manufacturers, and you are to enforce upon them the necessity of working seven weeks less in the year than at present. And what says the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Oldham ? He says, that by the Act which we passed last Session for permitting the export of machinery we gave additional advantages to our foreign rivals in competing with our manufacturers. The hon. Gentleman has told us that our machinery is now exported, and that our mechanics and artizans are going abroad. Those are advantages which our foreign competitors possess. The hon. Gentleman does not propose to repeal the Act which permitted the exportation of our machinery. [Mr. Hindley : I objected to that Act.] You objected to it ; and you are a great authority, I dare say, but there is a majority of both Houses of Parliament in favour of the Act, and it will be no consolation to the manufacturers who suffer from this competition, to be told that the hon. Gentleman is opposed to the exportation of machinery, unless he can prevail on Parliament to alter the law. The hon. Gentleman says that the wages of workmen would not be less if the hours of labour were limited, because there would be a rise in the price of manufactured articles. Why that certainly would be the natural consequence of restricting the hours of labour and reducing the quantity produced. The amount of manufactured produce would be diminished, prices would rise, and the manufacturers would it is supposed be able to give the same rate of wages. But how long would that be the case ? By the system which it is proposed that we should pursue, we should give the foreign manufacturer an evident advantage. His material will not be increased in price, and he will come into competition with you, having all the advantages of your machinery when you have raised the price of your manufactures; he will take advantage of that, and you will suffer in the neutral markets, without the power of compensating yourselves for that increased cost. Suppose the cost of the articles is increased—suppose the establishments are extended—how long does the hon. Gentleman think the master manufacturers—the owners of the existing establishments, will be enabled to give the same rate of wages to their workmen? The rise of price may induce new competition, but when that new competition has come into existence, in one or two years, does the hon. Member think the masters will continue to give increased wages? The hon. Gentleman says the manufacturers will be inclined to take advantage of circumstances, and reduce wages to the lowest point. I am not of that opinion. But do you think that they will not try to maintain their profits at the expense of the workman? Is it possible that under your new enactment for ten hours labour, the same rate of wages should be given as with a twelve hours' Bill? You do not give the same equivalent. Twelve hours' labour have a certain value, and you say the workman shall not have the option of giving more than ten hours. Would it not, then, be repugnant to common sense to suppose—speaking comprehensively—after the lapse of a few months, there being this competition, and the profits on account of foreign rivalry being extremely small, that the master manufacturer will not struggle for the maintenance of his profits, and try to obtain compensation for reduced time of labour, by falling on the workman? Depend upon it, it must be so. The sufferers in this case must be the workmen, who have to give a less amount of the commodity which is that in which they traffic—namely, their labour, than they gave before. If I could think that this would add to the comforts of the workmen, I should be disposed, I think, to relax the strict rules of political economy; but when I heard, the other night, the account which the hon. Member for Durham gave of the position of the workmen with whom he is connected

—when he stated—and I presume he would not state facts, which if not perfectly true would be so easily capable of contradiction—when I heard him giving instances of workmen earning 91*l.* a year in the enjoyment of comforts—who, he said, he feared to ask whether they received parish relief, because it would have been an insult—when I hear that such is the position of the working masses in this country, I must pause before I give my consent to a measure which is to have the effect of mulcting them of a great part of the wages which they now receive. It is said that we are not to take foreign competition into account. I am told that this is not to be viewed as a commercial question. I am told that it is a question between mammon and mercy. I am to disregard the effect which legislation will have upon the commerce of this country. Why, Sir, if I could separate the two considerations—if the alternative were offered to me of pecuniary gain on the one hand, and the comfort and welfare of the labourer on the other, I should at once decide for the latter; but when we look to the commerce of this country, and the interests bound up with it, it is my duty as a legislator to take that commerce into consideration. Look at the amount of capital expended on the faith of existing laws in cotton manufactures alone—the thousands and tens of thousands congregated together and dependent on them for their support; and look at the consequences which must ensue to these people—not from severe labour, but from the depression of manufacturing prosperity, from the absence of demand for labour. I never shall forget as long I live the situation of Paisley in 1841 and 1842, with 15,000 or 16,000 men out of employ, offering their labour without the means of obtaining an equivalent for it, and depending on charity for support. Did I not see that with a depressed commerce there is an addition to the material sufferings of the people of this country infinitely greater than could be produced by twelve, thirteen, or fourteen hours of the severest labour? I do not underrate the effects of exacting a great amount of labour and if my wishes could prevail I would have women employed in labour only eight hours a day. The question, however, does not depend on our wishes and feelings of humanity. It is an entirely different question what I wish and what it is desirable to attempt to effect by means of peremptory enactments. Therefore, when I say I must consider the commercial view of the subject, it is not by placing the commercial gain in contrast with the comforts of the people; but I say that hundreds and thousands are dependent for food upon the prosperity of our commerce, and if any particular measure tends to increase foreign competition and to strike a blow at the permanent prosperity of these great branches of industry, I shall rue, when it is too late, the injury I shall have inflicted upon the working classes of this country by assenting to it. Therefore I repeat that it is utterly impossible I should disregard commerce, and consider humanity and morality alone. It is said, that those who advocate ten hours a day ask only to establish in these great branches of manufacture an equilibrium of labour, similar to that in other branches of employment, where, it is said, ten hours a day is the number. That is the truth with respect to some branches of agricultural labour. At some periods of the year, women certainly do not work in the field more than ten hours; but I think that depends rather on the circumstance that that particular kind of labour cannot be carried on at night, than on any forbearance on the part of employers; because, during the hay and corn harvest more than ten hours' labour are exacted. Should we be content with a law which prescribed ten hours as the period of agricultural labour at all times of the year, in spring and in harvest time? I apprehend such a law would be deemed a severe restriction on agricultural labour; see what would be the effect of such a restriction on cottonspinners. For four years there has been great depression in that trade, the millowner, however, partly from a sense of his own interest hereafter, and partly from humanity has continued his mill at work by which he has been losing money. It is necessary that he should do so or his machinery would get out of repair. He submits to the loss partly in order to give employment to those in his immediate neighbourhood, and partly in the hope that better times will return. A demand for labour follows, with it an opportunity for the master and the man to make up their losses; but your law interposes, you say "when there is a period of depression, I expect you to continue your machinery at work, although it may be unproductive of profit—pay low wages, just sufficient to support life and keep the labourer from starvation—but when a demand for labour arrives, I will make it impossible either for master or man to make up for lost time, or go beyond a certain amount of profit which my law fixes." I doubt the justice of such an enactment; I doubt whether it is for the advantage of the manufacturer, and I am sure it is not for the advantage of the man and his family, who by this interposition finds 30 or 25 per cent. taken from the 91 $\frac{1}{2}$  a year, which but for that law he might have earned. What is this but levying a tax of 15 or 25 per cent. on capital and labour. I call upon the House to recollect what was thought of an imposition of 3 per cent., and to compare this with a permanent imposition of even 15 per cent. on the profit of capital and the wages of labour. I doubt whether the workmen do not cherish the hope that this restriction will not in its effects fall on them, but I believe the loss to the manufacturer will be much less than to the labourers, for the former will be able to obtain compensation by making reductions; but I doubt whether, by restricting the hours of labour, you will give the workman an equivalent for the loss of 15 per cent. You are going to apply this restriction to certain branches of labour, which are at your mercy, because they are congregated in large factories, and brought under your eye. I am now speaking on the assumption that this limitation is not necessary to be equally applied to other branches of industry; but never was assumption more erroneous. There are great branches of industry as to which greater necessity exists for interference than in the cotton manufacture. We should perhaps interfere there, but we cannot. "Why should we not," it is said, "notwithstanding, correct an evil which is tangible, and as to which we can apply a remedy, because there is another which we cannot? Let us restrict labour where we can apply our laws; at any rate, we do no harm if we leave untouched other departments of industry as to which we have no facilities for legislation." That is not a well-founded argument. After I have applied restrictions to one species of capital invested in a description of labour, I do not leave matters where I found them. I give a premium on that labour which I leave unrestricted; and I disturb the application of capital by subjecting capital applied to manufactures to peculiar and special restrictions, and by giving a premium on the application of capital to those employments which are not fettered by such legislation. What are those descriptions of employment I leave untouched by such legislation? Agriculture I put out of the question. It is said I cannot touch agricultural labour. I must say, however, that if I could carry my own wishes into effect I would prohibit a great deal of agricultural work carried on by women through the middle of winter, without reference to the inclemency of the weather. That women should be working from 8 to 10 hours, with no opportunity to change their raiment upon occasions, is surely sufficient reason for me to desire to protect them, and, if I could, to leave them to domestic engagements; and certainly, if I could by a wish effect this without injuring other interests, I should be disposed to do so. But I speak of labour employed in agriculture. I am going to restrict one species and to leave untouched another. What is the other species? Is it some small and unimportant department of employment? No. It includes the metal manufacture, the ironmongery, the japan, the tin wire, the screw, the nail, the pin-manufacture, everything passing under the name of Sheffield or Birmingham ware; earthenware, porcelain, glass, lace, hosiery, calico printing, bleaching and dyeing, paper-manufacture, rope and twine-making, leather glove-making, steel-plating, and, above all, dress-making and needlework. I am not going to touch these departments of industry. I am going to leave to the master in these manufactures the unfettered right to employ women and children at whatever period he pleases. Now I wish you could read the Report of the Commissioners on the employment of children in several branches of trade and manufactures, which has been laid on the Table within the last two years. By adopting this proposition, the House could only hold out a new inducement to give employment to women and children in other branches of trade and manufactures in contradistinction of the cotton manufacture. The Commissioners in their Report state:

"That in a very large proportion of these trades and manufactures female children are employed equally with boys, and at the same tender ages; in some, indeed, the number of girls exceeds that of boys; and in a few cases the work, as far as it is performed by those under adult age, is carried on almost entirely by girls and young women."

Now I dare to say, that a great number of Gentlemen who hear me are not aware of the number of women and children engaged in some particular branches of manufacture, which it is generally supposed are chiefly carried on by men. This has struck me as being particularly the case in the manufactures of metal. One of the Sub-Commissioners said,

"I saw in some manufactories women employed in most laborious work, such as stamping buttons and brass nails, and notching the heads of screws. These are certainly unfit operations for women. In screw manufactories the females constitute from 80 to 90 per cent. of the whole number employed. Thus:—Mr. James James, screw manufacturer states, that he employs about sixty men and 300 females. In the screw manufactory of Messrs. J. Hawkins and Co. there are thirty men and 102 women. Mr. S. Henn, foreman, of Messrs. F. H. Hyland and Co., screw-manufacturers, states that he has been in the screw-manufactory all his life; that in screw-making few children are employed—not more than 5 in 100. That the great majority of the work people are females, as many as 90 per cent.; and that some girls came as young as thirteen or fourteen, but generally from sixteen to twenty-three or twenty-four."

Again, it appears that the number of females engaged in the manufacture of earthenware is very great. It is stated in the Report,

"From the returns received from Staffordshire it appears that, of the total number of workpeople employed in the principal establishments, the females above twenty-one years of age are considerably more than one-third; between twenty-one and thirteen, the number of the females nearly equals that of the males; and under thirteen the number of the girls is much more than one-half that of the boys; the exact proportions being, above twenty-one years of age, females 2,648, males 4,544; between twenty-one and thirteen, females 1,736, males 1,979; and under thirteen, females 522, males 978."

Why do I quote these things? Because I wish to show you that it is impossible to stop in your legislation; that there is at least the same necessity, that there is a much greater necessity for your interference in respect to other branches of manufactures, than in the case of cotton factories; that if you stop at factories, you are giving encouragement to other branches of manufactures, which are not to be so protected; and if you do not stop there, I advise you to contemplate the extent of your legislation, if we are to undertake the regulation of all labour in respect to which females are employed and in which excessive tasks are required. Take a branch of manufactures closely allied with the cotton—that of calico-printing, or take the earthenware manufacture, as to both of which there is abundant information as to the employment of women and children in those departments of manufacture. With respect particularly to the manufacture of plates and saucers, in the Report of the Commissioners to which I have just referred, is this statement:

“But the children most to be commiserated are those called ‘jiggers and mould-runners,’ who are employed by the dish, saucer, and plate makers. Each man employs two boys, one to turn the jigger or horizontal wheel, the other to carry the ware from the whirler to the hot-house on moulds. The children thus employed constantly work in a temperature ranging from 100 to 130 degrees. A man frequently makes eight score dozen saucers in a week, each dozen counting thirty-six pieces; each piece is carried twice to the hot-house, and weighs, mould and bat, 2lbs.; but as two pieces are carried at the same time, they count but as one; that is to say, 4lbs. each trip. A child carries in the week, reckoning his working hours at 7,223,040lbs., or 3,840 lbs. each day. In carrying this weight he journeys 45 miles 1,440 yards every week, or seven miles, 1,120 yards per day. Besides this, he has to mount one, two, or three steps to place the pieces on the shelves, to wedge the clay in the yard, while his master is taking his pipe or his pot; to collect the half-dried pieces from the shelves; to come half an hour or more before his master in the morning to get coals in and ashes out, and to sweep and make the room ready, and to do anything else that may be wanted, having probably to walk a mile before and after his work.”

Such is the nature of the employment in a particular branch of the earthenware manufacture, in which large numbers of females and children are engaged. Now, hon. Gentlemen ask what are the hours of work? The Report states that the hours of work in the earthenware manufactories are seldom less than twelve, and that, at the end of the week, in plate making, the work lasts from six in the morning until nine at night, which makes fifteen hours, and that it very often extends from seventeen to eighteen hours out of the twenty-four. I ask, then, whether the House will only interfere with the cotton manufacturer, and leave earthenware and calico printing in the same state as at present. If I had not seen the statements in this Report, resting on such high authority, I never could have believed it possible that in this country there were human beings who had to undergo such a continuance of human labour as is exacted from those who are engaged in calico printing. In the report from which I have already quoted, it is stated in the evidence of Thomas Sidbread, block-printer, that after taking a child who had already been at work all day to assist him as a teerer through the night, says:—

“We began to work between eight and nine o'clock on the Wednesday night; but the boy had been sweeping the shop from Wednesday morning. You will scarcely believe it, but it is true—I never left the shop till six o'clock on the Saturday morning, and I had never stopped working all that time, excepting for an hour or two, and that boy with me all the time. I was knocked up, and the boy was almost insensible; if I stopped a minute, he was fast asleep in a moment. On the Friday I was printing a piece, and the block did not exactly fit the pattern, so I sent the boy to fasten the piece to a post at the other end of the room, that I might stretch it; he was so sleepy that he took the piece across where the other men were working, which he would never have done if he had been properly awake. However, he fell asleep in the act of doing this, and let go his hold of the end of the piece when I was leaning my weight upon it, and I fell down an open staircase which was at my back, and hurt myself very much. I did not recover it for some time. This child's parents neglected to give him food, and the people I lodged with had not taken care to prepare me enough, so we were obliged to go without food from dinner-time one day until breakfast the next day, as I dared not send the boy for any food, as I was afraid he would give me the slip and run away, and I could not get another; so we both went without food all that time. They worked regularly very long hours; it was quite a regular thing with them. There were men there, and children too, who came on a Monday morning and stayed till Saturday night, slept and ate their food there.”

Again, Henry Richardson, block-printer states:—

“At four o'clock I began to work, and worked all that day, all the next night, and until ten o'clock the following day. I had only one teerer during that time, and I dare say he would be about twelve years old. I had to shout to him towards the second night, as he got sleepy. I had one of my own children, about ten years old, who was a teerer. He worked with me at Messrs. Wilson and Crichton's, at Blakeley. We began to work together about two or three in the morning, and left off at four or five in the afternoon. Once I remember going on a Friday morning at two o'clock, working all Friday and Friday night, and until twelve o'clock on Saturday. On Saturday night I sent the child to bed about seven o'clock; the next morning, when the other children got up, I told them to let him lie still a bit, as he had had so little rest during the week. We never disturbed him at breakfast time, and when we returned from chapel at noon he was still asleep, and slept during dinner time. About five o'clock in the afternoon, when I came home from the school, I was alarmed at finding him still asleep, and awakened him; but I believe if I had not done so he would have slept until Monday morning. I have known children made ill by working too long hours. The boy that worked for me at the Adelphi was sometimes unable to come to his work from being sick with overworking; and I have known him give another lad his supper to take a night's turn for him; and he often had no appetite of his own."

Robert Kellatt, block printer, said;—

"I remember, either in August or September last, I started at six o'clock one morning, and it was one o'clock the following morning, when I went out of the shop; as I was going out, the foreman called me back, and ordered me to return by six o'clock. I came again at six in the morning, after being away five hours, and worked until nine o'clock at night, when the foreman came again to me to see if I could make it convenient to be back again at twelve o'clock at night; but I did not go, as I considered it rather unfeeling in them to expect me to do so, for my own child had worked with me all those hours, and she was but eleven years old.—Did any of the men who were working with you return at twelve o'clock? Yes, there were three men; but they had not been employing their own children as tea-ers, and they came back at twelve, and worked till twelve the next day."

Let hon. Members read these and other descriptions of the occupation of persons engaged in the metal trade, the earthenware manufacture, calico printing, lace manufacture, and the hosiery trade, and above all, read in this Report, the account of the nature of the occupation of the dress-makers and milliners in this metropolis, and then ask themselves if these trades do not as much call for the intervention of Parliament as the cotton manufacture? Is it right then, to deal only with this one branch of industry, and leave others altogether untouched, in which it appears that female children work fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, or even as much as eighteen hours a day? If you are prepared to legislate for them [Hear],—you are then prepared to legislate for them; and we are about to subject, not factory labour merely, but all labour in this country that falls at all within the same principle, to similar restrictions. We are not merely to interdict the employment of women in mines and collieries, but we are about to provide regulations which shall apply to children and which ought to apply to adults, in respect to all descriptions of labour where we think it is more severe than the human frame ought to be subjected to. This principle I certainly understand. If this then, be only the commencement of the work, I cannot make any objection to it as being an unjust interference with particular classes of labour; but if, as it seems now the impression—and perhaps the just one—that the imposition of these restrictions upon adult labour will engender the necessity of further restrictions applicable to all labour, and I see not why it should not be extended to agricultural labour—I say that, because you adopt the principle that necessarily leads to such extensive consequences, namely, an invariable and almost universal interference with labour in this country, before I adopt that principle, although I admit the universality of its application, and that it is not inconsistent with justice as showing a preference to no one description of labour over another, yet foreseeing that I should be involved in a duty, which I never shall be able satisfactorily to perform—seeing, although it is possible, perhaps, to deal with the factories, yet if I am to enter into private shops and houses, and impose obligations upon every individual as to the degree of labour he shall impose, not upon 300 or 400 children, but upon two or three Members of his family whom he employs—if I am to be involved in such a difficult, and, as I think, such a perilous enterprise—if I am to undertake the duty of prescribing and legislating, not merely how long the steam engine shall work (for that I can effect), but if I am to inculcate in every private establishment and every private family the duties of humanity, I am involved in a task above all human strength, and as I believe, pregnant with great injustice to individuals. I know my wishes and feelings would be as much in accordance with effecting that object as lessening the labour in the case of factories. I should like to see the father more proud.

of the education and instruction and moral training of his children than anxious to increase his earnings by their labour. Can I effect it by law? If I once undertake it, I must not be deterred by the difficulty of legislating for individual cases. The more I extend my legislation—if I go from factories to earthenware, from earthenware to hosiery, and from hosiery to lace, that which I leave unrestricted I am giving fresh encouragement to. It is not the magnitude of the establishment I shall have to contend with, because if I carry out the principle fully and fairly I must descend into all the details of daily occupation. It is admitted, that the first principle of undue interference involves that extent of interference. What may be the effect, then, on the general employment of the country of such an attempt? I know it is pregnant with the most important consequences. After legislation shall have been effected, and these new restrictions imposed, depend upon it that is not the close of your legislation. I see full well what other consequences must follow; and, believing that upon the whole we have attempted as much of legislation on these great branches of manufacture as it is now wise and safe to attempt for the commerce and manufactures of the country, and above all for the interests and comforts of the working classes—dreading the consequences of imposing the proposed restrictions on adult labour—saying to the man, “Whatever be your inclinations, the amount of your work and your earnings shall be limited”—admitting that the debate does not turn on the principle, but believing that the interference we suggest, which has been sanctioned by the proposal of former Legislators who had well considered the subject, is all that can safely be attempted in respect of this branch of manufacture—believing above all, that the forcible restriction upon labour to the extent of preventing the adult, in the cotton factory, in the silk factory, in the lace and woollen trade, from labouring more than ten hours—whatever may be my sympathies and my feelings, regardless of being in a majority or in a minority, having no other motive in my conscience than that of promoting what in my belief is most consistent with the public interest, I cannot and will not acquiesce in the proposal of my noble Friend, forcibly to limit labour in factories, to ten hours in the day.

Lord J. Russell had listened with the greatest anxiety to this debate, and never remembered any question on which it was more difficult than the present to form an opinion, or in the issue of which more important consequences were involved. He did not rise for the purpose of making any answer to an observation on which the Secretary of State for the Home Department had to-night laid so much stress—that he had taken a part on a former occasion which would be inconsistent with his support now of the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. If that statement were meant as a taunt, he must say that that was not an occasion on which he felt inclined to notice any observation of that kind. [Sir J. Graham, “Hear.”] If it were not so intended, he should certainly say, that whatever might be the degree of inconsistency, on a question where thousands and hundreds of thousands of the working population of this country had their interests deeply involved, he should be ashamed of himself if he were not ready to expose himself to that charge if he was persuaded that their interests required him to take a different course from that which he had hitherto supported. With respect to the Motion itself, he must say that he was not altogether satisfied with the statement of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, able as it was. He thought the noble Lord’s argument was liable to the reply of the Secretary for the Home Department, that it seemed rather to lead to the conclusion, that women and children, at all events, ought to be totally excluded from factories, and that the factory system ought to be altered if not entirely abrogated in all its essential details rather than a vindication of those alterations which the noble Lord concluded by proposing. The course which the discussion had taken, the speeches which had been made by many Gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the subject had, he must say, cleared it of many of the difficulties in which the noble Lord had involved it. The question after all was, what was the amount of the limitation proposed by Her Majesty’s Government in the present Bill, what had been the amount of the limitation proposed by successive Governments which had preceded them, and what was that now proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire? He must say, after listening to the Speech of the right

hon. Baronet who had just sat down, it appeared to him, that the arguments used in it, so far from being those which might have been looked for from a Member of a Government proposing a restriction upon the hours of labour, were those of a person who objected to any legislation at all in such a matter. When the right hon. Baronet told them that there were persons of sixteen and eighteen years of age employed upon calico printing, and other persons upon other most unwholesome employments connected with our manufactures, and spoke as one being an enemy to all legislative restrictions upon employment: would it have been supposed that the right hon. Baronet was an enemy to all interference which would make a difference between the occupations he had referred to, and those which were affected by the present Bill? And yet such was not the case, and the right hon. Baronet was himself proposing a limitation in favour of young persons, that they should not labour more than twelve hours a day in the cotton factories. Let it be recollected by the House that their legislation had already effected in great part the interference which the right hon. Baronet, as a general principle, asked them not to sanction. They had passed a restriction limiting the labour of children from nine to thirteen years of age to eight hours a day, and of young persons from thirteen to eighteen years of age to twelve hours a day. Her Majesty's Government were not satisfied with these restrictions, and proposed to limit to six and a-half hours a day the labour of children between nine and thirteen years of age; and besides this, proposed a very important change in regard to adult women, thus introducing a new, and, as he (Lord J. Russell) thought, a very doubtful principle of legislation. The House had given its sanction to some interference in regard to the employment of women in mines two years ago, but this could hardly be quoted in favour of extending the principle of interference, for they had been told that in Scotland at least that Act had been continually evaded, and that women had since been employed there dressed as men, notwithstanding the stringency of the Act. At all events it was a principle of legislation which it was difficult to justify though the Government had adopted it. In regard to young children, Parliament had also interfered to say that parents and guardians should not be allowed to employ their children in such an excessive manner, as to endanger their health, to produce distortion and decay of constitution, and premature death. Parliament had undertaken to legislate thus far. But when it came to the case of women of from twenty-five to thirty years of age, it seemed hard for them to interfere and say that they should not have the power of deciding the number of hours labour they could perform in a day. Yet these were not the principles of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, but were part and parcel of the Bill of Her Majesty's Government, a principle introduced for the first time by themselves. All that the noble Lord said, strictly confining himself within the scope of the Bill, was, let ten hours be inserted instead of twelve. The right hon. Baronet said, that if they introduced such a principle, they would be introducing it for all persons who laboured in these mills, because it applied generally to women. They had it in the Report of the Commission that though the twelve hours' limitation was applied generally to all persons, from thirteen to eighteen years of age, it did not apply at present to persons beyond from thirteen to fifteen years of age. Several cases were complained of by Mr. Horner and others, which they said ought not to have occurred. It would appear from this, that it would not follow that because the ten hours' limitation of the noble Lord were carried, it would apply to all persons included within the scope of this Bill. There was one point, and a very main one, in this question, in regard to which the arguments of both the right hon. Gentlemen who addressed the Committee from the Ministerial benches, had been very unsatisfactory. He thought that if there were to be any limit as to the right of adult males to labour any number of hours they thought proper, it would be a very undue distinction, and one contrary to all just principles of legislation. But it was too much to say that, in order to ensure the liberty of adult labour, they should abstain altogether from interfering to protect the health and lives of young persons. If it were found to be necessary not only for the physical health, but for the moral well being of young persons, and for the prospect of becoming good members of society as they grow older, that some distinction should be imposed as to the extent of labour they should be called upon to perform, he did not think it could be argued as decisive against such a principle, that it would indirectly restrict all labour. Now, what was the case respecting the persons referred to—namely, the women employed in factories? He found, according to the statements of the noble Lord, and which, he believed, had not been denied, that there had been a great increase during the last few years in the number of females, and especially of young ones, employed in these factories. They had it also upon the testimony of medical authorities, and of those who had watched the progress of the labour, that young girls of from thirteen to eighteen years of age could not be employed for twelve hours a-day, and with their meals be confined for fourteen hours in the factory, without serious injury to their constitutions and health, and a sacrifice of all the means which should be open to them of acquiring such habits as might make them good wives and mothers. He said that if the state of society and of the country had called upon Parliament to interfere for the protection of what was so essential to these persons, they ought not now to invalidate that course of legislation. He thought they ought not to have entered at all upon this sort of legislation, they ought not to have interfered in any way with the industrial occupations of the country, unless, having entered upon this principle of interference, and undertaken the guardianship of some thousands of young persons so employed, they were prepared to make that interference effectual. With regard to the case of other countries, the right hon. Member for Taunton had shown that in America these persons were allowed to work more than twelve hours a-day; but, looking to the subsequent part of this evidence, upon this point, it appeared that such persons were allowed to go away for three or four months in the year to attend schools; and such a principle might perhaps be adopted in other countries, and with advantage. He had been very much struck with the statement of the hon. Member for Leeds, that out of seventy owners of mills in that part of the country, forty were ready to adopt the ten hour principle in their mills, and had signed the petition in favour of its adoption. Now when they were told of the alarm which existed, and certainly he believed some did exist, at the legislation upon this point was it not something to be urged in support of the principle that practical men, who it would be thought ought naturally to have been opposed to it, were ready to agree in this proposition. And when he was told, that at the moment when trade was reviving from its former depression, it was peculiarly inexpedient to enter upon legislation of this kind, he must say that he thought it was not improbable that such an enactment might have a good effect in equalising employment throughout the country; and looking at the large quantity of goods which could be sent out from our manufactures in a very short space of time, he thought that there might be a more equal and uninterrupted rate of employment arrived at, than by leaving the amount of daily labour unlimited. There was one point which had been touched upon by those who were opposed to this proposition, which was not unimportant in connection with this subject. Those Gentlemen said, if they wished to legislate for the advantage of the working classes, let them rather take off the restrictions which operated against the admission of food, than by imposing restrictions upon the exercise of labour. He was one who thought that the proposition of the noble Lord would have the effect of diminishing the wages of the working classes; and he should be sorry to vote for any proposition which would have such an effect. But the fact was, that the question of the corn-laws should not be kept out of sight, but should rather be considered in conjunction with that of labour; and if a great portion of the working classes were working at rates which hardly supplied them with necessary food, he would ask was it better to work for twelve hours a day for 16s. a week, than for ten hours for 12s. a week, if the price of food was so much cheaper as to give an equivalent quantity of food. Looking at the state of the country generally, he believed that the case was, that there was an excess of toil and a deficiency of food. He thought that the working classes had behaved admirably on almost all subjects, and on almost all occasions. But he thought that the general feeling was that the toil which they were obliged to undergo in order to obtain the bare necessities of life was more than the people of any country ought to be called upon to submit to. It was a difficult matter to interfere with the quantity of toil, but the time was come when he thought they ought to do so; and if he were called upon to point out another measure of relief, it would be that which should allow of a greater supply of food; thus ensuring the double boon of diminished labour, and an increased enjoyment of the necessaries of life. With these opinions he should vote in favour of the amendment of the noble Lord.

Mr. Hindley said, that if he had any hesitation in addressing the Committee on the present occasion it was not because he had any doubt as to the vote which he should give, but because he was apprehensive of weakening the effect of the observations of the noble lord and others who had spoken in support of this proposition. He should vote in favour of the amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. The question was one resting partly upon commercial, and partly upon moral grounds; but he would not shrink from it in either view of it—believing as he did, that what was morally right, could not be inconsistent with true commercial interests. As far as his own interests were concerned, it was not necessary for him to inform the Committee that everything he had in the world depended upon manufacturing property with which he was connected. He spoke therefore with the experience and interest of a man deeply involved in the result, when he gave his support to this proposition. They had established Sunday and other schools, together with mechanics' institutes, in the manufacturing districts, to educate the people; but as far as the factory children and young persons were concerned, they were all but useless, unless some greater restriction in the hours of labour were introduced. Religious worship, too, was in general neglected, as after the severe toil of the week, the people required to rest on the only day on which they were released from their severe labour. And in many cases the sabbath-day was for the most part spent in bed. With such evidence before him of the gross evils of the existing system, he should feel that he was voting contrary to the convictions of his conscience, and to the interests of his country, if he did not support the noble Lord's Amendment. He admitted, that some improvement had already resulted from their legislation for regulating factory labour, but great abuses still remained to be remedied, and that remedy could only be supplied by Parliament. It might be said that the manufacturers might themselves adopt regulations for working moderate hours, but he had no hope that they would do so under present circumstances. Then it might be urged that the workmen had the remedy in their own hands by refusing to work more than ten hours a day, but to suppose they would do so was fallacious, they would never find the operatives sufficiently unanimous to enable them to take that course with any hope of success, but he could imagine the possibility of a state of things in which the operatives forced by the determination of Parliament not to provide for their comforts by legislation, might meet together, as the people of Ireland had done, and force them to the adoption of such arrangements as should reduce the hours of labour. If the factory system were shown to be a moral nuisance then he said it was the duty of the Legislature to interfere with it. The night was given as a period of rest, and the scripture said, "The night cometh when no man shall work."

Mr. Collett considered all legislation between the employer and the employed as an interference with the liberty of the subject. He considered the Bill as an instance of that mania for legislation so prevalent in this House. He confessed that he looked upon the mere question of the precise number of hours to be devoted to work as of minor importance. If they once began in this sort of legislation there was no saying where or when they would stop. Perhaps next year they should have the Secretary of State for the Home Department bringing in a Bill to regulate the relations between master and servant. He should support the Clause.

Mr. Hardy who could not obtain a hearing, was understood to say that he felt it due to his constituents to state that he had not heard any argument against the proposition of his noble Friend except that the safety of the country would be endangered by it, and that was quite unsupported by facts. It was his intention to vote for the Amendment.

Mr. Muntz was anxious to qualify the vote he was about to give in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord. He would vote for that Amendment, not because he believed that it was sound in principle—that was to say on general principles—and he was sorry that it had ever been introduced. If the vote he meant to give should have the result of tending to encourage Government to withdraw the Bill, he should think it the best vote which ever he gave in his life. He thought that this was one of the instances in which Government would find great difficulty in legislating. They would find that the subject was out of their reach. But he would support the Amendment of the noble Lord for two reasons. The one was, that he thought that if they did try a principle, they should try it well; so that there should be no mistake about the matter. One of two things must arise from the Amendment being carried; either there must be a reduction in consumption or a diminution in wages. The other cause why he would support the Amendment was, that he had not met one operative in the cotton manufacturing districts who had not expressed an earnest hope for the success of the ten hours' proposition. At the same time he thought that some clause should be introduced to prevent the excessive labour frequently undergone in the iron districts. He believed, however, that it was necessity which compelled parents to work their children so hard as they sometimes did. In fact, the parents could not support the children unless they contributed to the common earnings.

Lord Ashley would only say in reply, that should he be so happy as to succeed in carrying his Amendment, he would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Leeds, and introduce a clause providing that for the first year after the passing of the Bill the number of hours of labour should be eleven, to be reduced to the ultimate number of ten the next year. He would only add, that he had never vilified the factory system as a system, because he was convinced that from what he had seen himself in certain mills, that under due regulations it could be made conducive to the virtue, happiness, and prosperity of the country. Committee divided on the question that the word "eight" stand part of the clause, Lord Ashley having moved that it be struck out in order to substitute the word six:—Ayes 170; Noes 179: Majority 9.

TELLERS.

Ashley, Lord
 Wortley, J.

[The Members who voted on the two divisions, with the exception of those to whose names we have prefixed an asterisk, and who were absent from the second division, were nearly the same. The Ayes on the first division were the Noes on the second; Mr. Collett voted with the Noes on both divisions. With this explanation we forbear from repeating the Lists.]

The word eight struck out, the Committee again divided on the question that the word "six" be inserted—Ayes 161; Noes 153: Majority 8.

Sir James Graham said, that the decision which the Committee had just come to upon the noble Lord's Amendment, was a virtual adoption of a ten hours Bill without modification; and this, with all respect for the Committee, he had a decided objection to; but still he did not feel that it was consistent with his duty to drop the Bill in consequence of that decision. Upon the 8th Clause the Committee would have an opportunity of re-considering this question, in a form more substantial than the present; for upon the proposal of that Clause, he presumed his noble Friend would move, in accordance with his accepted resolutions, for the introduction of the words "ten hours" instead of "twelve hours." He should now move that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again on Friday.

House resumed, Committee to sit again.

House adjourned at a quarter to two o'clock.

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND).] Mr. More O'Ferrall according to notice asked the following questions of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, namely:—1. Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure during the present Session to carry into effect all or any of the recommendations contained in a report of a Commission appointed to revise the several laws under or by virtue of which monies are now raised by Grand Jury presentment in Ireland, more particularly as relates to the recommendation to effect a saving of 160,000*l.* in the expenditure of the county rates in Ireland? 2. Whether any steps have been taken consequent on the report of the Commissioners of Inquiry, in respect to the convict department of Kilmainham prison, which established the fact of great extravagance and misapplication of public monies, under the Inspector of prisons? 3. Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure founded on the report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the Common Law Courts in Ireland? 4. Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure during the present Session relative to Ministers' money in Ireland?

Lord Eliot said, the alteration and revision of the Grand Jury Laws in Ireland was an important and difficult subject. With respect to the expediency of adopting the recommendations of the Commissioners, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, he (Lord Eliot) could assure him that very considerable diversity of opinion prevailed in Ireland upon the subject. He was quite sure that if any measure were to be based on those recommendations it would fail to meet with general support. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that there was at the present moment a measure, an experimental one it should be called, applicable to the county of Dublin. That measure had been framed with the intention of embodying a great portion of the recommendations of the Commissioners, particularly in matters of finance, and he thought it very desirable that the House should ascertain the result of that experiment before they proceeded to apply a general measure of that description to all the counties of Ireland. He did not complain of the way in which the hon. Gentleman had put his questions, but they appeared to him (Lord Eliot) to partake of the nature of a statement. The hon. Gentleman had referred particularly to the recommendation of the Commissioners having for its object the saving of 160,000*l.* per annum. There were several instances in which money had been saved. In one case 12,000*l.* had been saved out of fines and penalties. A sum of 16,000*l.* had been saved in the county of Dublin. With regard to the second question, he begged to say that it was the intention of the Government to provide a separate place for convicts before their embarkation. With regard to the third question, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure relating to the Common Law Courts, he begged to say that Her Majesty's Government were not prepared with any measure on the subject.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.]

Mr. Labouchere said, that it would probably not be thought that he took an inconvenient step if he begged to ask the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire what were his intentions in regard to the Amendment upon a clause in the Factories Bill which had been adopted last night?

Lord Ashley said, it is my most sincere and ardent desire to make any sacrifice of personal feeling, in order to do what may to the utmost conciliate my opponents, and render the Amendment it was my good fortune to carry as little objectionable as possible. This morning I had an interview with five or six considerable manufacturers, and likewise with several operatives, who represented the feelings of the operative manufacturing classes. I proposed to them a plan which I am about to state to the House, and I am happy to say that it met their entire and hearty approval. On Friday next I shall take the liberty of intreating the House to affirm the proposition of ten hours' labour, by the substitution of the word "ten" for "twelve" in Clause 8 of the Bill. Should the House affirm that proposition, I will prepare a Clause which shall enact that the present duration of labour, twelve hours, shall continue from the time at which we may pass the Clause for six months, that is, till the 1st of October in this year. This will give six months' notice before any change takes place. From the 1st of October, this year, the period of labour I propose shall fall to eleven hours, and continue at that rate for two years, or till the 1st of October, 1846, when the period of ten hours labour shall commence. This I think will give ample time to test the experiment, and during the course of that time, should any mischief arise out of the enactment, the House will have the means in its own hands of preventing the Clause from running away with the interests of the nation.

Sir James Graham said, that though it was not quite regular on his part to address the House, perhaps he should be pardoned if he said a few words. In the first place, it was most desirable that the House and the country should understand that he and Her Majesty's Ministers had now heard for the first time the propositions which the noble Lord had expressed his intention of submitting to the Committee; but he had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion, that it would be his duty on Friday next, to resist the Motion of the noble Lord, and to take the sense of the House upon the proposition of substituting "ten hours" for "twelve." He might be permitted to add, with respect to the further proposition which the noble Lord contemplated making, that the scope of that proposition had not removed, in the least, the objection which he (Sir J. Graham) had urged against the other proposal, and it would be his duty to resist it.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.] Mr. Ricardo rose to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice, that "An humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions to Her servants not to enter into any negotiations with foreign powers, which would make any contemplated alterations of the tariff of the United Kingdom contingent on the alterations of the tariffs of other countries; and humbly expressing to Her Majesty the opinion of this House, that the great object of relieving the commercial intercourse between this country and foreign nations from all injurious restrictions, will be best promoted by regulating our own Customs' duties as may be most suitable to the financial and commercial interests of this country, without reference to the amount of duties which foreign powers may think it expedient, for their own interests, to levy on British goods."

The hon. Gentleman said, that at the commencement of the Session of Parliament in 1842, the following passages occurred in the Speech from the Throne:—

"I receive from all Princes and States the continued assurance of their earnest desire to maintain the most friendly relations with this country. I am engaged in negotiation with several powers, which, I trust, by leading to conventions, founded on the just principles of mutual advantage, may extend the trade and commerce of the country."

In the speech of Her Majesty at the beginning of the present Sessions, although the same, and even more stress was laid upon the friendly dispositions of foreign powers, no mention was made of commercial conventions at all. The natural inference from this would be, that the effect of the course which had been hitherto pursued was altogether unsatisfactory. The extension of our trade and commerce was the object we had in view in entering into these negotiations, and their want of success under circumstances of the most favourable nature in times of peace and good intelligence with the countries with whom they were undertaken, would seem to indicate that there was something radically wrong in the system under which they were commenced, and to lead to the inquiry as to whether, having signally failed in obtaining our object by means of negotiations to extend our exports, we might not arrive at the same end by simple legislation, in regard to imports. The principal treaties which were in question in 1842 were those with Brazil, with Portugal, Spain and France. The fate of the first of these treaties had been most pathetically described by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. It was now clearly understood that the result of all these protracted negotiations with Brazil was, a handsome proposition on the part of the Brazilian Government not to raise the duties on our commodities more than 25 per cent., in return for certain concessions on our part. What the concessions were the right hon. Gentleman had not shown; but, however preposterous were the proposals of the Brazilian government, he would venture to say, those of our own Government were so in a four or five-fold degree. Great as was his respect for the abilities of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department, and of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, displayed, as these last were nowhere so conspicuously as in making a good case out of bad materials, he could not imagine what arguments they had used in order to entice the Brazilian government to adopt a policy against which our own example set them on their guard. Certainly a proposition to reduce restrictions of 30 or 40 per cent. would not come well from a nation which imposed a duty of 400 or 500 per cent. upon Brazilian produce. With regard to the slave-trade argument, he would merely advert to it. A convention for the suppression of slavery was one thing, and a treaty of commerce was another; and if an abhorrence of slavery were the ground upon which the Government withheld from the people the advantages of an extended trade with the Brasils, he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it would not be more economical rather than to continue a costly annual sacrifice, to grant compensation to the Brazilian as well as to the West Indian slaveholders. In Spain they had done more than negotiate, they had expended treasure and risked war. The government of Spain could not but know that upwards of 300,000 of her people were employed in smuggling, and in smuggling only; and yet, with every circumstance apparently in our favour to assist and encourage our efforts to effect a commercial treaty with Spain; it was a fact that we were further off our point than ever. British influence had never been so low in the Peninsula as at the present moment. The next commercial convention which had miscarried was that with Portugal, and the derangement in the wine trade which had been occasioned by it the House was aware of. In a circular of the wine trade, dated May, 1843, it was stated—

“We fear that, independent of the consequences of the long-protracted negotiations, the consumption of wine has suffered from the depression which has affected all articles of luxury, but by reference to Table A., it will be seen, that the deficiency on port alone, last year, is no less than 1,081,637 gallons (being more than half), and 312,816*l.* of revenue.”

Unfortunately, wine merchants were not the only sufferers, nor can the effects be regarded as merely temporary, as would undoubtedly be experienced both by ourselves and by the Portuguese, who appear to forget that until the beginning of the last century French wines constituted here, as now in the north of Europe, almost the whole consumption. The trade remonstrated, but even while remonstrating, they avowed—

“We cannot blind ourselves to the fact, that, while we are demanding of Portugal the admission of our manufactures at some 30 or 40 per cent., the rate of duty we offer her in return cannot be estimated at less than 150 per cent. on the cost of her wine, nor less than 600 per cent. on her brandy; we do not allude to the few pipes of expensive wines shipped to England, but to the general growths of the country, and alone known to the inhabitants as the ‘wines of Portugal;’ and, we may add, that the same applies, more or less, to the wines and spirits of all wine-growing countries. Although the use of wine is permitted to very few in England, it is produced over the whole of the south of Europe, in unlimited quantities; and there, as well as places like Hamburg, where the duty is low, is not considered a luxury, more than tea or coffee, and all are aware of the greatly increased consumption and trade, as well as the increased revenue derived from these articles, since, by reduced prices and duties, they have been placed within the reach of a large class of consumers. It has been officially stated, that the reduction of duty on the wines of Portugal will be followed by a similar reduction on those of other countries; but if these are to be delayed until treaties of reciprocity are settled, the confusion, and frauds in business, and against the revenue, which will inevitably ensue, are incalculable."

But this was not all: so far from there being any probability of a reduction in the duties of those commodities of Portuguese produce, by the import of which our trade with Portugal would be extended, a fresh impediment had been thrown in the way by the Chancellor of the Exchequer having agreed to grant a drawback to the wine-merchants to the amount of the duty reduced. So that before any arrangement could be made, they would find that, on a moderate calculation, for every 1*s.* of duty taken off, from 150,000*l.* to 200,000*l.* would have to be paid as compensation to the wine merchants. With France we had been equally unsuccessful—we had been engaged in almost interminable diplomatic arrangements to negotiate a commercial treaty. As the right hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere) had happily styled it, "always pending, never ending." Upon this point, he might call attention to a paper, drawn up by Mr. McGregor, upon the subject of Commercial Tariffs, in which he quotes the opinion of M. St. Ferriol, given about nine years ago, as to what should be the system of commercial policy for France to pursue. M. St. Ferriol, in a work dedicated to M. Guterin, Director-in-chief of the administration of customs, professes to elucidate the principles of the French customs, and sums them up as follows:—

"1. To reduce the existing duties solely on materials required for manufactures. 2. To protect the importation of machines and tools for manufactures. (They had done this.) 3. To treat cotton-twists and linen-yarns as manufactured goods, and not as articles necessary for manufactures. (They had adhered most rigidly to this principle; for the only result of our diplomatic intrigues had been a raising of the import duties in France on our linens and linen yarns.) 4. To abolish no prohibition, to reduce no duty on manufactures on any other consideration than to lessen the profits of fraud. (This principle had been well carried out.) 5. To prohibit the exportation of machinery, tools, teazles, &c., and all that may contribute to the development of foreign industry. 6. To protect our merchant shipping in an efficient manner, by particularly favouring the importation of our merchandize from the ports of first shipping. 7. To consider as a principle that, in all treaties to be negotiated with England, most of the conditions which she will propose are to be avoided."

This was a principle which France had never lost sight of; and although it was known to the French Government that their loss on sugars was 30,000,000*f.*, and on iron 50,000,000*f.*—though it was known that the prohibition had produced incalculable mischief to both countries, yet notwithstanding all our efforts, it was now clearly ascertained that all idea of the commercial treaty was abandoned. Hitherto he had spoken only of the actual catastrophe of each particular treaty, and it would be an endless task to attempt to describe the various complications and dilemmas of these conventions were he to treat them relatively the one to the other. Independently of binding ourselves down to a particular course of commercial policy there was a clause in many of these sort of documents commonly called "the most favoured clause" which rendered every alteration in our Tariff a subject of negotiation and, perhaps, of altercation, not with one country alone, but with every country producing the commodity affected by the change; in the late treaty which had been concluded by Lord Ashburton with the United States, on the Boundary question, a commercial claim had been inserted, by which it was stipulated that the produce of the state of Maine, coming into the British colony of New Brunswick, should be considered as British produce, and admitted into the United Kingdom at the colonial rate of duty. Now, it appeared to him that they might be placed in a serious dilemma by this clause, for it might very fairly be said by the other corn and timber growing countries having the most favoured clause, that as Maine was as much a portion of the United States as New York itself, there was no reason why their produce should not be admitted upon the same terms. They knew of a parallel case. A low rate of duty had been imposed upon rice, the produce of the western coast of Africa, and the American Government claimed to have their rice admitted at the same duty. The late Government had refused their claim but the present Government had admitted it, by equalising the duty in the late change in the Tariff. This would show the nature of the difficulty that might arise under the clause he had referred to. But if he wanted any evidence as to the difficulties attending commercial treaties, he might appeal to the answer given last year by the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) to a question put by the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) as to the progress of certain negotiations then pending. The right hon. Baronet said:—

“He need not describe the difficulties which often arise in the course of negotiations, the prejudices which exist, and the jealousies the Government have to contend with. But in addition, they were also exposed to difficulties which could hardly be anticipated from some change taking place in a foreign government, which rendered it necessary, if not to recommence the negotiations, at least to enter into lengthened explanations. The difficulties of negotiating commercial treaties were not confined to the negotiations with arbitrary governments, indeed he might observe that the spread of constitutional principles, and the establishment of representative governments, had not increased the facilities of making these treaties; on the contrary, it had rather increased than abated the difficulties.”

He had quoted the testimony of the right hon. Baronet, and now he asked the House whether he had not fulfilled his pledge of showing that the system of seeking development for our trade, by meddling with foreign custom houses, was unwise, impolitic, and dangerous? He did honestly believe that this was manifest, and it was not without some mortification that he found that the Government of England had not been the first to avow it. In France M. Guizot had abandoned the deceptive advantages of commercial treaties, and had declared his intention of adopting measures for the welfare of his country, without reference to what other countries might do. He found in a report of the debates in the French Chamber the following question and answer.—

“M. Billault: I have no desire, Gentlemen, to measure my talents with those of the orator who has just spoken, but will content myself with dealing with facts. I wish to ask whether a treaty of commerce has not been contemplated with England?

“The Minister of Foreign Affairs; Negotiations were in progress for a treaty of commerce between France and England. It would have affected none of the great interests of the country; neither flax nor cotton manufactures were in question; and woollen manufactures were only treated of indirectly, and in a very limited manner. These negotiations have ceased, and have not been resumed. Therefore, at present, the hon. Gentleman has not any cause of alarm. Everything remains as before, and nothing has been done. For my own part, the more I consider the question, the more convinced I am that treaties of commerce of long duration with rival great powers are attended with inconvenience and danger, and that, in treating with rival powers, it is better to proceed by means of modifications in tariffs, which leave everything at liberty, and which need only last the time necessary for making the experiment. I may add, that I have reason to hope my ideas are shared in by the British Cabinet, that the British Cabinet will no longer insist on a treaty of commerce, but leave it to modifications of tariffs to obtain the end desired on both sides, namely the extension of our commercial relations.”

Now, if this was true, as to the intentions of France, and he saw no reason to doubt it, seeing that the statement came from the Prime Minister of France, he thought no one could blame him for bringing forward the present Motion, and for calling upon Government to adopt those means for extending our own commercial relations which were in its power, rather than to endeavour to obtain the same object by means over which they had had no controul. He had heard a great deal about the impossibility of fighting hostile tariffs with free ports, and the right hon. Baronet, at the head of the Government had last year quoted against him a most formidable little page of a much less formidable publication in support of this theory. Now he (Mr. Ricardo) maintained that the only weapon a commercial country has to oppose to a high tariff, is a reduction of its own import duties. The attempt to induce other countries to lower their duties upon our goods by increasing the import duties upon their produce was most absurd. It was in fact increasing the impediments to an extension of our commerce with those countries. If a country imposed a duty of 40 per cent. upon our commodities, that 40 per cent was the obstacle in the way of our trade with that country; but if, in retaliation, we imposed an equal amount of duty upon her produce, the obstacles to our trade with that country was raised from

40 to 80 per cent. by our own act. Therefore, he said, that every step they took in that course, would tend more and more to deteriorate and limit our commercial relations with foreign countries. The prejudicial effect of those reciprocal commercial treaties was shown by the fact, that our trade with Russia, a country where prohibition and protection are the means employed to maintain costly manufactures, was greater than with the Brazils, when we had what was called a favourable commercial treaty. Now, he knew, that Russia was, as it were, the citadel of those who maintained that tariff reductions were impolitic and disadvantageous. But, strange as it might appear, Russia was his strong point too. Our imports from Russia amounted to not less than 5,000,000*l.* annually, while our exports were not more than 1,600,000*l.* It was true, that the balance between the import and export must be paid by this country in some way or other, and he might be told that we should be driven to the ruinous alternative of paying it in gold. But even if we were, he apprehended no danger. He would be glad to see our trade with Russia doubled on the same terms, for a profitable trade might be carried on in gold as well as in any other commodity. He acknowledged no supernatural attribute to gold. We must buy it before we could sell it, and if we could do so with a profit, where was the objection? But, in point of fact, we did not export bullion to Russia in payment of the excess of our imports over our exports from that country. He found that our exports to Russia, of articles the produce of our foreign markets, in 1841, were—Cotton, 8,098,735 lbs.; indigo, 1,279,603 lbs.; cochineal, 230,854 lbs.; coffee, 439,364 lbs.; sugar, 84,606 cwts.; wine, 46,911 gals.; rum, 50,337 gals.; besides a great variety of other articles, all exported out of our bonded warehouses here, having been received from the countries where they were produced, to pay for the purchases of our goods, and thus promoting further demand for our manufactures. This was what was termed the triangular system of import. We imported from Russia, and paid for those imports by the produce of the Brazils and other foreign countries which we obtained in exchange for our cotton, woollen, and other manufactures; so that our payments to Russia were made by the goods of those foreign countries, through our bonded warehouses, and paid for by our manufactures. The balance was made up by the exports to Russia of the like commodities from the countries who sent them to those bonded warehouses, thereby displacing their own produce, and replacing it with ours. The transaction was most simple. The Russian wants sugar and coffee, we want hemp and tallow, and the Brazilian wants cotton goods and hardware. Therefore we buy of each other. We do not send the money to Russia, that she may send it to the Brazils, from thence to be returned to us by the whole transaction, as regulated by a bill of exchange—drawn by one of the parties on the others, and taken in payment by the others. And this is all the misfortune resulting from what they were pleased to call a one-sided free trade. He hoped his Motion would not be met with the objection that it was a mere abstract theory. They must deal in abstract propositions before they could arrive at practical results. The steam engine and the spinning jenny had once been abstract theories; and if they had not found a Watt or an Arkwright to carry these abstractions into practice, our resources and our industry would not have availed us against the ingenuity of our competitors. And so all political improvement and reform is theory. And if they could not find Ministers bold enough to carry out those principles which would tend to abolish restrictions which crippled trade, they might bid adieu to the greatness and prosperity which this country had so long enjoyed. He hoped that the right hon. Baronet would not content himself with contemplating the present moment of prosperity, but that he would look back on the years of adversity which had passed, and inquire whether the same causes from which that adversity had arisen were not still in operation, and whether the probability was not that they would be followed by equally lamentable results. The right hon. the President of the Board of Trade had, on a former occasion, asked him (Mr. Ricardo) if he desired a circular should be sent off to every British Minister accredited to a foreign court, desiring him to stop any negotiations that might be going on for effecting commercial treaties. And he would now say, that if that had been done, it would, in his opinion, have saved much unnecessary trouble. It was, perhaps, not too late to send it now; and if the right hon. Gentleman should decide upon sending such a circular, he hoped he would add to it instructions to our ambassadors to tell foreign powers that Great Britain was at length aware of the delusion she had so long laboured under; that she now knew she could not sell without buying, or buy without selling; and that, in consuming the productions of foreign countries; she was, in fact, merely consuming her own produce in an altered shape; that the markets of England were now open to the nations of the world for the exchange of that which they needed the most, for that which they could produce more economically than ourselves. Beyond revenue considerations there should be no let or hindrance, and the only limits to their trade would be those which they themselves imposed. The hon. Member, in conclusion, submitted the Motion he read at the commencement of his speech.

Mr. Ewart seconded the motion. He thought it a most unfortunate moment when diplomacy first meddled with commerce. In referring to the history of commercial treaties, he asked what good result had this country ever obtained from them? The first treaty to which he would refer was the celebrated Methuen treaty of 1703, which was for a long time the wonder of the commercial world. It had, however, conferred no advantage to commerce, but was an impediment. The effect of it was to introduce into this country a taste for the wine of Oporto, superseding the use of French wine, which until then was the only wine consumed in England. As to the absurdity of that treaty, Hallam, in his Constitutional History, said,

"A contemporary historian, of remarkable gravity, observes, 'It was strange to see how much the desire of French wine, and the dear-ness of it, alienated many men from the Duke of Marlborough's friendship (Cunningham, ii. 220). The hard drinkers complained that they were poisoned by Port; these formed almost a party. Dr. Aldrich, dean of Christ Church, surnamed the priest of Bacchus, Dr. Ratcliffe, General Churchill, &c., and all the bottle companions, many physicians, and a great number of the lawyers and inferior clergy, were united together in the faction against the Duke of Marlborough.'"

The next treaty was that which was concluded with France in 1786, by Mr. Pitt, by which it was endeavoured to establish a system of improved trade with France, but of which it was afterwards said, by all the French periodicals of the time, that it was so advantageous to the English nation that the French ought never again to enter into a treaty with England. He turned from this country to other countries, and he asked whether the reduction of duties on imports had not been always beneficial? The most obvious country in reference to this part of the question was the United States of America. For a long series of years, while the United States were steadily progressing, their imports largely exceeded their exports, and the attention of one of the most acute observers of human nature, Dr. Franklin, was turned to the subject. He said in one of his essays,

"That if the importation of foreign luxuries could ruin a people, they (the Americans) would probably have been ruined long ago, for the British nation had claimed and exercised the right of importing amongst them, not only the superfluities of her own production, but of every nation under heaven. We bought and consumed, yet we flourished and grew rich."

But setting aside these questions of the past, the simple question was, whether they were likely to succeed in future. There appeared to be no approximation on the part of France towards a commercial treaty with this country. He believed that there existed in France, and in almost every nation in the world, an extreme jealousy of English commerce. The same thing prevailed in Germany. He did not believe that the United States contemplated any approach towards a commercial connection. Our future commercial connection with other nations could only be extended or even continued by our throwing open our ports, and taking whatever we wanted, convinced that they would, in the end, take from us whatever they required in return. He therefore thought that Government were called on to give some definite description of their intentions with respect to our future commercial policy. In this respect the time was come when they should imitate the example of the French minister, and by stating clearly what their intentions were, relieve the country from that condition of suspense and anxiety to which it was at present subjected with reference to future commercial policy.

Mr. Gladstone did not think it would be difficult for him to show sufficient reason why the House should not accede to the motion of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman had referred at some length to the different cases in which

commercial negotiations had recently been carried on between Great Britain and foreign countries. It was not, however, necessary for him to follow the hon. Gentleman in detail through these cases, because, even although he were to grant that no benefit had arisen from these negotiations—that they had all failed—and failed hopelessly—he should still contend that the hon. Gentleman had laid no ground to justify a motion so broad and so sweeping as that which he had submitted to the House. The hon. Gentleman had made a motion upon the subject last year, and had called upon the House to declare, that it was not expedient that any remission of import duties should be entertained with a view to making such reductions the basis of stipulations with that foreign country in whose favour these reductions were contemplated. That motion was rejected by the House. But in his present motion the hon. Gentleman appeared determined to make the terms in which it was couched still more wide and sweeping than were those of his motion of last year. The object of the hon. Gentleman, in his present motion, seemed to be to declare, absolutely and abstractedly, that the Government of this country, under any circumstances or for any purpose, ought never to enter into mutual arrangements with other countries, involving modifications of their respective tariffs. As regarded, however, a particular case to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, he must thank him on behalf of the Government for the extreme charity of his judgment upon their measures. The hon. Gentleman stated with regard to that particular case, that the propositions made by this to a foreign country were quite absurd. He stated that they were much more absurd than were the propositions of the foreign country referred to. [Mr. Ricardo : Much more preposterous.]—Well, that was the word. But the hon. Gentleman quite overlooked the distinction between the two cases. He said that nothing could be more inconsistent, than for Great Britain to object to the Brazils levying a duty of 40 per cent. upon our productions, while we laid on their productions a duty of 300 per cent. Now, did the hon. Gentleman think that this was a fair representation of the case? Did he think that it was on the abstract doctrine, that 40 per cent. was a duty that a foreign country could not be justified in imposing upon our manufactures, that the Government proceeded? On a former occasion he had explained to the House that this 40 per cent. was imposed by the Brazilian Government, not for the sake of a revenue, but in order to rear up a protective system. That was quite different from levying it as a revenue tax. [An hon. Member : There is no distinction.] What! No distinction between a tax for the purposes of revenue, and a tax for the purposes of protection? He would leave hon. Gentlemen opposite to reconcile such an opinion with the opinions which they had expressed on former occasions, with the opinions which they had stated before the Import Duties Committee; and would contend, for his own part, that the very broadest distinction existed between a revenue and a protective duty. The question turned upon the rearing up of a new protective system. The Brazils demanded the imposition of a duty of 40 per cent. upon our manufactures for protective purposes, and that this country should consent to limit its protective duty on sugar to an amount which, instead of being 40 per cent. upon the value of the article, was more nearly 6 per cent., so that it would be more just if the hon. Gentleman had stated that the absurdity lay not upon the side of this, but upon that of the Brazilian Government. He did not wish to disguise the particular objections to these commercial negotiations; but the hon. Gentleman, in his estimate of these objections, and particularly of those having relation to Spain, should have taken into view, that the greatest of all difficulties in the way of our negotiations with that Government lay, not in its disinclination to negotiate with us, but in its extreme weakness—a weakness which subsequent events had abundantly proved. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the case of America, and founded an argument upon a clause in the Ashburton Treaty. That was a matter which he did not think could be prudently or fairly discussed at present; but he would say that the hon. Gentleman had formed a very hasty judgment of the effect of that clause, when he stated that upon it claims might be founded in favour of American corn-growing States for the admission of their produce upon the same terms as those granted, not to the State of Maine (for the hon. Gentleman seemed not to have read the Treaty), but to a certain portion only of that State. He ventured to say, that the opinion of the hon. Gentleman upon the claims which might be set up under the clause in question was quite erroneous; as was also his illustration with reference to the admission of Rice, which was admitted upon quite different grounds from those upon which the produce of Maine was proposed to be admitted. In the case of Rice a privilege had been given to a foreign country, but it was not given in respect to the origin of the grain, but in respect to the place of exportation. But as to the State of Maine the privilege had been agreed to be guaranteed to it when it was a British possession. Now, the hon. Gentleman thought it most unreasonable that we should stickle with Portugal as to its imposing duties upon our produce, while we were imposing a duty of 100 per cent. upon its wine, and 600 per cent. upon its brandy. But in the 30 or 40 per cent. proposed by Portugal to be levied upon our manufactures, the object was to place the British manufacturers at a disadvantage in Portugal. Now, we had no such object in laying a duty upon their wine and brandy. We wished to levy a tax upon articles of luxury, the consumption of which was confined to the rich. This was surely quite a different principle from that proposed to be adopted by Portugal. Now, as to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, he did not deny that great difficulties and disadvantages were incident to these commercial negotiations. The uncertainty and delay which attended them were great evils, and he was quite willing to admit that, in some cases, they might be made the causes of hostility, instead of promoting friendly feeling. He did not deny that parties negotiating together might place themselves unwisely in the position of parties making a hostile arrangement. He did not deny that the natural disposition to do all they could for their country led them to over-rate that which they offered to foreign countries, and to under-rate that which foreign countries offered them in return. All these difficulties attached themselves to commercial negotiations, and formed, he was ready to admit, serious impediments to their final and satisfactory settlement. To these evils, also, might be added the injurious effects which such negotiations might produce on the revenue during the time when they were pending, as reasons why they should not be entered into without rational expectations of success, and without very great and overwhelming considerations of public necessity. He wished to show that he did not under-rate the difficulties and disadvantages of commercial negotiations. If hon. Gentlemen were to put the question, whether he would admit that it was more probable that favourable negotiations would be formed between this and foreign countries within a certain space of time, or whether it were more probable that they would not—he would reply, that he did not deem it necessary at present to answer the question. He did not object to hon. Gentlemen raising the question, he did not object to a strong statement of the disadvantages and difficulties of commercial negotiations, but he would, in the first place, say that there had been treaties of this sort which had been very advantageous; and, in the second place, that even if there had not, it was quite possible that at some future period there might. Why then should the House, by a Resolution, preclude itself from the possibility of entering on such treaties at a future period? That was the question. Was it possible that there could be such a thing as an advantageous commercial Treaty? If that principle was once admitted, then it was most unwise in the House to declare that the Resolution before it should be adopted as a rule of conduct. He repeated that there had been advantageous commercial Treaties. The Treaty with the Brazils had been of this nature. It was true that in one respect that Treaty had illustrated one of the disadvantages to which he had alluded, because it had tended to encourage the belief in Brazil that the people there had been ill-treated; but that was no objection to a commercial Treaty. Such a Treaty was one equal on both sides. In the case of the Brazilian Treaty, political countenance had been exchanged for commercial advantage; and those who had to pay that commercial advantage, when the political countenance had ceased to be material, naturally entertained a feeling of soreness. But as to the commercial portion of the Treaty, it was decidedly advantageous to our manufacturers. The hon. Gentleman had talked of our trade with Russia, and said that we had as great, or a greater trade (propositions, by the way, which he begged to deny), as we had with the Brazils. But the hon. Gentleman must remember that while Russia had a population of 60,000,000, that of Brazil only amounted to 6,000,000. Again, the hon. Gentleman who had seconded the Motion (Mr. Ewart), had referred to the Treaty concluded with France in 1787. Now that was an example of a more than ordinary advantageous commercial Treaty; and surely no one was prepared to say that it was impossible that similar circumstances to those under which it had taken place might come round again. But the hon. Gentleman said, "do not take any objection to my Motion, because it is abstract." Why, he did not deny that such a thing as abstract truth existed; he did not deny that abstract truth existed in political and commercial matters. There was an abstract truth in them, although it was exceedingly difficult to come at; but the question was, whether abstract propositions were the most convenient forms for the expression of the judgment of deliberative bodies. By an abstract proposition they were called upon, instead of adapting their course to circumstances and giving them their due weight—they were called upon to tie up their hands beforehand, and to put it out of their power to judge of the claims of future exigencies. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the steam-engine and the spinning jenny were once abstract propositions. Now he thought that an altogether new doctrine. He did not think that these inventions made their first entrance into this world of ours in the shape of abstract propositions. He thought that they were the result of a patient investigation made by thoughtful men into the laws and operations of nature. But to return. Such were the principles upon which he proposed that Government should be left free and unfettered to proceed in the matter of commercial negotiations. If he were to admit that there could be no possible case in which the remission of a protective duty should be made contingent upon the concession of a foreign power, he would be conceding something very imprudent in itself, but very far from conceding all that the hon. Gentleman required, because his doctrine extended to all duties, whether for the sake of revenue or protection. Now he would make a wide distinction between them; and as to taxation imposed for revenue purposes, he denied the proposition that there could be no case in which it might be advisable to accede to a remission of such a duty contingent upon the proceedings of another country. The hon. Gentleman talked of the necessity of enlarging our imports, and letting our exports take care of themselves; but he appeared to assume that because we obtained a result in another shape—in the case of Russia, for example—to that obtained from India or from America, that therefore it was a perfect matter of indifference in what shape they obtained it. Now, our trade with Russia was a very good one as it stood, but it would be a far more advantageous trade for this country if its tariff, instead of being founded on a highly protective, were based upon a liberal system; and for these reasons, because our trade at present consisted almost entirely of articles on which little labour had been bestowed, and because a direct was better than an indirect trade. But unless the hon. Gentleman could make good the doctrine that there was no choice between different kinds of trade, he could not call upon the House to affirm his resolution. But even political subjects might be connected with commercial treaties. He would admit that that was a principle which required to be well watched—that it was most dangerous, as a general rule, to pay for political influence at the expense of the industry and capital of the country. That when he was not called upon to make any such sacrifice—when the question was, whether he should devlate merely from some rigid abstract rule, he did say that there might be cases, and these not very remote or improbable, in which political circumstances might dictate of themselves the remission of a duty for the purposes of revenue. But as to commercial subjects, he conceived that nothing was less improbable than that the question of the readiness of a foreign country to meet us by a reduction of import duties, should be a material element in the consideration of whether we should remit a certain import duty. How did the question of the reduction of an import duty generally arise? Some surplus existed in the revenue, and applications were immediately made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by numerous parties for a reduction of import duty upon the articles in which they were specially concerned. Now, the Chancellor should take a comprehensive view of the whole circumstances of the case, when the Government were considering how they were to apply any given amount of surplus. One of these circumstances might be a readiness to meet a certain reduction in import duty by a corresponding reduction on the part of a foreign country. He thought that there might be cases in which the balance of advantages between the reduction of different duties might be affected by such political considerations. But it was a mistake to exclude from our view that all commercial treaties were not analogous to the Methuen Treaty. That was partly based on political considerations, and we paid a high price for certain commercial advantages, moreover that was intended to be a permanent treaty; but during the last two years, when commercial treaties were contemplated, the negotiations were not carried on with a view to establish permanent differential duties. But if the reductions contended for had been conceded by the Governments negotiated with, surely the hon. Gentleman would not deny that it was a great practical object to consider the effect which these reductions would have had upon the general commercial system practised in those countries. If they had large dealings with a country carrying on a rigid system of prohibition, and supposing they felt persuaded that by inducing that country to consent to reductions on import duties, they could break down her prohibitory system, was that a consideration which any British minister should be sworn to exclude from his mind? That was the view adopted in several of the recent commercial negotiations. The negotiations with France, five or six years ago, were intended to secure the advantage not merely of obtaining a reduction of duty upon Sheffield goods and woollen cloths, but of breaking down the prohibitory system of France. While he did not admit that such a consideration was a considerable object in a commercial treaty, yet still let them not exclude themselves from the means of obtaining it. Watch the operation of those means as jealously as they pleased, but do not absolutely take out of the hands of Government a means of using what might be a great instrument for the purpose of producing favourable effects in commercial negotiations abroad. Unless the hon. Gentleman could show that all kinds of trade were equally advantageous—unless he could show that it was a matter of indifference to us whether the countries which we dealt with had a liberal or a prohibitory commercial system—unless he could prove that the treaty with Brazil had been disadvantageous to our manufactures—unless he could show that the treaty concluded by Mr. Pitt with France was disadvantageous to our manufacturers—unless he could show that there were no possible circumstances in which a commercial treaty could be aught other than evil—unless he could do all that, he had no right to call upon the House to affirm his resolution, which involved in it all the propositions which he had described, and which he therefore trusted the House would negative, as it had done the proposition brought forward by the hon. Gentleman last year.

Viscount Howick: I have heard with great satisfaction much of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, for I think that even my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Ricardo), who has made the Motion, has not placed before the House more strongly the objection to the policy of negotiating for mutual commercial advantages with foreign powers than has the right hon. Gentleman. That part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, in which he pointed out to the House the extreme inconvenience arising from the policy of these commercial negotiations, was expressed with a force and a conciseness, that it would be in vain for me to attempt to rival; but the right hon. Gentleman having stated his objections to that policy—only grounds his objections to the Motion before the House upon an allegation that the Motion is an abstract one, and upon the chance of there being some remote possibility of a case arising, in which it may be desirable to enter into these negotiations, and thus incur all those inconveniences which he has so well described. Now, I must confess, that I was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman object to the Motion, because it was an abstract one. Will the right hon. Gentleman inform me how anything can be less abstract than for this House to pray Her Majesty to exercise her prerogative in a certain manner, and, having made that prayer, to state the reasons on which it is founded? It is notorious, that the Executive Government enters into commercial negotiations without any previous control on the part of this House. We know nothing of the negotiations about to be commenced, until they have made a certain progress. And every hon. Gentleman must be aware, that nothing is more common than when an hon. Gentleman upon this side of the House urges the adoption of some measure of liberal commercial policy upon the Government, he is met with the reply, that his suggestion is inconsistent with "negotiations now in progress." It is in the power of the Executive Government to commit the faith of the country to a particular course of policy, and then they call upon us to frame our measures in consonance with what they have done. If it is true, that these negotiations are so inconvenient—if it is true that, as a general rule, we should abstain from entering into them, what can be more proper and less abstract than to ask Her Majesty to give directions to her servants to abstain in future from entering into those negotiations to the policy of which so many just objections are raised? I think that this is a fit and proper and constitutional course of proceeding for the House to adopt. We know that it is often the practice, both of this House, and of the other House of Parliament, to offer advice to Her Majesty, as to various negotiations: and the question is, whether the case now before us is one in which the advice proposed to be given to Her Majesty is sound advice? Now, for my part, I think that the advice which my hon. Friend near me wishes the House to give Her Majesty, is advice which it would be greatly for the benefit of this country should be followed. It is impossible for any body to compare the language held in this country by those who take a lead in public affairs, with the practical conduct of the Government, without being struck by this great anomaly—that whereas the leaders of political parties all agree in the advantages of free-trade, although it is stated on the other side of the House, as on this, that the principles of free-trade are the principles of common sense—that we should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, and that we should not punish ourselves by abstaining from adopting a liberal tariff, although other countries refused to adopt such a system—although these are the doctrines preached, yet when we come to look how they are carried into effect, we find that our commercial policy is encumbered in all directions with a mass of restrictions—that our scale of Custom House rates contains in every page, and in every item, duties which are totally contrary to the principles thus universally assented to—rates of duty so exceedingly high, that they cannot be defended on any sound principle of commercial or financial policy. This, then, is the existing state of things, and what is the explanation of the

anomaly? It is, that although we agree in principle, yet that whenever we come practically to apply that principle, there are private interests of one kind or another enlisted against us, and we always find some excuse for not applying it. The right hon. Gentleman opposite talked much about a thing being abstractly right. Now, I think that, instead of using the phrase, when they mean to convey its meaning, they should speak of a thing which is right in itself, but which is not exactly convenient to follow out in practice. It is something which you are not prepared to contest in argument; but which you are not prepared to do because there are interests to contend against so strong, that they can over-rule you. I say the reason for the anomaly to which I have adverted, between the opinions we profess and the practical conduct we pursue, is founded on the fact that there is always some pretence or other put forward by those parties interested in the various monopolies under which this country groans, for rejecting the practical application of principles which they cannot deny to be true; and of all those pretences, that which I believe at this moment has most effect on the House and the country—that which appears to me to afford the most convenient shelter to those who, in their hearts, are friends to monopoly, and the most convenient excuse to others for not carrying into effect what they admit to be just, is, that at this moment it is inexpedient to act, unless you can obtain what is called "a reciprocity of concession." It is this doctrine more than any other that prevents the effective reform of our commercial policy; and that being the case, it does appear to me that the Motion of my hon. Friend is calculated to be eminently useful, because it is calculated to bring before the House and the country, distinctly and broadly, the question of the policy of insisting on what is called reciprocity of concession. Now, if we were to judge from language apart from conduct, there really would appear to be a very slight ground of difference between the Government and the supporters of this Motion, because we who support this Motion are perfectly prepared to say that all restrictions on trade are disadvantageous—the restrictions imposed by other countries just as much as those we impose ourselves: we say that extravagant duties on the one side of the water or the other are a great evil. So far we agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel) opposite; and, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman agrees with us that, as a permanent system, to punish ourselves by maintaining high duties, because other countries are unwise enough not to follow our policy, is most injudicious. No man can doubt that this is the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman who has attended to his speech quoted by my hon. Friend last year on this Motion; and so far it really appears that we are entirely agreed; and the only difference between us is reduced to this:—first, is it expedient, even for a short time, to submit to the inconvenience of imposing restrictions on our trade, in the hope of getting other countries to join with us in taking off excessive imposts? and next, what are the means which this country has in its power to use, most likely to be successful in placing the trade between this and other nations on that footing on which we all agree it should rest? Now, it appears to me, if you admit that, as a permanent system, it is inexpedient to punish yourselves by high duties because others impose them, it is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that you ought at once to make the change. In the first place, time is a material element in the case. If you admit, that this system of punishing yourselves by high duties is too unwise permanently to continue, I ask you, how can you reject, even for a day, what you must feel to be a relief—the power of obtaining employment for your own population—under the vague expectation that other countries will join you in establishing hereafter a perfect freedom of trade? It seems to me that you can only do so from a misconception as to the relative advantage which the country derives from its export and import trade. Her Majesty's Government, with all the progress they have made in adopting the doctrines of free-trade, seem still not thoroughly to have shaken off the trammels of the old notion, that the export trade was alone advantageous, and that what, in old language, was called the “favourable balance of trade,” was the grand desideratum.—Though for the last three-quarters of a century, the old mercantile theory of the advantage of a balance in the precious metals has to the mind of every educated man been completely exploded, still the conventional language and the notions of policy arising out of that theory do most fatally hang about the minds of statesmen, and influence the conduct of nations. We still seem to think that our exports alone are really advantageous. Now, I entirely concur with the hon. Gentleman behind me, who has shown that our import trade is what is really valuable, since it is by importing the goods of other countries, we obtain a larger amount of comforts and luxuries for the consumption of our own population. Your export trade, no doubt, is valuable; but it is important only in this sense, as a means of enabling you to obtain imports. If in any other sense than as a means of increasing our import trade, our export trade were valuable, of course your exports to Africa—where the savages who buy them, would be too happy to take your goods, provided only you were not so unreasonable as to ask for payment, might be as advantageous as any we have. But it is because they have nothing with which to pay us; because they are poor, barbarous, and in the miserable state of savages, in comparison with the great nations in our neighbourhood—that is the reason why that trade—rising as it is in importance, as the great continent which furnishes it is beginning to improve—has hitherto been of trifling value compared with that which we carry on with the great nations of the world. But if this position be true—if our export trade is only valuable as the means of ensuring us the imports we desire to obtain—is it not a most extraordinary course of policy, that we should refuse to receive imports because we are not quite certain that there may not be a difficulty hereafter in providing the means of payment? Let me ask, if practically there is any kind of difference in the results of direct trade by which we pay at once the nations from which we receive commodities, and what has been called to-night “triangular” trade, by which we pay for what we receive indirectly by exportation, to some third country? It makes no sort of difference to us which mode of payment is adopted, and by the one or the other, have we ever yet experienced the smallest difficulty in paying for any produce we choose to receive? On the contrary, the riches and industry of this great country are so superior to those of most other nations of the world, that in general other nations are in our debt. The difficulty is to find some adequate return for the commodities we produce and they desire to obtain; and every new facility you offer for the introduction of their goods in some direction or other creates a corresponding extension of the export trade. Sir, this is a truth which seems to me to rest on the clearest and most obvious principles of the commonest arithmetic, and which it is utterly impossible to gainsay. And, if this is the case, I again say, what an extraordinary policy is yours, that because you are afraid other nations will not grant us greater facilities in paying for their goods, you refuse to receive the great advantage of an import trade which merely opening our ports must necessarily give us. For my own part, though I do not deny the extravagant duties maintained by foreign countries to be an evil, I think they are chiefly so in this sense—that they prevent those nations making the progress they ought in wealth and civilisation, and therefore render them less able to supply us with as large an amount of valuable commodities as we otherwise could obtain, and thus make our trade with them on the whole somewhat less considerable than it would otherwise be. This is the chief injury they thus inflict upon us; and, therefore, your course of policy is utterly unjustifiable—when because you are afraid extravagant duties will be still maintained by other countries, you refuse to your own population that relief which the right hon. Baronet himself admits would be the immediate effect of a relaxation of our duties. But then this brings me to another consideration. Suppose I admit to the fullest extent the right hon. Gentleman can maintain that it is an object to us to get the duties of foreign countries reduced—suppose I take the most exaggerated view of the greatness of that object—then I ask, not as an hypothetical question as to what possibly may occur, but as to the probability, on the right hon. Gentleman's own showing of events turning in our favour—I ask, I say, as a plain matter of fact, in the present circumstances of the country, what is the source of policy we should adopt if we wish to obtain a trade unfettered by extravagant duties on the one side or the other? I think, in considering this question, I have no little advantage in referring to what was stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It must be admitted, that he stated very distinctly that there were no grounds for anticipating the successful termination of commercial treaties with other countries. But I have still stronger authority than the right hon. Gentleman's words. I beg leave to appeal to experience. You have since the termination of the war been engaged in an unceasing course of negotiation; you have lost no opportunity of treating with other countries on this subject. Some of the most distinguished men which this country has produced—Mr. Canning, my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton, Lord Aberdeen, the Duke of Wellington, the right hon. Baronet opposite, Lord Sydenham—have been engaged for thirty years in attempts to negotiate advantageous commercial treaties with other countries. And, let me ask, what has been the result? Why, that at the end of that period you are worse off than when you commenced; for the right hon. Gentleman himself admits there is a growing tendency in foreign countries to throw obstacles in the way of the importation of goods the produce of this country, and the restrictions upon your trade it has been your object to get rid of, have been rendered more and more severe. This is the practical result. Now let me ask you, what do you think would have been the result if a different course had been pursued? Suppose at the Peace you had announced, "We shall enter into no negotiations, with the view of obtaining the admission of British produce by other nations at low rates of duty, we believe you (foreign countries) are able to judge of your own interests—we know what are ours, and we shall begin by reducing all our duties to as low a point as revenue considerations will admit of." Do you think if you had taken that course in 1815; if you had dealt on this principle with Brazilian sugar and Prussian corn, and Baltic timber—do you think, if beginning in 1815, you had continued to act on this wise, large, and liberal system of policy up to the present time, that the tariffs of foreign countries would exhibit their present exclusive character? Sir, I believe no man would contend that such would have been the case. What my hon. Friend asks by his Motion is—better late than never, adopt a policy which you should sooner have had recourse to. You see what has been the unhappy results of your past "laborious trifling" in this matter; pursue a wiser course for the future; teach other countries when they reduce the duties on British produce they are not giving an unfair advantage to England, but a boon to their own producers. Tell them, not by the inculcation of cold precept, but by a generous example, that the reduction of duties may indeed be an indirect advantage to those who produce the articles on which they are levied; but that the real principle on which the change is effected is, that the great proportion of gain accrues to those who are wise enough to effect it. Sir, this is the practical result of the Motion of my hon. Friend, and it involves no mere abstract proposition—the proposition it conveys, if ever there was one, is eminently practical and useful. And let me just observe to the House with what consistency the right hon. Gentleman resists this Motion as abstract, and resting on hypothetical and not practical grounds, when the right hon. Gentleman's argument from first to last amounts to this—"though I admit the general impolicy of commercial negotiations, and though it is not very probable, (the right hon. Gentleman well knows it is not), still it is possible a case may arise when we shall be able to conclude an advantageous treaty." He did give, I admit, an example to bear out his opinion—he instanced the Treaty of 1787. Now, I don't deny the advantage of that arrangement; and though I am a great admirer of Mr. Fox, I think, as a commercial Minister, Mr. Pitt was his superior. No party feeling shall ever prevent me from expressing that opinion. But I say, even of that treaty, though it was undoubtedly a good one, still had it never been concluded, better results would have followed, if without binding ourselves by any engagement, or seeking any in return, if we had made even more large and liberal concessions in favour of trade, and had left it to France to follow our example, I believe such a course would have had a more permanently beneficial effect on the trade of the country. The right hon. Gentleman's next example was the Treaty with Brazil; but he was himself obliged to give up this case as any instance of the success of a commercial negotiation, because, he says, that an unfair Treaty was imposed by Great Britain, in which, while we granted very little of what we called commercial advantages, we required from them a great deal, as the price which we made them pay for our political countenance. I think this the strongest condemnation of a treaty that ever was uttered. I firmly believe if, instead of driving a hard bargain with the Brazilians—if we had imposed no restrictions by treaty, if, instead of all this, we had liberally admitted her produce, and that she saw our political countenance was not given in a way which the right hon. Gentleman admits was no better than a bribe—I believe we should have had the full amount of commercial advantages which we have enjoyed from that time to this, and that now, in 1844, we should not object to a Brazilian treaty because she proposed a differential duty of 40 per cent. on our goods. But, Sir, further than this, I say I am "prepared to tie up the hands of the Government." I am prepared to lay down as a rule that commercial negotiations ought not to be entered into, because I should have great reliance on the success of the opposite policy, but only if it were acted on consistently and steadily, so as to shew that you were really guided by a plain and intelligible principle; your hope of getting more liberal principles gradually adopted towards you by foreign nations, depends upon their seeing that you are in earnest—that you do not disclaim Treaties when you think you cannot get them, but that you adopt a bonâ fide principle of dealing largely and liberally with all the world. If you do otherwise, if you allow it to appear that the prospect of a petty advantage in individual cases is a sufficient inducement to you to break through your rule and conclude what is commonly called a commercial Treaty; if you do this, other nations will consider that in disclaiming making reductions of duty matter of bargain as your general policy, you are like the fox in the fable, merely crying sour grapes, because you cannot reach them; but if you act on the principle I wish to see adopted, that you will enter into no commercial Treaties, no stipulations with foreign countries, and that you will proceed at once to the reduction of all duties on their goods, as far as your financial interests will allow, I am persuaded the result will be that the change will give such an immediate spring to your industry, that every restriction you remove will be the means of creating so great an extension of your export trade, that other nations—I do not say at once, but in the course of a few years—will see the wisdom of following your example. That fear of being overreached, so well and graphically described by the right hon. Gentleman as now influencing so much the conduct of foreign nations, will no longer be called into play. The monopolising interests—for example, the iron interest of France—will be no longer able to enlist in favour of their selfish interests the angry passions of a great portion of the community—the commercial policy of foreign countries will cease to be influenced by national antipathies; and in the course of a few years the practical effect of adopting the policy I recommend would be, that trade would be relieved from those extravagant rates of duty which foreign countries now impose. Then, Sir, I ask, is it a sufficient answer to me, when I wish to secure the general advantages of a liberal, generous, and manly, system of policy, which in order to be successful must be steadily and consistently adhered to, for the right hon. Gentleman to come here and say, "Don't tie up the hands of Government—it is not probable, but is possible, that a case may arise when I shall be able to conclude some commercial Treaty; but, for the sake of that faint probability, you must surrender those great advantages which it is now in your power to secure?" Sir, I say, the adoption of this Address by the House would be a most important step with reference to civilization. It would be a pledge in the face of Europe and the world, that this the first commercial nation of the universe is determined to give up the narrow and restrictive system of commercial policy. It would be a pledge binding on us for all future time, and, therefore, giving confidence to foreign countries, and holding out to them the strongest inducements to follow our example. I say, if a Government were in office entertaining the views which I am now recommending, I am prepared to contend, that instead of merely acting on them, they would do wisely if they themselves came forward and proposed some such Address as that now moved, in order that the House should deliberately sanction such a system of policy. I must also observe, that the Motion of my hon. Friend is at this moment peculiarly well-timed—in the first place, because it is brought on just when the fact is admitted that our long-drawn negotiations with four great commercial nations have utterly and lamentably failed, and that there is no prospect whatever of their being resumed with success. Now, therefore, is the time to pass such a Resolution. The ground is clear before you. You have given a trial of nearly thirty years to one system. You have failed—signally failed. The inference is natural—change your course. Give us as long a trial, and we might fairly win you to the opposite policy, before you despair of its results; but half or a quarter the time will satisfy me, and will furnish, in my opinion, the most decided proofs of the success of the liberal system. But I say the Motion is well timed in another sense; because I think it is impossible for any man to look about him in the present state of this country without seeing the urgent necessity of doing something for the extension and improvement of commerce. It is true distress is not so great as it was a year ago. I am most happy to believe that trade has revived to a great extent, and that there is, to a certain degree, a return to commercial prosperity; but I think no man who looks deeply into the state of things can fail to observe that our state is, on the whole, far from being satisfactory. Let me ask you, is it not clear that both wages and profits are ruinously low? That profits are low I think there is a pregnant proof in that financial measure of the Government which they have lately thought proper to propose. I agree entirely in the approbation expressed on this side as to the reduction of the interest on the Three-and-a-half per Cents.; but I confess I for one regard the high price of the funds, which rendered that operation practicable, as anything but a satisfactory indication of the state of the country. I think, so far from that, the high state of the funds is only a proof of the great difficulty of finding the means of a profitable investment of capital. But while there is a low state of profits, there is shown this state of things also—a low rate of wages. The hon. Member for Stockport adverted, in his most brilliant and unanswered speech on the subject of referring to a Committee the effect of prohibitory duties, on the condition of certain important classes of the population—in that speech, I say, he adverted to the miserably low rate of wages now received by the agricultural labourers of the south of England. The hon. Member justly and properly added for that he threw no blame on the employers—he said that rate did not at all depend on the employer; that the cause lay far deeper; but the fact is clear, you have this low rate of wages and profits, showing that the same state of things now exists as that which prevailed some years ago, and which was admirably described by Mr. Huskisson, when he said—"There was too great a pressure on the springs of productive industry." Sir, you have now that too great "pressure on the springs of industry." It is the difficulty which meets you in every quarter. It is that which meets you in the low wages of the Dorsetshire labourers, and in the miserable earnings of sempstresses in London, of which we have heard so much of late. It is the great difficulty to which the Government last night adverted, as being a bar to doing that which they themselves admitted to be so desirable. They told you, remember your own arguments: "there is at this moment so great a pressure on both wages and profits, they are now both screwed down to so low a point that we cannot afford to pass that measure of restriction as to the hours of labour for unprotected females which we admit to be exceedingly desirable." It is this "pressure on the springs of industry" which is at the bottom of your only available argument against a ten-hours' Bill. But that pressure which Mr. Huskisson adverted to, arose then, as it does now, from a deficiency in the employment of labour and capital. It is your restrictive laws which prevent that field from being enlarged as rapidly as the capital and population of the country enlarge: it is those restrictive laws which keep down profits and wages to their lowest possible point; and, therefore, I say it is those restrictive laws which it ought to be the first object of every man who really wishes for the well-being of the great body of the people to get rid of. As one of the important steps towards accomplishing that great object—as the first and most important that you can take in that direction, I concur in the principle announced by my hon. Friend, that the rule to be laid down in our commercial policy is not what is called "reciprocity of concession;" but that we ought at once, trusting the other nations will follow our example, to take into our serious consideration the means of consistently, and on general principles, reducing the rate of Custom duties so far as revenue considerations will admit.

Sir J. Hauser said, that as he took much interest in the inquiries to which this Motion related, and it was of concern to his constituents, he should follow the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Howick), to which he had listened attentively, with a few observations. He sincerely wished he could have agreed with the noble Lord, for if his arguments were as well and wisely founded as they were clearly and forcibly stated—if this were, indeed, a practical proposition and a true course of policy, we should have the consolation of thinking that great difficulties for the future would be removed from the path of those who had to govern this country—and so far from the conduct of its affairs tasking the abilities of Mr. Pitt, to whom as a commercial Minister the noble Lord had alluded, or those of any other of the great and eminent men who, from time to time since then had, with varied results, applied themselves to these questions, it would be easy for a man of the most ordinary mind, the man who was least versed in practical statesmanship, who looked most into a book, and least upon what was going on out of the room in which he was sitting—to attain the success which had been in some measure wanting up to this time, to arrange all the complications of commercial affairs, and to provide continually that increasing scope for their operation, which the increase of our powers demanded. He feared, however, that to adopt the policy which the noble Lord then recommended would not afford this consolation. The Motion was called a practical one; look then at the actual condition of the affairs of the world. Look to Russia, which he would mention first, because his constituents were greatly interested in that trade. If the principle of reciprocity were safely to be disregarded, he did not see what there was now to prevent a great increase in that trade; so many ships would not go out only in ballast to St. Petersburg; it would not be boasted in the state Gazette of St. Petersburg, as he had seen it, that taking two decennial periods, from 1814 to 1824, and from thence to 1834, there was an increase of vessels arriving in Russian ports in ballast, to the amount of 5,000 ships. That was stated by the Russian government writers, according to their notions, as an evidence of the prosperity of the Empire and the soundness of their commercial system. They thought it suited them, but did it suit us? No; for we were driven about from country to country, in order to buy something which did not come under the prohibitory duties of Russia, which overrode our manufactures, and we were subjected in our intercourse with that country to all the disadvantages of an indirect trade. Now, we should speedily be in the same position with all the world, if we did not regard as important the principle which the noble Lord would discard from the consideration of practical men. He was not, indeed, so much an advocate for reciprocity, as to say that we were to retaliate the Russian tariff. No; but why? The great bulk of our imports from Russia consisted of raw materials, afterwards used in our processes of re-production, in the production, one way or other, of those manufactures with which we had to go to the markets of the world, and to trade. That was a sufficient ground for not regulating our Tariff by the Russian one, but that afforded no general support to the general proposition of the hon. Member. Take, then, the case of France, where the noble Lord, in despair of a Commercial Treaty, would have us regulate our own Tariff without the least regard to theirs. If there were any productions of France—oils or otherwise—which could be of use in advancing our manufactures, and on which the present duty required to be reduced, he would say at once reduce it; let such articles be received in the English Custom-houses at no duty at all, or at the lowest practical rate of revenue duty. If, again, there were any commodities of France in the importation of which the smuggler defeated the fair trader, and so subjected to disadvantage equally the revenue and the British producer, then he would say, upon the principle of the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel), developed in that great course of practical education he had given them two years ago, reduce that rate of duty, irrespective of the duties of France, because in that case it is the smuggler that you have to contend with and not the foreign Government. But take the case of French brandies and French wines, which it was often said we should take at lower rates, upon the principle maintained by the noble Lord. If we sent cloth to Bordeaux in exchange for these, and suffered that cloth to be unfavourably taxed to pay a heavy rate of duty before it was admitted into the foreign market, the rate of duty must fall somehow upon the labour which produced that cloth. We should have to pay increased quantities of the cloth in order to buy the wine, and, therefore, however, the wine-drinker might enjoy his commodity at a cheaper rate, the cloth manufacturer would be taxed for his enjoyment. And this was the answer (well put in a number of the Foreign and Colonial Quarterly Review last autumn), to those who said, with the noble Lord, that broad considerations of public and general advantage dictated a disregard of foreign tariffs, and the adoption of some such vague sweeping proposition as was then before the House, by which all means of ever moderating those Tariffs would be thrown away. Then look at America—the hon. Member for Stockport advocated the disregard of the American Tariff, or of any treaty with America, in respect of corn. But if we did this, and if we cared not for treaties with America, and if the hon. Gentleman had his corn at his command brought in duty free from the wide regions of the Mississippi; and if, by means of this he had diminished his cost of production, which was his object, and then thought himself in a better condition to meet competition for his cotton goods in the markets of America, what was to hinder the Americans, bound by no treaty, by no stipulations, from immediately raising their duties, already 30 to 40 per cent. to 100 per cent; or such a rate as would countervail the advantage which the hon. Gentleman would thus vainly strive after, and would vanish as soon as it was attained. The noble Lord talked of imports and not exports being the measure of national prosperity, but surely the rate at which we were to buy the imports was of some consequence in this argument. The imports were bought by the exports, and if those exported goods were to be liable to hostile tariffs more and more, by dint of disregarding treaty stipulations, it would have some sensible effect upon national prosperity measured by the noble Lord's own rule. He well remembered what was said on this subject in 1833, by a Gentleman of great authority, now in the other House of Parliament—by one who had rendered great services to his country—but perhaps never more so than when he had stated in either House of Parliament the result of his manifold, long-continued, and various experience—he meant Lord Ashburton. He well remembered hearing that noble Lord arguing in favour of the principle now attacked, as it was attacked then, and when the President of the Board of Trade of that day (Lord Sydenham) taunted him with a paragraph in the celebrated London petition of 1821, which had been drawn up by Mr. Tooke, and presented and vehemently supported by Lord Ashburton, he replied that paragraph had not, in his own sense, nor in the sense of the other London merchants, anything like the vague meaning which was attempted to be given to it; but that it strictly applied to a vast and incredible amount of impediments to trade, which had grown up during the war, and which it was proper in the newly-restored and happier state of things to remove. Shew him (Sir J. Hanmer) such impediments now, and his aid would not be wanting to remove them. The noble

Lord, however, (Lord Howick) had said something derogatory to the position taken up by those who, desiring the extension of commerce, and not seldom speaking in its behalf, yet suffered themselves to be stopped and impeded as he thought, and who were not prepared to adopt what he called practical policy. The practical nature of the policy was denied; but upon this subject, he would for himself say, that he was well aware of all those deep-rooted necessities which pressed on the consideration of the extension of the commerce of the country. He knew the increase of the population; he knew the want of employment; he knew the effect of competition of labour, and of capital, compressed into too narrow a sphere. He was anxious ever to extend the scope, and so to lessen the pressure, and standing there himself a landed proprietor, but possessed of no inconsiderable share of the confidence of one of the great industrious communities of the country, he had given no narrow consideration to these things. But he did not agree with the noble Lord, nor did his constituents agree, that to disregard the tariffs of foreign countries was the wise and practical mode of advancing the prosperity of our own. He always had a respect for the noble Lord, on account of the clear and forcible way in which he advanced his arguments, but they were not well-founded, and must receive his opposition, for it mattered little whether we should follow the semi-barbarous policy of Turkey, and discourage exports altogether, or whether we suffered them to be discouraged, by neglecting the tariffs by which they were to be received by foreign powers.

Mr. Hume said attempts had already been made to accomplish the extension of our commerce by the ordinary mode of concluding reciprocity treaties; these had been continued for some years, but without success, and the House was now asked to say whether the mode proposed by his hon. Friend was not better. It had never been said that we were not placed at a disadvantage by the conduct of those foreign nations who levied high duties on our exports, nor that a treaty of complete reciprocity would not be beneficial. But the question was, would the House maintain our present system, which prevented us from doing any thing to extend our commerce, or try another method by which something might be gained, and by which we might obtain concessions from countries that now would not consent to them. Look at the effects of our present system. Four years ago Government agreed to receive French brandies at a duty of 14s. a gallon, instead of 22s. 6d., and wine at 3s. 6d. instead of 5s. 10d.; but in consequence of the occurrence of some political fracas, the treaty was broken off, and we had consequently been deprived during all that time of the benefits which it would have secured to us. To pursue this system, was to make the legislation of Great Britain, the greatest commercial country in the world, dependent upon that of its neighbours, perhaps the most paltry countries of Europe. We had agreed to a treaty with Portugal, by which the duty on its wines was to be reduced; but because Portugal would not admit our woollens at a certain rate, it was given up, and we had lost the advantages which the alteration would have conferred. We ought to act with reference to our own commercial and financial interest, and not that of other nations.

The hon. Gentleman was proceeding, when the House was counted out, and adjourned at a quarter to eight o'clock.

INTERMENT.] Mr. E. Turner, pursuant to notice, put the question to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Government intended to submit to the House of Commons any general plan of Cemetery Interment?

Sir J. Graham said, that more than one question had been put upon this subject during the course of the present Session. He did not exactly understand the question put by the hon. Member, but he might state that it was not the intention of Government to prohibit interment in towns in ancient churchyards where the ancestors of those who had the right of interment there had been buried.

COUNTY CORONERS.] The Report on the County Coroners' Bill was brought up, and the Bill re-committed.

House in Committee.

Mr. Scott, on the sixth Clause, objected, that the effect of it would be to take away the right of election from those in whom it was at present vested, and place it in the hands of those who were qualified to vote for knights of the shire. He would, therefore, move for the omission of the words "knights of the shire," and the insertion of the word "coroners."

The Committee divided on the question that the words "knights of the shire" stand part of the Clause—Ayes 45; Noes 70: Majority 25.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS.] On the question that the Masters and Servants' Bill be re-committed,

Mr. Hawes called the attention of the Government to the fact, that the Clauses were of a very large and comprehensive character, and gave to the Magistracy some extremely harsh powers.

Sir J. Graham said, that when the hon. Member had consulted him on the subject of this Bill, he had expressed an opinion that it would be well to bring into a focus all the Acts of Parliament relating to Master and Servant. He had understood that in doing so, the hon. Gentleman intended to extend to Magistrates a power as concerned work done under contract. To that he had no objection, and further, than that he had understood that the Bill would not alter the law. He had not had time, however, to read all the Clauses of the measure, and the hon. Mover could best state whether there was anything new in the Bill, or whether it was simply a re-enactment?

Mr. Miles said, that this Bill repealed all the existing Acts, and re-enacted their provisions, extending the power of Magistrates just so far as the right hon. Baronet had explained. He could assure the House, that he did not propose by this Bill to give any new power to magistrates.

Mr. T. Duncombe referred to clause 4, and observed, that a case occurred not long ago in which a female servant, employed by a farmer, had to go through the bed-room of a man-servant to her own room. She objected to do so—left her employer, and was taken before a magistrate, who said it was his duty to execute the law—and committed her to prison. He did not think any magistrate, who did not consider it compulsory on him to carry into effect the law, would have imprisoned a woman who absented herself from her employment for such a reason; and he thought some provision ought to be introduced into this Bill to meet such cases.

Mr. Miles wished to make the law as stringent with regard to the master as the servant.

Bill to be re-committed.

House in Committee.

On clause 1,

Mr. D. Barclay said, he had given notice of an Amendment on the Clause relating to domestic servants. It was not his object to give masters and mistresses more power over their servants than they already possessed, but to afford greater facilities to servants for the recovery of their wages. At present domestic servants had no means of recovering their wages by summary process; and he wished to give power to Magistrates in petty sessions to adjudicate on such cases. He proposed to give this power only to Magistrates in petty sessions, in order that no abuse might take place. He made this proposal, in consequence of strong representations he had received from the mayor and magistrates of Sunderland, pointing out the hardship which, in this respect, resulted from the existing law. They stated, that the sudden discharge of female domestic servants placed them frequently in circumstances of great misery and destitution, and, in many cases drove them to prostitution. He would therefore propose after clause 9, to introduce these words—

"Be it further enacted, that the provisions of this Act shall authorise magistrates in petty sessions assembled, and they are hereby authorised, to act in cases of disputes between masters and mistresses and domestic servants, with respect to claims for wages and other compensation for services rendered by such domestic servants."

Sir J. Graham suggested to the hon.

Member that he should now allow the Bill to go through Committee, and gave notice of his intention to propose such a Clause, on bringing up the Report. The Clause might then be printed, and he (Sir J. Graham) would give it his best consideration. He thought, however, that the limitation of the jurisdiction of magistrates, as proposed by the hon. Member, to cases of disputes as to wages, being so far in favour of the servants, might form some ground of objection to the Clause.

Clause agreed to.

THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. ANNUITIES BILL. Lord Campbell rose to call the attention of the House to what he considered to be one of the most unreasonable occurrences he ever recollected in Parliament. He alluded to the unjustifiable delay in giving the Royal Assent to the Three-and-a-half per Cent. Annuities Bill, a Bill which was read a third time and passed in their Lordships' House on Tuesday last. The operation of that Bill affected no less than 250,000,000*l.* of the debt of this country. By that Bill certain terms were offered to the parties holding the stock to induce them to consent to the proposition made by Government for its conversion; in the event of their dissenting from that proposition, the Bill reserved to them the right of expressing that dissent, and they were to be paid at par. The clauses in the Bill for that purpose provided that dissents should be signified on or before the 23d day of this present month of March. He guessed, from what had fallen on a former occasion from a noble Earl (Ripon) not then in his place, that it would be inconvenient to allow a long period to elapse between passing the Bill and the term in which dissents should be signified. But surely some fair portion of time should be allowed for that purpose, otherwise it was a pure mockery. The Bill was read a third time (the Committee having been negatived,) and passed on Tuesday last; and he had no doubt that Her Majesty's Ministers would have advised Her Majesty to issue a Commission to give the Royal Assent to the Bill on Wednesday. Had that been done, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday would have been allowed to the public for expressing their dissent; but there had been no Commission on Wednesday, and the Bill could not receive the Royal Assent, or become the law of the land, until to-morrow, if Her Majesty should be pleased to issue a Commission for that purpose. This Bill dealt with a sum of 250,000,000*l.*, and affected the interests of 100,000 shareholders. It could not become law, it could not receive the Royal Assent till some time to-morrow, which would leave only a few hours for the 100,000 stockholders, many of whom resided a great distance off, to notify their dissent. If the terms had been ever so unfavourable, no opportunity, beyond a few hours on Saturday, was afforded for the expression of dissent. The terms offered by the Government on this occasion were, no doubt, liberal, and the dissentients were likely to be few, if any; but an opportunity ought to have been given the parties concerned to consider whether they would accept of those terms, or prefer being paid off at par. Proper forms ought to be adhered to in important matters of this kind. The same thing might be done, under different circumstances, when some future Minister might wish to reduce the National Debt, and who might offer such terms that parties might be desirous of being paid off; and the stockholder be thus deprived of the opportunity of expressing his dissent. It might in that case be said, that in the month of March, 1844, 250,000,000*l.* were dealt with in this manner:—The Bill authorising the alteration did not receive the Royal Assent till four o'clock on Friday, and Saturday alone was given to the stockholders to intimate dissent. This was a most dangerous precedent; and he called on their Lordships to consider whether it would not also expose this country to misrepresentation among foreign nations. They had always prided themselves on keeping strict faith with the national creditor; but would they consider that faith was kept with the public creditor, when an opportunity was denied to him for the expression of dissent, and when it might, in consequence, be almost said that he was compelled to accept the terms offered to him? This had happened very unfortunately and very unnecessarily, and he wished for an explanation of the delay which had occurred.

The Lord Chancellor: I can only say, that I intended to have a Commission on Thursday (this day), but I received an intimation from the House of Commons, that it would be more convenient to-morrow. Although in point of law there could be no dissent until after the Bill had received the Royal Assent, yet practically dissent in three cases had been given, and, he believed, more were not expected.

Lord Campbell said a specific mode was pointed out for expressing dissent. That course alone could be pursued, and it could not be effected till the Bill had received the Royal Assent. The time, therefore, for dissenting was confined to a few hours on Saturday, while the Bank Books were open.

Lord Montagu believed that no practical inconvenience was likely to arise from this delay, because he thought that the terms were, on the whole, so advantageous to the shareholders that there would be very few dissentients. But the question was, whether the course taken by the Government in this instance was exactly fair to the holders of this stock; and whether, if it were adopted on other occasions of a similar nature, it might not operate most disadvantageously to the holders of stock? In that point of view, the subject was certainly one of much importance, and he was glad that his noble and learned Friend had called their Lordships' attention to it. It was a transaction in which the Government were releasing the State, on certain conditions, from obligations previously contracted by the State, and every part of the agreement with the stockholders ought to be fairly carried out. He was glad that the subject was mentioned now, that parties hereafter might not be led to apprehend

BOARD OF CHARITABLE BEQUESTS—(IRELAND).] The Marquis of Normanby had, he said, three Petitions to present; and to one of these he was particularly desirous of calling the attention of the noble Duke opposite. He had already referred to the constitution of the Charity Boards in Ireland, and he had now to show a neglect of duty on their parts. Such neglect was stated in the Petition that he then held in his hand. He did not mean to go into all the particulars detailed in that Petition; but the facts were briefly these:—The Petitioner stated that Thomas Willdridge, in the year 1819, bequeathed the profit rents of certain houses in Dublin, to be distributed amongst the poor of Dublin. The money to be so distributed, was 1,000*l.* a year. A suit in Chancery had been instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether certain towns were included in the bequest. A receiver was appointed in the year 1822; his conduct was complained of, and in 1828 there had been a final decree; but from 1828 up to this time there had not been one step taken by the Board of Charitable Bequests to apply the money so bequeathed for the benefit of the poor of Dublin to its proper object. It was reported by the Master, in 1840, that there was not more than 1,000*l.* now in hand, though it was declared by the next of kin that the rents received amounted to 24,000*l.* Not one step had been taken since 1828, so that up to this time 23,000*l.* had been squandered, and there was only 1,000*l.* in hand. If the facts contained in this Petition were correct, he could not but contrast the zeal exhibited by the members of this Board, in what they conceived to be the cause of orthodoxy, which zeal interfered with the education of seventy poor children, who were receiving a system of instruction sanctioned by the clergyman of a parish—he could not, he said, but contrast the zeal where so small a sum as 7*l.* 10*s.* was involved, with the neglect exhibited for the receipt of 1,000*l.* a year, when that sum was to be allocated for the benefit of the poor of Dublin.

The Duke of Wellington: Let me have a copy of the Petition.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.] The

Lord Chancellor said, that he now rose to call their Lordships' attention to the Second Reading of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. This question had, at different times, been submitted to their Lordships' consideration. There was little of novelty in it, and in what he should have to state on the subject, in pointing out the general scope and nature of this Bill, it would not be necessary for him for that purpose to occupy many minutes of their Lordships' time. It might be convenient, however, that he should call their Lordships' attention for a short time to the history of these proceedings. It would be in their recollection, that in the year 1829, a Commission was appointed to consider the constitution of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the general administration of justice by those tribunals. He had the honour, as a Member of His Majesty's Government at that period, of proposing the appointment of that Commission. The Commission made its report in the following year. The Commissioners consisted of several right rev. Prelates, some of whom were now present, and of many eminent persons in the various Courts of Law and Equity, and in the Ecclesiastical tribunals of this country. They considered the subject very fully and very minutely, and the result of their labours was a very comprehensive and talented report, drawn up with great ability and great judgment as he, (the Lord Chancellor) had reason to believe, by the Judge of the Consistorial Court, and that Report was afterwards presented to the House. Nothing was done immediately upon the recommendation of that Commission; but in the year 1833, a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed, for the purpose of again investigating the subject. The Report of the Commission was submitted to its consideration, and some of the Members of the Commission were examined before it as witnesses—he should mention particularly his late noble and learned Friend Lord Tenterden, and the present Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. That Committee made its Report, corresponding, however, not entirely with the Report of the Commission, but in substance it accorded with that Report. In consequence of these proceedings, and the inquiries which formed the source of them, a Bill was introduced into that House by his noble and Learned Friend (Lord Brougham) who at that time held the Great Seal. The object of that Bill was to carry into effect the Report of the Commission. He (the Lord Chancellor) did not know precisely for what reason, but the fact was, that that Bill, after it had proceeded to a certain stage, was not prosecuted further. In the year 1835, after his noble and learned Friend had left office (he thought he was correct in that respect) the same Bill or a similar Bill with some alterations and modifications, was presented by another noble and learned Friend, who, in introducing it, made a very full statement of all the circumstances which had led to the proposed alteration of the law. Nothing, however, took place on that Bill, and he presumed for this reason, that almost contemporaneously with the bringing in of that Bill, Sir F. Pollock, who by that time had succeeded to the office of Attorney General, had brought in a Bill on the same subject in the House of Commons. He said that Sir F. Pollock asked leave to bring in a Bill. Whether or not, that Bill was brought in in consequence of the permission which was given, he was not in a condition to inform their Lordships; but almost immediately afterwards that hon. and learned Gentleman resigned his office, and afterwards his noble and learned Friend who was now sitting at the Table (Lord Campbell), and who succeeded to the office of Attorney General in the Government which was then formed, he also introduced a Bill corresponding in substance, or nearly so, with the Bill which had been brought in or suggested by his predecessors. That Bill was brought into the House in June. It was founded not entirely on the Report of the Commission, but rather on the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, which deviated from the Report of the Commission in a particular to which he should presently have to call their Lordships' attention. Though that Bill was introduced in the month of June 1835, and although Parliament continued its sittings until the month of August in that year, no further proceedings took place in respect of it. Why that course was pursued by his noble and learned Friend he was not in a condition to explain. He apprehended that his noble and learned Friend felt some difficulties in his way; which induced him to abandon the measure for that Session. In the following year, 1836, the noble and learned Lord who preceded him in office (Lord Cottenham) introduced a similar Bill into this House. That Bill was read a first, and was read a second time and it was referred to a Committee, and a Report was made on it; but owing to some cause which his noble and learned Friend had not explained to him, and which he was, therefore, unable to communicate to their Lordships, that Bill proceeded no further. That measure was also abandoned, and he (the Lord Chancellor) apprehended that it was abandoned in consequence of some difficulties which his noble and learned Friend anticipated in some other place, for considering the important nature of the subject, he was convinced that his noble and learned Friend would not have abandoned it, unless he felt it to be impossible to carry it through Parliament. Thus the matter rested. His noble and learned Friend during the time that he continued in office, until 1841, never resumed that measure, and he (the Lord Chancellor) could only explain that course of proceeding on the part of his noble and learned Friend in this way—for, knowing what he did of his industry and his desire to accomplish every improvement in the law which he thought practicable, it must have been from the conviction on the mind of his noble and learned Friend, that it would be impossible for him, with any reasonable prospect of success, to have carried that measure into law. This brought him to the last attempt which had been made by the Legislature on this most interesting and important subject. He meant the proceedings which took place in the other House last Session. A Bill, in part the same, extending as far as the measure of his noble and learned Friend's did, was brought into the other House of Parliament under the auspices, in fact, by a Member of Her Majesty's Government. That Bill was debated on the Second Reading with great ability on both sides. An adjourned debate took place, and though the Second Reading was carried, the circumstances were such as, he had reason to know, to make it impossible to carry the Bill in the shape in which it had been presented to the House. It was modified for the Committee—alterations were made—essential alterations in the structure of the Bill, to which he should have to advert, were made, and it was referred pro forma, to a Committee, but the Session had arrived at such a period that it was impossible to carry it through that Session of Parliament, and the measure was not further proceeded with. Under these circumstances, he now felt it his duty to submit that measure, so modified, to their Lordships' consideration. He had thought it important to give this history of the Commission—of the Committee of the House of Commons, and of the various attempts that had been made by various Administrations, and in both Houses of Parliament, to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners. These attempts had hitherto failed, but he was desirous of carrying these recommendations into effect (though he believed it was impossible to carry all their recommendations into effect), and he wished to go as far as he could towards reforming the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts by carrying into effect the Report of the Commissioners. He thought that their Lordships would concur with him in thinking, that nothing could be done for the improvement of the Ecclesiastical jurisdiction beyond that which he could now recommend to their adoption. If they thought that the measure was good—if they thought that any advantage would be derived from the proposal, he entreated them not now to reject it, because it did not, at first sight, appear to accomplish all that they were desirous of obtaining. He would now call their attention to the details of the measure. They were simple, but some of them were very important—first, with respect to the constitution of the Ecclesiastical Courts, it was proposed by this Bill to carry into effect the recommendation for the union of the Archbishopial Courts, which were known respectively by the names of the Arches Court and the Prerogative Court. This recommendation had proceeded both from the Commission and the Committee of the House of Commons. Nothing could be said in objection to this proposal, at least, as he apprehended. These two Courts were presided over habitually, though not necessarily, by the same Judge, they were attended by the same Bar, they were held in the same hall, and, for all practical purposes, they must be considered one Court. They were, however, at present, distinct Courts, and by uniting them a great advantage would accrue to the public. As long as they were divided these Courts had two sets of magisterial officers, but, by uniting them one set of officers would be dispensed with, and this would tend to release the public from a considerable charge, and, therefore, he apprehended there could be no objection to this proposal. He proposed also by this Bill to adopt the same course precisely with respect to the Courts at York. These Courts were subject to the same objection. This also was recommended by the Commissioners. He proposed, therefore, that there should be one Archbishopial Court at York, and one Court of the same description at Canterbury. The next point was the Diocesan Courts. Their Lordships were aware that every Diocese in the kingdom had a Court for Probate and for contentious jurisdiction in Ecclesiastical matters. These Courts were coeval with the existence of the British Constitution. Justice had been administered in them in all times in the matters to which he had referred. He proposed that these Courts should be continued. It was recommended by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the contrary, that they should be abolished. It would be for their Lordships to say whether they would sanction a Bill for continuing these ancient tribunals of the country. It was said, that they imperfectly performed their duties; that they were not presided over by persons qualified to administer justice, and various objections were taken to their constitution. It did not appear to him to be a satisfactory reason to say that these ancient Courts should be abolished because some abuses might have crept into them. If the persons who presided over them were not duly qualified, in reference to the law which they had to administer, it was competent for their Lordships to rectify that evil. If there were any other imperfections in the working of these Courts, would not the same remark again apply? There could be no reason for abolishing these local Courts, which had existed for so long a period, if, by removing the present abuses and imperfections, they could be rendered competent to discharge all the duties with which they were entrusted. It was a part of this measure, not merely to continue these Courts, but to render them more efficient, by appointing individuals to preside over them duly qualified to administer the Ecclesiastical Law—either Advocates properly qualified or members of the other Courts of Justice in this country, duly qualified to administer justice impartially and correctly between the suitors in these Courts. This was one of the objects of the Bill, and he intreated their Lordships to consider well before they consented to abolish these tribunals; and, at all events, before they did so, to be thoroughly satisfied that they could not remodel them so as to make them advantageous for the public. Was there no alteration in the constitution of these Courts—no change in the character of the individuals who would preside over them—could no amendments be made which would make them more efficient for the purpose for which they were established? If they thought that this could not be effected, why then abolish them; but if, on the other hand, on a consideration of the whole of the proceedings, they should be of opinion, that with persons qualified to preside over them, and with proper subordinate officers, justice could be impartially and effectively administered by them, he must call upon their Lordships to continue these tribunals. There was another set of Courts very widely scattered throughout the kingdom, which he must class under the general description of Peculiars. Some of these either belonged to the Crown, some to the Archbishops, or to the Bishops, or to Deans, or to Rectors, or in some instances, even, to private individuals. These Courts were in number between 300 or 400. They were scattered all over the country, exercising the same jurisdiction, but restricted within narrow and confined limits. The objection to them was, that they had so little business—that the emoluments derived from them were so small—that it was impossible that they could be presided over by persons competent to administer justice properly between the suitors; it was also impossible to expect that the ministerial officers themselves could be well qualified, for it required a considerable degree of practice and experience to qualify parties for the discharge of ministerial duties in the administration of this branch of the law. These Courts had jurisdiction in granting Probates—in granting Letters of Administration—and as to all the contentious jurisdiction belonging to the Ecclesiastical Law. In many instances, in granting Probates or Letters of Administration, there was no controversy whatever—there was no contest—and consequently there was no person to watch the proceedings; there was no person to check any irregularity, or to inform the officer where he was ignorant. There might be what was called “truth in the common form,” but the proceedings were ex parte. Ignorance on the part of the officer might, therefore, to a most important extent, affect both the rights of property and the rights of parties. But on this point he need not enter more into detail. His proposal was, to abolish all these Courts. This proposal had been recommended by the Commissioners; it had formed part of every Bill that had been introduced on the subject, and he was sure that their Lordships could have no objection to it. Then how would the system stand? In appearance, at least, he must submit most admirable. In every diocese throughout this kingdom there would be one tribunal for the purpose of dispensing law, for the purposes which he had mentioned. In the provinces of York and Canterbury there would be appellate tribunals, which would keep the law steady and uniform. That was the system which he recommended, and if they could get the law well administered, and if they could get able judges, as the heads of these tribunals, it did not appear to him that any superior system could be established. He must admit that in what he was now stating he was acting adversely to the opinions of the Commissioners, to the opinions of the Committee of the House of Commons, and to the sentiments of many persons for whose views of the subject he entertained the very highest respect. What, therefore, he stated, he stated with some hesitation. He did not give his opinion as one which ought to outweigh the opinions which he had referred to, but he was stating that if he had the power to abolish these Diocesan Courts, he ought to consider for a longer time whether by so doing he should be adopting a reasonable course of proceeding. But he had no such authority—he had no such power. He knew a noble and learned Friend of his who would support him. He meant his noble and learned Friend at the Table (Lord Campbell). He was proud to believe that, for he knew no man more steady, more constant, more firm, more unwavering, in any opinion which he had once deliberately expressed, and expressed after opportunities of full deliberation and inquiry, than his noble and learned Friend; and he knew that his noble and learned Friend, when Sir F. Pollock, as Attorney-General, brought in this Bill, one object of which was to abolish these Diocesan Courts, that proceeding was protested against by his noble and learned Friend. His noble and learned Friend said that he never could consent to such a course. He said that the systems of centralisation might be carried too far; that these courts were of great accommodation, and a great facility to persons residing in the provinces, and that to bring all the proceedings to London would be a dangerous and mischievous measure. He knew, from the usual sources of information, that his noble and learned Friend made use of these expressions. He also knew from communications which he had had with persons who were present in the House at the time, that these were the sentiments expressed by his noble and learned Friend—and as he had before stated, he had so much experience of the constancy of his noble and learned Friend—of his firmness and his devoted perseverance in any opinion which he had once held, that he was convinced he should receive his support in carrying the measure which had been introduced to-night. But it was not upon the authority of his noble and learned Friend alone that he rested his support of this measure. He referred to another authority—he meant the authority of Lord Stowell, than whom there could be no greater authority in this country—a man who was most deeply learned in Ecclesiastical Law, and who was most profoundly conversant with every part of this subject. He thought that he (the Lord Chancellor) was in the House of Commons—he knew that one of his noble and learned Friends was—when Lord Stowell introduced his Bill on this subject; and what were the objects of that Bill? He proposed to maintain the Courts of the two Provinces and the Diocesan Courts, but he proposed to abolish all those Courts he (the Lord Chancellor) had designated under the general name of Peculiars. In fact, it was an outline of the Bill which he was now submitting to the House. There was really something whimsical in the course which was pursued by those persons who were opposed to the continuance of these Diocesan Courts. He heard on every side clamours for local tribunals, for bringing law and justice to every man's door. Here they found a system established which accomplished that object in reference to one important branch of law. That was the system established, and they were asked to proceed in an inverted order, and to abolish these Courts. Instead of altering these local tribunals they should endeavour to reform them. Make the experiment. As wise statesmen and legislators they should not overturn that which was established until they were satisfied that they could substitute for the existing system something better. He had had some experience—he had seen systems overturned, and other systems adopted in lieu of them; but in few instances had been realised the views of those who supported the alteration. Such was the infirmity of human nature, difficulties, objections, and obstructions which had not been before anticipated, and had not been guarded against, were found to attach themselves to the new system, which generally in its details was found to work imperfectly and disjointedly, and the measures which were found necessary to adjust it, the trouble, the time, the expense, and the anxiety, if applied to the old system which had been subverted, would in most cases have accomplished the object wished for more completely, more satisfactorily, and, in all probability, with less trouble and expense. He had thus stated shortly what the nature of this Bill was, as far as related to the alteration of the jurisdiction. He had stated the limits within which it was proposed to confine it. He must state that it was not open for him to decide in his own mind which was the best system, for he was satisfied that the system recommended by this Bill was the only one that was practicable. An attempt to do more might frustrate the object that they all desired, and they ought not, like forward children, to reject that which was offered to them, because there was something else which it was impossible for them to obtain. He would now state the minor objects of the Bill, which, trifling as they might appear, were really of considerable practical importance. One point recommended by the Commissioners was the alteration of the law with respect to "donatives." Their Lordships were aware that, in reference to a donative the Clerk was appointed to the Church by the authority of the grantor. It was not at all necessary that he should be presented to the Bishop, for institution or induction, and, when he was presented to the Church, the Bishop had no authority over him, and he was not bound to attend to the visitation of the ordinary. One of the objects of the Bill, therefore, was to place donatives on the same footing as "presentative benefices." This would make the system more uniform, and there would be no person in the Church who would be exempt from the jurisdiction of superior Ecclesiastical authority. Another subject to which the Bill referred was that of Tithes. Their Lordships knew that the Ecclesiastical Courts had jurisdiction with respect to Tithes. It was, however, a very limited jurisdiction, and it was one subject to the constant interference of the Courts of Common Law, and great inconvenience was unavoidably the consequence. It was therefore proposed, in conformity with the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to take away this part of their jurisdiction, for the cases relative to Tithes which could come before them had already been greatly reduced by the operation of the Tithe Commutation Act. Another subject to which the Bill related was the power of sequestration. The object of the Bill was to give relief to all those difficulties and obstacles which beset that branch of the Ecclesiastical Law; and to put the whole system in that respect upon one simple and intelligible footing. He had now stated all the alterations proposed to be effected by the measure. The main question upon it would, he was aware, arise on the subject of the Diocesan Courts. But with respect to another subject which he considered of the greatest importance, and which had just been suggested to him by his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Brougham)—namely, the system of bona notabilia, he should take leave to add a few words. By the Ecclesiastical Law, as it at present existed, any tribunal granting the power of Probate to a Will within the limits of its jurisdiction, was powerless if the testator left any sum above 5*l.* in any other jurisdiction, and the parties to whom the devise was made would have to apply to the Prerogative Court. That course was attended with great inconvenience and expense—and that inconvenience was all the greater, because a Probate granted in ignorance of the fact would be altogether void for the parties. There was no disposition on his part to disguise that fact. But there were at present 350 Courts of Peculiars, to each and all of which that difficulty applied, and from which that mischief resulted. All these, however, were proposed to be swept away by the Bill before their Lordships, and the jurisdiction in the matter of bona notabilia confined entirely to the Courts of the Diocese, each of which was to have it over a great extent of country. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham) had said, that there were nice questions of law sure to arise on the subject of bona notabilia, but he (Lord Lyndhurst) could not agree with him on that point. Nice questions as to fact might arise he would freely admit, but all questions of law which could arise on it had been long since settled by a variety of decisions. The only difficulty, therefore, would be, as to the facts; as there would be none as to the law. He (Lord Lyndhurst) admitted that the way to get rid entirely of the inconvenience that existed respecting bona notabilia would be to abolish altogether the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Courts. But then the question arose whether, in doing so, too high a price would not be paid in proportion to the advantage that would be gained by the community. Frankly he was of opinion that such would be the case. With the Bill which he had introduced to their Lordships, he did not think that the evil complained of in that respect would be felt to any great or serious extent; and, under any circumstances, he was of opinion that there were ways and means of averting it. For instance, it might be enacted, that if measures were not taken to set aside a Probate within a given time, that Probate should be considered in law as valid; and it might also be made law, that all acts of the party to whom such Probate was granted should be considered valid until that Probate had been set aside. Those provisions would correspond with the clause in the Bill by which all void or voidable Probates were to be sanctioned until they should have been superseded. Those were the views he (Lord Lyndhurst) took of the question. He was quite satisfied that the measure, as it stood, was advantageous and important to the public at large, and he, therefore, intreated their Lordships to pass it into a law. If their Lordships thought, on further consideration of the subject in Committee, that they could safely adopt the suggestions and plan contained in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commission on the point last mentioned, it would be perfectly competent for them to strike out the clause affecting it, and substitute whatever else they chose in its place. But he advised them not to do so without exercising the utmost caution; and, above all, not to attempt it unless they were fully satisfied, after the most careful and diligent inquiry into the subject, that the Establishment of the Diocesan Courts on an enlarged and improved footing, was not advantageous to the community, and that these jurisdictions, by the appointment of able judges, were not capable of being made fit instruments in the discharge of their duty, namely, in administering properly the Ecclesiastical Law of the country. Under these circumstances, he should move the second reading of the Bill by their Lordships.

Lord Cottenham said, he had certainly felt some curiosity to know the ground upon which his noble and learned Friend was about to ask their Lordships to assent to the principle of the maintenance of all the Diocesan Courts, and when his noble and learned Friend stated that it was impossible to carry any other measure than that now proposed, he was more surprised, because it could not be for want of Parliamentary power either in that or the other House, that the Government would be prevented from carrying a different measure. There might be inconveniences and difficulties into which he should not further inquire, which made his noble and learned Friend unwilling to abolish these Courts, and even induced him to bestow a panegyric upon them, although condemned by everybody who had investigated the subject, at least for the last twelve years, for such was the effect of the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the real Property Commissioners, a Committee of the House of Commons, a Select Committee of their Lordships' House—all concurring in this, that the abolition of the Diocesan Courts was essentially necessary, and with a view to any real improvement in the administration of the Ecclesiastical Law. His noble and learned Friend had been a party to the inquiries that were made, and must have concurred in the opinions expressed. He must have been of the same opinion at the conclusion of the last Session of Parliament, and what had changed his opinion and converted him into a strenuous advocate of those Courts, he had not informed the House. Their Lordships were aware that the Ecclesiastical Courts had jurisdiction in all matrimonial questions, and over all testamentary documents and letters of administration, and in what way as the system existed, were these important questions decided? By 340 different Courts, not all having the same extent of jurisdiction, but all of them having jurisdiction of a similar nature in these important matters. His noble and learned Friend had stated good reasons why some of those minor Courts should not be allowed to exist; but his noble and learned Friend did not bear in mind that the same reasons which he had himself advanced for the abolition of the minor Courts applied to the Diocesan Courts, and that the panegyric which he bestowed upon the one ought to be extended to the other. The Peculiar Courts were ancient as well as the Diocesan Courts, and if antiquity was a merit, they possessed it in common. His (Lord Cottenham's) object was to show that the same reasons which made his noble and learned Friend condemn the small jurisdictions should lead their Lordships to the conclusion that the Diocesan Courts should also be abolished. He must call the attention of their Lordships to the extraordinary state of the law, although he was not prepared to say that a measure could be at present laid before Parliament, which would effect a satisfactory adjustment of the anomaly of which he complained, but which must sooner or later become a subject of legislation; he referred to the absurd distinction which existed with regard to the jurisdiction upon a will affecting land and one relating to money. The same document generally bequeathed both land and money, where the testator had any land at all; but not only were the tribunals which were to adjudicate upon the subject-matter contained in the same piece of paper different from the first, but while, with respect to money the probate of the will was conclusive as to title, a document bequeathing freehold land might be tried twenty or thirty times over, and in short without any limit, unless a Court of Equity interfered. So far, as regarded money, it was the subject of probate. The Ecclesiastical Courts had nothing to do with realties or freehold property; but money and leaseholds for years came under the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and might be proved in solemn form—the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Courts against parties attempting to prove in that form being final against them, so far as money or personal interests were concerned. With respect also to freehold property, there existed no means of establishing a trust under devise by the Ecclesiastical Law; in such a case the Court of Chancery must be applied to for the purpose. These were not the only inconveniences that existed. The tribunals of appeal were different in the two cases. For if a question of law arose, whether real property should pass by a will, it ultimately came before that House; but if the question related to personal estate, it went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and there would probably be contradictory decisions upon the same document. He was not observing upon these points for the purpose of founding objections to the Bill upon them, because it did not profess to remove them; but he objected to establishing or new modelling thirty or forty courts having jurisdiction in wills relating to personality, being satisfied that it would be necessary, sooner, or later, to establish a principle upon which all wills should be referred to the same tribunal. He admitted, that some good would be done by abolishing the Peculiars, but he objected to new modelling the Diocesan Courts retaining to them the power they possessed over wills bequeathing personal property. Those matters had been fully considered by the Commission which was appointed under the Government of the noble Duke, which made its report in 1832. The time which elapsed between the period of the Commission being issued and the making of the Report, the body of evidence which had been taken, and the names of the eminent individuals who had been so properly appointed, entitled their recommendations to very great weight with their Lordships. There were upon the Commission the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Bishop of Bangor, Lord Tenterden, Lord Chief Justice Tindal, Lord Wynford, Sir William Alexander, Sir John Nicholl, Sir Christopher Robinson, Sir Herbert Jenner, Sir E. Carrington, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. R. C. Fergusson. This combination of ecclesiastical and judicial authority, ensured a mass of information which would induce their Lordships to give the more attention to their Report. And what was their Report? The Commissioners stated, that although there might be some doubts as to some particulars, yet the Commissioners were united in the recommendations contained in the Report. And amongst these recommendations the first and primary one was the abolition of the Diocesan Courts. The Commissioners proposed in the body of the Report to retain the Provincial Court of York, making it the Ecclesiastical Court for the province of York; and the Provincial Court of Canterbury the Ecclesiastical Court for all the parts of the country which came under the jurisdiction of the see of Canterbury. But they stated in the conclusion that doubts were entertained whether or not it was expedient also to abolish the Provincial Court of York, and transferring the whole jurisdiction to the Court of Canterbury. Upon this the Commissioners expressed no opinion, but left it open for consideration. With respect to that part of the jurisdiction of these Courts to which his noble and learned Friend had last referred—the subject of bona notabilia—there could not be a greater grievance than the law upon that point; but like many other grievances it produced some good. The rule was at present, that if a person died and had property to the amount of 5l. in more than one Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, either of them could grant a probate. What was the consequence? Not knowing where the whole of a man's property might be situate a probate might be obtained, and then, finding that he had 5l. worth of property elsewhere, there would be an end to the probate. There was hardly an estate of any value in the country which was not in some way or other affected by settlement. It was the constant habit to introduce into settlements terms of years for particular purposes, so that in investigating the title to an estate let their Lordships conceive the difficulty. There was a term of years, then the title could not be made good without getting in that term—then one must trace the representative of an individual; he would find that the deceased died in some particular jurisdiction in the country; could he then venture to administer to the deceased's estate, which he must do in order to get that term? If he did, he would get the term, and might then think perhaps that he was entitled to the estate, but subsequently finding that the deceased had been possessed of property of the value of 5l. in some other jurisdiction, he would have to set to work and go over the same ground. That constantly happened. The evidence given before the Commission was quite conclusive as to the extreme danger and the great expense attendant upon these investigations. All that arose from the doctrine of bona notabilia, and formed one strong leading argument for the abolition of the Diocesan Courts. The extent of the evil had led to the very general process of taking out a prerogative probate. The result of continuing the 380 separate jurisdictions where the property might be in different jurisdictions, was quite obvious; and the plan proposed by his noble and learned Friend was subject to the same objection, in cases where part of the property might lie in one jurisdiction, and part in another, for the expense and trouble which would attend such a case, under the proposed arrangement, would be quite as great as they were already. It would increase another grievance, for it would have a tendency to make people go to the Diocesan Courts instead of the Prerogative Court. The subject had been frequently enquired into, and the recommendations had been all of a similar nature. The Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended the abolition of the jurisdiction of those Ecclesiastical Courts in matters affecting Legacies, in brawls in churchyards, in defamation, in incest, in adultery, and in Church-Rates. Now, this Bill appeared to have for one of its objects to give extended jurisdiction to

Ecclesiastical Courts in matters affecting legacies; but the only satisfaction he (Lord Cottenham) had, as regarded that proposal to extend the jurisdiction, was, that it would not be effectual, as the Ecclesiastical Courts would be incapable of exercising that jurisdiction. There were no complaints of the Equity Courts: Why share their jurisdiction with other Courts wholly incompetent to it? Before the Ecclesiastical Courts could act in the case of a legacy, the functions of a Court of Equity, which it did not possess, should be fulfilled—the debts of the testator should be got in—receivers should be appointed for the estate—the devise should be apportioned—and, in short, every thing should be done which it was incompetent for an Ecclesiastical Court to perform. If a legacy was charged upon land, they could not stir; and in marshalling the assets of the estate of a testator they could not move. Yet, the Bill of his noble and learned Friend contained Clauses continuing the power of interference in them, and even extending it in some instances? Having directed the attention of their Lordships to the very important jurisdiction which it was proposed to extend, he should now make an observation upon the proposal with respect to the Judges of those Courts. The Judges of those Courts were not appointed by the Crown as the Judges in the Courts of Law were, but by individuals, and the Bill did not propose to alter the mode of their appointment. Now it should be recollected that it might frequently happen that questions affecting some of the highest and most important interests in the country might be decided by those Judges; by Judges not acting upon authority derived from the Crown, or the Parliament, but appointed by individuals. If such great powers were to be given to Judges, then it was only just and fair that the public should have the protection that the persons appointed to the office, however respectable they might be, should not be appointed by individuals. The Bill proposed that the Diocesan Courts should be presided over by Barristers of a certain standing, which was certainly an improvement. It was proposed that they should hold their office during good behaviour, and to that he should certainly make no objection; but if there were grounds to believe that the conduct of any one of those Judges was not such as it ought to be, and that it would be expedient to remove him, how was it proposed to effect that object? it was proposed that he should be removed in the same way as the Judges of the Superior Courts of Law. How was that done? By an Address to the Crown, so that in such a case the Parliament would have to Address the Crown, praying for the removal of a Judge appointed not by the Crown, but by a Bishop. That must be the way in which it was intended to proceed, for he presumed it was not intended that the Parliament should Address the Bishop for the removal of the Judge. If the Judges were appointed, on the contrary, by the Crown, that absurdity would be obviated, and the public would have a guarantee in the responsibility of the Government to Parliament for the propriety of the appointment? That proposition, as regarded the appointment of these Judges, was made in several Reports on the subject of Ecclesiastical Courts; and there was a provision to that effect in every Bill that had been brought in since the subject had been enquired into until the introduction of the present Bill. The Commission appointed to enquire into Ecclesiastical matters made a Report on the subject in 1831 or 1832, and the Commissioners of Enquiry into the portion of it which referred to Real Property, had it also brought under their attention in consequence of the evils that had arisen from so many outstanding terms, which he before described to their Lordships. That Commission consisted of individuals eminently qualified to form an opinion, as their Lordships would see, when he described to them the men of which it was composed. His noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Campbell) was at the head of the Commission; there were two Masters of the Court of Chancery upon it, and there were four of the most experienced conveyancers in London also Members of it. No Commission could be composed of individuals better qualified to form an opinion than that Commission; and they all agreed in recommending one Court of Probate and Administration. He should also call their Lordships' attention to the recommendation of another Commission which, from its composition, might be looked upon as the highest authority. It was the Committee which was appointed by the House of Commons in 1833; and when he read the names of some of those who composed it, their Lordships would see the weight which any recommendation coming from it ought to carry. Sir J. Graham was at the head of the Commission; and amongst those who composed it were Sir Robert Peel, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir John Nichol, Dr. Lushington, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Abercrombie. Those were names which their Lordships would admit were deserving of the very highest respect. It was a Select Committee to inquire into the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts, and the connection of some of these Courts with the see of Canterbury led to the inquiry affecting the subject now before them. In the report of that Committee they recommended the abolition of all the Diocesan Courts, and the appointment of a Court for the settlement of questions of Probate and Administration—it also recommended the abolition of the Jurisdiction of the Courts in the Diocese of York, and that the whole Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction should be placed in the Court of Canterbury, and that the Judge should be appointed by the Crown. That mode of appointment was approved of in the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in the Report of the Real Property Commissioners. It would thus be seen by their Lordships that there was a large mass of authority in favour of the abolition of the Diocesan Courts. In 1836 there was an inquiry before a Committee of their Lordships' House upon the subject now before them, and in the same year he (Lord Cottenham) introduced a Bill, embodying the alterations that had been recommended. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) had expressed a considerable degree of curiosity to know what had become of that Bill which he (Lord Cottenham) brought in during the year 1836, and he would endeavour to satisfy his noble and learned Friend's curiosity on that point, or rather to assist his memory as to what had happened to the Bill. In 1836 he brought in a Bill for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and on that occasion his noble and learned Friend, if he remembered correctly, moved to have it referred to a Select Committee. It was referred to a Select Committee, and his impression was, that it was referred to that Committee on the Motion of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor)—he was confident, at all events, that it was not moved for by any noble Lord on the side of the House at which he (Lord Cottenham) was in the habit of sitting, a fact which would appear quite evident to their Lordships from the list of the names which composed the Committee. Out of twenty names, there were only six names of noble

Lords who were in the habit of supporting the Government then in office. It was, however, immaterial from what side of the House they were selected for the purpose of instituting that inquiry, but it was a Committee which, like the others, consisted of individuals whose names were a guarantee of their ability to form an opinion, and of the respect which was due to their recommendation. Amongst the names on that Committee were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the President of the Council, the Earl of Devon, Lord Eldon, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Bishop of Bangor, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Langdale, Lord Plunkett, Lord Denman, the Marquess of Lansdowne. The Committee, after frequent meetings, made a short report, from which he should read one or two passages. Before that Committee, as before all the others, there was an inquiry into the objections that were made to the abolition of the Ecclesiastical Courts. The objection was this:—It was said, that at present there was considerable advantage in cases where persons possessed of small properties died, as the next of kin or the representative could prove the will, or take out Administration, in the district near where the party so dying had presided. In cases of large properties, that argument could not have effect, for it was not to be supposed that such large properties could be confined to one Diocese, generally speaking; but then in such cases they were brought before the Prerogative Court. It was, however, alleged that in cases of small property, there was great public advantage in the power to prove the will or the administration near the place where the person had lived. The report of the Committee to which he was referring, adverted to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to the Report of the Real Property Commission, and to the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons on the subject; and having referred to those Reports, their Lordships' Committee stated that they were unanimously of opinion, that it was expedient that throughout England and Wales the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in Probate and Administration should be abolished, and that one Court should be established in London to be the only Court of Probate and Administration; and it was recommended also, that consistently with this alteration, arrangements should be made for securing to persons living at a distance from London all the conveniences

and advantages which they received from the Ecclesiastical Courts. It appeared from the Report of the inquiry respecting Ecclesiastical Courts that four-fifths of the cases of Contention were in Doctors' Commons, and that the greater part of the business was "common form" business—that was, when a person dies, the necessary and usual proofs were made and the Probate was granted, no one being called on to disprove it; but if it were afterwards disproved, application was made to recall it, the Probate standing, however, if not disproved. In the country an officer, called the surrogate, took the necessary proofs, being empowered to administer the oaths, and if there was no will he took the proof necessary for the granting of Letters of Administration, and having transmitted them to the higher authorities, the Probate or Letters of Administration were in due course returned. It was said, with reference to the appointment of a Court of Probate and Administration, that in the country there was usually a great anxiety to see the will of the deceased person amongst those who expected something under it, or who, being next of kin, were desirous to see if they were excluded by the will; and that if those documents were sent to London, and kept there, they would necessarily be deprived of the opportunity of seeing them. To meet that difficulty, the Committee recommended that the documents should be left in the hands of the surrogate for fourteen days after the death of a party, in order that all those interested might have an opportunity of seeing them, and at the expiration of fourteen days the surrogate should transmit to the Court in London those documents, in order that they might be registered there; and after such registry copies might be sent to the country, in order that those interested might have an opportunity of inspecting them near their places of residence. But it was recommended that there should be one general register of those documents in London. The Committee stated that they were of opinion such an arrangement would be of great public advantage, and would remove many evils that now exist; for whilst the central registration would produce general advantage and convenience, there were means provided by which inspection of the wills in each diocese might be afforded within the diocese; and all the advantages of the present system, as regarded the proofs of wills, or for administrations in cases of small property, would be secured by providing means to administer or prove the wills for the survivors in such cases. That objection was therefore met by this proposal; but another question arose, and it was this—some right Rev. Prelates, and other Church dignities said, if you abolish those Courts and this jurisdiction, how shall we exercise a jurisdiction over our clergy? It was necessary to provide means for that jurisdiction, and he (Lord Cottenham) brought in a Bill for that purpose. It passed their Lordships' House, and went to the House of Commons, but it was there lost, in consequence, he believed, of the lateness of the period in the Session when it was introduced into the House of Commons. It was too late to pass it, and like many other Bills of that year, it was returned. Now that was an account of the Bill of 1836, with respect to which his noble and learned Friend had expressed such curiosity. It would be seen, therefore, that an attempt was made on that occasion to remove the objection with respect to the jurisdiction over the clergy; for such a Bill was necessary if they abolished the Diocesan Courts. That Bill which he had introduced, was in accordance with the recommendation of a Committee of their Lordships' House, and was sanctioned by the highest authority, and the reason why, when they thought it had passed all its trials, it was returned, was in consequence of the late period of the Session at which it was introduced. No further progress was made, therefore, with reference to that subject until the Bill of 1840 was introduced, regulating the jurisdiction which his Bill of 1836 was intended to affect. Until that measure had passed it was impossible to abolish the Diocesan Courts, but then no further difficulty existed. 1841 was not a good year for the progress of legislation on this subject; 1842 passed away also without legislation upon it; and in 1843 a Bill was brought in, after ample time for preparation—the Bill was brought in by Her Majesty's Government. It was brought into the other House of Parliament by Sir J. Graham, Dr. Nichol, and the Attorney General; and it was to be supposed that such a course would not have been adopted without consulting the other Members of the Government, or without the concurrence of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor). One could hardly suppose that a Bill, which proposed to abolish the jurisdiction of so many of those Courts, would have been brought in without the

concurrence of all the Members of the Government, and without the favourable opinion of his noble and learned Friend who had to-night spoken so highly of the Diocesan Courts, and described them as so perfect. It did seem, indeed, strange that when his noble and learned Friend thought these such excellent tribunals, another portion of the Government should have introduced a Bill for the purpose of abolishing them. It was a strange thing to see such a course adopted, particularly as it was so well known that Her Majesty's Government had the advantage of being so united, and of agreeing so well upon all their great measures. He must, however, consider that proposition in the Bill of 1843 as the proposition of Her Majesty's Government, and that Bill proposed to abolish the Diocesan Courts; indeed, it was in most respects very much like his Bill of 1836. Now, he wished to know, that recollecting that a Bill of that nature was introduced by Her Majesty's Government last year, how did it happen that his noble and learned Friend on this occasion asked them to support a Bill of an altogether different character—to adopt quite an opposite course? The 5th section of the Bill to which he referred provided that matters of Probate and Administration, and matters of Contention, should be brought before the Court of Arches, and that the Judge should be appointed by the Crown. There were some arrangements in it that might be found inconvenient enough, and whilst he admitted to his noble and learned Friend that it was in many respects similar to his (Lord Cottenham's) Bill, he should disclaim the reservation of a certain jurisdiction in the registrars which it proposed, for the purpose of cases of probate and administration under 300*l.* a year. He referred to the Bill of last year, in order to show that there had been no difference of opinion at either side of the House as to the course which ought to be adopted with respect to the Diocesan Courts. His noble and learned Friend had stated that several alterations were made in the Bill after its introduction. He (Lord Cottenham) did not know what those alterations were, nor was he anxious to ascertain—he was only desirous to know at what period the Government changed their opinion, for they brought in a Bill now which was directly opposite to the Bill of 1843. He did not wish to occupy their Lordships' time, but he felt it necessary to call their attention to the very mature investigation which the subject had received from the highest authorities, and those best capable of forming an opinion, and he would show their Lordships that the Diocesan Courts could not by possibility perform those duties well. He would show that they were not adequate to those duties which they were called on to perform. It was necessary, in order that they should be able to perform their duties, to have them more constantly employed, and he would ask, were their Lordships of opinion that the public ought to go to the expense of keeping up an establishment which was not adequate to the performance of its duties? The Appendix to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners stated that in the years 1827, 1828, and 1829, the testamentary and matrimonial cases in the Diocesan Courts were 499, of which 147 were cases of Citation, and were not contested, and 110 were cases of Administration. The witnesses, namely, the registrars of the Courts, stated, that of the testamentary suits only one-tenth were subjects of litigation, and the others passed as matters of course; thus, nine-tenths were matters of course, which did not call for the interference of the Judges; so that 438, not being subjects of litigation, deducted from 499, left 61 cases. Say, then, the business in the Courts of Peculiar were a quarter, that made 16, which, added to 61, made 76; and 76, divided by 3, left 25; so that there were twenty-five litigated cases for thirty-two Courts, which it was proposed to continue. Then as to the Judges of those Courts. They were nominally Judges, it was true, but many of them did not profess to administer the law, and were permitted to appoint deputies. He would not say the deputies were underpaid, for they had little or nothing to do, and one of those Judges had received but two guineas in a year—now, that Judge might be called on to decide questions affecting the legality of issue, questions affecting property to any extent. It was evident from the fact he stated that the Diocesan Courts had not a great deal to do, and although the sum which that Judge received was small, it might be thought that perhaps it was a handsome remuneration for doing nothing. Now, with regard to the alleged conveniences arising from the Diocesan Court to persons administering or proving wills in cases of small property, it appeared from the Appendix to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that parties in the country were often put to great inconvenience in consequence of the distance to which they had to go to the

Diocesan Court, and this was to be found even in the present arrangement, which was far more concentrated and convenient than formerly. A man at Greenwich having business at the Diocesan Court would have to go to Winchester. [Lord Campbell: No, to Canterbury; a man in Southwark would have to go to Winchester.] I was adverting to the fact, that under the existing system, which was stated to be so convenient, persons had in many cases to go very great distances; from Berwick to Durham, for instance, a person would have to go 78 miles; from Montgomery, to Bangor, 85 miles; from Brecon to St. David's, 98 miles; from Rye to Chichester, 80 miles; from Pensance to Exeter, 121 miles; and when it was recollected that the journey, in many of those cases, was to a great extent by cross roads, it would be seen how much inconvenience often arose under the present system. Then they should consider the enormous expense, for four-fifths of the contentious business and a much larger part of the uncontested went to the Prerogative Court, and he had already shown the small amount of business for which it was proposed to maintain the thirty-four Diocesan Courts, all of which must have Judges, Registrars, and so on, so that the expense would be very large, and even if there were some advantages arising from maintaining those Courts, they were advantages which would be purchased at a heavy expense. What difference could it make to add one-fifth more to the business of the present Court in London; whilst it gives the advantage of having a Court in which the public could have confidence, and able to do all the business with convenience to the suitors, and without additional expense? Why should they maintain those Courts, and incur expense that might be avoided? They had not got the sum the new system was to cost—the Bill was blank as to that, but if they wanted Judges fit to preside in Courts where important matters were to be decided they could not get them without giving reasonably ample salaries, for no man was fit for a Judge who had not experience himself in private business; then, in order to remunerate such men for giving up their business, it would be necessary to give them a considerable salary, and that would involve very great expense. If they referred to the Fee Fund, he was sorry to say it was likely to be a larger one, by large payments from the pockets of the suitors; for the report stated that they amounted to

tion in the other House. After considering the subject in every point of view, he was altogether at a loss to understand where any difficulty of a serious nature could arise to impede the progress of a really satisfactory measure. Surely the Government were not afraid that the country proctors would not turn them out of office if they did what was right in this matter. He did not impute any improper motive to the Government for having come to this new view of the subject, but certainly he was entitled to say that last year they quite concurred in all he had now stated, while this year they proceeded in a totally different direction. Why was this? He believed the opposition to the Bill last year arose from the circumstance that it did not propose any compensation to the country proctors for the loss of office, a very natural subject of complaint for those parties, no doubt. But the present Bill did provide compensation to the country proctors who might suffer, not from the loss of office, but from the loss of business in the particular Courts of Judicature affected by the measure. Now, such a provision as this would, he presumed, very materially mitigate the opposition of those Gentlemen to the reproduction of a Bill like that of last year. But the remarkable thing in the present case was this: the Bill abolished Courts of Peculiars, the business of which would be transferred to the Diocesan Courts; compensation was provided to the proctor for the loss of his business in the Peculiar Courts, yet all the while he would transact the same business in the Diocesan Courts; so that he retained his business and got his compensation into the bargain. Thus a man who had been doing a business of 100*l.* a year in a Peculiar Court, would go and transact it just the same in the Diocesan Courts, and would receive compensation for 100*l.* a year, as though he had lost instead of retaining it. Surely, it was somewhat extraordinary, that after what had been said by the highest authorities on the subject of the present system—after what had been said by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—by the noble and learned Lord himself—the noble Lord should now speak of it as though it were a perfect system which retained these Courts, as the Bill before them proposed to do. In order to give the Government an opportunity of reconsidering the subject, and of bringing in a Bill more calculated to satisfy the country, he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Bishop of London said, that, being one of those who had signed the original Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and as having supported the Bill which had been brought in for the purpose of carrying the recommendations of that Report into effect, he felt himself called on briefly to explain to their Lordships why, under these circumstances, he should not consider it inconsistent to give his support to the Bill now before the House. He supported the present Bill, because from all the information he had been able to acquire, and from the fullest consideration of the subject, he thought it the best Bill which the Legislature was in a condition to pass, without giving so much dissatisfaction to a great body of the public, as greatly to counterbalance the advantages that might otherwise be derived from a measure of this kind. With reference to the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he wished to say this, that there were some points of that Report about which he was not perfectly satisfied, but he had therein yielded in a great degree to what he was entitled to regard as the superior judgment of the learned Commissioners, who were more practically acquainted with the working of the Courts; on one point, indeed, he had held a very decided opinion—an opinion which he still retained, that it would be far better to transfer the testamentary jurisdiction, among some other incidentals to ecclesiastical Law, to the Common Law Courts. But he had submitted to the judgment of those who considered that any violent disruption of this jurisdiction from the courts which now exercised it would be attended with many serious evils; and that it would be better to leave the jurisdiction where it was, at all events for the present, taking measures, at the same time, for improving its administration in every possible way. Now, with respect to what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend opposite (lord Cottenham), he must be permitted to say, that he had not by any means understood his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to say that the present system was the best that could be devised; but he spoke of it as preserving that which was theoretically the right system. He thought it an advantage that every Bishop should have within his own diocese the means of administering the law. He thought it hardly fair for his noble Friend (lord Cottenham) to represent the present measure as a measure which proposed to create thirty-four new courts. It should rather be considered that there were in all 384 Courts exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and that of these the Bill proposed to abolish 350, leaving thirty-four, which were to be remodelled and improved in their constitution. Now, with respect to the administration of some of the Ecclesiastical Courts, he must own that his experience of some of those Courts had not given him the highest reverence for their administration of the law, and he thought it desirable that those Courts should be placed on a better system, and a better administration of justice substituted. With respect to testamentary jurisdiction, being of a civil nature, it might be wished that the whole of the testamentary jurisdiction should be in the hands of the Common Law Courts. It might be questionable whether, in their anxiety for the better administration of the law, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners did not go too far in recommending the abolition of those Courts. Perhaps their Lordships were not aware that those Courts discharged other functions, which could not be discharged with propriety by any other Court whatever. After various attempts to give effect to the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he thought that the present Bill was one which was likely to be attended with less dissatisfaction. His noble Friend had alluded to the Petitions which had last year been presented to that and the other House of Parliament on this subject. Those Petitions expressed the sentiments not only of the country practitioners but of other practitioners also, and represented the feelings of a large body of the clergy and laity of the country on this subject. Indeed, a much stronger feeling existed, and to a greater extent, than he was first aware of; and he considered the question now to be, whether those Courts would not, if remodelled, have the effect of remedying to a great extent the evils which arose from them. He could not but feel when the present Bill passed into a law, that those Courts would be a great support and consolation to the Bishop of each Diocese, limited as the Bill proposed, and presided over by proper Judges; for he admitted the justice of the principle that it was not expedient that they should be presided over by Clergymen. Upon the whole he did not think he was guilty of any inconsistency in supporting the present Bill, were he even disposed—which he would not say he was—to maintain the unimpeachable wisdom of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; for, although this Bill did not go so far as they recommended, it went a great way, and got rid of the crying evil of the Peculiar Jurisdictions. For these reasons, and seeing that the system of Diocesan Courts, even supposing it to be an evil system, could not be abolished without creating a great deal of opposition and unfriendly feeling on the part of those whom it was more desirable to conciliate, he would be content with the present measure, although it did not accomplish all the good that might be desired.

Lord Brougham agreed with the right Rev. Prelate, that there was quite enough of good in the measure to reconcile him to take it; while he also agreed with his noble and learned Friend near him in wishing it had gone a great deal further. This legislation originated in a Bill which he (Lord Brougham) had had the honour to bring before Parliament many years ago, and subsequently at different times, down to 1835, when he gave it up almost in despair; and his experience had taught him that which he did not think his noble and learned Friend near him was aware of, the very great difficulties that lay in the way of legislating upon this subject. When engaged in legislating upon that subject, if he saw one party or one deputation, he was sure he saw 200 or 300; if he received one memorial or remonstrance, he received 500. With the single exception of the Registry Act, which was defeated by the same influence, he never remembered so powerful a host of adversaries raised against any one measure he had any concern with in the way of legislation. The opposition the Reform Bill met with out of doors in 1831—not in Parliament, but out of doors—was really a joke compared to the opposition to the Registry Act; and there was a remarkable instance of it. After their Lordships threw out that Bill on the 10th of October, 1831, he remained in the House in consequence of judicial business until the 20th, and he then went down into Westmoreland to enjoy his long vacation of eleven days. During that time the country was never so much excited as it was on the Reform Bill; the people were in a rage against the Government, and against Lord Grey in particular, because his Government would not take the wise advice of proroguing Parliament one day and meeting two days afterwards to propound the same Bill. They were almost torn to pieces. Lord Grey received deputations in the dead of the night, who told him that he was a doomed Lord. He also was a doomed Lord, and his noble Friend there. Such was the extreme excitement which prevailed on the Reform Bill; and that from the capital to the remotest provinces. Well, after the eleven days' vacation, that most melancholy tragedy, incident to that agitation, took place,—the Bristol riots, which tended to increase the agitation and excitement. On his return from Westmoreland, if he saw one bill on the subject of Reform, or advertisement, or placard affixed to private mansions and public buildings, and exhibited at other places of public resort, upon the all-absorbing subject of Reform, he was sure he saw a score calling upon the landlords not to suffer themselves to be robbed by the detestable Registry Act. He mentioned this to show that it was the very same interest which opposed that Act which lately and now up to the present hour was at work to defeat the first and best Bill upon this subject which he and others of the Commissioners and Committee were most anxious to have carried, as the most complete and advisable measure. The interest to which he alluded consisted of the country practitioners, the landed Gentry, and those under their influence, who formed themselves into a kind of league to support the practice of the Local Courts, and to prevent any enlarged measure of reform; and he was one of those who believed that the Government would find insuperable difficulty in carrying this measure, not in that, but in the other House. The business of that House, then, would be not to send down measures to the other House, which they had not a fair and reasonable prospect of being able to carry. It was not a mere inconvenience they would have to deal with, but an insuperable difficulty. As, therefore, he could not get all he could wish, he was bound to take all he could get, and if he went into Committee with the Bill, he should go there to make it what he wanted it to be, or if not that, at any rate the best Bill that could be carried in the other House. He certainly, however, proposed to go into Committee, with the full intention of doing his best to remove from the measure any feature which might at present tend, as his noble and learned Friend suggested, to impede further improvement in this direction, to prevent onward legislation, when people should come to their senses upon the matter. Now, it certainly appeared to him that, to appoint thirty Judges for life, with good salaries—and good salaries they must be—would tend to impede, if not totally to obstruct, the introduction of a better measure at a more favourable time; but in Committee he should endeavour to prevail upon them to keep their power in their hands, and therefore he would have those officers made removable, and make them take their offices with a notice or warning not to complain if a Bill should pass to render their services in those Diocesan Courts no longer essential and necessary. [The Lord Chancellor: That is provided for by the Act. It is not intended that any compensation shall be given them.] That removed a very great difficulty, no doubt. But he had thought that those officers were irremovable, that they held office for life. But his objection was at an end. His noble and learned Friend had not forgotten the case of the Welch Judges. His noble and learned friend (Lord Cottenham) had said the argument about Local Courts had no bearing upon the question. He might think so, but he (Lord Brougham) was of a different opinion. He had been often told of the inconsistency of centralizing one day what he was localizing another; and no doubt he was liable to that charge, as regarded the Diocesan Courts. But he felt that there were good reasons for giving local jurisdiction, so as to bring home the diocesan jurisdiction to the suitor. Had there been in the Local Courts a most respectable man fit to be a Judge, then, as far as possible, it would have been right to give him the jurisdiction which this Bill reserved to the reformed Diocesan Court. He submitted his Local Courts Bill to the Common Law Commissioners, who differed from him upon one point; they struck out the testamentary jurisdiction. One of their reasons was, that there was a Diocesan Court already established there; and this Bill to abolish Diocesan Courts was not then brought in. The principal ground for his supporting this Bill was, undoubtedly, the abolition of the Peculiars; that was the greatest improvement that could be possibly made. The right Rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) would bear him out in saying that a very great scandal was removed from our ecclesiastical as well as our judicial establishments by the abolition of those exceedingly imperfect courts of judicature, the Peculiars and Exempts. He had hoped that the temper of the times

would have enabled them to go further; but as the case stood their Lordships should reserve to themselves with the option the power of hereafter legislating upon this subject, if so advised. Upon the whole, he was disposed to give his concurrence to the second reading of the Bill, reserving to himself the power of making such suggestions with regard to the details in Committee as hereafter might seem to him to be desirable.

Lord Campbell said, he must express his unfeigned astonishment, after what had been said by his noble and learned Friend, that there had been no explanation of the motives which had induced Her Majesty's Government to abandon the Bill introduced last Session. His noble and learned Friend who last addressed the House, had endeavoured to make an apology for the Bill being in its present shape, and had certainly made the most of his materials; but he did not suppose that his noble and learned Friend was present at the Cabinet when this subject was debated; nor could he suppose that his noble and learned Friend was one who spoke as the organ of the Government, for the purpose of communicating to the House and to the public information upon this subject. The House, then, was entirely in the dark with respect to the motives which had induced the Government to introduce this Session a measure so entirely different from that of last Session. There were present five Members of the Cabinet, perhaps six; and no doubt they had all made themselves masters of the subject. There was the noble Duke at the head of Her Majesty's Government, he could master anything. No doubt the noble Duke knew the advantages and disadvantages of the Bill of last year as compared with this one. The noble President of the Council, who had long presided there with much benefit to the public, was well acquainted with our judicial system in all its details; but he remained silent. There was the noble President of the Board of Control, versed in matters connected with finance—and he said nothing. There was the noble Secretary for the Foreign Department, who, though no soldier, was well acquainted with the Church militant and all its difficulties—but he was dumb. All were silent. The right rev. Prelate had given no explanation whatever of the reason of the change: on the contrary, he had strongly confirmed the objection of his noble and learned Friend, because that right rev. Prelate had told the House he would even then be ready to support the Bill of last Session. [The Bishop of London: "No, no!" He had understood so; and it would be most extraordinary if it were not so, because that right rev. Prelate not only was a Member of the Commission along with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and paid, as he always did, in other cases, the greatest attention to the subject, but, after seven years' deliberation, he signed the recommendation contained in the Report of the Commissioners. He presumed that his noble and learned Friend who had spoken last had left the House, as he did not see him either in his usual place on the woolsack, or in the seat which he occasionally occupied on that (the Opposition) side of the House; he would therefore abstain from adverting to some of the topics which had fallen from his noble and learned Friend. It was, clear, however, that his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack had changed his opinion on this subject. What was decisive on this point was, that a Bill on this subject, and similar to that of last year, which in 1836 passed the House of Commons, was sent up to that House; and he knew not what reason there was to suppose that a similar Bill would not now be passed through that House; and, above all, when it was recollected what powerful influence the Government possessed in that House. He still believed that if the Government wished to carry such a general measure as that of last year, there would not be the slightest difficulty in the matter. His noble and learned Friend on the woolsack anticipated that he (Lord Campbell) would oppose this Bill. Now, he could only say in reply, that he considered that he should be guilty of great inconsistency if he did not do so. He felt satisfied that this Bill preserved all the expensive and vexatious litigious proceedings in cases of marriage, adultery, defamation, testamentary cases and Church-rates, for jurisdiction in all these matters was reserved to all the Diocesan Courts. Again, this Bill preserved all the vices of the law respecting cases of bona notabilia, by which a probate was void, if proved only in one diocese, and there appeared to be goods to the amount of 5*l.* in another diocese. It preserved also all the distinctions now existing between the Prerogative Courts of the two provinces of Canterbury and York. The right rev. Prelate would recollect, that the Real Property Commission, of which he (Lord Campbell) had had the honour to be a member, recommended that there should be only one court for the trial of such cases for the whole of England and Wales, and he presumed that the right rev. Prelate still adhered to the opinion which he then gave as one of those Commissioners. It was obvious that there could be no injury to the Church in adopting such a proposition. God forbid that he (Lord Campbell) should wish to interfere with the proper jurisdiction of the Church in all matters which properly belonged to it; for instance, in all cases of Church discipline or orthodoxy he had no wish to interfere; but what had the Church to do now-a-days with marriage or wills? He would not say that in former times, when marriage was regarded as a sacrament, the Church ought not to have had some authority, but this had long since ceased to be so—since the period of Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Bill; and above all, since by the recent Act, marriage had become a civil contract, and all questions as to its validity in any case resolved themselves into the interpretation of an Act of Parliament, and, as a matter of course, to be referred to the Queen's Judges for decision. These were often of a most difficult nature, and they required on the part of the Judge a profound knowledge of the law, and he thought, therefore, all these matters were most properly referred to the Superior Courts of Law. The right rev. Prelate said that he regretted that the Church had ever anything to do with the jurisdiction as regarded wills. But how did the Church get possession of this jurisdiction? It was, that formerly, when a man died intestate, the Church claimed his personal property for the purpose of saying masses for the good of his soul. It, therefore, was supposed to have an interest in every case of a will, and got possession of this jurisdiction accordingly. Now the Church could put in no such plea; and, in fact, it ought to have no more to do with testamentary causes than with questions involving real estates. They might just as well claim the right to try tithe cases, insurance cases, or charter parties cases, as those respecting wills. He conceived that the only proper course to adopt was, to have one general court sitting in London, which should have general jurisdiction in all those questions which now went to the several Diocesan Courts. He was in favour of having Local Courts, where he could obtain them with advantage, but then two essential principles were involved in the case. The first was, that there was sufficient business for the court to transact, and the second was, that the business of the court should be such as to enable them to get competent Judges to do it. With regard to the Diocesan Courts, they possessed neither the one nor the other of these requisites. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham) had stated that such was the small quantity of business before these courts, that they had each only the fraction of a cause in a year before it. Was it possible, he would ask, to have good Judges under such a state of things? To deal with marriages and wills required a knowledge of the civil law, and of the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which were guided by civil law; and those only who had practised in Ecclesiastical Courts, who were familiar with the civil law and its practice, were competent to be Judges; but then there were thirty-four of these Judges to be selected; and it was obvious that from the small amount of business that it was no very easy matter to obtain that number of efficient persons. The right rev. Prelate said, that in some instances business was well done in the Diocesan Courts; he (Lord Campbell) would only say, if such was the case, they must be very rare instances indeed. He had had rather an extensive experience with respect to them, and he would venture to say that he had never heard a case before any one of these Diocesan Courts in which the grossest blunders were not made. Even the Archiepiscopal Court at York was not an exception. He had never heard any one praise these Diocesan Courts, unless it was his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, who seemed to consider them as the very perfection of the judicial system. He must be allowed to express his surprise that his noble and learned Friend did not attempt to make a better defence for the Government than he had made. In 1836, when his noble and learned Friend occupied a different position in that House, he, towards the close of the Session, took a review of the business which had been gone through, and he was particularly eloquent on the state of the Ecclesiastical Courts. His noble and learned Friend then said :—

learned Friend

“The next great branch of this promised reform of the law was the consolidation and reconstruction of the Ecclesiastical Courts; let us see what course His Majesty’s Government have pursued on this important subject? My noble Friend, the noble Duke near me, when in office, issued a Commission for the purpose of inquiring into this extensive subject.”

His noble and learned Friend then proceeded to panegyrisé the report of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and he did not then eulogise the Diocesan Courts as he now did. His noble Friend proceeded to say,

“That Commission made a report, which was prepared, he believed, by Dr. Lushington—a report distinguished for the information and learning which it contained, and which led to the preparation of a Bill handed by us to our successors in office. My noble and learned Friend was from time to time reminded of the importance of the subject, and called upon to adopt some legislative measure with respect to it. A Bill, indeed, had been introduced; but as on some parts of the measure a difference of opinion existed, they were referred to the consideration of a select Committee, who afterwards made a Report, which was laid upon your Lordships’ table. From that time to the present, the Bill has been allowed to slumber—not the slightest attempt has been made by the Ministers of the Crown to pursue this important measure.”

This was the Bill which was prepared in the year 1835, and which his noble and learned Friend taunted the late Government for not having the power to carry. But what had been done by the present Government? It could not have been expected that they would have brought forward a measure on the subject in the short Session of 1841, immediately after their accession to office; but in February, 1842, the Government induced Her Majesty to address the Parliament thus :—

“Measures will be submitted for your consideration for the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, and for the improvement of the jurisdiction exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts in England and Wales.”

That declaration was made by Her

Majesty in February, and, though Parliament sat until August, no Bill on the subject was introduced into either House. His noble and learned Friend said, that it was deemed better that the Bill should come from the other House. If that were the case, why was the measure now introduced into that House? What he complained of was, that the Bill was not introduced into the House of Commons in 1842, at which time the prejudices against the plan involved in the measure of last year did not exist to anything like the same extent to which they had been excited. If the Bill had been brought in in 1842, he would venture to say that the Government could have passed it with the greatest ease. He had asked several times why the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill had not been brought forward, and he could on no occasion obtain a satisfactory answer. Again, at the meeting of the Parliament in 1843, the Royal Commissioners said,

“We are commanded by Her Majesty to acquaint you that measures connected with the improvement of the Law will be submitted for your consideration.”

Now he had no doubt that this passage referred to the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. Such a measure was asked for again and again in their Lordships’ House, but no one ever saw it. In the other House of Parliament a measure certainly was brought forward, having for its object the establishment of one Court for the decision of all questions relating to wills and matters testamentary, and no measure was ever more panegyrised, or received such wide support. That Bill was brought forward in a very able speech, by his learned Friend Sir William Follett; and Sir James Graham, who had maturely considered the subject, as he was Chairman of the Committee of the other House on the inquiry into the matter, also in a most able manner supported the Bill. No measure of a Government could have been more warmly supported or panegyrised than this measure was when it was first introduced. His noble and learned Friend used to ask why did not the then Government carry this and other measures through that House? He could only say, that, unfortunately, a great desire existed on the part of some parties to act in such a way as to enable them to say that the Government had not power to carry measures which they deemed beneficial. But the Government which succeeded them in office did possess that power; why then, he would ask, did they not carry this Bill? That Bill was founded on the plan of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and which was so much praised by his noble and learned Friend in 1836—this Bill was brought forward by the present Government last year, and he should like to have some explanation why the Government chose to abandon altogether the great principles contained in it. His noble and learned Friend made, in 1836, a remark upon the then Government which, as regarded them, was wholly misapplied, but which was, with respect to the present occasion, strikingly appropriate. He said, that the measures which they themselves recommended and prepared, they, without the least regard to what they had previously said, tamely abandoned at the dictation of any section of their supporters. That was what had been said with reference to the late Government; and, it appeared to him curiously applicable to the present. There was much mystery in this transaction, which ought to be cleared up by an explanation from some Member of the Government.

The Bishop of London said, that whatever might have been his opinion of the plan suggested by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he had taken care that night not to express any opinion upon the subject, or what course he might have pursued.

The Lord Chancellor said, he rose for the purpose of meeting the challenge which his noble and learned Friend had thrown down. He had asked what were the reasons which induced the Government to depart from their original plan? Did his noble and learned Friend suppose that he (the Lord Chancellor) did not concur in the wisdom or the policy of the Bill introduced into the House of Commons last year? He could assure his noble and learned Friend that he was entirely mistaken in supposing that he had differed from his Colleagues as to that measure. Nothing that he had said, could, for a moment, warrant such an assumption. He, in common with the rest of the Cabinet, had anxiously wished to carry into effect the plan proposed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. His noble and learned Friend now asked, why abandon that measure, and substitute another, from which the best parts of the measure of last year were omitted? Neither of his noble and learned Friends had exercised their usual industry, when they made complaints of this nature; for if they had looked to the progress of the Bill through the other House last Session, they would have seen ample reasons to induce the Government to pursue the course which they had now taken. The second reading of the Bill was certainly carried by a majority, after a long and warm debate, but it was obvious to every Member of that House, from the tone that prevailed, that the Bill could not be carried to a third reading in the shape in which it then was. The Bill was materially altered in Committee and assumed an entirely new form, and it was apparent to the Government that it could only be carried in that new form. The question then for the consideration of the Government was, whether the entire measure should be abandoned, or whether the Bill should be carried in its altered shape, for some of the provisions still left in it were of the utmost importance. The Government determined to adopt the latter course, and the present Bill was, as nearly as possible, a copy of the Bill as it passed through Committee in the other House last year. This was the history of the Bill in the last Session; and he believed that if a Bill embodying all the suggestions of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners passed that House without delay, and was sent at once to the other House, the same course would be pursued with it as was taken with respect to the Bill of last year, if it was not thrown out altogether. He repeated, then, that the Bill now under consideration was essentially the Bill which went through the Committee of the other House last Session. If he believed that they could pass the large measure through that House, and if they were satisfied that they could not carry it through the other House, he conceived that it was wise and prudent not to attempt that which the experience of the past showed could not be done. He believed, therefore, that the proper course to pursue was, to introduce a measure, not going to the extent that he could wish, but going to the extent that they could calculate upon its success, and which would still be productive of much good. If his noble and learned Friend thought that he could carry such a Bill through the other House, let him try and persuade the House in Committee to make such alterations as would effect the object which he had in view. But he (the Lord Chancellor) was satisfied that his noble and Learned Friend could not succeed; he, therefore, must rest content to confine himself to that measure of good which was contained in this Bill. Such was the explanation of the course taken by the Government with respect to this Bill, and in respect to which every Member of the Cabinet fully and entirely concurred. They one and all were convinced that the Bill should be brought forward in its reduced shape, because they were satisfied it could be productive of great good, and because they were satisfied that they could not carry a measure which went so far as the former Bill. As for expressing an approval of the Diocesan Courts, and as for the charge of inconsistency which had been brought against him, both his noble and learned Friends had entirely misapprehended, he would not say misrepresented, what had fallen from him; for at the commencement of his observations, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, he distinctly and unequivocally stated that he greatly preferred the Bill of last year. The present Bill, he might add, was founded on a Bill which was introduced into the other House in 1813, by Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott), and he never should be ashamed to acknowledge that he had adopted a Bill on such a subject on the high authority of an individual, so eminent and learned in matters of this kind. He now thought that he had given a satisfactory explanation as to the conduct of the Government, and had shown that there was no ground for the charge of inconsistency which had so harshly been brought against him.

Amendment negatived. Bill read a second time.

THE THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENTS. BILL.] The Duke of Buccleugh, in reference to some observations which had on a former occasion fallen from a noble and learned Lord opposite, respecting the Three-and-a-Half per Cents., wished to say that in the year 1834, when a similar proceeding was adopted with regard to the Four per Cents., notice was given in the House of Commons on the 6th of May; on the 9th the House went into Committee, so that the Bill was not even brought in until after notice had been given to the holders of Stock; the time given to them being the interval between the 8th and the 28th of May. On the 12th the resolutions were reported, and it was not until the 12th of June that the Bill was read a first time, though the period for expressing dissent had expired on the 28th of the preceding month. On the 16th of June the Bill was read a second time; on the 19th it was Committed; on the 20th the Report was received; on the 25th it was read a third time; on the 9th of July it was returned from the House of Lords, and it was not until the 25th of that month that it received the Royal Assent. The dissentients respecting the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. up to the present time, were to an amount ridiculously small.

Lord Campbell said, that those who dissented, could not enter their names till a book was opened for that purpose, and the Bank could not open such a volume till the Bill became law. The Resolutions of the House of Commons had not the force of law, and no precedent could justify such irregularity.

The Duke of Wellington said, the difference between this case and the case of 1834 was just this: that in this case, in all probability, the Royal Assent would be given to this Bill to-morrow, and then there would be time between to-morrow and Saturday to give the dissent legally, according to the opinion of the noble Lord. In 1834 the Act did not pass till three weeks after the period when the legal dissent could be given.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. Wyse, from the Loyal National Repeal Association, for Inquiry into the State Prosecutions.—By Mr. J. A. Smith, from Leith, for Reduction of Duty on Tea.

tion in respect to the numbers who had signed it, to the wrong complained of, or the period at which it was presented to the House. It had received in the short interval of three weeks, not less than 821,334 signatures; nor were these names collected at hazard, but on the contrary, received with all due precaution to verify their authenticity, and to preclude, as much as possible, all chance of fraud; he could speak with certainty on this subject: he was in possession of a complete analysis of the number of petitioners sent from every part of the country, divided into counties, and each county again divided into parishes. It appeared from that analysis that every portion of the country, north, south, east, and west, had concurred. The north, indeed, in proportion to its population might be considered, if anything, more zealous than the south. Monaghan had contributed 20,329; Down, 22,525; Donegal, 20,041; Antrim, 26,410; Cavan, 47,340; while Clare had sent in 9,648; Kilkenny, 12,327; Kerry, 12,880; Meath, 23,755; Galway, 36,395; Dublin, 39,799. This was evidence that it was not a local movement; and he might, with equal truth infer, it was not one of party or sect. Nor was less diversity observable in the several classes who had pressed forward. The names comprehended all classes as well as persuasions. The names of the Catholic hierarchy and clergy were to be seen intermingled with those of the principal inhabitants, merchants, and traders of each place. The following Corporate bodies had also signed it:—The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of Dublin; the Mayor and twenty-nine Members of the Corporation of Cork; the Mayor, and fifteen Aldermen, and Town Council of Sligo; the Mayor, and twenty-four Aldermen, and Town Council of Kilkenny; the Chairman, and twenty-four Commissioners of Longford; the Chairman and seven Commissioners of Armagh; the Chairman, and fifteen Commissioners of Dundalk; by fifteen Commissioners of Galway, the Chairman, and fifteen Commissioners of Kells; by ten of the Commissioners, and by the Clergy, and Poor Law Guardians of Mallow; the Mayor, and twenty-four of the Aldermen, and Town Councillors, and Burgesses of Clonmel; by nine of the Commissioners of Kinsale; and by the Chairman and eighteen Commissioners of New Ross. Every precaution, as had already been stated, had been taken to guard against unauthorised and fictitious signatures. Each person signing was required to add his place of residence. Every care was taken that the subject matter of the petition should be explained fully before the parties were allowed to sign, and that no name should be permitted to be affixed without the fullest consent of each individual. He did not believe there had ever come from Ireland a Petition where more scrupulous accuracy had been sought and observed. He was quite sure there had never appeared before that House from Ireland a Petition signed by a greater number. He now turned to the Petition itself, and though he was debarred by the regulations of the House from reading it, and going into any discussion on its details, and though he had determined to bring later the whole matter by a substantive Motion before the House, he could not pass by so momentous a document without slightly referring to its several allegations. The Petitioners refer to the meetings held in various parts of Ireland to exercise their equal right of petitioning Parliament for the Repeal of an Act of Parliament which they considered prejudicial to their interests; that although several millions of people attended those meetings, and no breach of the peace occurred; that although those meetings continued to be held for several months, no declaration of their illegality by the functionaries of the Crown, or of the determination of Government to suppress them, had been made until the 8th of October, when the meeting at Clontarf had been announced, and the mode in which the Government interfered to prevent that meeting, the Petitioners complained of as being an unlawful interference with the rights of the people. They then referred to the late State trials, and complained that the most unjustifiable means had been resorted to by the law officers of the Crown to procure a conviction. They complained of the striking out the names of the Roman Catholics from the panel, and of the statement of the Attorney-General, that if the Bill against the traversers were found "the would undertake to establish the existence of as wicked and foul a conspiracy as ever existed in this Empire." This they alleged was calculated to produce a prejudicial effect on the minds of the Jury, against the traversers. That statement, however, the

Attorney-General had failed to prove. They also complained of the charge of the Lord Chief Justice to the Jury, as being partial against the traversers, and they further declared that if an inquiry were granted, they would undertake to prove that the Chief Justice had invaded the province of the Jury, by expressing an opinion as to the fact, while in doing so he suppressed every thing that was favourable to the traversers—and that all the circumstances connected with those proceedings were calculated, and had had the effect of inducing great distrust in the minds of the Irish people in the administration of justice in Ireland—that they infringed the right of Trial by Jury, and the right of meeting to petition Parliament—and they prayed that an immediate inquiry might be granted with a view of enabling them to establish the truth of the allegations contained in the Petition. This was not a mere Petition to this House—an ordinary complaint of grievance; but a solemn remonstrance—a dignified but determined protest, in respectful but not less firm language, of the people of Ireland, against what they considered the greatest wrong which could be inflicted—the greatest injury which could be aimed at the liberties of a country. With regard to the circumstances of the times, he should not now break through the regulations of the House by referring to them; indeed it was needless; they were present to every man's mind. He trusted, however, he had said enough to justify the intention then expressed, that, on an early day, he would move for a Committee to take the charges of the Petition into consideration. He moved that the Petition be brought up.

Petition brought up, read, and laid on the Table.

WEST INDIA IMMIGRATION.] Mr. Ver-non Smith, understanding from the papers laid upon the Table of the House, that inquiries had been instituted by the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, addressed to the Governors of Trinidad, Jamaica and Guiana, as to whether it would be advisable to relax the rule which prevailed of only admitting a proportion of women, amounting to one-third, in any Immigration which might take place into those Colonies; and also understanding that answers had been received favourable to such relaxation from the Governors of the Colonies, wished to know whether the noble

Lord had acted upon the information thus obtained?

Lord Stanley replied, that in consequence of communications from Sir Leonard stating that great difficulty had resulted from the restriction alluded to, prevailing upon men who were desirous of immigrating to West India Colonies to go thither, he had written to the Governors of Jamaica, Trinidad, and Guiana, to enquire whether, in their opinion, a relaxation of the rule as to the proportion of women to be admitted, would be advisable. Their answers had only been received four or five days ago: and, although the papers containing them had been immediately laid before the House, no actual steps had yet been taken in consequence of the information communicated in them.

IMPORT DUTIES.] Mr. Esart rose to move the following Resolutions:—

“That it is indispensable to the maintenance and extension of the Trade of this country, that those duties be repealed which press on the raw materials of manufacture, especially the raw materials of the woollen and cotton trade. That it is expedient also that those Duties be greatly reduced which press on articles of interchange in return for our manufactures, especially such articles of interchange as, at the same time, concern the subsistence of the people; being (besides corn, which is the subject of superior and separate consideration) such articles as tea, sugar, coffee, bacon, butter, and cheese. That it is expedient that those Duties also be greatly reduced which, by their amount, encourage smuggling; being at once injurious to the revenue and dangerous to the morality of the country; such as the Duties on tobacco, silk goods, and foreign spirits. That whatever temporary deficiency of revenue be caused by such reduction, ought, until the revenue regain its former amount, to be sustained by the property, and not by the trade and labour of the country.”

He conceived that there were many advantages attending the bringing forward and promoting the discussion of commercial measures of a general nature. Public opinion on such occasions cast its shadow before, and that which an individual Member of the House advocated as expressive of public opinion might hereafter become the subject of Parliamentary legislation. It was with that conviction that he brought forward his Motion. He asked the House to consent to the proposition of removing duties which pressed upon the raw materials

rial of manufactures. In doing so, he asked them to sanction a principle already introduced by the right hon. Gentleman, the First Lord of the Treasury, but he asked them to carry it further. It was generally admitted to be impolitic to tax the raw elements of our manufactures, but if there be any time at which it was most impolitic, it was in a time of peace, and at the same time of national difficulty. Our cotton manufacturers had to resist a competition almost unexampled in the annals of the trade. Whether we looked to America, to Germany, or to France, we found that our manufacturing prosperity was in danger; and he therefore thought, that even on that ground alone, the House was bound to reduce the duties on the raw material of manufactures. He maintained, however, that such a step was particularly politic in time of peace, because then prices necessarily became low; and, in proportion as the prices of raw material fell, the proportion of duty to the cost price of production increased. Low-priced cotton was also extensively used, to the duties upon which the same argument would apply. Much of the wool also used now was low-priced wool, coming from the banks of the Plate. A similar sort of wool was also imported from the Mediterranean; and as such commodities came to be more generally in use, the duty upon them was more severely felt than when it fell upon the high-priced German wool. The consequence was, that the wools of South America and the Mediterranean were generally exported, to be manufactured in other countries, and thus to enrich foreign manufacturers. He conceived, then, that he had good reason for calling upon them to repeal the duties affecting the raw materials of manufactures. This was the first part of his proposition, and he maintained, that by the repeal of those duties, they would add to the employment of the people. He wished, too, to increase their means of subsistence, and with this view he called upon the House to extend our commerce in tea, sugar, and coffee, and also in bacon, cheese, and butter. These might be called the household articles of commerce and they were unquestionably of the greatest importance to the poor. America had abstained from levying duties on the articles of tea and coffee, and he asked the House to follow the example thus set to it. But, besides, we were now anticipating an extension in our trade with China; but no such anticipations could be realised if they did not enable the Chinese to give us something in return for our manufactures. We must, if we increased the sale of our manufactures in China, take an increased quantity of some article in return from them, and that article must be tea. The consumption of tea in this country had remarkably increased of late years, and so had that of coffee and sugar. These articles had become of more importance to the people than they had ever been, for they had acquired those habits of temperance which were so honourable to them, but so unknown to their forefathers. Taking the whole amount of tea consumed in this country at 40,000,000lbs., about 22,000,000lbs. consisted of that sort called Congou, which was principally consumed by the poorer classes, and, therefore, a reduction in the duties would be a great relief to the poor. The present duty was 2s. 1d. per lb. upon tea of all sorts, and of course it pressed with greater severity upon the more coarse than upon the finer qualities of tea consumed by the rich. When the tea duties were altered, upon the opening of the Chinese trade, a discriminating rate of duty, favourable to the import of the teas consumed by the poor, was attempted to be introduced. It was proposed to divide the classes of tea imported into three sorts, to be charged respectively with 2s., 1s. 6d., and 1s. per lb. of duty. Great difficulty was anticipated, however, in judging of the qualities of the teas; and at length an uniform duty was suggested, and which was the parent of the present duty of 2s. 1d. Now, whether we looked to the prospects of our trade in China, or to the interests of our own poor, a reduction in the tea duties appeared equally just and politic. When the duties on tea were reduced in 1768, the consumption was doubled. In 1784, the duty was 1s., or about 67 per cent. Mr. Pitt reduced that duty, and the consumption rose immediately from 5,000,000lbs. to 10,000,000lbs., and in two years from 5,000,000lbs. to 17,000,000lbs. By reducing the present duties on tea, they would be enabling the poor to use not only a cheaper but a purer beverage. He would only allude slightly to the subject of the sugar duties, but he would maintain that these duties were most oppressively felt by the poor consumers, and on looking over the annual circulars printed with respect to the trade, he found accounts of a great increase in the quantity of impurities mixed up with the sugar. The lowest-priced sugars contained nearly 10 per cent. adulterated matter. With respect to coffee it was well known that the consumption had greatly increased. In 1811 there was only one coffee-house in London—that was to say, one establishment devoted to the sale of that beverage only—while at present the number amounted to upwards of 2,000. It was well known that in 1801 the duty on coffee was a very high one, amounting to 1s. 6d. per lb. The consumption, then, in this country did not exceed one pound per head for all the population. In 1811 the duty was lowered to 1s., and the consumption increased to five pounds per head. As long as the duty remained at 1s., the consumption was stationary; but when the former was reduced to 6d. per lb., he need not remind the House how rapidly the latter increased. The case of coffee was, indeed, a remarkable instance of the equality preserved between the reduction of duty and the increase of consumption. The consumption was always in the inverse ratio of the duty. The right hon. Baronet opposite had, indeed, reduced in some degree, the duty upon coffee in his Tariff; but although he reduced it in amount, he had not done so in proportion. In fact, the position of foreign coffee was rendered more unfavourable than before. Now, he asked for a reduction of duties upon tea, sugar, and coffee. He might be blamed for introducing so many articles into one proposition; but he believed, that by the increased consumption of one of them, the effect of any reduction of duty on another, would be fully made up to the Revenue. He had asked them to remove the duties upon the raw materials of manufactures—to lower the duties upon articles of subsistence; and he now asked them to turn their attention to those duties which had always been held as incentives to smuggling. Not a day passed but some poor seaman was dragged up at Liverpool, on the charge of having contraband tobacco in his possession. To put the trade upon something like a fair footing in the article of brandy, the duty ought to be reduced one-half. That this was the most expedient course, was proved by the fact, that in former cases, where the duties were reduced, the Revenue increased. Chemistry was made subservient

to smuggling; and brandy was introduced in considerable quantities, in the shape of naphtha. It would be a great advantage to this country if brandy was introduced in a larger quantity, for it was wanted for many pharmaceutical purposes. Mr. Huskisson reduced the duty on silk 30 per cent. ad valorem; but this was too high by half. He came now to the articles of butter and cheese. On the one there was a duty of 20s. per cwt., and on the other one of 10s. 6d. He could not understand, when the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) reduced the duties on salt provisions, why he omitted those two most important articles to the poor. He was afraid it was because the right hon. Gentleman found the cheese interest too strong to contend against. The indirect taxation which pressed so much on industry, was owing to the ascendency of the landed interest. Sir R. Walpole gave the sanction of his authority to this principle; but in the concluding years of his Administration, he acted on the views so long maintained by the present Opposition.

CORN LAWS.] The Earl of Radnor was anxious to notice a charge which had been thrown out against the manner in which a petition that he had recently presented to the House, from the County of Somerset, in favour of Free Trade, had been carried. It was said that persons had been sent, at the expense of the Anti-Corn-Law League, from Taunton to Bridgewater, by whose means the petition had been carried, although the meeting had been summoned for a very different object. It was true that many persons friendly to the principles advocated by the League were present, but they were not sent there in the manner alleged. At the time of presenting the petition to which he alluded, he had adverted to some observations made by a noble Lord, with reference to the Anti-Corn-Law League, at a meeting in favour of the Corn Laws, held at York. It had been supposed that he alluded, on that occasion, to Lord Feversham, as the speaker. Such, however, was not the fact. He referred to observations made by the Earl of Harewood.

The Duke of Richmond thought that from what the noble Earl himself said, it might be inferred that a great number of persons were at the meeting who would not have been present if some extraordinary influence had not been used. The noble Earl did not deny that many members of the Anti-Corn-Law League were present, and it was admitted, that by waiting till the meeting grew thinner, they carried their point. He believed that they considered this a great triumph, and he fancied that most of their triumphs were achieved in the same way. He was glad to find that they were angry, because they now discovered that the farmers had come to a determination to oppose their machinations, and support the existing Corn Laws.

The Duke of Buccleuch hoped that he might be permitted to make one observation, as a relation of his own (the Earl of Harewood) had been alluded to by the Noble Earl. His noble relation had certainly made a speech at the York meeting against the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-Law League, which speech contained the statement, that a farmer who had spoken against the Corn-Law League, had had his stacks set on fire the following night; but he could assure the noble Earl, that what his noble relation stated on that occasion, he stated as a fact that had appeared in a newspaper.

The Earl of Radnor said, that on reading the statement made by the noble Earl, as given in the Leeds Mercury, in which paper some commentaries appeared at the same time, on the expressions used by the noble Earl, he wrote to the noble Earl to ascertain whether the statement was accurate, and he received a note from him signifying that the report in the Leeds Mercury of what he had said was correct. Now there was a direct accusation made in those expressions, against the Anti-Corn-Law League, intimating that their proceedings led to incendiarianism.

Lord Wharncliffe could not avoid remarking that the Anti-Corn-Law League attacked the Aristocracy, not in measured language, but with considerable bitterness of expression, and he was not a little surprised to find that persons who thus acted, should be so thin-skinned themselves, as not to be able to bear strong language when applied to themselves. It appeared that his noble Friend had made a statement, at the York meeting, that a farmer, who had spoken against the Anti-Corn-Law League, had had his corn-stacks burnt the following night, and this the Anti-Corn-Law League could not endure. If that party used strong language, they must expect strong language being applied to them in retaliation.

Other petitions being presented on the subject of the Corn Laws,

The Earl of Radnor rose, and begged to offer a few words in reply to the observations which had been made a short time ago, by the Lord President of the Council, who expressed his surprise that persons who had themselves made attacks, should be so thin-skinned that they could not bear to be attacked in their turn. If the Corn-Law League had sinned, they had not been without imitators; but he (Lord Radnor) was not aware that the Anti-Corn-Law League had been guilty of making such attacks as those alluded to. The noble Earl said, that his noble Friend (Lord Harewood) had stated a fact, but he denied that it was calculated to lead to the inference that the Anti-Corn-Law League had incited parties to incendiarianism. Now he (the Earl of Radnor) had, as he had before said, called the attention of the noble Earl to the paragraph in the newspaper in which the meeting was reported, and the noble Earl admitted that it was correct. With regard to the Anti-Corn-Law League not being able to bear remarks on their proceedings, he begged to remind noble Lords that this was not the only language of the kind that had been used towards them. Among other things said of them, a Gentleman who for many years had represented the County of Lincoln, said that if the Anti-Corn-Law League came into Lincoln again, it was likely they would be thrown over the bridge into the river.

The Duke of Buccleuch observed, that the Earl of Harewood admitted that the newspaper report of what he had said was correct, but he did not admit the inference drawn from it in a newspaper article; the noble Earl did not impute, nor did he intend to impute to the League, that they incited to incendiarism.

The Earl of Radnor said that the words of the noble Earl were—"There are other views in the Anti-Corn-Law League agitation, than those which meet the eye of the public. What happened to a farmer the other day in Lincolnshire, or Norfolk, I forget which? He attended a meeting, and openly stated his opinions against the Anti-Corn-Law League. His stacks and his crops were burnt that night." If that did not mean an inference that the League incited to incendiarism, he did not know what it meant.

Lord Wharncliffe said, upon the face of the noble Earl's own report of the words used, there was no such charge. Two separate facts were stated.

The Earl of Radnor: Yes; but the one follows immediately on the other.

Lord Beaumont said, he was present at the time the noble Earl made the speech, and he could distinctly state, that no idea was raised, among those on the platform, of any intention on the part of the noble Earl to make such a charge against the League. The noble Earl alluded to the violent language used at the League meetings, and to the fact of the stacks being burnt, but he never implied that there was any intention on the part of the League to incite incendiarism.

The Marquis of Normanby said, he was neither an Anti-Corn-Law Leaguer, nor an anti-anti, but he must express his regret that a noble Earl, not so accustomed to public speaking as the noble Lord (Beaumont) was, should have stated two facts in such close succession, as to lead to the inference imputed to him.

The Duke of Richmond entertained no doubt whatever, that Lord Harewood was not aware that the House of Lords was to be made a court of appeal, to consider a speech that he had made in the City of York. He (the Duke of Richmond) hoped that his noble Friend (Lord Radnor) would recommend the Anti-Corn-Law League to be more guarded in their expressions than they had hitherto been. His noble Friend had stated that an hon. Gentleman at Lincoln had recommended that if any of the Anti-Corn-Law League should appear in that City, that they should be thrown over the bridge; now, if the hon. Gentleman to whom allusion had been thus made, had said so, all that he (the Duke of Richmond) could say was, that he would recommend them not to go.

HANDLOOM WEAVERS.] Lord Lilford rose, pursuant to notice, to present a Petition from 5,000 inhabitants of Leigh, in Lancashire, praying for a Committee of Inquiry into the condition of the Handloom Weavers. The noble Lord stated, that the statements of the Petitioners related chiefly to low wages, unjust abatements, and the want of employment. They complained also that the Arbitration Act was not properly carried out. The noble Lord read a number of papers for the purpose of showing that the Silk Weavers were subject to unjust abatements of wages, and that the law, as at present existing, was not sufficient to protect the workmen—justice being neither so speedy nor so economical as it ought to be. The petitioners, he observed, came before their Lordships with a statement of grievances, which, looking to the condition of the manufacturing districts, to the state of the markets in those districts, and to other circumstances, would, he thought, justify the Government in holding out some indication, however slight, of an intention to take their case into consideration, with a view to remedy those grievances. As he understood the noble Earl opposite intended to make a statement in reference to the petition, he would not move for a Committee. He would only assure the noble Earl he had every reason to believe that the allegations of the petitioners could be distinctly proved. The noble Lord concluded by presenting the Petition, in which the petitioners prayed for some legislative enactments to protect them from the unjust encroachments of unprincipled masters, for the establishment of a board of trade, composed of masters and workmen, and for a Committee to inquire into the system of cruel and unjust abatements of which they complained.

noble Lord did not intend to move for a Committee, as he (Lord Dalhousie) should have felt it an ungracious task to attempt to persuade their Lordships from granting it as it would have been his duty to do. But the case of the Handloom Silk Weavers had so frequently been the subject of inquiry before Committees of both Houses, and more particularly by a Commission whose labours extended over three years, their distress was so well known, and the result of those inquiries had proved so clearly that the remedies which the parties themselves had looked for were beyond the reach of legislative power, that to attempt now to renew the appointment of a Committee would only excite and encourage hopes which, ending, as they inevitably and unfortunately must, in disappointment, would only aggravate the distress and increase the difficulties which the Handloom Weavers were from time to time unhappily involved in. The noble Lord did not enter into any general statement of their case, but restricted himself to the point, as stated by the petitioners in their memorial, of those abatements of wages which they alleged to be unjustly made by masters in the oppressive exercise of their power; and he was not inclined to dispute any of the statements made by the noble Lord on that point. He believed that documents at present on their Lordships' Table would afford sufficient proof of the partial existence of such a system; and show, that although a great number of manufacturers were free from any charge upon the subject, yet that there were some who did take advantage of the necessities of the workmen, and deduct an undue proportion of their wages. The matter was one which had already engaged the attention of the Government, and been for some time under their consideration; but, as the House must be aware, it was necessary to proceed with extreme caution in a law which affected a trade scattered over the country as this was, and governed by regulations which were as various as the localities themselves. It was necessary gravely to consider all the evidence that had been collected upon the subject before they could venture to make alterations in the law, however plausible they might be, so that in removing the grievances in one locality they might not make the matter worse in another. He would give no positive pledge for the introduction of a Bill to amend that Clause of the Arbitration Act, to which the noble Lord adverted but he could assure the noble Lord that the question would be considered without loss of time, and that the sincerest desire existed on the part of the Government to remedy such imperfections as might be found in that Act. If after a deliberate consideration of the whole case it should be found that the difficulties were such as to render any attempt at alteration undesirable, his noble Friend would, of course, have notice to that effect, and it would then be open to him to renew his Motion for a Committee of Inquiry, or adopt such other course as he might think best.

Lord Lilford thanked the noble Earl for his assurance that the question would be anxiously considered, particularly as he admitted the existence of the grievance of abatement of wages in the district from which the Petition emanated.

The Earl of Dalhousie wished to be perfectly accurate in his statement. He admitted the existence of the grievance of abatement of wages; but he did not say that it existed in the particular place alluded to, because the inquiry had not been carried into that particular place.

House adjourned.

WRECKS OF THE NERBUDDA AND ANN.] Dr. Bowring wished to inquire of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government whether any reply had been received from the Government of Peking in answer to the application made for the punishment of the authorities of the Island of Formosa who ordered the murder of the crews of the Nerbudda and Ann?

Sir R. Peel said, that the two vessels had been wrecked on the Island of Formosa, and that after the sailors had defended themselves for a time, they had been taken prisoners, subjected to great privations, and many of them put to death, —whether by the Chinese authorities or not he did not know. Sir Henry Pottinger made a representation to the Emperor of China on the subject, and it was stated that the Chinese Government viewed the unfortunate transaction with great regret, and had ordered that punishment should be inflicted on the parties who sanctioned the murder. Upon the whole, the statement made on the subject was satisfactory. The declaration of the Emperor was one quite becoming (the ruler of a great country. The Proclamation was inserted by the order of the Emperor in the Peking Gazette, and Sir H. Pottinger spoke of it in the highest terms. He stated, that he had seen with the greatest pleasure the decree of the Chinese Government on the subject of the British subjects who had been unjustly put to death in the Island of Formosa, and was sure that the proof of a sense of justice which it displayed would be highly satisfactory to his Government. He had seen a translation of the Proclamation, and he thought that a stronger desire to do justice had never been shown in a civilized state. The Emperor stated in the Proclamation

“That he had been deceived by the Chinese authorities of Formosa, who represented that the Island had been invaded by the British crews with arms in their hands, and that they were taken and had suffered as prisoners of war. He had ordered the Governor-General of the district to institute an inquiry, and in the result of finding that the officers had deceived him and falsified their statements, he had ordered all those who by their false representations had obtained a promotion of rank to be degraded from it and handed over to the board of punishment.”

The Emperor went on to say,

“We cherish the Chinese and foreigners with equal beneficence, and will not allow those who have become amenable to punishment to escape because they are accused by foreigners. It is our desire to act with strict justice and impartiality.”

The culprits had been disgraced after having been convicted by the regular authorities; and the tone of the Proclamation indicated a sincere intention to facilitate intercourse with civilized nations.

INCENDIARY FIRES.] Colonel Fox wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, if he could state any steps which might have been taken in consequence of the recent numerous fires that had occurred in Suffolk? The Chairman of Quarter Sessions in that County had lately, in addressing the Grand Jury said,

“It might be asked why the rural police had not prevented these crimes; but it was impossible to suppose, that if the rural police were even more numerous than they were, they would be enabled to prevent such offences; nay, even if the whole of the metropolitan police were sent down to Suffolk it would be impossible to give security against those outrages; unless, indeed, a policeman stood sentry in every homestead all night.”

Sir J. Graham deeply regretted that so many fires had recently taken place in Suffolk; and, unhappily, of such offences it was too difficult to detect the perpetrators. He had deemed it his duty to send down assistance from the Metropolitan Force, but as yet no detection had taken place.

Lord Henniker only the other night had been called up to witness a dreadful conflagration within a few gunshots of the house in which he had been sleeping. The Magistrates and the Police had adopted every means of detection, though hitherto, unhappily, unsuccessfully. They had, of course, communicated with the Home Secretary, and from him had received every assistance. He, himself, should continue to afford to the right hon. Gentleman, as he had already done, all the information in his power on this painful subject.

THE ARMY.] Mr. Gill rose pursuant to notice,

"With a view to obviate an erroneous impression produced by the statement of the Secretary at War on the 12th instant, to call the attention of the House to the detention of Captain Brewster, of the 76th Regiment, under arrest for eight months, without any charge being made against him; and to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any objection to communicate to the House the order from the Horse-Guards for that officer's release and admonition."

It would be remembered that about ten days ago, in reply to a question in reference to the detention of two officers, Captain Brewster and another, of the seventy-sixth regiment, the right hon. and gallant Officer (Sir Henry Hardinge) stated that the cause of that detention was, that a junior officer had challenged a senior officer, and that the senior officer, having accepted that challenge, had committed an offence, and had been consequently arrested. The right hon. and gallant Officer was also reported to have stated, that as both officers had violated their duty in an unjustifiable manner, the Commander-in-chief had punished them by an arrest at large; but that the Commander-in-chief bearing in mind the long period they had been under arrest, intended to release them after a suitable admonition. Now, what he was anxious to show was, that that statement, so far as it referred to Captain Brewster, was incorrect. He need not say that he was sure the inaccuracy did not attach to the right hon. and gallant Officer whom everybody in that House, and out of it, knew to be incapable of stating anything but what he believed to be fully borne out by facts. The effect of that inaccuracy might, however, be injurious to the character of Captain Brewster, and he (Mr. Gill) therefore, now asked for some further explanation, in order to remove any imputation which might, in consequence of that statement, rest upon that officer, and he was sure that no one would be more anxious to remove such imputation than the right hon. and gallant Officer. The two officers referred to were, it appeared, ordered under arrest by another officer, who was present at some proceeding which had taken place between them, and who had subsequently communicated the fact and the circumstances which had occasioned the arrest, to the commanding officer. Now, he (Mr. Gill) found, by the Articles of War, that no officer was liable to arrest except for an offence committed, and that it was the duty of a person putting an officer under arrest immediately to take steps for instituting an inquiry by court-martial or otherwise. When he stated to the House that Captain Brewster had not been guilty of any offence deserving punishment or scarcely arrest, he thought he was not asking too much when he asked for the removal of an imputation which might militate against his reputation as an officer, or his character as a gentleman. After being five months under arrest, Captain Brewster wrote a letter to his commanding officer, begging it might be forwarded, through the major-general in command of the district, to the Commander-in-Chief, entreating to know under what charge he was detained, and stating that if any offence was charged against him, it might be subjected to whatever tribunal the Commander-in-Chief might think fit to select. To that letter no reply had been given. Subsequently two letters were written by Sir David Brewster—one of them to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and the other to Lord Fitzroy Somerset. The noble Duke, in his reply to Sir David Brewster, said he was aware his son was under an arrest, but that certain regulations were being prepared to suppress Duelling, and it was intended that the two officers (Captain Brewster and the other) should be made subject to them when completed. Notwithstanding this, these two officers were continued under arrest three months longer. There was one other circumstance he wished to advert to, which was, that during the first six weeks of their arrest these officers had been confined to their room, and were only liberated in consequence of the medical certificate of the surgeon that they were suffering in their health from their close confinement. He thought the House would agree with him that this severe punishment was uncalled for, and that some explanation was due to the character of Captain Brewster. He wished to know whether the right hon. Baronet had any objection to communicate to the House a copy of the order of the Horse Guards for the liberation of these Gentlemen, and the admonition given to them.

Sir H. Hardinge would at once state that he could not produce the paper asked for; first, as it was contrary to precedent thus to communicate to the House of Commons matter of detail connected with Military Administration; and secondly, because the case had originated in a private quarrel, the nature of which would necessarily be disclosed in the publication of the admonition issued from the Commander-in-Chief, and the revival of which after it had been honourably adjusted could answer no good purpose. He had attached no imputation to the senior of the officers concerned beyond his having violated military law in taking a challenge from a junior who had conducted himself in a highly improper manner, which, however, the senior had generously forgiven and had become reconciled to his adversary. No doubt generally, in ordinary cases, the Commander-in-Chief would cause inquiry into the circumstances; but in the present instance the quarrel had been purely private.

Mr. Gill said the explanation had been perfectly satisfactory.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.]
House resolved into Committee on the Factories Bill.

The consideration of Clause 2 was resumed.

Mr. Egerton moved that the word "silk" be omitted from the second clause. The provisions of the Bill, he thought, would have a most injurious effect, if applied to the silk manufacture. He did not wish by a side-wind to thwart the benevolent intentions of any party: but the persons connected with the silk trade were anxious that the distinctions hitherto recognized between that and other trades should be continued; and that regulations applied to them should be applied to them only, and not comprehended in regulations applicable to other branches of manufacture. He adverted to the progress of legislation on the subject of the silk trade, and observed, that the present was the first time that it had been included in one general measure affecting other trades, and he was at a loss to understand on what grounds. The general provisions of the present Bill would be very injurious to the silk manufacture, on account of the peculiar nature of that manufacture. We understood the hon. Gentleman also to observe, that a great number of children were required in the silk manufacture; that they were not exposed to unpleasant effluvia in the manufacture, and that the masters afforded every facility for education. He thought it necessary to legislate cautiously with regard to such great interests.

Sir J. Graham assured his hon. Friend that he was anxious to deal with caution in reference to the great manufacturing interest brought under the consideration of the Committee, and he also admitted that the silk manufacture had been treated distinctly from the other manufactures included in the Bill. The effect of his hon. Friend's proposition was to take the silk manufacture out of the operation of the present Bill; and to that he could not agree. If there was any portion of the present legislation more defensible than another it was that which extended legislative protection to children. They were comparatively defenceless, and did not exercise with respect to labour an independent will; and the poverty of the parents induced them too often, in spite of their natural affection, to overwork their children, in order to obtain a larger amount of wages. Thus the Legislature appeared to have thought, and its efforts on this subject—at first confined, at the commencement of this century, to apprentices—were subsequently extended to children generally, if employed in factories. At the present moment, in respect to the silk trade, there was no limitation whatever with regard to the age at which children might be employed, and they might be employed at the early age of six or seven years. There was a limitation with respect to the time of their employment, which could not extend beyond ten hours a day, from the time they entered the factory until they attained the age of thirteen years. There was also another regulation to the effect, that children employed in silk manufactories did not require that certificate of education which was necessary in other cases. He, therefore, thought it was important that with respect to these points the children employed in the silk trade should be brought under the general operation of the Bill; and such was the opinion formed by the Committee which sat in 1841. There was, however, a broad difference between the various processes attending the silk manufacture. The Committee to which he had referred reported that a measure ought to be adopted for the purpose of bringing the children employed in the silk trade within the law, and that they saw no reason why the spinning process of the silk trade should not be placed under the same regulations as spinning in cotton, flax, and worsted mills. With respect to the other processes of "winding" and "throwing," the Committee came to a different recommendation, and stated, that from the great number of children absolutely required, it would be extremely difficult to introduce with regard to those processes the same regulations as were applicable to cotton and other mills. Thus, the Committee in 1841, recommended that the children in the spinning process of the silk manufacture should be brought under the operation of the law as applicable to cotton factories. To give full effect to this recommendation of the Committee, he had to state the course which he should propose to be adopted. He must resist the proposition of his hon. Friend, which would take the silk manufacture entirely out of the operation of the present Bill, and should propose to retain the word "silk" where it now stood; but with reference to the 75th clause, which alluded particularly to the silk manufacture, he would state what he intended to propose with respect to the processes of "winding" and "throwing" silk. They must bear in mind that a very large proportion of children to adults, he believed a proportion of four to one, was employed in this part of the manufacture. He should therefore, propose, instead of limiting the clause as it was now limited, to omit the words "1st. day of October, 1846." The consequence would be that no children in silk manufactories would be employed more than six-and-a-half hours a-day, under the general provisions of the Bill, between the ages of eight and eleven years; but between the ages of eleven and thirteen years the children might be employed for ten hours in "winding" and "throwing" silk; and when they passed the age of thirteen years they would return under the general provisions of the Bill; and the period of their employment would be limited in accordance with whatever decision might be come to in respect to the hours of labour. He had reason to believe that this arrangement would be satisfactory to the silk manufacturers generally; he hoped it would be so to the hon. Member, and that the Motion would be of consequence withdrawn.

Mr. Labouchere had felt some apprehension with regard to this particular clause, but he thought after what the right hon. Baronet had said, that the objections of the silk trade had been fairly met, and that the present proposition would doubtless give general satisfaction. He agreed that it was not desirable to see the silk trade excluded from the provisions of a general Factory Bill. If the Legislature were to secure to the children the blessings of education and to guard them against overwork, it was surely quite as necessary that the Bill should apply to labour in silk factories as to labour in any other Factories.

Mr. Grimsditch expressed an opinion that the proposition of the right hon. Baronet would prove satisfactory to the trade.

Sir G. Strickland had been a member of the Committee appointed in 1841 to consider the effect of labour upon children in the silk factories, and he must say, that he had been greatly surprised at hearing the interpretation which the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham) had put upon the Report which the Committee had presented. If he remembered right, it was almost the universal impression amongst the members of that Committee that the silk manufacturers had made out no case whatever for exemption from the provisions of this enactment. It was proved before that Committee that the children were employed in rooms which were extremely hot; that they were employed twelve hours a-day; that during the whole of that time they were either running about or standing on their legs, and that very often they did not cover, in the course of the twelve hours, less than from fifteen to twenty miles of ground. One surgeon, a gentleman of Derby, whose evidence he perfectly recollected, had stated that he was employed by the masters in his district, and that his opinions were very strong against any limitation of the hours of labour. He said that twelve hours' exertions was healthy and useful to the children. Some Member of the Committee asked him if he was the father of any young children himself, to which he replied in the affirmative. "Do you make them stand on their legs twelve hours a-day for the good of their health, and walk twenty miles besides?" was the next interrogatory, to which the only rejoinder was that "they were not labourers." It was impossible that the House should fail to see that the children could not endure such Herculean tasks without contortion and deformity. He was glad the right hon. Baronet had conceded so much as he had; he only wished he had conceded more. He feared, too, that his arrangement would be generally liable to invasion, and he particularly referred to the intended difference between the hours of labour of children under and above eleven years of age, as opening a door for fraud in every possible shape.

Mr. G. Banks said, that if the hon. Member for Cheshire persisted in pressing his motion he should certainly divide with him. He was the representative of a body of persons in Dorsetshire who were engaged in silk-throwing. On their part he had made a representation to the right hon. Baronet, not claiming any exemption from the protection very properly bestowed by Parliament upon young persons, but stating that the difference between their manufactures and the woollen and cotton manufactures was so great, that the regulations which applied to the one could scarcely be considered applicable to the others. The reply which he had received from the right hon. Baronet embodied the proposal the right hon. Baronet had made that night, and was, he was bound to say, satisfactory to his constituents. At the same time, however, he thought it would be better to leave them altogether out of the Bill, and he should therefore vote for this amendment if it were pressed to a division.

Mr. Strutt thought the hon. Baronet, the Member for Preston, had no doubt unintentionally made most extraordinary mis-statements respecting the Report of the Committee of which he had been a Member in 1841. There was hardly a word which the hon. Baronet had stated which could be borne out. The hon. Baronet had first of all told them that the children engaged in the silk trade worked in a very high temperature. Now, it happened that precisely the reverse was the fact; for, whilst in the cotton trade the temperature was necessarily high, in the silk trade it was necessarily low, and indeed the silk manufacture could not by any possibility be carried on in an unduly heated room.

The hon. Baronet had further said, that it had been proved by a surgeon belonging to the town which he had the honour to represent, that children in silk factories had been known to run from fifteen to twenty miles a-day. Now, he had a perfect recollection of the evidence referred to, and what was the fact? The surgeon in question stated, no doubt, that he had known children run backwards and forwards from fifteen to twenty miles a-day in pursuance of their occupation as silk-workers, but he had stated the circumstance as a curious fact; and he had said that it occurred, not in a silk-mill—not in any factory that came within the scope of the operations of this enactment—but in a mill for the manufacture of sewing-silk, which was conducted on somewhat the same principle as rope-making, and in which it was necessary for children to run from one end to the other of the building many times during the hours they were employed. The hon. Baronet had also said, that it was a common practice to work children in silk-mills from twelve to fourteen hours a-day, and that that labour was stated not to be injurious to health. Now, there was not a single silk-mill in Derby which worked more than ten hours a day, nor, he believed, was there one proprietor of a silk mill in that town who desired to work more. As to the question which had been put to the surgeon about his own children, he did not recollect that circumstance, but he trusted he had shown that the hon. Member had not sufficiently refreshed his memory upon those subjects to enable him to give quotations with any assurance of accuracy. Upon the general question he (Mr. Strutt) must own that, though he would rather the silk trade had been left out of the Bill altogether, yet that upon the whole he was satisfied with the right hon. Baronet's proposal, and trusted, therefore, that the amendment now before them would be withdrawn.

Mr. T. Egerton said, that the general feeling being that the proposal of the Government was satisfactory to the trade, he would not attempt to press the Amendment he had brought forward.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8. No young person or female adult to be employed in a factory in any one day more than — hours.

to several Members of the House that he was sure that the manufacturers in Frome, the town which he represented, were satisfied to employ women and children ten hours a-day. At the time he had said this he had felt a conviction that the fact was as he had stated it, but he had not visited the town for three or four years, and, consequently, was not, it seemed, so well aware of all the facts relating to the employment of its labourers as he should have been. The truth was, as he was now instructed, that the children were altogether excluded from employment in the factories at Frome, and that the labour of young persons was substituted. The men spinners worked there for twelve hours a-day, the women and young persons attending the spindles. He was told that a reduction of two hours from the labour period of the day would inflict a serious injury upon the export trade of the town, particularly at a time when the Belgians were so actively competing with them. He felt it right to make this explanation; and he thanked the House for the attention with which they had heard it.

Mr. V. Smith said, that upon the words, "no female of any age," in this Clause had turned in fact the whole of the discussion on a previous occasion, as far as the proposal of his noble Friend was concerned. The chief argument was this—that they were restricting labour in the manufactories, and thereby preventing the prosperity and increase of manufactures, and the competition with foreign nations. It appeared to him that the principal, and indeed the only new restriction in the Act, was the labour of female adults. In two instances the House had decided that they would interfere in behalf of the helpless; not indeed between master and child, but between parent and child, upon the principle that the parents were in such a condition as to make their children frequently, to the injury of health, support them by their earnings. The only argument made use of by the right hon. Baronet the other evening was in favour of the restriction as to married women—that labour in factories might be injurious to women with child, or married women; but he had heard no argument to establish a difference between a man above twenty-one, and a woman above twenty-one, as regarded labour in factories. He should, therefore, be glad if the right hon. Baronet would explain upon what ground he imposed a restriction upon the labour of women who were equally capable of determining how far they should employ themselves for profit as men were of a similar age.

Sir J. Graham believed this was the first time any restriction was placed on female labour, and he certainly felt it was a restriction questionable on principle, and an exception to all legislation on such subjects. He had stated, and believed it to be true, that female adults, as well as male adults, tempted by a love of high wages, and honest gain, were disposed to flock to factories where labour might be obtained for a longer period than twelve hours. On the other hand there was every reason to believe that a limit of twelve hours to female labour was absolutely necessary to their health under the peculiar circumstances more especially to which the right hon. Gentleman had adverted. Now, he was bound to state as with respect to children, so with respect to females, that being the weaker part of the community, and married women being under the influence of their husbands, they were often tempted to labour under a desire of gain to an extent not consistent with their health. This was an exception certainly, to the general rule, which ought to guide Legislation on this delicate subject, but it was under the pressure of these exceptions that his noble Friend had urged the limit of ten hours instead of twelve, which he (Sir James Graham) thought dangerous and inexpedient. He was bound, therefore, to say that, arguing this question on principle, he could not give to the right hon. Gentleman a satisfactory answer. At the same time he must state that a general practice had been established in the greater portion of the large manufactories that the term of twelve hours' labour should not be exceeded by females.

On the question that the blank in the Clause be filled with the word "twelve," applying to the labour of young children and females,

Lord Ashley said, it was not his intention to detain the Committee by any lengthened observations, and he would state in a few words his reasons for urging the amendment of which he had given notice. He would, however, first call the attention of his right hon. Friend opposite to the Report of the factory inspectors. They allowed that in theory these females were considered free agents, yet that in practice they were no such thing. Now, in the Report of Mr. Horner, in October, 1843, he said,

"I recently investigated a case in Manchester, in a large mill, where they are now employing workers above eighteen years of age, many of them young women just arrived at that time of life, from half-past five in the morning until eight o'clock at night, with no cessation from work, except a quarter of an hour for breakfast and three-quarters of an hour for dinner; so that these persons, having to be out of bed at five o'clock in the morning, and not getting home till half-past eight o'clock at night, may fairly be said to labour fifteen hours and a half out of the twenty-four. A theorist may say that these people are old enough to take care of themselves. But, practically, there can be no such thing as freedom of labour, when, from the redundancy of population, there is such a competition for employment." (Hear.)

Exactly so; he understood that cheer of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ward); all he wanted the hon. Member to admit was that which he now stated; the hon. Member might provide another remedy for the evil, but he only wanted the hon. Gentleman to deal with the fact as he found it. But Mr. Horner proceeded:—

"Twelve hours' daily work is more than enough for any one; but, however desirable it might be that excessive working should be prevented, there are great difficulties in the way of legislative interference with the labour of adult men. The case, however, is very different as respects women; for not only are they much less free agents, but they are physically incapable of bearing a continuance of work for the same length of time as men, and a deterioration of their health is attended with far more injurious consequences to society."

This was the opinion of those Gentlemen who had devoted nearly twelve years to the consideration of this subject, telling them as the result of their experience that females employed in factories were not free agents, and that it was the duty of the House to interfere for them as though they were persons having no self-government or control. It was the invariable opinion of medical men upon that point, and he had never heard it dissented from either by persons in the employment of labour or the labourers themselves, that those females could not be considered as free agents. He would now refer to an opinion that was given in the former debate that Mr. Horner had been giving any opinion in favour of a limitation of labour to ten hours. Now, it happened, that Mr. Horner had given a very important opinion on that subject—one of the most valuable he had seen. In his Report of December, 1841, he said:—

"There can be but little doubt that working

ten hours a-day would be more favourable to health, and the enjoyment of life, than twelve hours can be; but, without entering into the question of health, no one will hesitate, I think, to admit that, in a moral point of view, so entire an absorption of the time of the working classes, without intermission from the early age of thirteen, and in trades not subject to restriction much younger, must be extremely prejudicial, and is an evil greatly to be deplored. Some there are, undoubtedly, who by more than ordinary natural energy overcome this disadvantage, but with the great mass it has the effect of rendering them ignorant, prejudiced, addicted to coarse sensual indulgence, and susceptible of being led into mischief and violence by any appeal to their passions and prejudices. With so few opportunities of mental culture and of moral and religious training, it is surprising that there should be so many virtuous and respectable people among them."

Not only that, but to practice that which they might have acquired. Mr. Horner then said, the remedy of such an education, however sure, must be slow in its effects; but much might be done for the existing generation of adolescents, and even adults, by good evening schools, for those at least whose hours of work would enable them to attend schools; and the second remedial measure I have named would save thousands from the public-house and its long train of accompanying vices. Many had said that the reduction of the hours of labour would lead to a reduction of wages: but he would ask the House, whether it were better to have a sound and moral population with a small amount of wages, or a people worse as to their moral condition, but in what might be called a far better financial position? Mr. Horner, who had made this inquiry, had conducted it with the greatest attention and accuracy, and he thought it was not possible for any man to evince more zeal than Mr. Horner had shown in acquiring information upon this subject. But there was one very important fact connected with this subject of wages which showed the accuracy and fairness of Mr. Horner. He gave a long detail of the effect of a reduction of the hours of labour on the condition of the labourer, but at the same time he told them that all the information he had received as to wages had been obtained from millowners only; that he had endeavoured to obtain statements from the operatives themselves, but without success. Observe that in this great and important question, Mr. Horner stated most fairly that he gave only one side of the case—that he was not able to obtain one opinion from the operatives. That statement, therefore, must be received as Mr. Horner intended it should be, with very great allowances. When he entered into these details, it might appear that he was travelling out of the line he had proposed, but he wished only to put the question upon the great and broad principles of justice and humanity; and when it was said that his proposition, as compared with that of the Government, was the more inhuman of the two, it was necessary for him to prove that, at any rate, whether they concurred or not in the course he took, the proposition he made could be borne out by certain statements of the operatives themselves. This question of the reduction of wages was no new question. It had even been urged as a preliminary argument against any reduction of labour. It was one of the chief arguments in 1816, 1817, and 1818, before the hours of labour were reduced from sixteen to twelve hours a-day. It was the same in 1833, but in both instances the prediction was contradicted by evidence. He recollected perfectly well that it was said, in respect of those children who were put on half-time in 1833, that they would lose in their earnings; but had any such result taken place! Quite the reverse. When he went into the manufacturing districts in 1836, he inquired what had been the effect upon the wages of the children, and he found that in almost every instance—certainly in worsted and in a great part of the cotton manufactures—wages had continued precisely the same, and children for eight hours work got as much as they did formerly for twelve hours' work. There was the same prediction in 1818. But there was a curious statement made at the time, in a petition for restricting the time of labour in the cotton factories, which was presented by Sir Robert Peel, the father of his right hon. Friend; and in presenting that petition he made these remarks:—

"He rose to present a petition which, he said, was unanimously signed by a class of men who had rendered as great service to the country by their industry and skill as any body of persons of the same order in society. The petitioners had come to him most unexpectedly, but he felt that they were entitled to his peculiar attention. They were aware that the attainment of their object must be attended with a reduction of wages; but, anxious for health, and wishing to enjoy some of the comforts of life, they were willing to submit to that sacrifice. He had had a communication with some of these poor men this morning, and he could not hear that statement, or witness their appearance, which confirmed their statement, without shedding tears. As the House valued the trade of the country, it could not fail to feel for the sufferings and consider the interests of those by whom that trade was supported. How then would the Gentlemen who heard him regard those poor petitioners, who, in rooms badly ventilated and much overheated, were compelled to work from fourteen to fifteen hours a-day? Young persons might endure such labour; but, after a certain period of life, it became intolerable. Premature old age, accompanied by incurable disease, was too often the consequence of excessive labour in such places. He had himself been long concerned in the cotton trade; and, from a strong conviction of its necessity, he brought in a Bill for the purpose of regulating the work of apprentices: but since that Bill had passed into a law masters declined to take apprentices, and employed the children of paupers without any limitation. Hence the law was evaded and rendered ineffective for the object which it had in view, the prevention of inhumanity; and he hoped it was not inconsistent with our Constitution to legislate for the protection of children as well as grown persons against the harshness of their employers. Those immediately concerned in the cotton trade did not perhaps perceive the injury to health which their workmen suffered, as they were in the habit of seeing them every day; but the injury was obvious to every stranger. Such facts were detailed in this petition as presented an appeal which could not be withstood by any assemblage of Gentlemen susceptible of common humanity; and these poor people had no other protection but in that House."

The Report stated, that the hon. Baronet manifested throughout very great emotion, and his statement was listened to with profound attention. Now if the statements of the hon. Members for Durham and Manchester as to the amount of wages in the cotton factories were correct, he thought they would agree to his position; because they had shown that the cotton manufacturers were in receipt of such large wages, they could very well afford to give up a portion of those wages; and if, at the same time that it was shown they could afford to do so, it was also shown that they were willing to bear with the abatement, he could not understand how that House could stand up against it. He would now just refer to some little details connected with the domestic condition of operative families in the manufacturing districts. He believed he would be able to show by these statements, which had been furnished by several families, that there was no reason to apprehend any bad result to the operatives from a reduction of wages consequent on the reduction of the time of work from twelve to ten hours. He would suppose the case of a single woman working in a factory and earning 9s. a-week. He hoped the House would allow him to read these statements, for they would prove the case of the operatives—that they had nothing to fear from a reduction of wages consequent on a reduction of work. A single woman, earning 9s. a-week, would have to pay at least 6d. a-week for washing; the expense of making and mending her clothes would be 4d. a-week; and the cost of her tea, which was, under the existing system, carried to her in the mill, but which, if the period of labour were reduced to ten hours, she might get out of the mill, was 1½d. a-day, or 7½d. a-week. Her total expenses, therefore, in consequence of her confinement in the mill, and her inability to perform certain domestic duties, would be 1s. 5½d. a-week. But suppose the case of the same person under the ten hour system; and suppose that the reduction of one-sixth of the present period of labour was attended with a reduction of one-sixth of her amount of wages. She would then be a gainer of ¾d. a-week, because she would be able to wash and repair her own clothes, and to take her meals at home. That was the case of a single woman, stated by herself. But he would refer to another statement of the expenses of a family of five persons, three of whom worked in a mill twelve hours a-day, the father being out of employment, and the mother and two children working in the mill. The mother obtained 10s. a-week, the eldest child 4s., and the other 3s.; making the total weekly receipts of the family 17s. But what were the outgoings under the present system? The expense of washing, which they were obliged to send out, and mangling, was 2s. a-week; it cost them 1s. a-week to employ a woman to assist the husband—who remained at home, performing the domestic work—in cleaning the house; and a further expense of 1s. a-week was incurred by the necessity of sending meals out to the mills. Hon. Gentlemen were aware that, if a family dined together, each person satisfied his appetite, and any food which remained might be kept for a subsequent meal; but if the meals of each member of the family were sent to different mills any surplus food was likely to be wasted. A very considerable weekly saving would therefore result from families being able to take their meals together. But there was another source of loss to be taken into account—that which arose from the cooking being performed by the husband. He (Lord Ashley) believed that no man, whether Frenchman or Englishman, could cook so economically as a woman. The loss which resulted from cooking being performed by the husband might be calculated at 1s. a-week. The total loss of the family was, therefore, 5s. a-week; this sum, deducted from the wages of 17s., left 12s. a-week for rent, provisions, clothing, and other necessary expenses. But he would state the expenses of the same family under the ten hour system, supposing that the rate of wages was reduced in the same proportion as the hours of labour—by one-sixth. The total wages of the family would then be 14s. 2d. a-week; but mark what economy resulted from the happier circumstances in which they were placed. The washing and mangling, which were formerly sent out, would now in a great measure be done by the women, in consequence of their reaching home earlier, and it might therefore be calculated that the cost of washing, &c., would not exceed 1s. a-week. Then his informant calculated that the cost of employing a woman to assist the husband and wife in cleaning those parts of the house which required the hardest work would be 6d. a-week. The total expense to which the family would be put for these purposes would thus be only 1s. 6d. per week, leaving a balance of 12s. 8d. to meet rent, provisions, and clothing. This statement proved, he thought most satisfactorily, that a family which under the twelve hour system received 17s. a-week, and under the ten hour system 14s. 2d., would, under the latter system, effect a saving of 8d. a-week. These were statements with which he had been furnished by operatives themselves; and he would now refer to another communication which he had received from an operative, the head of a family, and a man of considerable ability. His informant took the case of a family of four persons, all working in different factories. What were their expenses? In each case tea had to be sent separately.

"The expence and inconvenience of this system, (said the writer), is, that whatever state of appetite the parties are in, the full amount of victuals sent is either consumed or destroyed, by which much waste is occasioned. In working ten hours a day, three meals would be quite sufficient, and much more conducive to health than four under the present regulation,—dinner between one and two o'clock, and again an evening meal about six o'clock, would be quite ample for the day."

He had been told by operative spinners that, under the present system of working twelve hours a day, their exhaustion was so great, that it was absolutely necessary they should have at least four meals a-day; but that, with a reduced period of labour, they would be content with three meals per day. They stated, that under the existing system, they were obliged to take food even without appetite, as a stimulus to enable them to go through the closing hours of their day's work. The writer of the letter from which he had been quoting proceeded,—

"By this means a meal would be saved, besides the domestic advantages of all taking our meals together. When the writer of this note worked ten hours a day, in the latter end of 1842, he never had more than three meals a-day, all plain food at home. When working twelve hours in the same mill afterwards, he was obliged to have extras (say a little ham) for his tea, but which he found by no means so adequate to the maintenance of his strength as short hours and plainer food. When the ten hours a-day (short time) was going on in 1842, the persons in the mill established a school, and bought themselves forms, &c., and were taught by some of the spinners to write and read; when the mill commenced working twelve hours the school was abandoned, and all desire for learning almost extinguished."

But they must take into consideration that, in consequence of the members of the family being employed in different mills, it was the work of one child to carry their meals to the several mills, and the labour of that child was consequently lost. The general result, then, of the reduction of the hours of labour would be this,—that one meal would be saved, the other meals would be greatly economized, and the labour of the child now employed in carrying the meals might be turned to good account. But there was another consideration more important than any he had yet mentioned. It was calculated, and he believed the statement would be confirmed by every operative spinner, that, if the hours of labour were reduced from twelve to ten, it would have the effect of prolonging, by at least three years, the duration of the working life of the operatives. It had been said, that such a measure would prolong their working life for five years; but he had not the slightest doubt it would prolong it for at least three years. There was only one other fact—a very remarkable one—to which he would call the attention of the House, as showing the moral character of females in the manufacturing districts. He found, from tables showing the number of criminal offenders in England and Wales in 1841, that

"The proportion of females committed for offences is much greater in the manufacturing and commercial counties than in the agricultural. On a comparison of thirteen agricultural and thirteen manufacturing counties the aggregate proportion was—in the agricultural counties only one female to 601 males; in the manufacturing and commercial counties one female to 388 males."

He begged to apologize to the House for having detained them so long; but he was anxious to show what were the feelings of the operatives on this subject—that they did not entertain any fear of the effects of a reduction of wages; indeed, he thought he had shown by the statements he had quoted, that a reduction of wages combined with a reduction of the hours of labour, would be to their advantage. Do allow me (continued the noble Lord) to appeal to the House to consider the position in which this question now stands. Let Her Majesty's Government recollect that this is no new proposition—that it is not now brought forward for the first time; but that for twelve years past this question has gradually been growing up to its present magnitude. For twelve years it has been the subject of deep thought and deliberation, and I entreat you to bear in mind the position in which the question now stands. After a majority in this House—and a majority so constituted, comprising the representatives of the greatest commercial constituencies in this Kingdom, and backed, moreover, by the fervid and undying sympathies of the country—after such a majority has affirmed my proposition, do Her Majesty's Government think it wise, do they think it just, to reverse that decision by the simple exercise of official authority? I appeal to the House whether, having excited the hopes and expectations of the people, they will now rescind their former decision, and disappoint those animating and fervid anticipations which are entertained by the great body of the manufacturing operatives? I do hope, from the bottom of my heart, that this noble and august Assembly will consider its own character—that it will not so speedily reverse its own decision; but that it will have some regard to the character it has to maintain before this country, and before all the nations of the world. But do Her Majesty's Government really think that this cause will not eventually triumph? Do they suppose that the principles and feelings which have been excited in the minds of the people will ever rest before the desired consummation is attained? I am convinced that, though you may succeed to-night—not that I believe you will—though you may succeed to-night, the effect of your success will only be to give additional vigour and determination to those who have so long advocated this cause, and to those whose interests are involved. And what will you have gained? If you succeed in your attempt to defeat my proposal to-night, you will have gained nothing but a little prolongation of suffering and toil; and, depend upon it, the sympathies of mankind and the feeling of this country will compel you to surrender your position, and you will surrender at last, when concession shall have lost all its grace, and I fear not a little of its remedial power. The House would of course understand, that if his proposal to limit factory-labour to ten hours should be affirmed, he would move the proviso of which he had given notice, postponing the full operation of the Measure till 1846. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the blank in the Clause be filled up with the word “ten.”

Sir William Clay should oppose the Motion, but he should do so actuated by the same motives by which the noble Lord stated himself to be guided, viz., motives of humanity and justice. He could assert most sincerely, that if he thought the course recommended by the noble Lord, the most consistent with humanity and justice, he would willingly follow it; but such was not his opinion, nor did he think that the noble Lord, or those who acted with him, were entitled exclusively to attribute to themselves the being actuated by these motives. His opposition to the Motion, arose, not from any bigotted adherence on his part to any dogma of economical science, he did not object to the Motion in limine, because it contravened the great principle of non-interference with industry. Undoubtedly, it was true, in the abstract, that there should be no interference in the transactions between individuals, and that the labour market should be left to regulate itself by the operation of supply and demand, but it seemed to him that by the course of their recent legislation and the precedent they had established, they had precluded themselves from standing by this principle. Were it not so, however, he must confess, that he thought there were circumstances in the present times—symptoms in our social condition, mighty causes in operation, which rendered it highly unsafe, impossible indeed, to consider the mere enunciation of that principle a sufficient answer to those who sought a remedy for any great evil in the relations between labourers and their employers. Still, he thought, and he presumed the noble Lord would go with him to that extent—that non-interference should be the rule, and interference the exception—that the assumption should always be, that it was better to let the value of labour, like all other commodities, be regulated by supply and demand; and that the burthen of proof should always rest on those who sought to interfere between the employer and those he employed. It should be shown, first, that there was a great evil only to be remedied by legislative interference, and, secondly, that the proposed remedy would not produce greater evils, would not, in short, be worse, than the disease. Did the case with which the noble Lord proposed to deal satisfy these conditions? In his opinion, it satisfied not one of them. He was by no means convinced of the extent of the evil as stated by the noble Lord. He was still less satisfied that the plan of the noble Lord would remedy what there was of evil. The evils seemed to him to lie in one direction, and the noble Lord's remedies in another, or rather, he believed that the proposed remedies would aggravate the evils complained of: whilst on general grounds, he entertained the strongest conviction, that the measure of the noble Lord was fraught with danger to the welfare of the community, and above all, to the well-being, the comfort, the very existence of those classes whom the noble Lord sought especially to benefit. Now, was there such an evil to be remedied as to call for the amount of legislative interference contemplated by the Motion of the noble Lord? Would the system of factory labour as regulated by the Bill now before the House, (for that was the point to look to) be of so severe, so degrading, so repugnant a character, as to require the further restriction sought to be imposed by the noble Lord? He was of opinion, that there was no proof that such was the case, that the evidence, comparing factory labour with almost every other species of labour, tended to the contrary presumption. Without wearying the House with statistics, or going over ground which had been already trodden, let them look at those facts, respecting which there could be no dispute. With regard to the evidence respecting the influence of factory labour on the general health of those engaged in it, he would only make one observation; that, although there was very great discrepancy in the evidence given by medical men on the subject, yet that the opinion of its highly prejudicial influence on the general health was principally entertained by men who had no personal knowledge on the subject, while those medical men who lived among the factory population, and had the experience of years of the effect of factory labour entertained directly opposite opinions. On this point, hon. Gentlemen would do well to consult the able and dispassionate statements of Mr. Noble, in a pamphlet published by that gentleman last year. But turning from opinions let them look at facts—look at the evidence appended to the sanitary Report, and to be gathered from the publications of the Registrar General. Was the mean duration of life less among the operatives of Manchester than among the operatives of other large towns? On the contrary, it was less than at Liverpool, less, he regretted to say, than among his own constituents at Bethnal-green, and there were the very strongest grounds for believing, that the low state of health of the operatives at Manchester or elsewhere, depended far more on the nature of their dwellings and the defective state of sewerage, and other means of securing the health of towns, than on the peculiar nature of their occupations. With respect to the health of the labourers in factories elsewhere than in great towns, they had the unimpeachable evidence of Mr. Senior in the letter referred to the other evening by his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, and alluded to in the Chronicle newspaper of that morning, that it was above an average. Evidence of a like kind was to be found in the Reports of the Commission of Inquiry in 1834. The conclusion to which the evidence of the hon. Gentleman tended, was strengthened by a reference to the very nature of factory labour—it was very light labour. Mr. Senior, in the letter to Lord Sydenham, to which he had already referred, said, that with the exception of the male spinners (a very small portion of factory labourers, probably not exceeding 12,000 or 15,000 in the whole kingdom, and constantly diminishing in number), the work is merely that of watching the machinery and piecing the threads that break. "I have seen," so he says "the girls who thus attend, standing with their arms folded during the whole time that I stayed in the room—others sewing a handkerchief or sitting down." Mr. Tufnel, one of the Commissioners of Inquiry in 1834, in his able Report says, "Of all the common prejudices that exist with regard to factory labour, there is none more unfounded than that which ascribes to it excessive tediousness and irksomeness above all other occupations;" and he goes on to speak of the nature of the occupation, much in the same terms as Mr. Senior. The work of the mule spinners was, however, no doubt laborious, but with regard to that, there was the most extraordinary disparity of evidence. The noble Lord had entered into very elaborate statements on that point. He gave us the results of calculations made, as he said, by one of the most experienced mathematicians in England, the following extraordinary facts. Discarding, the noble Lord said, cases which yet occurred where the mule spinner walks thirty-seven miles a day and taking the average,—

"The distance travelled will be in a mill spinning number fourteen yarns, twenty-two miles; number fifteen yarns, twenty-four miles; number thirty yarns, thirty miles. But this was not all. In estimating the fatigue of a day's work due consideration," said the noble Lord "should be given to the necessity of turning the body round to a reverse direction not less than from 4,000 to 5,000 times in a day, besides the strain of continually having to lean over the machine, and return to an erect position. The House will be aware," said the noble Lord "of the great strain requisite after leaning over the machinery, in bringing the body back to an upright position. It often happens, indeed, that the body is bent in the form of a right angle."

He was quite sure that that noble Lord placed entire faith in these astounding assertions. The noble Lord would pardon him if he expressed his entire disbelief of them, and took the liberty also of saying, that the belief of them by the noble Lord did tend to lessen in some degree in his mind, the weight of the noble Lord's authority, when he saw the little amount of caution with which the noble Lord weighed the evidence tending in the direction of his own views. What, thirty miles a day, and turning the body to a reverse position, and bending the body to a right angle, and bringing it back to an erect position 4,000 or 5,000 times in addition, and this not for one day but continuously! Why, no evidence ought to have convinced the noble Lord of the truth of such a statement. The thing was physically impossible. Did the noble Lord know what was the ordinary day's march of a regiment of infantry?—that which men could keep up. Had the noble Lord never made a pedestrian tour? Had he no opinion as to the number of miles which a man in the prime of life with abundance of food, and in the best health, could walk day by day continuously? Let the noble Lord make an experiment: let him take the most athletic man of twenty-five: let him train him as for a pugilistic encounter, and try for how many days, continuously, such a man could walk thirty miles, and turn himself round, and bend to a horizontal position and raise himself again, 4,000 or 5,000 times—and then let the noble Lord decide whether it could be done for the year round by all the spinners in all the factories which spun No. 30 yarn. But they knew these facts—the work was carried on in large rooms, necessarily, from the nature of the occupation, not over-crowded, whitewashed, ventilated. By-the-way, he did not know why a provision requiring ventilation should not be part of the present Bill. Most of the factories were ventilated, but he thought a discretionary power might be given to the inspectors that all should be so. They knew that the operatives, when trade was brisk, received wages unknown almost to any other class of labourers—60*l.*, 70*l.*, 80*l.*, 90*l.* per annum each family—an amount of annual earnings, implying if well husbanded, all the necessities, many of the decent luxuries of life. Knowing these things, could they think further legislative intervention imperatively necessary? Comparing factory labour with the labour in almost every other trade or calling, rural or mechanical—were they not forced to the conclusion that factory labour was to be further interfered with, not because interference was most wanted, but because it was most easy. But whatever might be the amount of evil admitted to exist in the working of the factory system, how would it be affected by the plan of the noble Lord? In his conviction the measure of the noble Lord would tend immeasurably to enhance and aggravate every one of the evils of which he complained. What were the points chiefly insisted on in the eloquent and affecting speech of the noble Lord? Why mainly these—1st. That the present system of factory labour had the effect of superannuating adult males at an age when, according to the usual duration of human life, very many years of unabated health and strength were before them, forcing them, consequently, to seek in employments uncongenial to them, and foreign to their habits, a wretched and precarious existence. 2ndly. That it tended to substitute female for male adult labour—thus diverting women from their proper sphere of action—the discharge of domestic duties. 3rdly. That by the preference of very young persons, and making consequently, parents depending on their children; it disturbed and perverted the natural relations in the members of families, weakening parental authority on the one hand, and filial piety on the other, and producing thereby all the train of disorders and vice, so eloquently dwelt on by the noble Lord. Now, to which of these evils would the plan of the noble Lord apply a remedy? What were the temptations to prefer the labour of women to men, and of very young persons to that of persons of middle age, it might be said almost of adults? Why they were twofold, first, because it was cheaper; but secondly, and mainly, perhaps, because as the machinery was improved, became more delicate and moved faster, and required less human labour,—it became more essential that that labour should be, that of persons at the precise period of life when there was the utmost amount of quickness and activity, when the nerves of sight and touch, were in the utmost perfection. The noble Lord's own statistics showed that such was the tendency now. Would that tendency be decreased by the proposed measure? Was it not certain that it would be increased? They were about to take off one entire sixth-part of the time within which the master manufacturer was to obtain a return on his fixed capital. How must he meet this new condition of things? Why, by greater economy in his labour in the first place, and by working his machinery faster in the second. He would seek with tenfold avidity to make his engine, with its Briarean power, do more, and human hands less. He would make his giant of iron and brass work faster too—so fast that it could only have for fellow labourers human beings when the young powers of life were in their utmost intensity, and those powers taxed to their very utmost stretch. Such would be the effect of the noble Lord's plan with reference to the evils he especially proposed to remedy; but far more overwhelming was the argument against its adoption to be drawn from a consideration of the irresistible effect of its adoption on the general condition of the working classes—of those who furnished the labour in factories. It would be at once conceded, that out of the gross returns of the manufacturer, of the amount that was beyond what was necessary to replace the floating capital perpetually employed, must be drawn both the wages of labour and the profits on his fixed as well as his floating capital. If they limited the hours within which he worked his machinery there would be less surplus beyond the mere replacing the floating capital, and either wages or profits, must be reduced. Both would be so; but could there be a doubt which would be so in the greater proportion? The capitalist would take care of himself first. In the present state of supply and demand for labour the operative was at his mercy, and in his (Sir W. Clay's) opinion, the absolutely inevitable result of forced reduction of the working of mills to ten hours would be a reduction of wages in a far greater proportion than as twelve to ten. After the most careful consideration he could give the subject, he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary overrated the reduction at 25 per cent. The force of this argument was so strongly felt by the hon. Member for Oldham—certainly well qualified to judge on the question—that, admitting the truth of the proposition as to the result on profits and wages, of reducing the hours of working of the mills—he could only meet it by asserting that, if the quantity produced were diminished, the price of the article produced would rise. A moment's consideration would show, that this anticipation was wholly fallacious. It would be true only if either England were the only manufacturing country, or other countries would adopt the noble Lord's regulations. At present it was impossible to raise prices one farthing beyond those at which they could face foreign competition. England sold in foreign markets, as was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, 35,000,000*l.* annually of the products of those factories now proposed to be dealt with. Now, what would be the result of adopting the noble Lord's proposition? Why inevitably, and as of course, one of two. Either England would still send to foreign markets the present amount of manufactured goods at the same price, and then as he had shown wages must be reduced not only in the proportion of ten to one, but in a much larger ratio, or she must send her goods at a higher price, and thus, to a certainty, lose a portion of her present share of the sales in foreign markets, that displacement of English goods becoming larger and larger each year as their foreign competitors produced, as they then would do, larger and larger quantities of goods at cheaper rates, which could always be done as the quantities increased and thus would the demand for English labour each year become less. To be sure it had been proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton, when examined in 1833, before the Commission of Inquiry, that the English Government should by negotiation with all foreign countries, induce them to adopt a ten hours Factory Bill, in which case the price of the articles produced would be simultaneously raised all over the world; but the House would scarcely think the probable success of such negotiation sufficient ground on which to legislate. Let the House recollect that, in adopting the proposition of the noble Lord, they were taking a step in direct opposition to the opinions of perfectly impartial persons, well qualified by long observation to form a judgment—he alluded to Mr. Horner and Mr. Saunders, whose opinions were quoted by the noble Lord with approbation when they seemed to agree with his own, but whose authority he disregarded when it went in opposition to his own views. Let them, above all, recollect that they were legislating for classes the most sure to suffer by any error they might commit. The noble Lord had said, apostrophising the manufacturers, "We do not envy you your stupendous wealth. Peace be within your walls and plenty within your palaces; we ask but a slight compensation for it." There would seem to lurk in the mind of the noble Lord—perhaps almost unconsciously to him—some vague and undefined belief that manufacturing profits were so vast, that this "compensation" could be deducted from them without inconvenience. That the manufacturers could afford to give twelve hours wages for ten hours work, and not be very ill off. Never was there a more fatal error. In the present superabundance of capital, it was absolutely certain that not more than the ordinary rate of profit could be obtained in any trade, and that rate was a very low one. But the manufacturer would take care of himself; and in the present state of the supply and demand he could do so, and throw his loss on the wages of the unfortunate operative. Should they, moreover, impose on the capitalist burdens he was unable or unwilling to bear, he might (although, no doubt, with loss) transport his capital and skill to other lands—the operative must remain, destitute and helpless, a burden to himself and to the country on which he would be thrown back for support. Might he, as an illustration of the probable effect of the noble Lord's Motion on the classes he sought to benefit, bring before the House one illustration which had forced itself on his mind? Perhaps, in the whole speech of the noble Lord—powerful and affecting as it was—nothing produced greater effect on the feelings of the House than his statement of sufferings produced by factory-labour on women in a state of pregnancy. He said, that twelve hours' labour is unsafe and improper for women so circumstanced. Does he believe that ten hours would be safe or proper? It was impossible he could think so. But let the House mark the result of what the noble Lord proposed. He would trust nothing to the prudence of the woman herself—nothing to the tenderness or humanity of the husband. He would not permit any woman to work twelve hours, but how immeasurably did he increase the temptation to those to whom it was most dangerous to work ten? From a family earning 80*l.* per annum, his plan would take 20*l.* Will the mother of that family be more or less likely to absent herself from home—from the care of her children, and to work when she ought to be in repose. In conclusion, he would entreat the House to proceed with caution; the Bill on their Table was no mean advance in the direction of the noble Lord's own views. The Bill met the difficulties and remedied the evils pointed out by the inspectors. The work of children was limited; the detection of fraud was rendered easier. No person under eighteen was to work more than twelve hours; no woman was to work more than twelve hours; no young person, no woman, was to work in the night. Were not these important regulations—to be enforced, let it always be recollected, on the free-will of workpeople themselves. Let the House be contented for the present at least, and proceed no further in a path, every step of which, they might rest assured, was beset with danger to the best interests of the country, and, above all, to the interests of the labouring classes. If he might venture respectfully also to offer one word of advice to the noble Lord, he would venture to tell him that there were other departments of British industry where his benevolent labours were more needed than they now were with respect to factory-labour. No doubt elsewhere he would meet with more difficulties; but the noble Lord had shown that he possessed that noblest of all qualities, that enthusiastic perseverance in well-doing, which was not to be daunted by difficulties. Let him go on, and he would be supported, not by narrow majorities, but by the unanimous votes of that House, and the universal approbation of the public.

Mr. Monckton Milnes said, that perhaps his connection with the West Riding of Yorkshire, where this subject had long excited a deep and enthusiastic interest, might be his excuse for intruding for a short time on the attention of the House. He had never risen under any circumstances with so much individual pain as at the present moment, because he rose to speak upon the subject with the conviction that it would be his duty this evening to oppose the Government, with whom he had generally the honour and the pleasure of acting; and he was compelled so do so from a sincere belief that the course which the Government had pursued on this question was one neither of benefit to the country, nor of dignity to themselves. In the course of last year the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department brought forward a factory Bill, and he had this year brought forward another factory Bill. The House knew how the former Bill was met, and how it was foiled; and he might be permitted to say, that he considered the yielding up of that Measure by the right hon. Gentleman last year was just as unfortunate as was the perseverance of the right hon. Gentleman in his present course. He said this, because he believed that it was necessary for the dignity of the Government that the Measure of last year should have been carried. He would have risked his seat to have given the right hon. Gentleman any advantage in his power to have carried that Bill. But the question now came before the House under a different aspect, and supported by a different kind of agitation. The agitation which now met the right hon. Gentleman, and which he now so strenuously opposed, was one in which for the last ten years a large portion of the people of this country had been engaged, which had excited the deepest sympathy, and which had now been confirmed by a majority of that House; and yet, under these circumstances, the House was now asked to rescind the solemn Resolution which, after an adjourned debate of two days, it had come to, without any circumstance of casualty or haste, merely because the right hon. Gentleman wished to take the advantage of any chance or contingency which might by possibility induce the House to reverse its own recent solemn decision. He hoped he might be excused for speaking earnestly upon this subject, because he did feel that it was now almost impossible to meet this question with the same calmness that was most becoming and most just on a preceding occasion. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets, who had just addressed the House, had indeed undertaken a most difficult task. While every other Member seemed to feel that the question was one of enormous difficulty—while it appeared to be the general opinion, that whether the remedy proposed was right or not, yet the evils were great and undoubted

—while those evils were generally allowed and unchallenged, that hon. Baronet had undertaken the task of representing the whole matter as a mere dream of philanthropic enthusiasts, and of holding up the factory women and children of this country as persons in so happy and contented a position that it would be most impertinent for the Legislature to interfere with them. He had hoped that that part of the question had long since been settled. He thought that the House felt the enormity of the evils, and that a national guilt had been incurred by the miseries of the unrestricted factory system. They knew that by that system they were bringing up millions of their fellow-creatures in a state of degradation almost lower than that of any slave population. They knew that there were thousands of factory children who had no possible means of receiving either moral or religious instruction. They knew that thousands of them had perished on the very threshold of manhood, it being physically impossible for them, from their exhausted strength, to obtain by labour any of the comforts of life. This question had attracted not only the attention of every Member of that House, but also of Her Majesty's Government; for the Government had this year come down with a Bill directly interfering with labour. On that account he said, that the present Bill had been very unfairly treated. He considered that the debate turning so much upon the presumption that this Bill would not interfere with labour, was unjust to the Bill, to his noble Friend (Lord Ashley), and to the Government itself. A great part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government on a former evening, went far more against the principle which it was the object of the Government Bill to establish, than against any modification of it which his noble Friend wished to introduce. It was most true that it did not interfere with the labour of male adults. But, with regard to children, it provided that those under thirteen years of age should only work half a-day—those working in the morning were not to work in the afternoon, and those working in the afternoon were not to work in the morning. This presupposed the adoption of a system of relays, as regarded children. Now childhood, according to this Bill, ceased at thirteen years of age. What his noble Friend wished to do was

this—to extend the operation of this part of the Bill up to the age of eighteen years. The whole scope of his noble Friend's Amendment, as regarded males, was as to the ages between thirteen and eighteen years. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was, that children up to thirteen years should not labour more than six hours and a half a day; but from that age they were suddenly transferred to labour for twelve hours a day. What his noble Friend required was a sliding-scale in this matter, which the Government had so wisely applied in other ways—that children from thirteen to eighteen years of age should work ten hours a day, and that when eighteen they might work as many hours as the factories worked. He hoped the Committee would keep this steadily in mind, that as far as regarded male labour the sole difference was this—his noble Friend wished so to modify the Bill, that children on attaining their thirteenth year should not be at once transferred from six and a-half hours labour, to the enormous labour of twelve hours. Let the House imagine what twelve hours labour was to a boy of fourteen or fifteen years of age. The hon. Baronet (Sir W. Clay) had attempted to make out that this labour of twelve hours was nothing at all. The hon. Baronet did this upon the authority of Mr. Senior, who having started from his villa at Kensington, and having taken a run through the manufacturing districts, returned to his home, and drew up a report representing the factory labour as the lightest of all possible occupations. Now he knew Mr. Senior very well, and he knew him to be a very excellent and intelligent man; but he was sure that if the hon. Baronet or Mr. Senior were to be set to that labour for twelve hours a day for a single week, they would come down to that House with very different feelings on the subject. But after quoting this opinion of Mr. Senior, of Kensington, the hon. Baronet most inconsistently made it a matter of complaint against his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) for having taken the opinions of persons who were strangers to all the localities. The hon. Baronet said, with regard to the medical part of the question, that the information obtained was not from surgeons of the neighbourhood, and therefore they knew nothing about it. He found in the evidence of Dr. Hawkins, before the Committee of 1833, this passage:—

"I am compelled to declare it to be my deliberate opinion that no child should be employed in factory-labour below ten years of age, and that no individual below eighteen should be employed longer than ten hours. As to the reduction of the hours of labour of all below eighteen, I feel the less distrust in my own opinion, because it has the sanction of a large majority of the most eminent medical men who practise in the manufacturing districts."

Now, he thought that the authority of Dr. Hawkins, of Manchester, was much more to be relied on than that of Mr. Senior, of Kensington. The hon. Baronet had referred to certain statistics which had been brought forward with respect to the duration of lives in the factory districts, but to him these statements did not appear sufficiently to allow for the great amount of new blood which was daily infused into those factories from the agricultural counties. There were many healthy adults constantly entering those districts, which must materially affect any statistical statement upon this head. The hon. Baronet had said, that the notion of a young person running thirty-seven miles a-day was an absolute impossibility. It had, he believed, been physically established as a fact, that a child running about all day for its own pleasure would run over a much larger space of ground than almost any healthy man would do. Therefore he would say, that if a child was kept up to his full speed all day, [with the dread of punishment before him, he might perform some such feat as that. But whether the distance was thirty-seven or twenty-seven miles was immaterial; both required a degree of toil which was frightful. Now, when he heard his noble Friend make such statements as these, and when he found it stated in an Address issued by the delegates from Lancashire and Yorkshire, that they had read his noble Friend's speech, "paragraph by paragraph, and that they could affirm from their own knowledge that every statement made to the House was absolutely correct," he was bound to believe that there did exist a very great grievance on this part of the subject. He would now say one word upon the effect of the proposed Measure upon wages. The hon. Baronet had said, that political economy ought not to be introduced into this debate, though he himself certainly did introduce a considerable portion into it. According to the doctrine of wages, as it had been scientifically laid down, it was fully understood that there were at least four elements influencing wages—population, capital, fluctuation of the prices of necessaries, and the standard of living. These four elements together determined the amount of wages. All depended upon each, and each upon all. Therefore, he could not believe, that the mere reduction of one of these elements—all the others remaining the same—could effect that considerable diminution of wages which had been mentioned in the course of this debate. With respect also to the shortening of the time of working the mills, this might be avoided if relays of women, as well as of young persons were established. This Bill required relays of children: the only thing therefore required, was relays of women, and then the machinery might go for any period. There was one part of the Bill which he did not understand—that which required the factories to close at half-past seven o'clock. He did not see why the mills should not be allowed to work the two additional hours during daylight in the Summer supposing there was sufficient labour in the neighbourhood, and a sufficient demand for it. This compulsory closing of the mills was infinitely more harsh, and calculated to excite greater discontent than any condition required by his noble Friend. He would conclude by solemnly appealing to the Committee to look well to it before they rescinded the decision they had already come to. He entreated them to consider under what a very different aspect the Question now appeared before them. It had already gone forth to the country that a majority of the Representatives of the people declared it to be their opinion that women and children were not to be employed in factories more than ten hours a-day. At this very moment they were speaking about it to one another. At this very moment they were telling one another of the glorious result that had followed the exertions of his noble Friend, and that after ten years of unwearied labour this great thing had been at last achieved. The people knew this as well as they (the House of Commons) did, and could any Government suppose, that even if by hon. Members coming up from different parts of the country to vote, they should succeed in rescinding the late decision of the House; could any Government suppose that any such course would turn back into its former channels the feelings of the people, or make them forget what had passed the other night? No! the people would not forget it, and the Government would do well not to think so. He thought it very unimportant which way the majority turned this evening, as regarded the fate of the Measure; because it was already, above all governments and all majorities, absolutely decided. It was impossible now for any Government to stop a ten hours Bill. It was, in every moral sense, as much a part of the law of this country as any part of this interfering Bill which he held in his hand. Wishing from his heart the best in every way to Her Majesty's Government, he most heartily grieved that they had in this matter set themselves against the opinion, against the sympathy, against the good feeling, and against, he believed, the religious sense of so large a proportion of the people of England; and he would now sit down, humbly imploring them, before it was too late, not to persist in that dangerous course, and not drive his noble Friend to extremity. It was a subject he felt deeply upon, and, therefore, he said—not drive his noble Friend to any extremity to which he would be very unwillingly driven, but in which he believed his noble Friend would be supported by a majority of this House. Yes; he believed that a majority would support his noble Friend in an Address to the Throne, declaring to Her Majesty that the only resource was in her benevolence, and in her noble and generous feelings against the short-sightedness or rather blindness of her Ministers.

Mr. Vernon Smith wished to say a few words in support of the proposition he threw out just now. His noble Friend had said that he was surprised at his making such a proposition, but he did it conceiving that it would do away with the objection to the Bill on the ground of its imposing restrictions on labour. He believed that the whole of the arguments urged the other evening upon the question, at least those coming from Her Majesty's Government were founded upon this principle—that the Legislature ought not to interfere with the labour of the people. How these arguments were more applicable to a ten hours' Bill, he was at a loss to conceive. It appeared to him that this—to extend the operation of this part of the Bill up to the age of eighteen years. The whole scope of his noble Friend's Amendment, as regarded males, was as to the ages between thirteen and eighteen years. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was, that children up to thirteen years should not labour more than six hours and a half a day; but from that age they were suddenly transferred to labour for twelve hours a day. He entreated them to consider under what a very different aspect the Question now appeared before them. It had already gone forth to the country that a majority of the Representatives of the people declared it to be their opinion that women and children were not to be employed in factories more than ten hours a-day. At this very moment they were speaking about it to one another. At this very moment they were telling one another of the glorious result that had followed the exertions of his noble Friend, and that after ten years of unwearied labour this great thing had been at last achieved. The people knew this as well as they (the House of Commons) did, and could any Government suppose, that even if by hon. Members coming up from different parts of the country to vote, they should succeed in rescinding the late decision of the House; could any Government suppose that any such course would turn back into its former channels the feelings of the people, or make them forget what had passed the other night? No! the people would not forget it, and the Government would do well not to think so. He thought it very unimportant which way the majority turned this evening, as regarded the fate of the Measure; because it was already, above all governments and all majorities, absolutely decided. It was impossible now for any Government to stop a ten hours Bill. It was, in every moral sense, as much a part of the law of this country as any part of this interfering Bill which he held in his hand. Wishing from his heart the best in every way to Her Majesty's Government, he most heartily grieved that they had in this matter set themselves against the opinion, against the sympathy, against the good feeling, and against, he believed, the religious sense of so large a proportion of the people of England; and he would now sit down, humbly imploring them, before it was too late, not to persist in that dangerous course, and not drive his noble Friend to extremity. It was a subject he felt deeply upon, and, therefore, he said—not drive his noble Friend to any extremity to which he would be very unwillingly driven, but in which he believed his noble Friend would be supported by a majority of this House. Yes; he believed that a majority would support his noble Friend in an Address to the Throne, declaring to Her Majesty that the only resource was in her benevolence, and in her noble and generous feelings against the short-sightedness or rather blindness of her Ministers.

Mr. Vernon Smith wished to say a few words in support of the proposition he threw out just now. His noble Friend had said that he was surprised at his making such a proposition, but he did it conceiving that it would do away with the objection to the Bill on the ground of its imposing restrictions on labour. He believed that the whole of the arguments urged the other evening upon the question, at least those coming from Her Majesty's Government were founded upon this principle—that the Legislature ought not to interfere with the labour of the people. How these arguments were more applicable to a ten hours' Bill, he was at a loss to conceive. It appeared to him that this—to extend the operation of this part of the Bill up to the age of eighteen years. The whole scope of his noble Friend's Amendment, as regarded males, was as to the ages between thirteen and eighteen years. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was, that children up to thirteen years should not labour more than six hours and a half a day; but from that age they were suddenly transferred to labour for twelve hours a day. What his noble Friend required was a sliding-scale in this matter, which the Government had so wisely applied in other ways—that children from thirteen to eighteen years of age should work ten hours a day, and that when eighteen they might work as many hours as the factories worked. He hoped the Committee would keep this steadily in mind, that as far as regarded male labour the sole difference was this—his noble Friend wished so to modify the Bill, that children on attaining their thirteenth year should not be at once transferred from six and a-half hours labour, to the enormous labour of twelve hours. Let the House imagine what twelve hours labour was to a boy of fourteen or fifteen years of age. The hon. Baronet (Sir W. Clay) had attempted to make out that this labour of twelve hours was nothing at all. The hon. Baronet did this upon the authority of Mr. Senior, who having started from his villa at Kensington, and having taken a run through the manufacturing districts, returned to his home, and drew up a report representing the factory labour as the lightest of all possible occupations. Now he knew Mr. Senior very well, and he knew him to be a very excellent and intelligent man; but he was sure that if the hon. Baronet or Mr. Senior were to be set to that labour for twelve hours a day for a single week, they would come down to that House with very different feelings on the subject. But after quoting this opinion of Mr. Senior, of Kensington, the hon. Baronet most inconsistently made it a matter of complaint against his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) for having taken the opinions of persons who were strangers to all the localities. The hon. Baronet said, with regard to the medical part of the question, that the information obtained was not from surgeons of the neighbourhood, and therefore they knew nothing about it. He found in the evidence of Dr. Hawkins, before the Committee of 1833, this passage:—

"I am compelled to declare it to be my deliberate opinion that no child should be employed in factory-labour below ten years of age, and that no individual below eighteen should be employed longer than ten hours. As to the reduction of the hours of labour of all below eighteen, I feel the less distrust in my own opinion, because it has the sanction of a large majority of the most eminent medical men who practise in the manufacturing districts."

Now, he thought that the authority of Dr. Hawkins, of Manchester, was much more to be relied on than that of Mr. Senior, of Kensington. The hon. Baronet had referred to certain statistics which had been brought forward with respect to the duration of lives in the factory districts, but to him these statements did not appear sufficiently to allow for the great amount of new blood which was daily infused into those factories from the agricultural counties. There were many healthy adults constantly entering those districts, which must materially affect any statistical statement upon this head. The hon. Baronet had said, that the notion of a young person running thirty-seven miles a-day was an absolute impossibility. It had, he believed, been physically established as a fact, that a child running about all day for its own pleasure would run over a much larger space of ground than almost any healthy man would do. Therefore he would say, that if a child was kept up to his full speed all day, [with the dread of punishment before him, he might perform some such feat as that. But whether the distance was thirty-seven or twenty-seven miles was immaterial; both required a degree of toil which was frightful. Now, when he heard his noble Friend make such statements as these, and when he found it stated in an Address issued by the delegates from Lancashire and Yorkshire, that they had read his noble Friend's speech, "paragraph by paragraph, and that they could affirm from their own knowledge that every statement made to the House was absolutely correct," he was bound to believe that there did exist a very great grievance on this part of the subject. He would now say one word upon the effect of the proposed Measure upon wages. The hon. Baronet had said, that political economy ought not to be introduced into this debate, though he himself certainly did introduce a considerable portion into it. According to the doctrine of wages, as it had been scientifically laid down, it was fully understood that there were at least four elements influencing wages—population, capital, fluctuation of the prices of necessaries, and the standard of living. These four elements together determined the amount of wages. All depended upon each, and each upon all. Therefore, he could not believe, that the mere reduction of one of these elements—all the others remaining the same—could effect that considerable diminution of wages which had been mentioned in the course of this debate. With respect also to the shortening of the time of working the mills, this might be avoided if relays of women, as well as of young persons were established. This Bill required relays of children: the only thing therefore required, was relays of women, and then the machinery might go for any period. There was one part of the Bill which he did not understand—that which required the factories to close at half-past seven o'clock. He did not see why the mills should not be allowed to work the two additional hours during daylight in the Summer supposing there was sufficient labour in the neighbourhood, and a sufficient demand for it. This compulsory closing of the mills was infinitely more harsh, and calculated to excite greater discontent than any condition required by his noble Friend. He would conclude by solemnly appealing to the Committee to look well to it before they rescinded the decision they had already come to. He entreated them to consider under what a very different aspect the Question now appeared before them. It had already gone forth to the country that a majority of the Representatives of the people declared it to be their opinion that women and children were not to be employed in factories more than ten hours a-day. At this very moment they were speaking about it to one another. At this very moment they were telling one another of the glorious result that had followed the exertions of his noble Friend, and that after ten years of unwearied labour this great thing had been at last achieved. The people knew this as well as they (the House of Commons) did, and could any Government suppose, that even if by hon. Members coming up from different parts of the country to vote, they should succeed in rescinding the late decision of the House; could any Government suppose that any such course would turn back into its former channels the feelings of the people, or make them forget what had passed the other night? No! the people would not forget it, and the Government would do well not to think so. He thought it very unimportant which way the majority turned this evening, as regarded the fate of the Measure; because it was already, above all governments and all majorities, absolutely decided. It was impossible now for any Government to stop a ten hours Bill. It was, in every moral sense, as much a part of the law of this country as any part of this interfering Bill which he held in his hand. Wishing from his heart the best in every way to Her Majesty's Government, he most heartily grieved that they had in this matter set themselves against the opinion, against the sympathy, against the good feeling, and against, he believed, the religious sense of so large a proportion of the people of England; and he would now sit down, humbly imploring them, before it was too late, not to persist in that dangerous course, and not drive his noble Friend to extremity. It was a subject he felt deeply upon, and, therefore, he said—not drive his noble Friend to any extremity to which he would be very unwillingly driven, but in which he believed his noble Friend would be supported by a majority of this House. Yes; he believed that a majority would support his noble Friend in an Address to the Throne, declaring to Her Majesty that the only resource was in her benevolence, and in her noble and generous feelings against the short-sightedness or rather blindness of her Ministers.

Mr. Vernon Smith wished to say a few words in support of the proposition he threw out just now. His noble Friend had said that he was surprised at his making such a proposition, but he did it conceiving that it would do away with the objection to the Bill on the ground of its imposing restrictions on labour. He believed that the whole of the arguments urged the other evening upon the question, at least those coming from Her Majesty's Government were founded upon this principle—that the Legislature ought not to interfere with the labour of the people. How these arguments were more applicable to a ten hours' Bill, he was at a loss to conceive. It appeared to him that had been imposed upon rice, the produce of the western coast of Africa, and the American Government claimed to have their rice admitted at the same duty. The late Government had refused their claim but the present Government had admitted it, by equalising the duty in the late change in the Tariff. This would show the nature of the difficulty that might arise under the clause he had referred to. But if he wanted any evidence as to the difficulties attending commercial treaties, he might appeal to the answer given last year by the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) to a question put by the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) as to the progress of certain negotiations then pending. The right hon. Baronet said:—

“He need not describe the difficulties which often arise in the course of negotiations, the prejudices which exist, and the jealousies the Government have to contend with. But in addition, they were also exposed to difficulties which could hardly be anticipated from some change taking place in a foreign government, which rendered it necessary, if not to recommence the negotiations, at least to enter into lengthened explanations. The difficulties of negotiating commercial treaties were not confined to the negotiations with arbitrary governments, indeed he might observe that the spread of constitutional principles, and the establishment of representative governments, had not increased the facilities of making these treaties; on the contrary, it had rather increased than abated the difficulties.”

He had quoted the testimony of the right hon. Baronet, and now he asked the House whether he had not fulfilled his pledge of showing that the system of seeking development for our trade, by meddling with foreign custom houses, was unwise, impolitic, and dangerous? He did honestly believe that this was manifest, and it was not without some mortification that he found that the Government of England had not been the first to avow it. In France M. Guizot had abandoned the deceptive advantages of commercial treaties, and had declared his intention of adopting measures for the welfare of his country, without reference to what other countries might do. He found in a report of the debates in the French Chamber the following question and answer:—

“M. Billault: I have no desire, Gentlemen, to measure my talents with those of the orator who has just spoken, but will content myself with dealing with facts. I wish to ask whether a treaty of commerce has not been contemplated with England?

“The Minister of Foreign Affairs; Negotiations were in progress for a treaty of commerce between France and England. It would have affected none of the great interests of the country; neither flax nor cotton manufactures were in question; and woollen manufactures were only treated of indirectly, and in a very limited manner. These negotiations have ceased, and have not been resumed. Therefore, at present, the hon. Gentleman has not any cause of alarm. Everything remains as before, and nothing has been done. For my own part, the more I consider the question, the more convinced I am that treaties of commerce of long duration with rival great powers are attended with inconvenience and danger, and that, in treating with rival powers, it is better to proceed by means of modifications in tariffs, which leave everything at liberty, and which need only last the time necessary for making the experiment. I may add, that I have reason to hope my ideas are shared in by the British Cabinet, that the British Cabinet will no longer insist on a treaty of commerce, but leave it to modifications of tariffs to obtain the end desired on both sides, namely the extension of our commercial relations.”

Now, if this was true, as to the intentions of France, and he saw no reason to doubt it, seeing that the statement came from the Prime Minister of France, he thought no one could blame him for bringing forward the present Motion, and for calling upon Government to adopt those means for extending our own commercial relations which were in its power, rather than to endeavour to obtain the same object by means over which they had had no controul. He had heard a great deal about the impossibility of fighting hostile tariffs with free ports, and the right hon. Baronet, at the head of the Government had last year quoted against him a most formidable little page of a much less formidable publication in support of this theory. Now he (Mr. Ricardo) maintained that the only weapon a commercial country has to oppose to a high tariff, is a reduction of its own import duties. The attempt to induce other countries to lower their duties upon our goods by increasing the import duties upon their produce was most absurd. It was in fact increasing the impediments to an extension of our commerce with those countries. If a country imposed a duty of 40 per cent. upon our commodities, that 40 per cent was the obstacle in the way of our trade with that country; but if, in retaliation, we imposed an equal amount of duty upon her produce, the obstacles to our trade with that country was raised from

40 to 80 per cent. by our own act. Therefore, he said, that every step they took in that course, would tend more and more to deteriorate and limit our commercial relations with foreign countries. The prejudicial effect of those reciprocal commercial treaties was shown by the fact, that our trade with Russia, a country where prohibition and protection are the means employed to maintain costly manufactures, was greater than with the Brasils, when we had what was called a favourable commercial treaty. Now, he knew, that Russia was, as it were, the citadel of those who maintained that tariff reductions were impolitic and disadvantageous. But, strange as it might appear, Russia was his strong point too. Our imports from Russia amounted to not less than 5,000,000*l.* annually, while our exports were not more than 1,600,000*l.* It was true, that the balance between the import and export must be paid by this country in some way or other, and he might be told that we should be driven to the ruinous alternative of paying it in gold. But even if we were, he apprehended no danger. He would be glad to see our trade with Russia doubled on the same terms, for a profitable trade might be carried on in gold as well as in any other commodity. He acknowledged no supernatural attribute to gold. We must buy it before we could sell it, and if we could do so with a profit, where was the objection? But, in point of fact, we did not export bullion to Russia in payment of the excess of our imports over our exports from that country. He found that our exports to Russia, of articles the produce of our foreign markets, in 1841, were—Cotton, 8,098,735 lbs.; indigo, 1,279,603 lbs.; cochineal, 230,854 lbs.; coffee, 439,364 lbs.; sugar, 84,606 cwts.; wine, 46,911 gals.; rum, 50,337 gals.; besides a great variety of other articles, all exported out of our bonded warehouses here, having been received from the countries where they were produced, to pay for the purchases of our goods, and thus promoting further demand for our manufactures. This was what was termed the triangular system of import. We imported from Russia, and paid for those imports by the produce of the Brasils and other foreign countries which we obtained in exchange for our cotton, woollen, and other manufactures; so that our payments to Russia were made by the goods of those foreign countries, through our bonded warehouses, and paid for by our manufactures. The balance was made up by the exports to Russia of the like commodities from the countries who sent them to these bonded warehouses, thereby displacing their own produce, and replacing it with ours. The transaction was most simple. The Russian wants sugar and coffee, we want hemp and tallow, and the Brazilian wants cotton goods and hardware. Therefore we buy of each other. We do not send the money to Russia, that she may send it to the Brasils, from thence to be returned to us by the whole transaction, as regulated by a bill of exchange—drawn by one of the parties on the others, and taken in payment by the others. And this is all the misfortune resulting from what they were pleased to call a one-sided free trade. He hoped his Motion would not be met with the objection that it was a mere abstract theory. They must deal in abstract propositions before they could arrive at practical results. The steam engine and the spinning jenny had once been abstract theories; and if they had not found a Watt or an Arkwright to carry these abstractions into practice, our resources and our industry would not have availed us against the ingenuity of our competitors. And so all political improvement and reform is theory. And if they could not find Ministers bold enough to carry out those principles which would tend to abolish restrictions which crippled trade, they might bid adieu to the greatness and prosperity which this country had so long enjoyed. He hoped that the right hon. Baronet would not content himself with contemplating the present moment of prosperity, but that he would look back on the years of adversity which had passed, and inquire whether the same causes from which that adversity had arisen were not still in operation, and whether the probability was not that they would be followed by equally lamentable results. The right hon. the President of the Board of Trade had, on a former occasion, asked him (Mr. Ricardo) if he desired a circular should be sent off to every British Minister accredited to a foreign court, desiring him to stop any negotiations that might be going on for effecting commercial treaties. And he would now say, that if that had been done, it would, in his opinion, have saved much unnecessary trouble. It was, perhaps, not too late to send it now; and if the right hon. Gentleman should decide upon sending such a circular, he hoped he would add to it instructions to our ambassadors to tell foreign powers that Great Britain was at length aware of the delusion she had so long laboured under; that she now knew she could not sell without buying, or buy without selling; and that, in consuming the productions of foreign countries; she was, in fact, merely consuming her own produce in an altered shape; that the markets of England were now open to the nations of the world for the exchange of that which they needed the most, for that which they could produce more economically than ourselves. Beyond revenue considerations there should be no let or hindrance, and the only limits to their trade would be those which they themselves imposed. The hon. Member, in conclusion, submitted the Motion he read at the commencement of his speech.

Mr. Ewart seconded the motion. He thought it a most unfortunate moment when diplomacy first meddled with commerce. In referring to the history of commercial treaties, he asked what good result had this country ever obtained from them? The first treaty to which he would refer was the celebrated Methuen treaty of 1703, which was for a long time the wonder of the commercial world. It had, however, conferred no advantage to commerce, but was an impediment. The effect of it was to introduce into this country a taste for the wine of Oporto, superseding the use of French wine, which until then was the only wine consumed in England. As to the absurdity of that treaty, Hallam, in his Constitutional History, said,

"A contemporary historian, of remarkable gravity, observes, 'It was strange to see how much the desire of French wine, and the dearness of it, alienated many men from the Duke of Marlborough's friendship (Cunningham, ii. 220). The hard drinkers complained that they were poisoned by Port; these formed almost a party. Dr. Aldrich, dean of Christ Church, surnamed the priest of Bacchus, Dr. Ratcliffe, General Churchill, &c., and all the bottle companions, many physicians, and a great number of the lawyers and inferior clergy, were united together in the faction against the Duke of Marlborough.'"

The next treaty was that which was concluded with France in 1786, by Mr. Pitt, by which it was endeavoured to establish a system of improved trade with France, but of which it was afterwards said, by all the French periodicals of the time, that it was so advantageous to the English nation that the French ought never again to enter into a treaty with England. He turned from this country to other countries, and he asked whether the reduction of duties on imports had not been always beneficial? The most obvious country in reference to this part of the question was the United States of America. For a long series of years, while the United States were steadily progressing, their imports largely exceeded their exports, and the attention of one of the most acute observers of human nature, Dr. Franklin, was turned to the subject. He said in one of his essays,

"That if the importation of foreign luxuries could ruin a people, they (the Americans) would probably have been ruined long ago, for the British nation had claimed and exercised the right of importing amongst them, not only the superfluities of her own production, but of every nation under heaven. We bought and consumed, yet we flourished and grew rich."

But setting aside these questions of the past, the simple question was, whether they were likely to succeed in future. There appeared to be no approximation on the part of France towards a commercial treaty with this country. He believed that there existed in France, and in almost every nation in the world, an extreme jealousy of English commerce. The same thing prevailed in Germany. He did not believe that the United States contemplated any approach towards a commercial connection. Our future commercial connection with other nations could only be extended or even continued by our throwing open our ports, and taking whatever we wanted, convinced that they would, in the end, take from us whatever they required in return. He therefore thought that Government were called on to give some definite description of their intentions with respect to our future commercial policy. In this respect the time was come when they should imitate the example of the French minister, and by stating clearly what their intentions were, relieve the country from that condition of suspense and anxiety to which it was at present subjected with reference to future commercial policy.

Mr. Gladstone did not think it would be difficult for him to show sufficient reason why the House should not accede to the motion of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman had referred at some length to the different cases in which

commercial negotiations had recently been carried on between Great Britain and foreign countries. It was not, however, necessary for him to follow the hon. Gentleman in detail through these cases, because, even although he were to grant that no benefit had arisen from these negotiations—that they had all failed—and failed hopelessly—he should still contend that the hon. Gentleman had laid no ground to justify a motion so broad and so sweeping as that which he had submitted to the House. The hon. Gentleman had made a motion upon the subject last year, and had called upon the House to declare, that it was not expedient that any remission of import duties should be entertained with a view to making such reductions the basis of stipulations with that foreign country in whose favour these reductions were contemplated. That motion was rejected by the House. But in his present motion the hon. Gentleman appeared determined to make the terms in which it was couched still more wide and sweeping than were those of his motion of last year. The object of the hon. Gentleman, in his present motion, seemed to be to declare, absolutely and abstractedly, that the Government of this country, under any circumstances or for any purpose, ought never to enter into mutual arrangements with other countries, involving modifications of their respective tariffs. As regarded, however, a particular case to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, he must thank him on behalf of the Government for the extreme charity of his judgment upon their measures. The hon. Gentleman stated with regard to that particular case, that the propositions made by this to a foreign country were quite absurd. He stated that they were much more absurd than were the propositions of the foreign country referred to. [Mr. Ricardo : Much more preposterous.]—Well, that was the word. But the hon. Gentleman quite overlooked the distinction between the two cases. He said that nothing could be more inconsistent, than for Great Britain to object to the Brazils levying a duty of 40 per cent. upon our productions, while we laid on their productions a duty of 300 per cent. Now, did the hon. Gentleman think that this was a fair representation of the case? Did he think that it was on the abstract doctrine, that 40 per cent. was a duty that a foreign country could not be justified in imposing upon our manufactures, that the Government proceeded? On a former occasion he had explained to the House that this 40 per cent. was imposed by the Brazilian Government, not for the sake of a revenue, but in order to rear up a protective system. That was quite different from levying it as a revenue tax. [An hon. Member : There is no distinction.] What! No distinction between a tax for the purposes of revenue, and a tax for the purposes of protection? He would leave hon. Gentlemen opposite to reconcile such an opinion with the opinions which they had expressed on former occasions, with the opinions which they had stated before the Import Duties Committee; and would contend, for his own part, that the very broadest distinction existed between a revenue and a protective duty. The question turned upon the rearing up of a new protective system. The Brazils demanded the imposition of a duty of 40 per cent. upon our manufactures for protective purposes, and that this country should consent to limit its protective duty on sugar to an amount which, instead of being 40 per cent. upon the value of the article, was more nearly 6 per cent., so that it would be more just if the hon. Gentleman had stated that the absurdity lay not upon the side of this, but upon that of the Brazilian Government. He did not wish to disguise the particular objections to these commercial negotiations; but the hon. Gentleman, in his estimate of these objections, and particularly of those having relation to Spain, should have taken into view, that the greatest of all difficulties in the way of our negotiations with that Government lay, not in its disinclination to negotiate with us, but in its extreme weakness—a weakness which subsequent events had abundantly proved. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the case of America, and founded an argument upon a clause in the Ashburton Treaty. That was a matter which he did not think could be prudently or fairly discussed at present; but he would say that the hon. Gentleman had formed a very hasty judgment of the effect of that clause, when he stated that upon it claims might be founded in favour of American corn-growing States for the admission of their produce upon the same terms as those granted, not to the State of Maine (for the hon. Gentleman seemed not to have read the Treaty), but to a certain portion only

of that State. He ventured to say, that the opinion of the hon. Gentleman upon the claims which might be set up under the clause in question was quite erroneous; as was also his illustration with reference to the admission of Rice, which was admitted upon quite different grounds from those upon which the produce of Maine was proposed to be admitted. In the case of Rice a privilege had been given to a foreign country, but it was not given in respect to the origin of the grain, but in respect to the place of exportation. But as to the State of Maine the privilege had been agreed to be guaranteed to it when it was a British possession. Now, the hon. Gentleman thought it most unreasonable that we should stickle with Portugal as to its imposing duties upon our produce, while we were imposing a duty of 100 per cent. upon its wine, and 600 per cent. upon its brandy. But in the 30 or 40 per cent. proposed by Portugal to be levied upon our manufactures, the object was to place the British manufacturers at a disadvantage in Portugal. Now, we had no such object in laying a duty upon their wine and brandy. We wished to levy a tax upon articles of luxury, the consumption of which was confined to the rich. This was surely quite a different principle from that proposed to be adopted by Portugal. Now, as to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, he did not deny that great difficulties and disadvantages were incident to these commercial negotiations. The uncertainty and delay which attended them were great evils, and he was quite willing to admit that, in some cases, they might be made the causes of hostility, instead of promoting friendly feeling. He did not deny that parties negotiating together might place themselves unwisely in the position of parties making a hostile arrangement. He did not deny that the natural disposition to do all they could for their country led them to over-rate that which they offered to foreign countries, and to under-rate that which foreign countries offered them in return. All these difficulties attached themselves to commercial negotiations, and formed, he was ready to admit, serious impediments to their final and satisfactory settlement. To these evils, also, might be added the injurious effects which such negotiations might produce on the revenue during the time when they were pending, as reasons why they should not be entered into without rational expectations of success, and without very great and overwhelming considerations of public necessity. He wished to show that he did not under-rate the difficulties and disadvantages of commercial negotiations. If hon. Gentlemen were to put the question, whether he would admit that it was more probable that favourable negotiations would be formed between this and foreign countries within a certain space of time, or whether it were more probable that they would not—he would reply, that he did not deem it necessary at present to answer the question. He did not object to hon. Gentlemen raising the question, he did not object to a strong statement of the disadvantages and difficulties of commercial negotiations, but he would, in the first place, say that there had been treaties of this sort which had been very advantageous; and, in the second place, that even if there had not, it was quite possible that at some future period there might. Why then should the House, by a Resolution, preclude itself from the possibility of entering on such treaties at a future period? That was the question. Was it possible that there could be such a thing as an advantageous commercial Treaty? If that principle was once admitted, then it was most unwise in the House to declare that the Resolution before it should be adopted as a rule of conduct. He repeated that there had been advantageous commercial Treaties. The Treaty with the Brazils had been of this nature. It was true that in one respect that Treaty had illustrated one of the disadvantages to which he had alluded, because it had tended to encourage the belief in Brazil that the people there had been ill-treated; but that was no objection to a commercial Treaty. Such a Treaty was one equal on both sides. In the case of the Brazilian Treaty, political countenance had been exchanged for commercial advantage; and those who had to pay that commercial advantage, when the political countenance had ceased to be material, naturally entertained a feeling of soreness. But as to the commercial portion of the Treaty, it was decidedly advantageous to our manufacturers. The hon. Gentleman had talked of our trade with Russia, and said that we had as great, or a greater trade (propositions, by the way, which he begged to deny), as we had with the Brazils. But the hon. Gentleman must remember that while Russia had a population of 60,000,000, that of Brazil only amounted to 6,000,000. Again, the hon. Gentleman who had seconded the Motion (Mr. Ewart), had referred to the Treaty concluded with France in 1787. Now that was an example of a more than ordinary advantageous commercial Treaty; and surely no one was prepared to say that it was impossible that similar circumstances to those under which it had taken place might come round again. But the hon. Gentleman said, "do not take any objection to my Motion, because it is abstract." Why, he did not deny that such a thing as abstract truth existed; he did not deny that abstract truth existed in political and commercial matters. There was an abstract truth in them, although it was exceedingly difficult to come at; but the question was, whether abstract propositions were the most convenient forms for the expression of the judgment of deliberative bodies. By an abstract proposition they were called upon, instead of adapting their course to circumstances and giving them their due weight—they were called upon to tie up their hands beforehand, and to put it out of their power to judge of the claims of future exigencies. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the steam-engine and the spinning jenny were once abstract propositions. Now he thought that an altogether new doctrine. He did not think that these inventions made their first entrance into this world of ours in the shape of abstract propositions. He thought that they were the result of a patient investigation made by thoughtful men into the laws and operations of nature. But to return. Such were the principles upon which he proposed that Government should be left free and unfettered to proceed in the matter of commercial negotiations. If he were to admit that there could be no possible case in which the remission of a protective duty should be made contingent upon the concession of a foreign power, he would be conceding something very imprudent in itself, but very far from conceding all that the hon. Gentleman required, because his doctrine extended to all duties, whether for the sake of revenue or protection. Now he would make a wide distinction between them; and as to taxation imposed for revenue purposes, he denied the proposition that there could be no case in which it might be advisable to accede to a remission of such a duty contingent upon the proceedings of another country. The hon. Gentleman talked of the necessity of enlarging our imports, and letting our exports take care of themselves; but he appeared to assume that because we obtained a result in another shape—in the case of Russia, for example—to that obtained from India or from America, that therefore it was a perfect matter of indifference in what shape they obtained it. Now, our trade with Russia was a very good one as it stood, but it would be a far more advantageous trade for this country if its tariff, instead of being founded on a highly protective, were based upon a liberal system; and for these reasons, because our trade at present consisted almost entirely of articles on which little labour had been bestowed, and because a direct was better than an indirect trade. But unless the hon. Gentleman could make good the doctrine that there was no choice between different kinds of trade, he could not call upon the House to affirm his resolution. But even political subjects might be connected with commercial treaties. He would admit that that was a principle which required to be well watched—that it was most dangerous, as a general rule, to pay for political influence at the expense of the industry and capital of the country. That when he was not called upon to make any such sacrifice—when the question was, whether he should deviate merely from some rigid abstract rule, he did say that there might be cases, and these not very remote or improbable, in which political circumstances might dictate of themselves the remission of a duty for the purposes of revenue. But as to commercial subjects, he conceived that nothing was less improbable than that the question of the readiness of a foreign country to meet us by a reduction of import duties, should be a material element in the consideration of whether we should remit a certain import duty. How did the question of the reduction of an import duty generally arise? Some surplus existed in the revenue, and applications were immediately made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by numerous parties for a reduction of import duty upon the articles in which they were specially concerned. Now, the Chancellor should take a comprehensive view of the whole circumstances of the case, when the Government were considering how they were to apply any given amount of surplus. One of these circumstances might be a readiness to meet a certain reduction in import duty by a corresponding reduction on the part of a foreign country. He thought that there might be cases in which the balance of advantages between the reduction of different duties might be affected by such political considerations. But it was a mistake to exclude from our view that all commercial treaties were not analogous to the Methuen Treaty. That was partly based on political considerations, and we paid a high price for certain commercial advantages, moreover that was intended to be a permanent treaty; but during the last two years, when commercial treaties were contemplated, the negotiations were not carried on with a view to establish permanent differential duties. But if the reductions contended for had been conceded by the Governments negotiated with, surely the hon. Gentleman would not deny that it was a great practical object to consider the effect which these reductions would have had upon the general commercial system practised in those countries. If they had large dealings with a country carrying on a rigid system of prohibition, and supposing they felt persuaded that by inducing that country to consent to reductions on import duties, they could break down her prohibitory system, was that a consideration which any British minister should be sworn to exclude from his mind? That was the view adopted in several of the recent commercial negotiations. The negotiations with France, five or six years ago, were intended to secure the advantage not merely of obtaining a reduction of duty upon Sheffield goods and woollen cloths, but of breaking down the prohibitory system of France. While he did not admit that such a consideration was a considerable object in a commercial treaty, yet still let them not exclude themselves from the means of obtaining it. Watch the operation of those means as jealously as they pleased, but do not absolutely take out of the hands of Government a means of using what might be a great instrument for the purpose of producing favourable effects in commercial negotiations abroad. Unless the hon. Gentleman could show that all kinds of trade were equally advantageous—unless he could show that it was a matter of indifference to us whether the countries which we dealt with had a liberal or a prohibitory commercial system—unless he could prove that the treaty with Brazil had been disadvantageous to our manufactures—unless he could show that the treaty concluded by Mr. Pitt with France was disadvantageous to our manufacturers—unless he could show that there were no possible circumstances in which a commercial treaty could be aught other than evil—unless he could do all that, he had no right to call upon the House to affirm his resolution, which involved in it all the propositions which he had described, and which he therefore trusted the House would negative, as it had done the proposition brought forward by the hon. Gentleman last year.

Viscount Howick: I have heard with great satisfaction much of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, for I think that even my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Ricardo), who has made the Motion, has not placed before the House more strongly the objection to the policy of negotiating for mutual commercial advantages with foreign powers than has the right hon. Gentleman. That part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, in which he pointed out to the House the extreme inconvenience arising from the policy of these commercial negotiations, was expressed with a force and a conciseness, that it would be in vain for me to attempt to rival; but the right hon. Gentleman having stated his objections to that policy—only grounds his objections to the Motion before the House upon an allegation that the Motion is an abstract one, and upon the chance of there being some remote possibility of a case arising, in which it may be desirable to enter into these negotiations, and thus incur all those inconveniences which he has so well described. Now, I must confess, that I was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman object to the Motion, because it was an abstract one. Will the right hon. Gentleman inform me how anything can be less abstract than for this House to pray Her Majesty to exercise her prerogative in a certain manner, and, having made that prayer, to state the reasons on which it is founded? It is notorious, that the Executive Government enters into commercial negotiations without any previous control on the part of this House. We know nothing of the negotiations about to be commenced, until they have made a certain progress. And every hon. Gentleman must be aware, that nothing is more common than when an hon. Gentleman upon this side of the House urges the adoption of some measure of liberal commercial policy upon the Government, he is met with the reply, that his suggestion is inconsistent with "negotiations now in progress." It is in the power of the Executive Government to commit the faith of the country to a particular course of policy, and then they call upon us to frame our measures in consonance with what they have done. If it is true, that these negotiations are so inconvenient—if it is true that, as a general rule, we should abstain from entering into them, what can be more proper and less abstract than to ask Her Majesty to give directions to her servants to abstain in future from entering into those negotiations to the policy of which so many just objections are raised? I think that this is a fit and proper and constitutional course of proceeding for the House to adopt. We know that it is often the practice, both of this House, and of the other House of Parliament, to offer advice to Her Majesty, as to various negotiations: and the question is, whether the case now before us is one in which the advice proposed to be given to Her Majesty is sound advice? Now, for my part, I think that the advice which my hon. Friend near me wishes the House to give Her Majesty, is advice which it would be greatly for the benefit of this country should be followed. It is impossible for any body to compare the language held in this country by those who take a lead in public affairs, with the practical conduct of the Government, without being struck by this great anomaly—that whereas the leaders of political parties all agree in the advantages of free-trade, although it is stated on the other side of the House, as on this, that the principles of free-trade are the principles of common sense—that we should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, and that we should not punish ourselves by abstaining from adopting a liberal tariff, although other countries refused to adopt such a system—although these are the doctrines preached, yet when we come to look how they are carried into effect, we find that our commercial policy is encumbered in all directions with a mass of restrictions—that our scale of Custom House rates contains in every page, and in every item, duties which are totally contrary to the principles thus universally assented to—rates of duty so exceedingly high, that they cannot be defended on any sound principle of commercial or financial policy. This, then, is the existing state of things, and what is the explanation of the

anomaly? It is, that although we agree in principle, yet that whenever we come practically to apply that principle, there are private interests of one kind or another enlisted against us, and we always find some excuse for not applying it. The right hon. Gentleman opposite talked much about a thing being abstractly right. Now, I think that, instead of using the phrase, when they mean to convey its meaning, they should speak of a thing which is right in itself, but which is not exactly convenient to follow out in practice. It is something which you are not prepared to contest in argument; but which you are not prepared to do because there are interests to contend against so strong, that they can over-rule you. I say the reason for the anomaly to which I have adverted, between the opinions we profess and the practical conduct we pursue, is founded on the fact that there is always some pretence or other put forward by those parties interested in the various monopolies under which this country groans, for rejecting the practical application of principles which they cannot deny to be true; and of all those pretences, that which I believe at this moment has most effect on the House and the country—that which appears to me to afford the most convenient shelter to those who, in their hearts, are friends to monopoly, and the most convenient excuse to others for not carrying into effect what they admit to be just, is, that at this moment it is inexpedient to act, unless you can obtain what is called "a reciprocity of concession." It is this doctrine more than any other that prevents the effective reform of our commercial policy; and that being the case, it does appear to me that the Motion of my hon. Friend is calculated to be eminently useful, because it is calculated to bring before the House and the country, distinctly and broadly, the question of the policy of insisting on what is called reciprocity of concession. Now, if we were to judge from language apart from conduct, there really would appear to be a very slight ground of difference between the Government and the supporters of this Motion, because we who support this Motion are perfectly prepared to say that all restrictions on trade are disadvantageous—the restrictions imposed by other countries just as much as those we impose ourselves: we say that extravagant duties on the one side of the water or the other are a great evil. So far we agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel) opposite; and, on the

these circumstances might be a readiness to meet a certain reduction in import duty by a corresponding reduction on the part of a foreign country. So far we agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel) opposite; and, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman agrees with us that, as a permanent system, to punish ourselves by maintaining high duties, because other countries are unwise enough not to follow our policy, is most injudicious. No man can doubt that this is the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman who has attended to his speech quoted by my hon. Friend last year on this Motion; and so far it really appears that we are entirely agreed; and the only difference between us is reduced to this:—first, is it expedient, even for a short time, to submit to the inconvenience of imposing restrictions on our trade, in the hope of getting other countries to join with us in taking off excessive imposts? and next, what are the means which this country has in its power to use, most likely to be successful in placing the trade between this and other nations on that footing on which we all agree it should rest? Now, it appears to me, if you admit that, as a permanent system, it is inexpedient to punish yourselves by high duties because others impose them, it is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that you ought at once to make the change. In the first place, time is a material element in the case. If you admit, that this system of punishing yourselves by high duties is too unwise permanently to continue, I ask you, how can you reject, even for a day, what you must feel to be a relief—the power of obtaining employment for your own population—under the vague expectation that other countries will join you in establishing hereafter a perfect freedom of trade? It seems to me that you can only do so from a misconception as to the relative advantage which the country derives from its export and import trade. Her Majesty's Government, with all the progress they have made in adopting the doctrines of free-trade, seem still not thoroughly to have shaken off the trammels of the old notion, that the export trade was alone advantageous, and that what, in old language, was called the “favourable balance of trade,” was the grand desideratum.—Though for the last three-quarters of a century, the old mercantile theory of the advantage of a balance in the precious metals has to the mind of every educated man been completely exploded, still the conventional language and the notions of policy arising out of that theory do most fatally hang about the minds of statesmen, and influence the conduct of nations. We still seem to think that our exports alone are really advantageous. Now, I entirely concur with the hon. Gentleman behind me, who has shown that our import trade is what is really valuable, since it is by importing the goods of other countries, we obtain a larger amount of comforts and luxuries for the consumption of our own population. Your export trade, no doubt, is valuable; but it is important only in this sense, as a means of enabling you to obtain imports. If in any other sense than as a means of increasing our import trade, our export trade were valuable, of course your exports to Africa—where the savages who buy them, would be too happy to take your goods, provided only you were not so unreasonable as to ask for payment, might be as advantageous as any we have. But it is because they have nothing with which to pay us; because they are poor, barbarous, and in the miserable state of savages, in comparison with the great nations in our neighbourhood—that is the reason why that trade—rising as it is in importance, as the great continent which furnishes it is beginning to improve—has hitherto been of trifling value compared with that which we carry on with the great nations of the world. But if this position be true—if our export trade is only valuable as the means of ensuring us the imports we desire to obtain—is it not a most extraordinary course of policy, that we should refuse to receive imports because we are not quite certain that there may not be a difficulty hereafter in providing the means of payment? Let me ask, if practically there is any kind of difference in the results of direct trade by which we pay at once the nations from which we receive commodities, and what has been called to-night “triangular” trade, by which we pay for what we receive indirectly by exportation, to some third country? It makes no sort of difference to us which mode of payment is adopted, and by the one or the other, have we ever yet experienced the smallest difficulty in paying for any produce we choose to receive? On the contrary, the riches and industry of this great country are so superior to those of most other nations of the world, that in general other nations are in our debt. The difficulty is to find some adequate return for the commodities we produce and they desire to obtain; and every new facility you offer for the introduction of their goods in some direction or other creates a corresponding extension of the export trade. Sir, this is a truth which seems to me to rest on the clearest and most obvious principles of the commonest arithmetic, and which it is utterly impossible to gainsay. And, if this is the case, I again say, what an extraordinary policy is yours, that because you are afraid other nations will not grant us greater facilities in paying for their goods, you refuse to receive the great advantage of an import trade which merely opening our ports must necessarily give us. For my own part, though I do not deny the extravagant duties maintained by foreign countries to be an evil, I think they are chiefly so in this sense—that they prevent those nations making the progress they ought in wealth and civilisation, and therefore render them less able to supply us with as large an amount of valuable commodities as we otherwise could obtain, and thus make our trade with them on the whole somewhat less considerable than it would otherwise be. This is the chief injury they thus inflict upon us; and, therefore, your course of policy is utterly unjustifiable—when because you are afraid extravagant duties will be still maintained by other countries, you refuse to your own population that relief which the right hon. Baronet himself admits would be the immediate effect of a relaxation of our duties. But then this brings me to another consideration. Suppose I admit to the fullest extent the right hon. Gentleman can maintain that it is an object to us to get the duties of foreign countries reduced—suppose I take the most exaggerated view of the greatness of that object—then I ask, not as an hypothetical question as to what possibly may occur, but as to the probability, on the right hon. Gentleman's own showing of events turning in our favour—I ask, I say, as a plain matter of fact, in the present circumstances of the country, what is the source of policy we should adopt if we wish to obtain a trade unfettered by extravagant duties on the one side or the other? I think, in considering this question, I have no little advantage in referring to what was stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It must be admitted, that he stated very distinctly that there were no grounds for anticipating the successful termination of commercial treaties with other countries. But I have still stronger authority than the right hon. Gentleman's words. I beg leave to appeal to experience. You have since the termination of the war been engaged in an unceasing course of negotiation; you have lost no opportunity of treating with other countries on this subject. Some of the most distinguished men which this country has produced—Mr. Canning, my noble Friend the Member for Tiverton, Lord Aberdeen, the Duke of Wellington, the right hon. Baronet opposite, Lord Sydenham—have been engaged for thirty years in attempts to negotiate advantageous commercial treaties with other countries. And, let me ask, what has been the result? Why, that at the end of that period you are worse off than when you commenced; for the right hon. Gentleman himself admits there is a growing tendency in foreign countries to throw obstacles in the way of the importation of goods the produce of this country, and the restrictions upon your trade it has been your object to get rid of, have been rendered more and more severe. This is the practical result. Now let me ask you, what do you think would have been the result if a different course had been pursued? Suppose at the Peace you had announced, “We shall enter into no negotiations, with the view of obtaining the admission of British produce by other nations at low rates of duty, we believe you (foreign countries) are able to judge of your own interests—we know what are ours, and we shall begin by reducing all our duties to as low a point as revenue considerations will admit of.” Do you think if you had taken that course in 1815; if you had dealt on this principle with Brazilian sugar and Prussian corn, and Baltic timber—do you think, if beginning in 1815, you had continued to act on this wise, large, and liberal system of policy up to the present time, that the tariffs of foreign countries would exhibit their present exclusive character? Sir, I believe no man would contend that such would have been the case. What my hon. Friend asks by his Motion is—better late than never, adopt a policy which you should sooner have had recourse to. You see what has been the unhappy results of your past “laborious trifling” in this matter; pursue a wiser course for the future; teach other countries when they reduce the duties on British produce they are not giving an unfair advantage to England, but a boon to their own producers. Tell them, not by the inculcation of cold precept, but by a generous example, that the reduction of duties may indeed be an indirect advantage to those who produce the articles on which they are levied; but that the real principle on which the change is effected is, that the great proportion of gain accrues to those who are wise enough to effect it. Sir, this is the practical result of the Motion of my hon. Friend, and it involves no mere abstract proposition—the proposition it conveys, if ever there was one, is eminently practical and useful. And let me just observe to the House with what consistency the right hon. Gentleman resists this Motion as abstract, and resting on hypothetical and not practical grounds, when the right hon. Gentleman's argument from first to last amounts to this—"though I admit the general impolicy of commercial negotiations, and though it is not very probable, (the right hon. Gentleman well knows it is not), still it is possible a case may arise when we shall be able to conclude an advantageous treaty." He did give, I admit, an example to bear out his opinion—he instanced the Treaty of 1787. Now, I don't deny the advantage of that arrangement; and though I am a great admirer of Mr. Fox, I think, as a commercial Minister, Mr. Pitt was his superior. No party feeling shall ever prevent me from expressing that opinion. But I say, even of that treaty, though it was undoubtedly a good one, still had it never been concluded, better results would have followed, if without binding ourselves by any engagement, or seeking any in return, if we had made even more large and liberal concessions in favour of trade, and had left it to France to follow our example, I believe such a course would have had a more permanently beneficial effect on the trade of the country. The right hon. Gentleman's next example was the Treaty with Brazil; but he was himself obliged to give up this case as any instance of the success of a commercial negotiation, because, he says, that an unfair Treaty was imposed by Great Britain, in which, while we granted very little of what we called commercial advantages, we required from them a great deal, as the price which we made them pay for our political countenance. I think this the strongest condemnation of a treaty that ever was uttered. I firmly believe if, instead of driving a hard bargain with the Brazilians—if we had imposed no restrictions by treaty, if, instead of all this, we had liberally admitted her produce, and that she saw our political countenance was not given in a way which the right hon. Gentleman admits was no better than a bribe—I believe we should have had the full amount of commercial advantages which we have enjoyed from that time to this, and that now, in 1844, we should not object to a Brazilian treaty

because she proposed a differential duty of 40 per cent. on our goods. But, Sir, further than this, I say I am "prepared to tie up the hands of the Government." I am prepared to lay down as a rule that commercial negotiations ought not to be entered into, because I should have great reliance on the success of the opposite policy, but only if it were acted on consistently and steadily, so as to shew that you were really guided by a plain and intelligible principle; your hope of getting more liberal principles gradually adopted towards you by foreign nations, depends upon their seeing that you are in earnest—that you do not disclaim Treaties when you think you cannot get them, but that you adopt a bond fide principle of dealing largely and liberally with all the world. If you do otherwise, if you allow it to appear that the prospect of a petty advantage in individual cases is a sufficient inducement to you to break through your rule and conclude what is commonly called a commercial Treaty; if you do this, other nations will consider that in disclaiming making reductions of duty matter of bargain as your general policy, you are like the fox in the fable, merely crying sour grapes, because you cannot reach them; but if you act on the principle I wish to see adopted, that you will enter into no commercial Treaties, no stipulations with foreign countries, and that you will proceed at once to the reduction of all duties on their goods, as far as your financial interests will allow, I am persuaded the result will be that the change will give such an immediate spring to your industry, that every restriction you remove will be the means of creating so great an extension of your export trade, that other nations—I do not say at once, but in the course of a few years—will see the wisdom of following your example. That fear of being overreached, so well and graphically described by the right hon. Gentleman as now influencing so much the conduct of foreign nations, will no longer be called into play. The monopolising interests—for example, the iron interest of France—will be no longer able to enlist in favour of their selfish interests the angry passions of a great portion of the community—the commercial policy of foreign countries will cease to be influenced by national antipathies; and in the course of a few years the practical effect of adopting the policy I recommend would be, that trade would be relieved from those extravagant rates of duty which foreign countries now impose. Then, Sir, I ask, is it a sufficient answer to me, when I wish to secure the general advantages of a liberal, generous, and mainly, system of policy, which in order to be successful must be steadily and consistently adhered to, for the right hon. Gentleman to come here and say, "Don't tie up the hands of Government—it is not probable, but is possible, that a case may arise when I shall be able to conclude some commercial Treaty; but, for the sake of that faint probability, you must surrender those great advantages which it is now in your power to secure?" Sir, I say, the adoption of this Address by the House would be a most important step with reference to civilization. It would be a pledge in the face of Europe and the world, that this the first commercial nation of the universe is determined to give up the narrow and restrictive system of commercial policy. It would be a pledge binding on us for all future time, and, therefore, giving confidence to foreign countries, and holding out to them the strongest inducements to follow our example. I say, if a Government were in office entertaining the views which I am now recommending, I am prepared to contend, that instead of merely acting on them, they would do wisely if they themselves came forward and proposed some such Address as that now moved, in order that the House should deliberately sanction such a system of policy. I must also observe, that the Motion of my hon. Friend is at this moment peculiarly well-timed—in the first place, because it is brought on just when the fact is admitted that our long-drawn negotiations with four great commercial nations have utterly and lamentably failed, and that there is no prospect whatever of their being resumed with success. Now, therefore, is the time to pass such a Resolution. The ground is clear before you. You have given a trial of nearly thirty years to one system. You have failed—signally failed. The inference is natural—change your course. Give us as long a trial, and we might fairly win you to the opposite policy, before you despair of its results; but half or a quarter the time will satisfy me, and will furnish, in my opinion, the most decided proofs of the success of the liberal system. But I say the Motion is well timed in another sense; because I think it is impossible for any man to look about him in the present state of this country without seeing the urgent necessity of doing something for the extension and improvement of commerce. It is true distress is not so great as it was a year ago. I am most happy to believe that trade has revived to a great extent, and that there is, to a certain degree, a return to commercial prosperity; but I think no man who looks deeply into the state of things can fail to observe that our state is, on the whole, far from being satisfactory. Let me ask you, is it not clear that both wages and profits are ruinously low? That profits are low I think there is a pregnant proof in that financial measure of the Government which they have lately thought proper to propose. I agree entirely in the approbation expressed on this side as to the reduction of the interest on the Three-and-a-half per Cents.; but I confess I for one regard the high price of the funds, which rendered that operation practicable, as anything but a satisfactory indication of the state of the country. I think, so far from that, the high state of the funds is only a proof of the great difficulty of finding the means of a profitable investment of capital. But while there is a low state of profits, there is shown this state of things also—a low rate of wages. The hon. Member for Stockport adverted, in his most brilliant and unanswered speech on the subject of referring to a Committee the effect of prohibitory duties, on the condition of certain important classes of the population—in that speech, I say, he adverted to the miserably low rate of wages now received by the agricultural labourers of the south of England. The hon. Member justly and properly added for that he threw no blame on the employers—he said that rate did not at all depend on the employer; that the cause lay far deeper; but the fact is clear, you have this low rate of wages and profits, showing that the same state of things now exists as that which prevailed some years ago, and which was admirably described by Mr. Huskisson, when he said—"There was too great a pressure on the springs of productive industry." Sir, you have now that too great "pressure on the springs of industry." It is the difficulty which meets you in every quarter. It is that which meets you in the low wages of the Dorsetshire labourers, and in the miserable earnings of sempstresses in London, of which we have heard so much of late. It is the great difficulty to which the Government last night adverted, as being a bar to doing that which they themselves admitted to be so desirable. They told you, remember your own arguments: "there is at this moment so great a pressure on both wages and profits, they are now both screwed down to so low a point that we cannot afford to pass that measure of restriction as to the hours of labour for unprotected females which we admit to be exceedingly desirable." It is this "pressure on the springs of industry" which is at the bottom of your only available argument against a ten-hours' Bill. But that pressure which Mr. Huskisson adverted to, arose then, as it does now, from a deficiency in the employment of labour and capital. It is your restrictive laws which prevent that field from being enlarged as rapidly as the capital and population of the country enlarge: it is those restrictive laws which keep down profits and wages to their lowest possible point; and, therefore, I say it is those restrictive laws which it ought to be the first object of every man who really wishes for the well-being of the great body of the people to get rid of. As one of the important steps towards accomplishing that great object—as the first and most important that you can take in that direction, I concur in the principle announced by my hon. Friend, that the rule to be laid down in our commercial policy is not what is called "reciprocity of concession;" but that we ought at once, trusting the other nations will follow our example, to take into our serious consideration the means of consistently, and on general principles, reducing the rate of Custom duties so far as revenue considerations will admit.

Sir J. Hauser said, that as he took much interest in the inquiries to which this Motion related, and it was of concern to his constituents, he should follow the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Howick), to which he had listened attentively, with a few observations. He sincerely wished he could have agreed with the noble Lord, for if his arguments were as well and wisely founded as they were clearly and forcibly stated—if this were, indeed, a practical proposition and a true course of policy, we should have the consolation of thinking that great difficulties for the future would be removed from the path of those who had to govern this country—and so far from the conduct of its affairs tasking the abilities of Mr. Pitt, to whom as a commercial Minister the noble Lord had alluded, or those of any other of the great and eminent men who, from time to time since then had, with varied results, applied themselves to these questions, it would be easy for a man of the most ordinary mind, the man who was least versed in practical statesmanship, who looked most into a book, and least upon what was going on out of the room in which he was sitting—to attain the success which had been in some measure wanting up to this time, to arrange all the complications of commercial affairs, and to provide continually that increasing scope for their operation, which the increase of our powers demanded. He feared, however, that to adopt the policy which the noble Lord then recommended would not afford this consolation. The Motion was called a practical one; look then at the actual condition of the affairs of the world. Look to Russia, which he would mention first, because his constituents were greatly interested in that trade. If the principle of reciprocity were safely to be disregarded, he did not see what there was now to prevent a great increase in that trade; so many ships would not go out only in ballast to St. Petersburg; it would not be boasted in the state Gazette of St. Petersburg, as he had seen it, that taking two decennial periods, from 1814 to 1824, and from thence to 1834, there was an increase of vessels arriving in Russian ports in ballast, to the amount of 5,000 ships. That was stated by the Russian government writers, according to their notions, as an evidence of the prosperity of the Empire and the soundness of their commercial system. They thought it suited them, but did it suit us? No; for we were driven about from country to country, in order to buy something which did not come under the prohibitory duties of Russia, which overrode our manufactures, and we were subjected in our intercourse with that country to all the [disadvantages of an indirect trade. Now, we should speedily be in the same position with all the world, if we did not regard as important the principle which the noble Lord would discard from the consideration of practical men. He was not, indeed, so much an advocate for reciprocity, as to say that we were to retaliate the Russian tariff. No; but why? The great bulk of our imports from Russia consisted of raw materials, afterwards used in our processes of re-production, in the production, one way or other, of those manufactures with which we had to go to the markets of the world, and to trade. That was a sufficient ground for not regulating our Tariff by the Russian one, but that afforded no general support to the general proposition of the hon. Member. Take, then, the case of France, where the noble Lord, in despair of a Commercial Treaty, would have us regulate our own Tariff without the least regard to theirs. If there were any productions of France—oils or otherwise—which could be of use in advancing our manufactures, and on which the present duty required to be reduced, he would say at once reduce it; let such articles be received in the English Custom-houses at no duty at all, or at the lowest practical rate of revenue duty. If, again, there were any commodities of France in the importation of which the smuggler defeated the fair trader, and so subjected to disadvantage equally the revenue and the British producer, then he would say, upon the principle of the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel), developed in that great course of practical education he had given them two years ago, reduce that rate of duty, irrespectively of the duties of France, because in that case it is the smuggler that you have to contend with and not the foreign Government. But take the case of French brandies and French wines, which it was often said we should take at lower rates, upon the principle maintained by the noble Lord. If we sent cloth to Bordeaux in exchange for these, and suffered that cloth to be unfavourably taxed to pay a heavy rate of duty before it was admitted into the foreign market, the rate of duty must fall somehow upon the labour which produced that cloth. We should have to pay increased quantities of the cloth in order to buy the wine, and, therefore, however, the wine-drinker might enjoy his commodity at a cheaper rate, the cloth manufacturer would be taxed for his enjoyment. And this was the answer (well put in a number of the Foreign and Colonial Quarterly Review last autumn), to those who said, with the noble Lord, that broad considerations of public and general advantage dictated a disregard of foreign tariff, and the adoption of some such vague sweeping proposition as was then before the House, by which all means of ever moderating those Tariffs would be thrown away. Then look at America—the hon. Member for Stockport advocated the disregard of the American Tariff, or of any treaty with America, in respect of corn. But if we did this, and if we cared

not for treaties with America, and if the hon. Gentleman had his corn at his command brought in duty free from the wide regions of the Mississippi; and if, by means of this he had diminished his cost of production, which was his object, and then thought himself in a better condition to meet competition for his cotton goods in the markets of America, what was to hinder the Americans, bound by no treaty, by no stipulations, from immediately raising their duties, already 30 to 40 per cent. to 100 per cent; or such a rate as would countervail the advantage which the hon. Gentleman would thus vainly strive after, and would vanish as soon as it was attained. The noble Lord talked of imports and not exports being the measure of national prosperity, but surely the rate at which we were to buy the imports was of some consequence in this argument. The imports were bought by the exports, and if those exported goods were to be liable to hostile tariffs more and more, by dint of disregarding treaty stipulations, it would have some sensible effect upon national prosperity measured by the noble Lord's own rule. He well remembered what was said on this subject in 1833, by a Gentleman of great authority, now in the other House of Parliament—by one who had rendered great services to his country—but perhaps never more so than when he had stated in either House of Parliament the result of his manifold, long-continued, and various experience—he meant Lord Ashburton. He well remembered hearing that noble Lord arguing in favour of the principle now attacked, as it was attacked then, and when the President of the Board of Trade of that day (Lord Sydenham) taunted him with a paragraph in the celebrated London petition of 1821, which had been drawn up by Mr. Tooke, and presented and vehemently supported by Lord Ashburton, he replied that paragraph had not, in his own sense, nor in the sense of the other London merchants, anything like the vague meaning which was attempted to be given to it; but that it strictly applied to a vast and incredible amount of impediments to trade, which had grown up during the war, and which it was proper in the newly-restored and happier state of things to remove. Shew him (Sir J. Hanmer) such impediments now, and his aid would not be wanting to remove them. The noble

Lord, however, (Lord Howick) had said something derogatory to the position taken up by those who, desiring the extension of commerce, and not seldom speaking in its behalf, yet suffered themselves to be stopped and impeded as he thought, and who were not prepared to adopt what he called practical policy. The practical nature of the policy was denied; but upon this subject, he would for himself say, that he was well aware of all those deep-rooted necessities which pressed on the consideration of the extension of the commerce of the country. He knew the increase of the population; he knew the want of employment; he knew the effect of competition of labour, and of capital, compressed into too narrow a sphere. He was anxious ever to extend the scope, and so to lessen the pressure, and standing there himself a landed proprietor, but possessed of no inconsiderable share of the confidence of one of the great industrious communities of the country, he had given no narrow consideration to these things. But he did not agree with the noble Lord, nor did his constituents agree, that to disregard the tariffs of foreign countries was the wise and practical mode of advancing the prosperity of our own. He always had a respect for the noble Lord, on account of the clear and forcible way in which he advanced his arguments, but they were not well-founded, and must receive his opposition, for it mattered little whether we should follow the semi-barbarous policy of Turkey, and discourage exports altogether, or whether we suffered them to be discouraged, by neglecting the tariffs by which they were to be received by foreign powers.

Mr. Hume said attempts had already been made to accomplish the extension of our commerce by the ordinary mode of concluding reciprocity treaties; these had been continued for some years, but without success, and the House was now asked to say whether the mode proposed by his hon. Friend was not better. It had never been said that we were not placed at a disadvantage by the conduct of those foreign nations who levied high duties on our exports, nor that a treaty of complete reciprocity would not be beneficial. But the question was, would the House maintain our present system, which prevented us from doing any thing to extend our commerce, or try another method by which something might be gained, and by which we might obtain concessions from countries that now would not consent to them. Look at the effects of our present system. Four years ago Government agreed to receive French brandies at a duty of 14s. a gallon, instead of 22s. 6d., and wine at 3s. 6d. instead of 5s. 10d.; but in consequence of the occurrence of some political fracas, the treaty was broken off, and we had consequently been deprived during all that time of the benefits which it would have secured to us. To pursue this system, was to make the legislation of Great Britain, the greatest commercial country in the world, dependent upon that of its neighbours, perhaps the most paltry countries of Europe. We had agreed to a treaty with Portugal, by which the duty on its wines was to be reduced; but because Portugal would not admit our woollens at a certain rate, it was given up, and we had lost the advantages which the alteration would have conferred. We ought to act with reference to our own commercial and financial interest, and not that of other nations.

The hon. Gentleman was proceeding, when the House was counted out, and adjourned at a quarter to eight o'clock.

INTERMENT.] Mr. E. Turner, pursuant to notice, put the question to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Government intended to submit to the House of Commons any general plan of Cemetery Interment?

Sir J. Graham said, that more than one question had been put upon this subject during the course of the present Session. He did not exactly understand the question put by the hon. Member, but he might state that it was not the intention of Government to prohibit interment in towns in ancient churchyards where the ancestors of those who had the right of interment there had been buried.

COUNTY CORONERS.] The Report on the County Coroners' Bill was brought up, and the Bill re-committed.

House in Committee.

Mr. Scott, on the sixth Clause, objected, that the effect of it would be to take away the right of election from those in whom it was at present vested, and place it in the hands of those who were qualified to vote for knights of the shire. He would, therefore, move for the omission of the words "knights of the shire," and the insertion of the word "coroners."

The Committee divided on the question that the words "knights of the shire" stand part of the Clause—Ayes 45; Noes 70 : Majority 25.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS.] On the question that the Masters and Servants' Bill be re-committed,

Mr. Hawes called the attention of the Government to the fact, that the Clauses were of a very large and comprehensive character, and gave to the Magistracy some extremely harsh powers.

Sir J. Graham said, that when the hon. Member had consulted him on the subject of this Bill, he had expressed an opinion that it would be well to bring into a focus all the Acts of Parliament relating to Master and Servant. He had understood that in doing so, the hon. Gentleman intended to extend to Magistrates a power as concerned work done under contract. To that he had no objection, and further, than that he had understood that the Bill would not alter the law. He had not had time, however, to read all the Clauses of the measure, and the hon. Mover could best state whether there was anything new in the Bill, or whether it was simply a re-enactment?

Mr. Miles said, that this Bill repealed all the existing Acts, and re-enacted their provisions, extending the power of Magistrates just so far as the right hon. Baronet had explained. He could assure the House, that he did not propose by this Bill to give any new power to magistrates.

Mr. T. Duncombe referred to clause 4, and observed, that a case occurred not long ago in which a female servant, employed by a farmer, had to go through the bed-room of a man-servant to her own room. She objected to do so—left her employer, and was taken before a magistrate, who said it was his duty to execute the law—and committed her to prison. He did not think any magistrate, who did not consider it compulsory on him to carry into effect the law, would have imprisoned a woman who absented herself from her employment for such a reason; and he thought some provision ought to be introduced into this Bill to meet such cases.

Mr. Miles wished to make the law as stringent with regard to the master as the servant.

Bill to be re-committed.

House in Committee.

On clause 1,

Mr. D. Barclay said, he had given notice of an Amendment on the Clause relating to domestic servants. It was not his object to give masters and mistresses more power over their servants than they already possessed, but to afford greater facilities to servants for the recovery of their wages. At present domestic servants had no means of recovering their wages by summary process; and he wished to give power to Magistrates in petty sessions to adjudicate on such cases. He proposed to give this power only to Magistrates in petty sessions, in order that no abuse might take place. He made this proposal, in consequence of strong representations he had received from the mayor and magistrates of Sunderland, pointing out the hardship which, in this respect, resulted from the existing law. They stated, that the sudden discharge of female domestic servants placed them frequently in circumstances of great misery and destitution, and, in many cases drove them to prostitution. He would therefore propose after clause 9, to introduce these words—

“Be it further enacted, that the provisions of this Act shall authorise magistrates in petty sessions assembled, and they are hereby authorised, to act in cases of disputes between masters and mistresses and domestic servants, with respect to claims for wages and other compensation for services rendered by such domestic servants.”

Sir J. Graham suggested to the hon.

Member that he should now allow the Bill to go through Committee, and gave notice of his intention to propose such a Clause, on bringing up the Report. The Clause might then be printed, and he (Sir J. Graham) would give it his best consideration. He thought, however, that the limitation of the jurisdiction of magistrates, as proposed by the hon. Member, to cases of disputes as to wages, being so far in favour of the servants, might form some ground of objection to the Clause.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.—Committee to sit again.

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock.

THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. ANNUITIES BILL.] Lord Campbell rose to call the attention of the House to what he considered to be one of the most unreasonable occurrences he ever recollected in Parliament. He alluded to the unjustifiable delay in giving the Royal Assent to the Three-and-a-half per Cent. Annuities Bill, a Bill which was read a third time and passed in their Lordships' House on Tuesday last. The operation of that Bill affected no less than 260,000,000*l.* of the debt of this country. By that Bill certain terms were offered to the parties holding the stock to induce them to consent to the proposition made by Government for its conversion; in the event of their dissenting from that proposition, the Bill reserved to them the right of expressing that dissent, and they were to be paid at par. The clauses in the Bill for that purpose provided that dissents should be signified on or before the 23d day of this present month of March. He guessed, from what had fallen on a former occasion from a noble Earl (Ripon) not then in his place, that it would be inconvenient to allow a long period to elapse between passing the Bill and the term in which dissents should be signified. But surely some fair portion of time should be allowed for that purpose, otherwise it was a pure mockery. The Bill was read a third time (the Committee having been negatived,) and passed on Tuesday last; and he had no doubt that Her Majesty's Ministers would have advised Her Majesty to issue a Commission to give the Royal Assent to the Bill on Wednesday. Had that been done, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday would have been allowed to the public for expressing their dissent; but there had been no Commission on Wednesday, and the Bill could not receive the Royal Assent, or become the law of the land, until to-morrow, if Her Majesty should be pleased to issue a Commission for that purpose. This Bill dealt with a sum of 250,000,000*l.*, and affected the interests of 100,000 shareholders. It could not become law, it could not receive the Royal Assent till some time to-morrow, which would leave only a few hours for the 100,000 stockholders, many of whom resided a great distance off, to notify their dissent. If the terms had been ever so unfavourable, no opportunity, beyond a few hours on Saturday, was afforded for the expression of dissent. The terms offered by the Government on this occasion were, no doubt, liberal, and the dissentients were likely to be few, if any; but an opportunity ought to have been given the parties concerned to consider whether they would accept of those terms, or prefer being paid off at par. Proper forms ought to be adhered to in important matters of this kind. The same thing might be done, under different circumstances, when some future Minister might wish to reduce the National Debt, and who might offer such terms that parties might be desirous of being paid off; and the stockholder be thus deprived of the opportunity of expressing his dissent. It might in that case be said, that in the month of March, 1844, 250,000,000*l.* were dealt with in this manner:—The Bill authorising the alteration did not receive the Royal Assent till four o'clock on Friday, and Saturday alone was given to the stockholders to intimate dissent. This was a most dangerous precedent; and he called on their Lordships to consider whether it would not also expose this country to misrepresentation among foreign nations. They had always prided themselves on keeping strict faith with the national creditor; but would they consider that faith was kept with the public creditor, when an opportunity was denied to him for the expression of dissent, and when it might, in consequence, be almost said that he was compelled to accept the terms offered to him? This had happened very unfortunately and very unnecessarily, and he wished for an explanation of the delay which had occurred.

The Lord Chancellor: I can only say, that I intended to have a Commission on Thursday (this day), but I received an intimation from the House of Commons, that it would be more convenient to-morrow. Although in point of law there could be no dissent until after the Bill had received the Royal Assent, yet practically dissent in three cases had been given, and, he believed, more were not expected.

Lord Campbell said a specific mode was pointed out for expressing dissent. That course alone could be pursued, and it could not be effected till the Bill had received the Royal Assent. The time, therefore, for dissenting was confined to a few hours on Saturday, while the Bank Books were open.

Lord Monteagle believed that no practical inconvenience was likely to arise from this delay, because he thought that the terms were, on the whole, so advantageous to the shareholders that there would be very few dissentients. But the question was, whether the course taken by the Government in this instance was exactly fair to the holders of this stock; and whether, if it were adopted on other occasions of a similar nature, it might not operate most disadvantageously to the holders of stock? In that point of view, the subject was certainly one of much importance, and he was glad that his noble and learned Friend had called their Lordships' attention to it. It was a transaction in which the Government were releasing the State, on certain conditions, from obligations previously contracted by the State, and every part of the agreement with the stockholders ought to be fairly carried out. He was glad that the subject was mentioned now, that parties hereafter might not be led to apprehend

mittee of the House of Commons, and of the various attempts that had been made by various Administrations, and in both Houses of Parliament, to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners. These attempts had hitherto failed, but he was desirous of carrying these recommendations into effect (though he believed it was impossible to carry all their recommendations into effect), and he wished to go as far as he could towards reforming the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts by carrying into effect the Report of the Commissioners. He thought that their Lordships would concur with him in thinking, that nothing could be done for the improvement of the Ecclesiastical jurisdiction beyond that which he could now recommend to their adoption. If they thought that the measure was good—if they thought that any advantage would be derived from the proposal, he entreated them not now to reject it, because it did not, at first sight, appear to accomplish all that they were desirous of obtaining. He would now call their attention to the details of the measure. They were simple, but some of them were very important—first, with respect to the constitution of the Ecclesiastical Courts, it was proposed by this Bill to carry into effect the recommendation for the union of the Archiepiscopal Courts, which were known respectively by the names of the Arches Court and the Prerogative Court. This recommendation had proceeded both from the Commission and the Committees of the House of Commons. Nothing could be said in objection to this proposal, at least, as he apprehended. These two Courts were presided over habitually, though not necessarily, by the same Judge, they were attended by the same Bar, they were held in the same hall, and, for all practical purposes, they must be considered one Court. They were, however, at present, distinct Courts, and by uniting them a great advantage would accrue to the public. As long as they were divided these Courts had two sets of magisterial officers, but, by uniting them one set of officers would be dispensed with, and this would tend to release the public from a considerable charge, and, therefore, he apprehended there could be no objection to this proposal. He proposed also by this Bill to adopt the same course precisely with respect to the Courts at York. These Courts were subject to the same objection. This also was recommended by the Commissioners. He proposed, therefore, that there [should be one Archiepiscopal Court at York, and one Court of the same description at Canterbury. The next point was the Diocesan Courts. Their Lordships were aware that every Diocese in the kingdom had a Court for Probate and for contentious jurisdiction in Ecclesiastical matters. These Courts were coeval with the existence of the British Constitution. Justice had been administered in them in all times in the matters to which he had referred. He proposed that these Courts should be continued. It was recommended by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the contrary, that they should be abolished. It would be for their Lordships to say whether they would sanction a Bill for continuing these ancient tribunals of the country. It was said, that they imperfectly performed their duties; that they were not presided over by persons qualified to administer justice, and various objections were taken to their constitution. It did not appear to him to be a satisfactory reason to say that these ancient Courts should be abolished because some abuses might have crept into them. If the persons who presided over them were not duly qualified, in reference to the law which they had to administer, it was competent for their Lordships to rectify that evil. If there were any other imperfections in the working of these Courts, would not the same remark again apply? There could be no reason for abolishing these local Courts, which had existed for so long a period, if, by removing the present abuses and imperfections, they could be rendered competent to discharge all the duties with which they were entrusted. It was a part of this measure, not merely to continue these Courts, but to render them more efficient, by appointing individuals to preside over them duly qualified to administer the Ecclesiastical Law—either Advocates properly qualified or members of the other Courts of Justice in this country, duly qualified to administer justice impartially and correctly between the suitors in these Courts. This was one of the objects of the Bill, and he intreated their Lordships to consider well before they consented to abolish these tribunals; and, at all events, before they did so, to be thoroughly satisfied that they could not remodel them so as to make them advantageous for the public. Was there no alteration in the constitution of these Courts—no change in the character of the individuals who would preside over them—could no amendments be made which would make them more efficient for the purpose for which they were established? If they thought that this could not be effected, why then abolish them; but if, on the other hand, on a consideration of the whole of the proceedings, they should be of opinion, that with persons qualified to preside over them, and with proper subordinate officers, justice could be impartially and effectively administered by them, he must call upon their Lordships to continue these tribunals. There was another set of Courts very widely scattered throughout the kingdom, which he must class under the general description of Peculiars. Some of these either belonged to the Crown, some to the Archbishops, or to the Bishops, or to Deans, or to Rectors, or in some instances, even, to private individuals. These Courts were in number between 300 or 400. They were scattered all over the country, exercising the same jurisdiction, but restricted within narrow and confined limits. The objection to them was, that they had so little business—that the emoluments derived from them were so small—that it was impossible that they could be presided over by persons competent to administer justice properly between the suitors; it was also impossible to expect that the ministerial officers themselves could be well qualified, for it required a considerable degree of practice and experience to qualify parties for the discharge of ministerial duties in the administration of this branch of the law. These Courts had jurisdiction in granting Probates—in granting Letters of Administration—and as to all the contentious jurisdiction belonging to the Ecclesiastical Law. In many instances, in granting Probates or Letters of Administration, there was no controversy whatever—there was no contest—and consequently there was no person to watch the proceedings; there was no person to check any irregularity, or to inform the officer where he was ignorant. There might be what was called “truth in the common form,” but the proceedings were ex parte. Ignorance on the part of the officer might, therefore, to a most important extent, affect both the rights of property and the rights of parties. But on this point he need not enter more into detail. His proposal was, to abolish all these Courts. This proposal had been recommended by the Commissioners; it had formed part of every Bill that had been introduced on the subject, and he was sure that their Lordships could have no objection to it. Then how would the system stand? In appearance, at least, he must submit most admirable. In every diocese throughout this kingdom there would be one tribunal for the purpose of dispensing law, for the purposes which he had mentioned. In the provinces of York and Canterbury there would be appellate tribunals, which would keep the law steady and uniform. That was the system which he recommended, and if they could get the law well administered, and if they could get able judges, as the heads of these tribunals, it did not appear to him that any superior system could be established. He must admit that in what he was now stating he was acting adversely to the opinions of the Commissioners, to the opinions of the Committee of the House of Commons, and to the sentiments of many persons for whose views of the subject he entertained the very highest respect. What, therefore, he stated, he stated with some hesitation. He did not give his opinion as one which ought to outweigh the opinions which he had referred to, but he was stating that if he had the power to abolish these Diocesan Courts, he ought to consider for a longer time whether by so doing he should be adopting a reasonable course of proceeding. But he had no such authority—he had no such power. He knew a noble and learned Friend of his who would support him. He meant his noble and learned Friend at the Table (Lord Campbell). He was proud to believe that, for he knew no man more steady, more constant, more firm, more unwavering, in any opinion which he had once deliberately expressed, and expressed after opportunities of full deliberation and inquiry, than his noble and learned Friend; and he knew that his noble and learned Friend, when Sir F. Pollock, as Attorney-General, brought in this Bill, one object of which was to abolish these Diocesan Courts, that proceeding was protested against by his noble and learned Friend. His noble and learned Friend said that he never could consent to such a course. He said that the systems of centralisation might be carried too far; that these courts were of great accommodation, and a great facility to persons residing in the provinces, and that to bring all the proceedings to London would be a dangerous and mischievous measure. He knew, from the usual sources of information, that his noble and learned Friend made use of these expressions. He also knew from communications which he had had with persons who were present in the House at the time, that these were the sentiments expressed by his noble and learned Friend—and as he had before stated, he had so much experience of the constancy of his noble and learned Friend—of his firmness and his devoted perseverance in any opinion which he had once held, that he was convinced he should receive his support in carrying the measure which had been introduced to-night. But it was not upon the authority of his noble and learned Friend alone that he rested his support of this measure. He referred to another authority—he meant the authority of Lord Stowell, than whom there could be no greater authority in this country—a man who was most deeply learned in Ecclesiastical Law, and who was most profoundly conversant with every part of this subject. He thought that he (the Lord Chancellor) was in the House of Commons—he knew that one of his noble and learned Friends was—when Lord Stowell introduced his Bill on this subject; and what were the objects of that Bill? He proposed to maintain the Courts of the two Provinces and the Diocesan Courts, but he proposed to abolish all those Courts he (the Lord Chancellor) had designated under the general name of Peculiars. In fact, it was an outline of the Bill which he was now submitting to the House. There was really something whimsical in the course which was pursued by those persons who were opposed to the continuance of these Diocesan Courts. He heard on every side clamours for local tribunals, for bringing law and justice to every man's door. Here they found a system established which accomplished that object in reference to one important branch of law. That was the system established, and they were asked to proceed in an inverted order, and to abolish these Courts. Instead of altering these local tribunals they should endeavour to reform them. Make the experiment. As wise statesmen and legislators they should not overturn that which was established until they were satisfied that they could substitute for the existing system something better. He had had some experience—he had seen systems overturned, and other systems adopted in lieu of them; but in few instances had been realised the views of those who supported the alteration. Such was the infirmity of human nature, difficulties, objections, and obstructions which had not been before anticipated, and had not been guarded against, were found to attach themselves to the new system, which generally in its details was found to work imperfectly and disjointedly, and the measures which were found necessary to adjust it, the trouble, the time, the expense, and the anxiety, if applied to the old system which had been subverted, would in most cases have accomplished the object wished for more completely, more satisfactorily, and, in all probability, with less trouble and expense. He had thus stated shortly what the nature of this Bill was, as far as related to the alteration of the jurisdiction. He had stated the limits within which it was proposed to confine it. He must state that it was not open for him to decide in his own mind which was the best system, for he was satisfied that the system recommended by this Bill was the only one that was practicable. An attempt to do more might frustrate the object that they all desired, and they ought not, like forward children, to reject that which was offered to them, because there was something else which it was impossible for them to obtain. He would now state the minor objects of the Bill, which, trifling as they might appear, were really of considerable practical importance. One point recommended by the Commissioners was the alteration of the law with respect to “donatives.” Their Lordships were aware that, in reference to a donative the Clerk was appointed to the Church by the authority of the grantor. It was not at all necessary that he should be presented to the Bishop, for institution or induction, and, when he was presented to the Church, the Bishop had no authority over him, and he was not bound to attend to the visitation of the ordinary. One of the objects of the Bill, therefore, was to place donatives on the same footing as “presentative benefices.” This would make the system more uniform, and there would be no person in the Church who would be exempt from the jurisdiction of superior Ecclesiastical authority. Another subject to which the Bill referred was that of Tithes. Their Lordships knew that the Ecclesiastical Courts had jurisdiction with respect to Tithes. It was, however, a very limited jurisdiction, and it was one subject to the constant interference of the Courts of Common Law, and great inconvenience was unavoidably the consequence. It was therefore proposed, in conformity with the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to take away this part of their jurisdiction, for the cases relative to Tithes which could come before them had already been greatly reduced by the operation of the Tithe Commutation Act. Another subject to which the Bill related was the power of sequestration. The object of the Bill was to give relief to all those difficulties and obstacles which beset that branch of the Ecclesiastical Law; and to put the whole system in that respect upon one simple and intelligible footing. He had now stated all the alterations proposed to be effected by the measure. The main question upon it would, he was aware, arise on the subject of the Diocesan Courts. But with respect to another subject which he considered of the greatest importance, and which had just been suggested to him by his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Brougham)—namely, the system of bona notabilia, he should take leave to add a few words. By the Ecclesiastical Law, as it at present existed, any tribunal granting the power of Probate to a Will within the limits of its jurisdiction, was powerless if the testator left any sum above 5*l.* in any other jurisdiction, and the parties to whom the devise was made would have to apply to the Prerogative Court. That course was attended with great inconvenience and expense—and that inconvenience was all the greater, because a Probate granted in ignorance of the fact would be altogether void for the parties. There was no disposition on his part to disguise that fact. But there were at present 350 Courts of Peculiars, to each and all of which that difficulty applied, and from which that mischief resulted. All these, however, were proposed to be swept away by the Bill before their Lordships, and the jurisdiction in the matter of bona notabilia confined entirely to the Courts of the Diocese, each of which was to have it over a great extent of country. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham) had said, that there were nice questions of law sure to arise on the subject of bona notabilia, but he (Lord Lyndhurst) could not agree with him on that point. Nice questions as to fact might arise he would freely admit, but all questions of law which could arise on it had been long since settled by a variety of decisions. The only difficulty, therefore, would be, as to the facts; as there would be none as to the law. He (Lord Lyndhurst) admitted that the way to get rid entirely of the inconvenience that existed respecting bona notabilia would be to abolish altogether the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Courts. But then the question arose whether, in doing so, too high a price would not be paid in proportion to the advantage that would be gained by the community. Frankly he was of opinion that such would be the case. With the Bill which he had introduced to their Lordships, he did not think that the evil complained of in that respect would be felt to any great or serious extent; and, under any circumstances, he was of opinion that there were ways and means of averting it. For instance, it might be enacted, that if measures were not taken to set aside a Probate within a given time, that Probate should be considered in law as valid; and it might also be made law, that all acts of the party to whom such Probate was granted should be considered valid until that Probate had been set aside. Those provisions would correspond with the clause in the Bill by which all void or voidable Probates were to be sanctioned until they should have been superseded. Those were the views he (Lord Lyndhurst) took of the question. He was quite satisfied that the measure, as it stood, was advantageous and important to the public at large, and he, therefore, intreated their Lordships to pass it into a law. If their Lordships thought, on further consideration of the subject in Committee, that they could safely adopt the suggestions and plan contained in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commission on the point last mentioned, it would be perfectly competent for them to strike out the clause affecting it, and substitute whatever else they chose in its place. But he advised them not to do so without exercising the utmost caution; and, above all, not to attempt it unless they were fully satisfied, after the most careful and diligent inquiry into the subject, that the Establishment of the Diocesan Courts on an enlarged and improved footing, was not advantageous to the community, and that these jurisdictions, by the appointment of able judges, were not capable of being made fit instruments in the discharge of their duty, namely, in administering properly the Ecclesiastical Law of the country. Under these circumstances, he should move the second reading of the Bill by their Lordships.

Lord Cottenham said, he had certainly felt some curiosity to know the ground upon which his noble and learned Friend was about to ask their Lordships to assent to the principle of the maintenance of all the Diocesan Courts, and when his noble and learned Friend stated that it was impossible to carry any other measure than that now proposed, he was more surprised,

because it could not be for want of Parliamentary power either in that or the other House, that the Government would be prevented from carrying a different measure. There might be inconveniences and difficulties into which he should not further inquire, which made his noble and learned Friend unwilling to abolish these Courts, and even induced him to bestow a panegyric upon them, although condemned by everybody who had investigated the subject, at least for the last twelve years, for such was the effect of the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the real Property Commissioners, a Committee of the House of Commons, a Select Committee of their Lordships' House—all concurring in this, that the abolition of the Diocesan Courts was essentially necessary, and with a view to any real improvement in the administration of the Ecclesiastical Law. His noble and learned Friend had been a party to the inquiries that were made, and must have concurred in the opinions expressed. He must have been of the same opinion at the conclusion of the last Session of Parliament, and what had changed his opinion and converted him into a strenuous advocate of those Courts, he had not informed the House. Their Lordships were aware that the Ecclesiastical Courts had jurisdiction in all matrimonial questions, and over all testamentary documents and letters of administration, and in what way as the system existed, were these important questions decided? By 340 different Courts, not all having the same extent of jurisdiction, but all of them having jurisdiction of a similar nature in these important matters. His noble and learned Friend had stated good reasons why some of those minor Courts should not be allowed to exist; but his noble and learned Friend did not bear in mind that the same reasons which he had himself advanced for the abolition of the minor Courts applied to the Diocesan Courts, and that the panegyric which he bestowed upon the one ought to be extended to the other. The Peculiar Courts were ancient as well as the Diocesan Courts, and if antiquity was a merit, they possessed it in common. His (Lord Cottenham's) object was to show that the same reasons which made his noble and learned Friend condemn the small jurisdictions should lead their Lordships to the conclusion that the Diocesan Courts should also be abolished. He must call the attention of their Lordships to the extraordinary state of the law, although he was not prepared to say that a measure could be at present laid before Parliament, which would effect a satisfactory adjustment of the anomaly of which he complained, but which must sooner or later become a subject of legislation; he referred to the absurd distinction which existed with regard to the jurisdiction upon a will affecting land and one relating to money. The same document generally bequeathed both land and money, where the testator had any land at all; but not only were the tribunals which were to adjudicate upon the subject-matter contained in the same piece of paper different from the first, but while, with respect to money the probate of the will was conclusive as to title, a document bequeathing freehold land might be tried twenty or thirty times over, and in short without any limit, unless a Court of Equity interfered. So far, as regarded money, it was the subject of probate. The Ecclesiastical Courts had nothing to do with realties or freehold property; but money and leaseholds for years came under the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and might be proved in solemn form—the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Courts against parties attempting to prove in that form being final against them, so far as money or personal interests were concerned. With respect also to freehold property, there existed no means of establishing a trust under devise by the Ecclesiastical Law; in such a case the Court of Chancery must be applied to for the purpose. These were not the only inconveniences that existed. The tribunals of appeal were different in the two cases. For if a question of law arose, whether real property should pass by a will, it ultimately came before that House; but if the question related to personal estate, it went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and there would probably be contradictory decisions upon the same document. He was not observing upon these points for the purpose of founding objections to the Bill upon them, because it did not profess to remove them; but he objected to establishing or new modelling thirty or forty courts having jurisdiction in wills relating to personality, being satisfied that it would be necessary, sooner, or later, to establish a principle upon which all wills should be referred to the same tribunal. He admitted, that some good would be done by abolishing the Peculiars, but he objected to new modelling the Diocesan Courts retaining to them the power they possessed over wills bequeathing personal property. Those matters had been fully considered by the Commission which was appointed under the Government of the noble Duke, which made its report in 1832. The time which elapsed between the period of the Commission being issued and the making of the Report, the body of evidence which had been taken, and the names of the eminent individuals who had been so properly appointed, entitled their recommendations to very great weight with their Lordships. There were upon the Commission the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Bishop of Bangor, Lord Tenterden, Lord Chief Justice Tindal, Lord Wynford, Sir William Alexander, Sir John Nicholl, Sir Christopher Robinson, Sir Herbert Jenner, Sir E. Carrington, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. R. C. Fergusson. This combination of ecclesiastical and judicial authority, ensured a mass of information which would induce their Lordships to give the more attention to their Report. And what was their Report? The Commissioners stated, that although there might be some doubts as to some particulars, yet the Commissioners were united in the recommendations contained in the Report. And amongst these recommendations the first and primary one was the abolition of the Diocesan Courts. The Commissioners proposed in the body of the Report to retain the Provincial Court of York, making it the Ecclesiastical Court for the province of York; and the Provincial Court of Canterbury the Ecclesiastical Court for all the parts of the country which came under the jurisdiction of the see of Canterbury. But they stated in the conclusion that doubts were entertained whether or not it was expedient also to abolish the Provincial Court of York, and transferring the whole jurisdiction to the Court of Canterbury. Upon this the Commissioners expressed no opinion, but left it open for consideration. With respect to that part of the jurisdiction of these Courts to which his noble and learned Friend had last referred—the subject of bona notabilia—there could not be a greater grievance than the law upon that point; but like many other grievances it produced some good. The rule was at present, that if a person died and had property to the amount of 5*l.* in more than one Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, either of them could grant a probate. What was the consequence? Not knowing where the whole of a man's property might be situate a probate might be obtained, and then, finding that he had 5*l.* worth of property elsewhere, there would be an end to the probate. There was hardly an estate of any value in the country which was not in some way or other affected by settlement. It was the constant habit to introduce into settlements terms of years for particular purposes, so that in investigating the title to an estate let their Lordships conceive the difficulty. There was a term of years, then the title could not be made good without getting in that term—then one must trace the representative of an individual; he would find that the deceased died in some particular jurisdiction in the country; could he then venture to administer to the deceased's estate, which he must do in order to get that term? If he did, he would get the term, and might then think perhaps that he was entitled to the estate, but subsequently finding that the deceased had been possessed of property of the value of 5*l.* in some other jurisdiction, he would have to set to work and go over the same ground. That constantly happened. The evidence given before the Commission was quite conclusive as to the extreme danger and the great expense attendant upon these investigations. All that arose from the doctrine of bona notabilia, and formed one strong leading argument for the abolition of the Diocesan Courts. The extent of the evil had led to the very general process of taking out a prerogative probate. The result of continuing the 380 separate jurisdictions where the property might be in different jurisdictions, was quite obvious; and the plan proposed by his noble and learned Friend was subject to the same objection, in cases where part of the property might lie in one jurisdiction, and part in another, for the expense and trouble which would attend such a case, under the proposed arrangement, would be quite as great as they were already. It would increase another grievance, for it would have a tendency to make people go to the Diocesan Courts instead of the Prerogative Court. The subject had been frequently enquired into, and the recommendations had been all of a similar nature. The Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended the abolition of the jurisdiction of those Ecclesiastical Courts in matters affecting Legacies, in brawls in churchyards, in defamation, in incest, in adultery, and in Church-Rates. Now, this Bill appeared to have for one of its objects to give extended jurisdiction to

Ecclesiastical Courts in matters affecting legacies; but the only satisfaction he (Lord Cottenham) had, as regarded that proposal to extend the jurisdiction, was, that it would not be effectual, as the Ecclesiastical Courts would be incapable of exercising that jurisdiction. There were no complaints of the Equity Courts: Why share their jurisdiction with other Courts wholly incompetent to it? Before the Ecclesiastical Courts could act in the case of a legacy, the functions of a Court of Equity, which it did not possess, should be fulfilled—the debts of the testator should be got in—receivers should be appointed for the estate—the devise should be apportioned—and, in short, every thing should be done which it was incompetent for an Ecclesiastical Court to perform. If a legacy was charged upon land, they could not stir; and in marshalling the assets of the estate of a testator they could not move. Yet, the Bill of his noble and learned Friend contained Clauses continuing the power of interference in them, and even extending it in some instances? Having directed the attention of their Lordships to the very important jurisdiction which it was proposed to extend, he should now make an observation upon the proposal with respect to the Judges of those Courts. The Judges of those Courts were not appointed by the Crown as the Judges in the Courts of Law were, but by individuals, and the Bill did not propose to alter the mode of their appointment. Now it should be recollected that it might frequently happen that questions affecting some of the highest and most important interests in the country might be decided by those Judges; by Judges not acting upon authority derived from the Crown, or the Parliament, but appointed by individuals. If such great powers were to be given to Judges, then it was only just and fair that the public should have the protection that the persons appointed to the office, however respectable they might be, should not be appointed by individuals. The Bill proposed that the Diocesan Courts should be presided over by Barristers of a certain standing, which was certainly an improvement. It was proposed that they should hold their office during good behaviour, and to that he should certainly make no objection; but if there were grounds to believe that the conduct of any one of those Judges was not such as it ought to be, and that it would be expedient to remove him, how was it proposed to effect that object? it was proposed that he should be removed in the same way as the Judges of the Superior Courts of Law. How was that done? By an Address to the Crown, so that in such a case the Parliament would have to Address the Crown, praying for the removal of a Judge appointed not by the Crown, but by a Bishop. That must be the way in which it was intended to proceed, for he presumed it was not intended that the Parliament should Address the Bishop for the removal of the Judge. If the Judges were appointed, on the contrary, by the Crown, that absurdity would be obviated, and the public would have a guarantee in the responsibility of the Government to Parliament for the propriety of the appointment? That proposition, as regarded the appointment of these Judges, was made in several Reports on the subject of Ecclesiastical Courts; and there was a provision to that effect in every Bill that had been brought in since the subject had been enquired into until the introduction of the present Bill. The Commission appointed to enquire into Ecclesiastical matters made a Report on the subject in 1831 or 1832, and the Commissioners of Enquiry into the portion of it which referred to Real Property, had it also brought under their attention in consequence of the evils that had arisen from so many outstanding terms, which he before described to their Lordships. That Commission consisted of individuals eminently qualified to form an opinion, as their Lordships would see, when he described to them the men of which it was composed. His noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Campbell) was at the head of the Commission; there were two Masters of the Court of Chancery upon it, and there were four of the most experienced conveyancers in London also Members of it. No Commission could be composed of individuals better qualified to form an opinion than that Commission; and they all agreed in recommending one Court of Probate and Administration. He should also call their Lordships' attention to the recommendation of another Commission which, from its composition, might be looked upon as the highest authority. It was the Committee which was appointed by the House of Commons in 1833; and when he read the names of some of those who composed it, their Lordships would see the weight which any recommendation coming from it ought to carry. Sir J. Graham was at the head of the Commission; and amongst those who composed it were Sir Robert Peel, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir John Nichol, Dr. Lushington, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Abercrombie. Those were names which their Lordships would admit were deserving of the very highest respect. It was a Select Committee to inquire into the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts, and the connection of some of these Courts with the see of Canterbury led to the inquiry affecting the subject now before them. In the report of that Committee they recommended the abolition of all the Diocesan Courts, and the appointment of a Court for the settlement of questions of Probate and Administration—it also recommended the abolition of the Jurisdiction of the Courts in the Diocese of York, and that the whole Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction should be placed in the Court of Canterbury, and that the Judge should be appointed by the Crown. That mode of appointment was approved of in the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in the Report of the Real Property Commissioners. It would thus be seen by their Lordships that there was a large mass of authority in favour of the abolition of the Diocesan Courts. In 1836 there was an inquiry before a Committee of their Lordships' House upon the subject now before them, and in the same year he (Lord Cottenham) introduced a Bill, embodying the alterations that had been recommended. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) had expressed a considerable degree of curiosity to know what had become of that Bill which he (Lord Cottenham) brought in during the year 1836, and he would endeavour to satisfy his noble and learned Friend's curiosity on that point, or rather to assist his memory as to what had happened to the Bill. In 1836 he brought in a Bill for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and on that occasion his noble and learned Friend, if he remembered correctly, moved to have it referred to a Select Committee. It was referred to a Select Committee, and his impression was, that it was referred to that Committee on the Motion of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor)—he was confident, at all events, that it was not moved for by any noble Lord on the side of the House at which he (Lord Cottenham) was in the habit of sitting, a fact which would appear quite evident to their Lordships from the list of the names which composed the Committee. Out of twenty names, there were only six names of noble

Lords who were in the habit of supporting the Government then in office. It was, however, immaterial from what side of the House they were selected for the purpose of instituting that inquiry, but it was a Committee which, like the others, consisted of individuals whose names were a guarantee of their ability to form an opinion, and of the respect which was due to their recommendation. Amongst the names on that Committee were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the President of the Council, the Earl of Devon, Lord Eldon, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Bishop of Bangor, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Langdale, Lord Plunkett, Lord Denman, the Marquess of Lansdowne. The Committee, after frequent meetings, made a short report, from which he should read one or two passages. Before that Committee, as before all the others, there was an inquiry into the objections that were made to the abolition of the Ecclesiastical Courts. The objection was this:—It was said, that at present there was considerable advantage in cases where persons possessed of small properties died, as the next of kin or the representative could prove the will, or take out Administration, in the district near where the party so dying had presided. In cases of large properties, that argument could not have effect, for it was not to be supposed that such large properties could be confined to one Diocese, generally speaking; but then in such cases they were brought before the Prerogative Court. It was, however, alleged that in cases of small property, there was great public advantage in the power to prove the will or the administration near the place where the person had lived. The report of the Committee to which he was referring, adverted to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, to the Report of the Real Property Commission, and to the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons on the subject; and having referred to those Reports, their Lordships' Committee stated that they were unanimously of opinion, that it was expedient that throughout England and Wales the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in Probate and Administration should be abolished, and that one Court should be established in London to be the only Court of Probate and Administration; and it was recommended also, that consistently with this alteration, arrangements should be made for securing to persons living at a distance from London all the convenience

and advantages which they received from the Ecclesiastical Courts. It appeared from the Report of the inquiry respecting Ecclesiastical Courts that four-fifths of the cases of Contention were in Doctors' Commons, and that the greater part of the business was "common form" business—that was, when a person dies, the necessary and usual proofs were made and the Probate was granted, no one being called on to disprove it; but if it were afterwards disproved, application was made to recall it, the Probate standing, however, if not disproved. In the country an officer, called the surrogate, took the necessary proofs, being empowered to administer the oaths, and if there was no will he took the proof necessary for the granting of Letters of Administration, and having transmitted them to the higher authorities, the Probate or Letters of Administration were in due course returned. It was said, with reference to the appointment of a Court of Probate and Administration, that in the country there was usually a great anxiety to see the will of the deceased person amongst those who expected something under it, or who, being next of kin, were desirous to see if they were excluded by the will; and that if those documents were sent to London, and kept there, they would necessarily be deprived of the opportunity of seeing them. To meet that difficulty, the Committee recommended that the documents should be left in the hands of the surrogate for fourteen days after the death of a party, in order that all those interested might have an opportunity of seeing them, and at the expiration of fourteen days the surrogate should transmit to the Court in London those documents, in order that they might be registered there; and after such registry copies might be sent to the country, in order that those interested might have an opportunity of inspecting them near their places of residence. But it was recommended that there should be one general register of those documents in London. The Committee stated that they were of opinion such an arrangement would be of great public advantage, and would remove many evils that now exist; for whilst the central registration would produce general advantage and convenience, there were means provided by which inspection of the wills in each diocese might be afforded within the diocese; and all the advantages of the present system, as regarded the proofs of wills, or for administrations

in cases of small property, would be secured by providing means to administer or prove the wills for the survivors in such cases. That objection was therefore met by this proposal; but another question arose, and it was this—some right Rev. Prelates, and other Church dignities said, if you abolish those Courts and this jurisdiction, how shall we exercise a jurisdiction over our clergy? It was necessary to provide means for that jurisdiction, and he (Lord Cottenham) brought in a Bill for that purpose. It passed their Lordships' House, and went to the House of Commons, but it was there lost, in consequence, he believed, of the lateness of the period in the Session when it was introduced into the House of Commons. It was too late to pass it, and like many other Bills of that year, it was returned. Now that was an account of the Bill of 1836, with respect to which his noble and learned Friend had expressed such curiosity. It would be seen, therefore, that an attempt was made on that occasion to remove the objection with respect to the jurisdiction over the clergy; for such a Bill was necessary if they abolished the Diocesan Courts. That Bill which he had introduced, was in accordance with the recommendation of a Committee of their Lordships' House, and was sanctioned by the highest authority, and the reason why, when they thought it had passed all its trials, it was returned, was in consequence of the late period of the Session at which it was introduced. No further progress was made, therefore, with reference to that subject until the Bill of 1840 was introduced, regulating the jurisdiction which his Bill of 1836 was intended to affect. Until that measure had passed it was impossible to abolish the Diocesan Courts, but then no further difficulty existed. 1841 was not a good year for the progress of legislation on this subject; 1842 passed away also without legislation upon it; and in 1843 a Bill was brought in, after ample time for preparation—the Bill was brought in by Her Majesty's Government. It was brought into the other House of Parliament by Sir J. Graham, Dr. Nichol, and the Attorney General; and it was to be supposed that such a course would not have been adopted without consulting the other Members of the Government, or without the concurrence of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor). One could hardly suppose that a Bill, which proposed to abolish the jurisdiction of so many of those Courts, would have been brought in without the

concurrence of all the Members of the Government, and without the favourable opinion of his noble and learned Friend who had to-night spoken so highly of the Diocesan Courts, and described them as so perfect. It did seem, indeed, strange that when his noble and learned Friend thought these such excellent tribunals, another portion of the Government should have introduced a Bill for the purpose of abolishing them. It was a strange thing to see such a course adopted, particularly as it was so well known that Her Majesty's Government had the advantage of being so united, and of agreeing so well upon all their great measures. He must, however, consider that proposition in the Bill of 1843 as the proposition of Her Majesty's Government, and that Bill proposed to abolish the Diocesan Courts; indeed, it was in most respects very much like his Bill of 1836. Now, he wished to know, that recollecting that a Bill of that nature was introduced by Her Majesty's Government last year, how did it happen that his noble and learned Friend on this occasion asked them to support a Bill of an altogether different character—to adopt quite an opposite course? The 5th section of the Bill to which he referred provided that matters of Probate and Administration, and matters of Contention, should be brought before the Court of Arches, and that the Judge should be appointed by the Crown. There were some arrangements in it that might be found inconvenient enough, and whilst he admitted to his noble and learned Friend that it was in many respects similar to his (Lord Cottenham's) Bill, he should disclaim the reservation of a certain jurisdiction in the registrars which it proposed, for the purpose of cases of probate and administration under 300*l.* a year. He referred to the Bill of last year, in order to show that there had been no difference of opinion at either side of the House as to the course which ought to be adopted with respect to the Diocesan Courts. His noble and learned Friend had stated that several alterations were made in the Bill after its introduction. He (Lord Cottenham) did not know what those alterations were, nor was he anxious to ascertain—he was only desirous to know at what period the Government changed their opinion, for they brought in a Bill now which was directly opposite to the Bill of 1843. He did not wish to occupy their Lordships' time, but he felt it necessary to call their attention to the very mature investigation which the subject had received from the highest authorities, and those best capable of forming an opinion, and he would show their Lordships that the Diocesan Courts could not by possibility perform those duties well. He would show that they were not adequate to those duties which they were called on to perform. It was necessary, in order that they should be able to perform their duties, to have them more constantly employed, and he would ask, were their Lordships of opinion that the public ought to go to the expense of keeping up an establishment which was not adequate to the performance of its duties? The Appendix to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners stated that in the years 1827, 1828, and 1829, the testamentary and matrimonial cases in the Diocesan Courts were 499, of which 147 were cases of Citation, and were not contested, and 110 were cases of Administration. The witnesses, namely, the registrars of the Courts, stated, that of the testamentary suits only one-tenth were subjects of litigation, and the others passed as matters of course; thus, nine-tenths were matters of course, which did not call for the interference of the Judges; so that 438, not being subjects of litigation, deducted from 499, left 61 cases. Say, then, the business in the Courts of Peculiar were a quarter, that made 16, which, added to 61, made 76; and 76, divided by 3, left 25; so that there were twenty-five litigated cases for thirty-two Courts, which it was proposed to continue. Then as to the Judges of those Courts. They were nominally Judges, it was true, but many of them did not profess to administer the law, and were permitted to appoint deputies. He would not say the deputies were underpaid, for they had little or nothing to do, and one of those Judges had received but two guineas in a year—now, that Judge might be called on to decide questions affecting the legality of issue, questions affecting property to any extent. It was evident from the fact he stated that the Diocesan Courts had not a great deal to do, and although the sum which that Judge received was small, it might be thought that perhaps it was a handsome remuneration for doing nothing. Now, with regard to the alleged convenience arising from the Diocesan Court to persons administering or proving wills in cases of small property, it appeared from the Appendix to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that parties in the country were often put to great inconvenience in consequence of the distance to which they had to go to the

Diocesan Court, and this was to be found even in the present arrangement, which was far more concentrated and convenient than formerly. A man at Greenwich having business at the Diocesan Court would have to go to Winchester. [Lord Campbell: No, to Canterbury; a man in Southwark would have to go to Winchester.] I was adverting to the fact, that under the existing system, which was stated to be so convenient, persons had in many cases to go very great distances; from Berwick to Durham, for instance, a person would have to go 78 miles; from Montgomery, to Bangor, 85 miles; from Brecon to St. David's, 98 miles; from Rye to Chichester, 80 miles; from Penzance to Exeter, 121 miles; and when it was recollected that the journey, in many of those cases, was to a great extent by cross roads, it would be seen how much inconvenience often arose under the present system. Then they should consider the enormous expense, for four-fifths of the contentious business and a much larger part of the uncontested went to the Prerogative Court, and he had already shown the small amount of business for which it was proposed to maintain the thirty-four Diocesan Courts, all of which must have Judges, Registrars, and so on, so that the expense would be very large, and even if there were some advantages arising from maintaining those Courts, they were advantages which would be purchased at a heavy expense. What difference could it make to add one-fifth more to the business of the present Court in London; whilst it gives the advantage of having a Court in which the public could have confidence, and able to do all the business with convenience to the suitors, and without additional expense? Why should they maintain those Courts, and incur expense that might be avoided? They had not got the sum the new system was to cost—the Bill was blank as to that, but if they wanted Judges fit to preside in Courts where important matters were to be decided they could not get them without giving reasonably ample salaries, for no man was fit for a Judge who had not experience himself in private business; then, in order to remunerate such men for giving up their business, it would be necessary to give them a considerable salary, and that would involve very great expense. If they referred to the Fee Fund, he was sorry to say it was likely to be a larger one, by large payments from the pockets of the suitors; for the report stated that they amounted to

tion in the other House. After considering the subject in every point of view, he was altogether at a loss to understand where any difficulty of a serious nature could arise to impede the progress of a really satisfactory measure. Surely the Government were not afraid that the country proctors would not turn them out of office if they did what was right in this matter. He did not impute any improper motive to the Government for having come to this new view of the subject, but certainly he was entitled to say that last year they quite concurred in all he had now stated, while this year they proceeded in a totally different direction. Why was this? He believed the opposition to the Bill last year arose from the circumstance that it did not propose any compensation to the country proctors for the loss of office, a very natural subject of complaint for those parties, no doubt. But the present Bill did provide compensation to the country proctors who might suffer, not from the loss of office, but from the loss of business in the particular Courts of Judicature affected by the measure. Now, such a provision as this would, he presumed, very materially mitigate the opposition of those Gentlemen to the reproduction of a Bill like that of last year. But the remarkable thing in the present case was this: the Bill abolished Courts of Peculiars, the business of which would be transferred to the Diocesan Courts; compensation was provided to the proctor for the loss of his business in the Peculiar Courts, yet all the while he would transact the same business in the Diocesan Courts; so that he retained his business and got his compensation into the bargain. Thus a man who had been doing a business of 100*l.* a year in a Peculiar Court, would go and transact it just the same in the Diocesan Courts, and would receive compensation for 100*l.* a year, as though he had lost instead of retaining it. Surely, it was somewhat extraordinary, that after what had been said by the highest authorities on the subject of the present system—after what had been said by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—by the noble and learned Lord himself—the noble Lord should now speak of it as though it were a perfect system which retained these Courts, as the Bill before them proposed to do. In order to give the Government an opportunity of reconsidering the subject, and of bringing in a Bill more calculated to satisfy the country, he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Bishop of London said, that, being one of those who had signed the original Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and as having supported the Bill which had been brought in for the purpose of carrying the recommendations of that Report into effect, he felt himself called on briefly to explain to their Lordships why, under these circumstances, he should not consider it inconsistent to give his support to the Bill now before the House. He supported the present Bill, because from all the information he had been able to acquire, and from the fullest consideration of the subject, he thought it the best Bill which the Legislature was in a condition to pass, without giving so much dissatisfaction to a great body of the public, as greatly to counterbalance the advantages that might otherwise be derived from a measure of this kind. With reference to the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he wished to say this, that there were some points of that Report about which he was not perfectly satisfied, but he had therein yielded in a great degree to what he was entitled to regard as the superior judgment of the learned Commissioners, who were more practically acquainted with the working of the Courts; on one point, indeed, he had held a very decided opinion—an opinion which he still retained, that it would be far better to transfer the testamentary jurisdiction, among some other incidentals to ecclesiastical Law, to the Common Law Courts. But he had submitted to the judgment of those who considered that any violent disruption of this jurisdiction from the courts which now exercised it would be attended with many serious evils; and that it would be better to leave the jurisdiction where it was, at all events for the present, taking measures, at the same time, for improving its administration in every possible way. Now, with respect to what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend opposite (lord Cottenham), he must be permitted to say, that he had not by any means understood his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to say that the present system was the best that could be devised; but he spoke of it as preserving that which was theoretically the right system. He thought it an advantage that every Bishop should have within his own diocese the means of administering the law. He thought it hardly fair for his noble Friend (lord Cottenham) to represent the present measure

as a measure which proposed to create thirty-four new courts. It should rather be considered that there were in all 384 Courts exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and that of these the Bill proposed to abolish 350, leaving thirty-four, which were to be remodelled and improved in their constitution. Now, with respect to the administration of some of the Ecclesiastical Courts, he must own that his experience of some of those Courts had not given him the highest reverence for their administration of the law, and he thought it desirable that those Courts should be placed on a better system, and a better administration of justice substituted. With respect to testamentary jurisdiction, being of a civil nature, it might be wished that the whole of the testamentary jurisdiction should be in the hands of the Common Law Courts. It might be questionable whether, in their anxiety for the better administration of the law, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners did not go too far in recommending the abolition of those Courts. Perhaps their Lordships were not aware that those Courts discharged other functions, which could not be discharged with propriety by any other Court whatever. After various attempts to give effect to the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he thought that the present Bill was one which was likely to be attended with less dissatisfaction. His noble Friend had alluded to the Petitions which had last year been presented to that and the other House of Parliament on this subject. Those Petitions expressed the sentiments not only of the country practitioners but of other practitioners also, and represented the feelings of a large body of the clergy and laity of the country on this subject. Indeed, a much stronger feeling existed, and to a greater extent, than he was first aware of; and he considered the question now to be, whether those Courts would not, if remodelled, have the effect of remedying to a great extent the evils which arose from them. He could not but feel when the present Bill passed into a law, that those Courts would be a great support and consolation to the Bishop of each Diocese, limited as the Bill proposed, and presided over by proper Judges; for he admitted the justice of the principle that it was not expedient that they should be presided over by Clergymen. Upon the whole he did not think he was guilty of any inconsistency in supporting the present Bill, were he even disposed—which he would not say he was—to maintain the unimpeachable wisdom of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; for, although this Bill did not go so far as they recommended, it went a great way, and got rid of the crying evil of the Peculiar Jurisdictions. For these reasons, and seeing that the system of Diocesan Courts, even supposing it to be an evil system, could not be abolished without creating a great deal of opposition and unfriendly feeling on the part of those whom it was more desirable to conciliate, he would be content with the present measure, although it did not accomplish all the good that might be desired.

Lord Brougham agreed with the right Rev. Prelate, that there was quite enough of good in the measure to reconcile him to take it; while he also agreed with his noble and learned Friend near him in wishing it had gone a great deal further. This legislation originated in a Bill which he (Lord Brougham) had had the honour to bring before Parliament many years ago, and subsequently at different times, down to 1835, when he gave it up almost in despair; and his experience had taught him that which he did not think his noble and learned Friend near him was aware of, the very great difficulties that lay in the way of legislating upon this subject. When engaged in legislating upon that subject, if he saw one party or one deputation, he was sure he saw 200 or 300; if he received one memorial or remonstrance, he received 500. With the single exception of the Registry Act, which was defeated by the same influence, he never remembered so powerful a host of adversaries raised against any one measure he had any concern with in the way of legislation. The opposition the Reform Bill met with out of doors in 1831—not in Parliament, but out of doors—was really a joke compared to the opposition to the Registry Act; and there was a remarkable instance of it. After their Lordships threw out that Bill on the 10th of October, 1831, he remained in the House in consequence of judicial business until the 20th, and he then went down into Westmoreland to enjoy his long vacation of eleven days. During that time the country was never so much excited as it was on the Reform Bill; the people were in a rage against the Government, and against Lord Grey in particular, because his Government would not take the wise advice of proroguing Parliament one day and meeting two days afterwards to propound the same Bill. They were almost torn to pieces. Lord Gray received deputations in the dead of the night, who told him that he was a doomed Lord. He also was a doomed Lord, and his noble Friend there. Such was the extreme excitement which prevailed on the Reform Bill; and that from the capital to the remotest provinces. Well, after the eleven days' vacation, that most melancholy tragedy, incident to that agitation, took place,—the Bristol riots, which tended to increase the agitation and excitement. On his return from Westmoreland, if he saw one bill on the subject of Reform, or advertisement, or placard affixed to private mansions and public buildings, and exhibited at other places of public resort, upon the all-absorbing subject of Reform, he was sure he saw a score calling upon the landlords not to suffer themselves to be robbed by the detestable Registry Act. He mentioned this to show that it was the very same interest which opposed that Act which lately and now up to the present hour was at work to defeat the first and best Bill upon this subject which he and others of the Commissioners and Committee were most anxious to have carried, as the most complete and advisable measure. The interest to which he alluded consisted of the country practitioners, the landed Gentry, and those under their influence, who formed themselves into a kind of league to support the practice of the Local Courts, and to prevent any enlarged measure of reform; and he was one of those who believed that the Government would find insuperable difficulty in carrying this measure, not in that, but in the other House. The business of that House, then, would be not to send down measures to the other House, which they had not a fair and reasonable prospect of being able to carry. It was not a mere inconvenience they would have to deal with, but an insuperable difficulty. As, therefore, he could not get all he could wish, he was bound to take all he could get, and if he went into Committee with the Bill, he should go there to make it what he wanted it to be, or if not that, at any rate the best Bill that could be carried in the other House. He certainly, however, proposed to go into Committee, with the full intention of doing his best to remove from the measure any feature which might at present tend, as his noble and learned Friend suggested, to impede further improvement in this direction, to prevent onward legislation, when people should come to their senses upon the matter. Now, it certainly appeared to him that, to appoint thirty Judges for life, with good salaries—and good salaries they must be—would tend to impede, if not totally to obstruct, the introduction of a better measure at a more favourable time; but in Committee he should endeavour to prevail upon them to keep their power in their hands, and therefore he would have those officers made removable, and make them take their offices with a notice or warning not to complain if a Bill should pass to render their services in those Diocesan Courts no longer essential and necessary. [The Lord Chancellor: That is provided for by the Act. It is not intended that any compensation shall be given them.] That removed a very great difficulty, no doubt. But he had thought that those officers were irremovable, that they held office for life. But his objection was at an end. His noble and learned Friend had not forgotten the case of the Welch Judges. His noble and learned friend (Lord Cottenham) had said the argument about Local Courts had no bearing upon the question. He might think so, but he (Lord Brougham) was of a different opinion. He had been often told of the inconsistency of centralizing one day what he was localizing another; and no doubt he was liable to that charge, as regarded the Diocesan Courts. But he felt that there were good reasons for giving local jurisdiction, so as to bring home the diocesan jurisdiction to the suitor. Had there been in the Local Courts a most respectable man fit to be a Judge, then, as far as possible, it would have been right to give him the jurisdiction which this Bill reserved to the reformed Diocesan Court. He submitted his Local Courts Bill to the Common Law Commissioners, who differed from him upon one point; they struck out the testamentary jurisdiction. One of their reasons was, that there was a Diocesan Court already established there; and this Bill to abolish Diocesan Courts was not then brought in. The principal ground for his supporting this Bill was, undoubtedly, the abolition of the Peculiars; that was the greatest improvement that could be possibly made. The right Rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) would bear him out in saying that a very great scandal was removed from our ecclesiastical as well as our judicial establishments by the abolition of those exceedingly imperfect courts of judicature, the Peculiars and Exempts. He had hoped that the temper of the times

would have enabled them to go further; but as the case stood their Lordships should reserve to themselves with the option the power of hereafter legislating upon this subject, if so advised. Upon the whole, he was disposed to give his concurrence to the second reading of the Bill, reserving to himself the power of making such suggestions with regard to the details in Committee as hereafter might seem to him to be desirable.

Lord Campbell said, he must express his unfeigned astonishment, after what had been said by his noble and learned Friend, that there had been no explanation of the motives which had induced Her Majesty's Government to abandon the Bill introduced last Session. His noble and learned Friend who last addressed the House, had endeavoured to make an apology for the Bill being in its present shape, and had certainly made the most of his materials; but he did not suppose that his noble and learned Friend was present at the Cabinet when this subject was debated; nor could he suppose that his noble and learned Friend was one who spoke as the organ of the Government, for the purpose of communicating to the House and to the public information upon this subject. The House, then, was entirely in the dark with respect to the motives which had induced the Government to introduce this Session a measure so entirely different from that of last Session. There were present five Members of the Cabinet, perhaps six; and no doubt they had all made themselves masters of the subject. There was the noble Duke at the head of Her Majesty's Government, he could master anything. No doubt the noble Duke knew the advantages and disadvantages of the Bill of last year as compared with this one. The noble President of the Council, who had long presided there with much benefit to the public, was well acquainted with our judicial system in all its details; but he remained silent. There was the noble President of the Board of Control, versed in matters connected with finance—and he said nothing. There was the noble Secretary for the Foreign Department, who, though no soldier, was well acquainted with the Church militant and all its difficulties—but he was dumb. All were silent. The right rev. Prelate had given no explanation whatever of the reason of the change: on the contrary, he had strongly confirmed

the objection of his noble and learned Friend, because that right rev. Prelate had told the House he would even then be ready to support the Bill of last Session. [The Bishop of London: "No, no!" He had understood so; and it would be most extraordinary if it were not so, because that right rev. Prelate not only was a Member of the Commission along with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and paid, as he always did, in other cases, the greatest attention to the subject, but, after seven years' deliberation, he signed the recommendation contained in the Report of the Commissioners. He presumed that his noble and learned Friend who had spoken last had left the House, as he did not see him either in his usual place on the woolsack, or in the seat which he occasionally occupied on that (the Opposition) side of the House; he would therefore abstain from advertg to some of the topics which had fallen from his noble and learned Friend. It was, clear, however, that his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack had changed his opinion on this subject. What was decisive on this point was, that a Bill on this subject, and similar to that of last year, which in 1836 passed the House of Commons, was sent up to that House; and he knew not what reason there was to suppose that a similar Bill would not now be passed through that House; and, above all, when it was recollected what powerful influence the Government possessed in that House. He still believed that if the Government wished to carry such a general measure as that of last year, there would not be the slightest difficulty in the matter. His noble and learned Friend on the woolsack anticipated that he (Lord Campbell) would oppose this Bill. Now, he could only say in reply, that he considered that he should be guilty of great inconsistency if he did not do so. He felt satisfied that this Bill preserved all the expensive and vexatious litigious proceedings in cases of marriage, adultery, defamation, testamentary cases and Church-rates, for jurisdiction in all these matters was reserved to all the Diocesan Courts. Again, this Bill preserved all the vices of the law respecting cases of bona notabilia, by which a probate was void, if proved only in one diocese, and there appeared to be goods to the amount of 5*l.* in another diocese. It preserved also all the distinctions now existing between the Prerogative Courts of the two provinces of Canterbury and York. The right rev. Prelate would recollect, that the Real Property Commission, of which he (Lord Campbell) had had the honour to be a member, recommended that there should be only one court for the trial of such cases for the whole of England and Wales, and he presumed that the right rev. Prelate still adhered to the opinion which he then gave as one of those Commissioners. It was obvious that there could be no injury to the Church in adopting such a proposition. God forbid that he (Lord Campbell) should wish to interfere with the proper jurisdiction of the Church in all matters which properly belonged to it; for instance, in all cases of Church discipline or orthodoxy he had no wish to interfere; but what had the Church to do now-a-days with marriage or wills? He would not say that in former times, when marriage was regarded as a sacrament, the Church ought not to have had some authority, but this had long since ceased to be so—since the period of Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Bill; and above all, since by the recent Act, marriage had become a civil contract, and all questions as to its validity in any case resolved themselves into the interpretation of an Act of Parliament, and, as a matter of course, to be referred to the Queen's Judges for decision. These were often of a most difficult nature, and they required on the part of the Judge a profound knowledge of the law, and he thought, therefore, all these matters were most properly referred to the Superior Courts of Law. The right rev. Prelate said that he regretted that the Church had ever anything to do with the jurisdiction as regarded wills. But how did the Church get possession of this jurisdiction? It was, that formerly, when a man died intestate, the Church claimed his personal property for the purpose of saying masses for the good of his soul. It, therefore, was supposed to have an interest in every case of a will, and got possession of this jurisdiction accordingly. Now the Church could put in no such plea; and, in fact, it ought to have no more to do with testamentary causes than with questions involving real estates. They might just as well claim the right to try tithe cases, insurance cases, or charter parties cases, as those respecting wills. He conceived that the only proper course to adopt was, to have one general court, sitting in London, which should have general jurisdiction in all those questions which now went to the several Diocesan Courts. He was in favour of having Local Courts, where he could obtain them with advantage, but then two essential principles were involved in the case. The first was, that there was sufficient business for the court to transact, and the second was, that the business of the court should be such as to enable them to get competent Judges to do it. With regard to the Diocesan Courts, they possessed neither the one nor the other of these requisites. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham) had stated that such was the small quantity of business before these courts, that they had each only the fraction of a cause in a year before it. Was it possible, he would ask, to have good Judges under such a state of things? To deal with marriages and wills required a knowledge of the civil law, and of the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which were guided by civil law; and those only who had practised in Ecclesiastical Courts, who were familiar with the civil law and its practice, were competent to be Judges; but then there were thirty-four of these Judges to be selected; and it was obvious that from the small amount of business that it was no very easy matter to obtain that number of efficient persons. The right rev. Prelate said, that in some instances business was well done in the Diocesan Courts; he (Lord Campbell) would only say, if such was the case, they must be very rare instances indeed. He had had rather an extensive experience with respect to them, and he would venture to say that he had never heard a case before any one of these Diocesan Courts in which the grossest blunders were not made. Even the Archbishop's Court at York was not an exception. He had never heard any one praise these Diocesan Courts, unless it was his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, who seemed to consider them as the very perfection of the judicial system. He must be allowed to express his surprise that his noble and learned Friend did not attempt to make a better defence for the Government than he had made. In 1836, when his noble and learned Friend occupied a different position in that House, he, towards the close of the Session, took a review of the business which had been gone through, and he was particularly eloquent on the state

His noble and learned Friend then proceeded to panegyrisé the report of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and he did not then eulogise the Diocesan Courts as he now did. His noble Friend proceeded to say,

“That Commission made a report, which was prepared, he believed, by Dr. Lushington—a report distinguished for the information and learning which it contained, and which led to the preparation of a Bill handed by us to our successors in office. My noble and learned Friend was from time to time reminded of the importance of the subject, and called upon to adopt some legislative measure with respect to it. A Bill, indeed, had been introduced; but as on some parts of the measure a difference of opinion existed, they were referred to the consideration of a select Committee, who afterwards made a Report, which was laid upon your Lordships’ table. From that time to the present, the Bill has been allowed to slumber—not the slightest attempt has been made by the Ministers of the Crown to pursue this important measure.”

This was the Bill which was prepared in the year 1835, and which his noble and learned Friend taunted the late Government for not having the power to carry. But what had been done by the present Government? It could not have been expected that they would have brought forward a measure on the subject in the short Session of 1841, immediately after their accession to office; but in February, 1842, the Government induced Her Majesty to address the Parliament thus :—

That declaration was made by Her

Majesty in February, and, though Parliament sat until August, no Bill on the subject was introduced into either House. His noble and learned Friend said, that it was deemed better that the Bill should come from the other House. If that were the case, why was the measure now introduced into that House? What he complained of was, that the Bill was not introduced into the House of Commons in 1842, at which time the prejudices against the plan involved in the measure of last year did not exist to anything like the same extent to which they had been excited. If the Bill had been brought in in 1842, he would venture to say that the Government could have passed it with the greatest ease. He had asked several times why the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill had not been brought forward, and he could on no occasion obtain a satisfactory answer. Again, at the meeting of the Parliament in 1843, the Royal Commissioners said,

“We are commanded by Her Majesty to acquaint you that measures connected with the improvement of the Law will be submitted for your consideration.”

Now he had no doubt that this passage referred to the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. Such a measure was asked for again and again in their Lordships’ House, but no one ever saw it. In the other House of Parliament a measure certainly was brought forward, having for its object the establishment of one Court for the decision of all questions relating to wills and matters testamentary, and no measure was ever more panegyrised, or received such wide support. That Bill was brought forward in a very able speech, by his learned Friend Sir William Follett; and Sir James Graham, who had maturely considered the subject, as he was Chairman of the Committee of the other House on the inquiry into the matter, also in a most able manner supported the Bill. No measure of a Government could have been more warmly supported or panegyrised than this measure was when it was first introduced. His noble and learned Friend used to ask why did not the then Government carry this and other measures through that House? He could only say, that, unfortunately, a great desire existed on the part of some parties to act in such a way as to enable them to say that the Government had not power to carry measures which they deemed beneficial. But the Government which succeeded them in office did possess that power; why then, he would ask, did they not carry this Bill? That Bill was founded on the plan of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and which was so much praised by his noble and learned Friend in 1836—this Bill was brought forward by the present Government last year, and he should like to have some explanation why the Government chose to abandon altogether the great principles contained in it. His noble and learned Friend made, in 1836, a remark upon the then Government which, as regarded them, was wholly misapplied, but which was, with respect to the present occasion, strikingly appropriate. He said, that the measures which they themselves recommended and prepared, they, without the least regard to what they had previously said, tamely abandoned at the dictation of any section of their supporters. That was what had been said with reference to the late Government; and, it appeared to him curiously applicable to the present. There was much mystery in this transaction, which ought to be cleared up by an explanation from some Member of the Government.

The Bishop of London said, that whatever might have been his opinion of the plan suggested by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he had taken care that night not to express any opinion upon the subject, or what course he might have pursued.

The Lord Chancellor said, he rose for the purpose of meeting the challenge which his noble and learned Friend had thrown down. He had asked what were the reasons which induced the Government to depart from their original plan? Did his noble and learned Friend suppose that he (the Lord Chancellor) did not concur in the wisdom or the policy of the Bill introduced into the House of Commons last year? He could assure his noble and learned Friend that he was entirely mistaken in supposing that he had differed from his Colleagues as to that measure. Nothing that he had said, could, for a moment, warrant such an assumption. He, in common with the rest of the Cabinet, had anxiously wished to carry into effect the plan proposed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. His noble and learned Friend now asked, why abandon that measure, and substitute another, from which the best parts of the measure of last year were omitted? Neither of his noble and learned Friends had exercised their usual industry, when they made complaints of this nature; for if they had looked to the progress of the Bill through the other House last Session, they would have seen ample reasons to induce the Government to pursue the course which they had now taken. The second reading of the Bill was certainly carried by a majority, after a long and warm debate, but it was obvious to every Member of that House, from the tone that prevailed, that the Bill could not be carried to a third reading in the shape in which it then was. The Bill was materially altered in Committee and assumed an entirely new form, and it was apparent to the Government that it could only be carried in that new form. The question then for the consideration of the Government was, whether the entire measure should be abandoned, or whether the Bill should be carried in its altered shape, for some of the provisions still left in it were of the utmost importance. The Government determined to adopt the latter course, and the present Bill was, as nearly as possible, a copy of the Bill as it passed through Committee in the other House last year. This was the history of the Bill in the last Session; and he believed that if a Bill embodying all the suggestions of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners passed that House without delay, and was sent at once to the other House, the same course would be pursued with it as was taken with respect to the Bill of last year, if it was not thrown out altogether. He repeated, then, that the Bill now under consideration was essentially the Bill which went through the Committee of the other House last Session. If he believed that they could pass the large measure through that House, and if they were satisfied that they could not carry it through the other House, he conceived that it was wise and prudent not to attempt that which the experience of the past showed could not be done. He believed, therefore, that the proper course to pursue was, to introduce a measure, not going to the extent that he could wish, but going to the extent that they could calculate upon its success, and which would still be productive of much good. If his noble and learned Friend thought that he could carry such a Bill through the other House, let him try and persuade the House in Committee to make such alterations as would effect the object which he had in view. But he (the Lord Chancellor) was satisfied that his noble and Learned Friend could not succeed; he, therefore, must rest content to confine himself to that measure of good which was contained in this Bill. Such was the explanation of the course taken by the Government with respect to this Bill, and in respect to which every Member of the Cabinet fully and entirely concurred. They one and all were convinced that the Bill should be brought forward in its reduced shape, because they were satisfied it could be productive of great good, and because they were satisfied that they could not carry a measure which went so far as the former Bill. As for expressing an approval of the Diocesan Courts, and as for the charge of inconsistency which had been brought against him, both his noble and learned Friends had entirely misapprehended, he would not say misrepresented, what had fallen from him; for at the commencement of his observations, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, he distinctly and unequivocally stated that he greatly preferred the Bill of last year. The present Bill, he might add, was founded on a Bill which was introduced into the other House in 1813, by Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott), and he never should be ashamed to acknowledge that he had adopted a Bill on such a subject on the high authority of an individual, so eminent and learned in matters of this kind. He now thought that he had given a satisfactory explanation as to the conduct of the Government, and had shown that there was no ground for the charge of inconsistency which had so harshly been brought against him.

Amendment negatived. Bill read a second time.

THE THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENTS. BILL.] The Duke of Buccleugh, in reference to some observations which had on a former occasion fallen from a noble and learned Lord opposite, respecting the Three-and-a-Half per Cents., wished to say that in the year 1834, when a similar proceeding was adopted with regard to the Four per Cents., notice was given in the House of Commons on the 6th of May; on the 9th the House went into Committee, so that the Bill was not even brought in until after notice had been given to the holders of Stock; the time given to them being the interval between the 8th and the 28th of May. On the 12th the resolutions were reported, and it was not until the 12th of June that the Bill was read a first time, though the period for expressing dissent had expired on the 28th of the preceding month. On the 16th of June the Bill was read a second time; on the 19th it was Committed; on the 20th the Report was received; on the 25th it was read a third time; on the 9th of July it was returned from the House of Lords, and it was not until the 25th of that month that it received the Royal Assent. The dissentients respecting the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. up to the present time, were to an amount ridiculously small.

Lord Campbell said, that those who dissented, could not enter their names till a book was opened for that purpose, and the Bank could not open such a volume till the Bill became law. The Resolutions of the House of Commons had not the force of law, and no precedent could justify such irregularity.

The Duke of Wellington said, the difference between this case and the case of 1834 was just this: that in this case, in all probability, the Royal Assent would be given to this Bill to-morrow, and then there would be time between to-morrow and Saturday to give the dissent legally, according to the opinion of the noble Lord. In 1834 the Act did not pass till three weeks after the period when the legal dissent could be given.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. Wyse, from the Loyal National Repeal Association, for Inquiry into the State Prosecutions. — By Mr. J. A. Smith, from Leth, for Reduction of Duty on Tea.

tion in respect to the numbers who had signed it, to the wrong complained of, or the period at which it was presented to the House. It had received in the short interval of three weeks, not less than 821,334 signatures; nor were these names collected at hazard, but on the contrary, received with all due precaution to verify their authenticity, and to preclude, as much as possible, all chance of fraud; he could speak with certainty on this subject: he was in possession of a complete analysis of the number of petitioners sent from every part of the country, divided into counties, and each county again divided into parishes. It appeared from that analysis that every portion of the country, north, south, east, and west, had concurred. The north, indeed, in proportion to its population might be considered, if anything, more zealous than the south. Monaghan had contributed 20,329; Down, 22,526; Donegal, 20,041; Antrim, 26,410; Cavan, 47,340; while Clare had sent in 9,648; Kilkenny, 12,327; Kerry, 12,880; Meath, 23,755; Galway, 36,395; Dublin, 39,799. This was evidence that it was not a local movement; and he might, with equal truth infer, it was not one of party or sect. Nor was less diversity observable in the several classes who had pressed forward. The names comprehended all classes as well as persuasions. The names of the Catholic hierarchy and clergy were to be seen intermingled with those of the principal inhabitants, merchants, and traders of each place. The following Corporate bodies had also signed it:—The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of Dublin; the Mayor and twenty-nine Members of the Corporation of Cork; the Mayor, and fifteen Aldermen, and Town Council of Sligo; the Mayor, and twenty-four Aldermen, and Town Council of Kilkenny; the Chairman, and twenty-four Commissioners of Longford; the Chairman and seven Commissioners of Armagh; the Chairman, and fifteen Commissioners of Dundalk; by fifteen Commissioners of Galway, the Chairman, and fifteen Commissioners of Kells; by ten of the Commissioners, and by the Clergy, and Poor Law Guardians of Mallow; the Mayor, and twenty-four of the Aldermen, and Town Councillors, and Burgesses of Clonmel; by nine of the Commissioners of Kinsale; and by the Chairman and eighteen Commissioners of New Ross. Every precaution, as had already been stated, had been taken to guard against unauthorised and fictitious signatures. Each person signing was required to add his place of residence. Every care was taken that the subject matter of the petition should be explained fully before the parties were allowed to sign, and that no name should be permitted to be affixed without the fullest consent of each individual. He did not believe there had ever come from Ireland a Petition where more scrupulous accuracy had been sought and observed. He was quite sure there had never appeared before that House from Ireland a Petition signed by a greater number. He now turned to the Petition itself, and though he was debarred by the regulations of the House from reading it, and going into any discussion on its details, and though he had determined to bring later the whole matter by a substantive Motion before the House, he could not pass by so momentous a document without slightly referring to its several allegations. The Petitioners refer to the meetings held in various parts of Ireland to exercise their equal right of petitioning Parliament for the Repeal of an Act of Parliament which they considered prejudicial to their interests; that although several millions of people attended those meetings, and no breach of the peace occurred; that although those meetings continued to be held for several months, no declaration of their illegality by the functionaries of the Crown, or of the determination of Government to suppress them, had been made until the 8th of October, when the meeting at Clontarf had been announced, and the mode in which the Government interfered to prevent that meeting, the Petitioners complained of as being an unlawful interference with the rights of the people. They then referred to the late State trials, and complained that the most unjustifiable means had been resorted to by the law officers of the Crown to procure a conviction. They complained of the striking out the names of the Roman Catholics from the panel, and of the statement of the Attorney-General, that if the Bill against the traversers were found "the would undertake to establish the existence of as wicked and foul a conspiracy as ever existed in this Empire." This they alleged was calculated to produce a prejudicial effect on the minds of the Jury, against the traversers. That statement, however, the

Attorney-General had failed to prove. They also complained of the charge of the Lord Chief Justice to the Jury, as being partial against the traversers, and they further declared that if an inquiry were granted, they would undertake to prove that the Chief Justice had invaded the province of the Jury, by expressing an opinion as to the fact, while in doing so he suppressed every thing that was favourable to the traversers—and that all the circumstances connected with those proceedings were calculated, and had had the effect of inducing great distrust in the minds of the Irish people in the administration of justice in Ireland—that they infringed the right of Trial by Jury, and the right of meeting to petition Parliament—and they prayed that an immediate inquiry might be granted with a view of enabling them to establish the truth of the allegations contained in the Petition. This was not a mere Petition to this House—an ordinary complaint of grievance; but a solemn remonstrance—a dignified but determined protest, in respectful but not less firm language, of the people of Ireland, against what they considered the greatest wrong which could be inflicted—the greatest injury which could be aimed at the liberties of a country. With regard to the circumstances of the times, he should not now break through the regulations of the House by referring to them; indeed it was needless; they were present to every man's mind. He trusted, however, he had said enough to justify the intention then expressed, that, on an early day, he would move for a Committee to take the charges of the Petition into consideration. He moved that the Petition be brought up.

Petition brought up, read, and laid on the Table.

WEST INDIA IMMIGRATION.] Mr. Vernon Smith, understanding from the papers laid upon the Table of the House, that inquiries had been instituted by the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, addressed to the Governors of Trinidad, Jamaica and Guiana, as to whether it would be advisable to relax the rule which prevailed of only admitting a proportion of women, amounting to one-third, in any Immigration which might take place into those Colonies; and also understanding that answers had been received favourable to such relaxation from the Governors of the Colonies, wished to know whether the noble

Lord had acted upon the information thus obtained?

Lord Stanley replied, that in consequence of communications from Sierra Leone stating that great difficulty had resulted from the restriction alluded to, a prevailing upon men who were desirous of immigrating to West India Colonies to go thither, he had written to the Governors of Jamaica, Trinidad, and Guiana, to inquire whether, in their opinion, a relaxation of the rule as to the proportion of two men to be admitted, would be advisable. Their answers had only been received four or five days ago: and, although the papers containing them had been immediately laid before the House, no actual steps had yet been taken in consequence of the information communicated in them.

IMPORT DUTIES.] Mr. Ewart rose to move the following Resolutions:—

“That it is indispensable to the maintenance and extension of the Trade of this country, that those duties be repealed which press on the raw materials of manufacture, especially the raw materials of the woollen and cotton trade. That it is expedient also that those Duties be greatly reduced which press on articles of interchange in return for our manufactures, especially such articles of interchange as, at the same time, concern the subsistence of the people; being (besides corn, which is the subject of superior and separate consideration) such articles as tea, sugar, coffee, bacon, butter, and cheese. That it is expedient that those Duties also be greatly reduced which, by their amount, encourage smuggling; being at once injurious to the revenue and dangerous to the morality of the country; such as the Duties on tobacco, silk goods, and foreign spirits. That whatever temporary deficiency of revenue be caused by such reduction, ought, until the revenue regain its former amount, to be sustained by the property, and not by the trade and labour of the country.”

He conceived that there were many advantages attending the bringing forward and promoting the discussion of commercial measures of a general nature. Public opinion on such occasions cast its shadow before, and that which an individual Member of the House advocated as expressive of public opinion might hereafter become the subject of Parliamentary legislation. It was with that conviction that he brought forward his Motion. He asked the House to consent to the proposition of removing duties which pressed upon the raw material of manufactures. In doing so, he asked them to sanction a principle already introduced by the right hon. Gentleman, the First Lord of the Treasury, but he asked them to carry it further. It was generally admitted to be impolitic to tax the raw elements of our manufactures, but if there be any time at which it was most impolitic, it was in a time of peace, and at the same time of national difficulty. Our cotton manufacturers had to resist a competition almost unexampled in the annals of the trade. Whether we looked to America, to Germany, or to France, we found that our manufacturing prosperity was in danger; and he therefore thought, that even on that ground alone, the House was bound to reduce the duties on the raw material of manufactures. He maintained, however, that such a step was particularly politic in time of peace, because then prices necessarily became low; and, in proportion as the prices of raw material fell, the proportion of duty to the cost price of production increased. Low-priced cotton was also extensively used, to the duties upon which the same argument would apply. Much of the wool also used now was low-priced wool, coming from the banks of the Plate. A similar sort of wool was also imported from the Mediterranean; and as such commodities came to be more generally in use, the duty upon them was more severely felt than when it fell upon the high-priced German wool. The consequence was, that the wools of South America and the Mediterranean were generally exported, to be manufactured in other countries, and thus to enrich foreign manufacturers. He conceived, then, that he had good reason for calling upon them to repeal the duties affecting the raw materials of manufactures. This was the first part of his proposition, and he maintained, that by the repeal of these duties, they would add to the employment of the people. He wished, too, to increase their means of subsistence, and with this view he called upon the House to extend our commerce in tea, sugar, and coffee, and also in bacon, cheese, and butter. These might be called the household articles of commerce and they were unquestionably of the greatest importance to the poor. America had abstained from levying duties on the articles of tea and coffee, and he asked the House to follow the example thus set to it. But, besides, we were now anticipating an extension in our trade with China; but no such anticipations could be realised if they did not enable the Chinese to give us something in return for our manufactures. We must, if we increased the sale of our manufactures in China, take an increased quantity of some article in return from them, and that article must be tea. The consumption of tea in this country had remarkably increased of late years, and so had that of coffee and sugar. These articles had become of more importance to the people than they had ever been, for they had acquired those habits of temperance which were so honourable to them, but so unknown to their forefathers. Taking the whole amount of tea consumed in this country at 40,000,000lbs., about 22,000,000lbs. consisted of that sort called Congou, which was principally consumed by the poorer classes, and, therefore, a reduction in the duties would be a great relief to the poor. The present duty was 2s. 1d. per lb. upon tea of all sorts, and of course it pressed with greater severity upon the more coarse than upon the finer qualities of tea consumed by the rich. When the tea duties were altered, upon the opening of the Chinese trade, a discriminating rate of duty, favourable to the import of the teas consumed by the poor, was attempted to be introduced. It was proposed to divide the classes of tea imported into three sorts, to be charged respectively with 2s., 1s. 6d., and 1s. per lb. of duty. Great difficulty was anticipated, however, in judging of the qualities of the teas; and at length an uniform duty was suggested, and which was the parent of the present duty of 2s. 1d. Now, whether we looked to the prospects of our trade in China, or to the interests of our own poor, a reduction in the tea duties appeared equally just and politic. When the duties on tea were reduced in 1768, the consumption was doubled. In 1784, the duty was 1s., or about 67 per cent. Mr. Pitt reduced that duty, and the consumption rose immediately from 5,000,000lbs. to 10,000,000lbs., and in two years from 5,000,000lbs. to 17,000,000lbs. By reducing the present duties on tea, they would be enabling the poor to use not only a cheaper but a purer beverage. He would only allude slightly to the subject of the sugar duties, but he would maintain that these duties were most oppressively felt by the poor consumers, and on looking over the annual circulars printed with respect to the trade, he found accounts of a great increase in the quantity of impurities mixed up with the sugar. The lowest-priced sugars contained nearly 10 per cent. adulterated matter. With respect to coffee it was well known that the consumption had greatly increased. In 1811 there was only one coffee-house in London—that was to say, one establishment devoted to the sale of that beverage only—while at present the number amounted to upwards of 2,000. It was well known that in 1801 the duty on coffee was a very high one, amounting to 1s. 6d. per lb. The consumption, then, in this country did not exceed one pound per head for all the population. In 1811 the duty was lowered to 1s., and the consumption increased to five pounds per head. As long as the duty remained at 1s., the consumption was stationary; but when the former was reduced to 6d. per lb., he need not remind the House how rapidly the latter increased. The case of coffee was, indeed, a remarkable instance of the equality preserved between the reduction of duty and the increase of consumption. The consumption was always in the inverse ratio of the duty. The right hon. Baronet opposite had, indeed, reduced in some degree, the duty upon coffee in his Tariff; but although he reduced it in amount, he had not done so in proportion. In fact, the position of foreign coffee was rendered more unfavourable than before. Now, he asked for a reduction of duties upon tea, sugar, and coffee. He might be blamed for introducing so many articles into one proposition; but he believed, that by the increased consumption of one of them, the effect of any reduction of duty on another, would be fully made up to the Revenue. He had asked them to remove the duties upon the raw materials of manufactures—to lower the duties upon articles of subsistence; and he now asked them to turn their attention to those duties which had always been held as incentives to smuggling. Not a day passed but some poor seaman was dragged up at Liverpool, on the charge of having contraband tobacco in his possession. To put the trade upon something like a fair footing in the article of brandy, the duty ought to be reduced one-half. That this was the most expedient course, was proved by the fact, that in former cases, where the duties were reduced, the Revenue increased. Chemistry was made subservient

to smuggling; and brandy was introduced in considerable quantities, in the shape of naphtha. It would be a great advantage to this country if brandy was introduced in a larger quantity, for it was wanted for many pharmaceutical purposes. Mr. Huskisson reduced the duty on silk 30 per cent. ad valorem; but this was too high by half. He came now to the articles of butter and cheese. On the one there was a duty of 20s. per cwt., and on the other one of 10s. 6d. He could not understand, when the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) reduced the duties on salt provisions, why he omitted those two most important articles to the poor. He was afraid it was because the right hon. Gentleman found the cheese interest too strong to contend against. The indirect taxation which pressed so much on industry, was owing to the ascendancy of the landed interest. Sir R. Walpole gave the sanction of his authority to this principle; but in the concluding years of his Administration, he acted on the views so long maintained by the present Opposition.

CORN LAWS.] The Earl of Radnor was anxious to notice a charge which had been thrown out against the manner in which a petition that he had recently presented to the House, from the County of Somerset, in favour of Free Trade, had been carried. It was said that persons had been sent, at the expense of the Anti-Corn-Law League, from Taunton to Bridgewater, by whose means the petition had been carried, although the meeting had been summoned for a very different object. It was true that many persons friendly to the principles advocated by the League were present, but they were not sent there in the manner alleged. At the time of presenting the petition to which he alluded, he had adverted to some observations made by a noble Lord, with reference to the Anti-Corn-Law League, at a meeting in favour of the Corn Laws, held at York. It had been supposed that he alluded, on that occasion, to Lord Feversham, as the speaker. Such, however, was not the fact. He referred to observations made by the Earl of Harewood.

The Duke of Richmond thought that from what the noble Earl himself said, it might be inferred that a great number of persons were at the meeting who would not have been present if some extraordinary influence had not been used. The noble Earl did not deny that many members of the Anti-Corn-Law League were present, and it was admitted, that by waiting till the meeting grew thinner, they carried their point. He believed that they considered this a great triumph, and he fancied that most of their triumphs were achieved in the same way. He was glad to find that they were angry, because they now discovered that the farmers had come to a determination to oppose their machinations, and support the existing Corn Laws.

The Duke of Buccleuch hoped that he might be permitted to make one observation, as a relation of his own (the Earl of Harewood) had been alluded to by the Noble Earl. His noble relation had certainly made a speech at the York meeting against the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-Law League, which speech contained the statement, that a farmer who had spoken against the Corn-Law League, had had his stacks set on fire the following night; but he could assure the noble Earl, that what his noble relation stated on that occasion, he stated as a fact that had appeared in a newspaper.

The Earl of Radnor said, that on reading the statement made by the noble Earl, as given in the Leeds Mercury, in which paper some commentaries appeared at the same time, on the expressions used by the noble Earl, he wrote to the noble Earl to ascertain whether the statement was accurate, and he received a note from him signifying that the report in the Leeds Mercury of what he had said was correct. Now there was a direct accusation made in those expressions, against the Anti-Corn-Law League, intimating that their proceedings led to incendiarism.

Lord Wharnccliffe could not avoid remarking that the Anti-Corn-Law League attacked the Aristocracy, not in measured language, but with considerable bitterness of expression, and he was not a little surprised to find that persons who thus acted, should be so thin-skinned themselves, as not to be able to bear strong language when applied to themselves. It appeared that his noble Friend had made a statement, at the York meeting, that a farmer, who had spoken against the Anti-Corn-Law League, had had his corn-stacks burnt the following night, and this the Anti-Corn-Law League could not endure. If that party used strong language, they must expect strong language being applied to them in retaliation.

Other petitions being presented on the subject of the Corn Laws,

The Earl of Radnor rose, and begged to offer a few words in reply to the observations which had been made a short time ago, by the Lord President of the Council, who expressed his surprise that persons who had themselves made attacks, should be so thin-skinned that they could not bear to be attacked in their turn. If the Corn-Law League had sinned, they had not been without imitators; but he (Lord Radnor) was not aware that the Anti-Corn-Law League had been guilty of making such attacks as those alluded to. The noble Earl said, that his noble Friend (Lord Harewood) had stated a fact, but he denied that it was calculated to lead to the inference that the Anti-Corn-Law League had incited parties to incendiarism. Now he (the Earl of Radnor) had, as he had before said, called the attention of the noble Earl to the paragraph in the newspaper in which the meeting was reported, and the noble Earl admitted that it was correct. With regard to the Anti-Corn-Law League not being able to bear remarks on their proceedings, he begged to remind noble Lords that this was not the only language of the kind that had been used towards them. Among other things said of them, a Gentleman who for many years had represented the County of Lincoln, said that if the Anti-Corn-Law League came into Lincoln again, it was likely they would be thrown over the bridge into the river.

The Duke of Buckingham observed, that the Earl of Harewood admitted that the newspaper report of what he had said was correct, but he did not admit the inference drawn from it in a newspaper article; the noble Earl did not impute, nor did he intend to impute to the League, that they incited to incendiarism.

The Earl of Radnor said that the words of the noble Earl were—"There are other views in the Anti-Corn-Law League agitation, than those which meet the eye of the public. What happened to a farmer the other day in Lincolnshire, or Norfolk, I forget which? He attended a meeting, and openly stated his opinions against the Anti-Corn-Law League. His stacks and his crops were burnt that night." If that did not mean an inference that the League incited to incendiarism, he did not know what it meant.

Lord Wharncliffe said, upon the face of the noble Earl's own report of the words used, there was no such charge. Two separate facts were stated.

The Earl of Radnor: Yes; but the one follows immediately on the other.

Lord Beaumont said, he was present at the time the noble Earl made the speech, and he could distinctly state, that no idea was raised, among those on the platform, of any intention on the part of the noble Earl to make such a charge against the League. The noble Earl alluded to the violent language used at the League meetings, and to the fact of the stacks being burnt, but he never implied that there was any intention on the part of the League to incite incendiarism.

The Marquis of Normanby said, he was neither an Anti-Corn-Law Leaguer, nor an anti-anti, but he must express his regret that a noble Earl, not so accustomed to public speaking as the noble Lord (Beaumont) was, should have stated two facts in such close succession, as to lead to the inference imputed to him.

The Duke of Richmond entertained no doubt whatever, that Lord Harewood was not aware that the House of Lords was to be made a court of appeal, to consider a speech that he had made in the City of York. He (the Duke of Richmond) hoped that his noble Friend (Lord Radnor) would recommend the Anti-Corn-Law League to be more guarded in their expressions than they had hitherto been. His noble Friend had stated that an hon. Gentleman at Lincoln had recommended that if any of the Anti-Corn-Law League should appear in that City, that they should be thrown over the bridge; now, if the hon. Gentleman to whom allusion had been thus made, had said so, all that he (the Duke of Richmond) could say was, that he would recommend them not to go.

HANDLOOM WEAVERS.] Lord Lilford rose, pursuant to notice, to present a Petition from 5,000 inhabitants of Leigh, in Lancashire, praying for a Committee of Inquiry into the condition of the Handloom Weavers. The noble Lord stated, that the statements of the Petitioners related chiefly to low wages, unjust abatements, and the want of employment. They complained also that the Arbitration Act was not properly carried out. The noble Lord read a number of papers for the purpose of showing that the Silk Weavers were subject to unjust abatements of wages, and that the law, as at present existing, was not sufficient to protect the workmen—justice being neither so speedy nor so economical as it ought to be. The petitioners, he observed, came before their Lordships with a statement of grievances, which, looking to the condition of the manufacturing districts, to the state of the markets in those districts, and to other circumstances, would, he thought, justify the Government in holding out some indication, however slight, of an intention to take their case into consideration, with a view to remedy those grievances. As he understood the noble Earl opposite intended to make a statement in reference to the petition, he would not move for a Committee. He would only assure the noble Earl he had every reason to believe that the allegations of the petitioners could be distinctly proved. The noble Lord concluded by presenting the Petition, in which the petitioners prayed for some legislative enactments to protect them from the unjust encroachments of unprincipled masters, for the establishment of a board of trade, composed of masters and workmen, and for a Committee to inquire into the system of cruel and unjust abatements of which they complained.

noble Lord did not intend to move for a Committee, as he (Lord Dalhousie) should have felt it an ungracious task to attempt to persuade their Lordships from granting it as it would have been his duty to do. But the case of the Handloom Silk Weavers had so frequently been the subject of inquiry before Committees of both Houses, and more particularly by a Commission whose labours extended over three years, their distress was so well known, and the result of those inquiries had proved so clearly that the remedies which the parties themselves had looked for were beyond the reach of legislative power, that to attempt now to renew the appointment of a Committee would only excite and encourage hopes which, ending, as they inevitably and unfortunately must, in disappointment, would only aggravate the distress and increase the difficulties which the Handloom Weavers were from time to time unhappily involved in. The noble Lord did not enter into any general statement of their case, but restricted himself to the point, as stated by the petitioners in their memorial, of those abatements of wages which they alleged to be unjustly made by masters in the oppressive exercise of their power; and he was not inclined to dispute any of the statements made by the noble Lord on that point. He believed that documents at present on their Lordships' Table would afford sufficient proof of the partial existence of such a system; and show, that although a great number of manufacturers were free from any charge upon the subject, yet that there were some who did take advantage of the necessities of the workmen, and deduct an undue proportion of their wages. The matter was one which had already engaged the attention of the Government, and been for some time under their consideration; but, as the House must be aware, it was necessary to proceed with extreme caution in a law which affected a trade scattered over the country as this was, and governed by regulations which were as various as the localities themselves. It was necessary gravely to consider all the evidence that had been collected upon the subject before they could venture to make alterations in the law, however plausible they might be, so that in removing the grievances in one locality they might not make the matter worse in another. He would give no positive pledge for the introduction of a Bill to amend that Clause of the Arbitration Act, to which the noble Lord adverted but he could assure the noble Lord that the question would be considered without loss of time, and that the sincerest desire existed on the part of the Government to remedy such imperfections as might be found in that Act. If after a deliberate consideration of the whole case it should be found that the difficulties were such as to render any attempt at alteration undesirable, his noble Friend would, of course, have notice to that effect, and it would then be open to him to renew his Motion for a Committee of Inquiry, or adopt such other course as he might think best.

Lord Lilford thanked the noble Earl for his assurance that the question would be anxiously considered, particularly as he admitted the existence of the grievance of abatement of wages in the district from which the Petition emanated.

The Earl of Dalhousie wished to be perfectly accurate in his statement. He admitted the existence of the grievance of abatement of wages; but he did not say that it existed in the particular place alluded to, because the inquiry had not been carried into that particular place.

House adjourned.

WRECKS OF THE NERBUDDA AND ANN.] Dr. Bowring wished to inquire of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government whether any reply had been received from the Government of Pekin in answer to the application made for the punishment of the authorities of the Island of Formosa who ordered the murder of the crews of the Nerbudda and Ann?

Sir R. Peel said, that the two vessels had been wrecked on the Island of Formosa, and that after the sailors had defended themselves for a time, they had been taken prisoners, subjected to great privations, and many of them put to death, —whether by the Chinese authorities or not he did not know. Sir Henry Pottinger made a representation to the Emperor of China on the subject, and it was stated that the Chinese Government viewed the unfortunate transaction with great regret, and had ordered that punishment should be inflicted on the parties who sanctioned the murder. Upon the whole, the statement made on the subject was satisfactory. The declaration of the Emperor was one quite becoming to the ruler of a great country. The Proclamation was inserted by the order of the Emperor in the Pekin Gazette, and Sir H. Pottinger spoke of it in the highest terms. He stated, that he had seen with the greatest pleasure the decree of the Chinese Government on the subject of the British subjects who had been unjustly put to death in the Island of Formosa, and was sure that the proof of a sense of justice which it displayed would be highly satisfactory to his Government. He had seen a translation of the Proclamation, and he thought that a stronger desire to do justice had never been shown in a civilized state. The Emperor stated in the Proclamation

“That he had been deceived by the Chinese authorities of Formosa, who represented that the Island had been invaded by the British crews with arms in their hands, and that they were taken and had suffered as prisoners of war. He had ordered the Governor-General of the district to institute an inquiry, and in the result of finding that the officers had deceived him and falsified their statements, he had ordered all those who by their false representations had obtained a promotion of rank to be degraded from it and handed over to the board of punishment.”

The Emperor went on to say,

“We cherish the Chinese and foreigners with equal beneficence, and will not allow those who have become amenable to punishment to escape because they are accused by foreigners. It is our desire to act with strict justice and impartiality.”

The culprits had been disgraced after having been convicted by the regular authorities; and the tone of the Proclamation indicated a sincere intention to facilitate intercourse with civilized nations.

INCENDIARY FIRES.] Colonel Fox wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, if he could state any steps which might have been taken in consequence of the recent numerous fires that had occurred in Suffolk? The Chairman of Quarter Sessions in that County had lately, in addressing the Grand Jury said,

“It might be asked why the rural police had not prevented these crimes; but it was impossible to suppose, that if the rural police were even more numerous distributed than they were, they would be enabled to prevent such offences; nay, even if the whole of the metropolitan police were sent down to Suffolk it would be impossible to give security against those outrages; unless, indeed, a policeman stood sentry in every homestead all night.”

Sir J. Graham deeply regretted that so many fires had recently taken place in Suffolk; and, unhappily, of such offences it was too difficult to detect the perpetrators. He had deemed it his duty to send down assistance from the Metropolitan Force, but as yet no detection had taken place.

Lord Henniker only the other night had been called up to witness a dreadful conflagration within a few gunshots of the house in which he had been sleeping. The Magistrates and the Police had adopted every means of detection, though hitherto, unhappily, unsuccessfully. They had, of course, communicated with the Home Secretary, and from him had received every assistance. He, himself, should continue to afford to the right hon. Gentleman, as he had already done, all the information in his power on this painful subject.

THE ARMY.] Mr. Gill rose pursuant to notice,

"With a view to obviate an erroneous impression produced by the statement of the Secretary at War on the 12th instant, to call the attention of the House to the detention of Captain Brewster, of the 76th Regiment, under arrest for eight months, without any charge being made against him; and to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any objection to communicate to the House the order from the Horse-Guards for that officer's release and admonition."

It would be remembered that about ten days ago, in reply to a question in reference to the detention of two officers, Captain Brewster and another, of the seventy-sixth regiment, the right hon. and gallant Officer (Sir Henry Hardinge) stated that the cause of that detention was, that a junior officer had challenged a senior officer, and that the senior officer, having accepted that challenge, had committed an offence, and had been consequently arrested. The right hon. and gallant Officer was also reported to have stated, that as both officers had violated their duty in an unjustifiable manner, the Commander-in-chief had punished them by an arrest at large; but that the Commander-in-chief bearing in mind the long period they had been under arrest, intended to release them after a suitable admonition. Now, what he was anxious to show was, that that statement, so far as it referred to Captain Brewster, was incorrect. He need not say that he was sure the inaccuracy did not attach to the right hon. and gallant Officer whom everybody in that House, and out of it, knew to be incapable of stating anything but what he believed to be fully borne out by facts. The effect of that inaccuracy might, however, be injurious to the character of Captain Brewster, and he (Mr. Gill) therefore, now asked for some further explanation, in order to remove any imputation which might, in consequence of that statement, rest upon that officer, and he was sure that no one would be more anxious to remove such imputation than the right hon. and gallant Officer. The two officers referred to were, it appeared, ordered under arrest by another officer, who was present at some proceeding which had taken place between them, and who had subsequently communicated the fact and the circumstances which had occasioned the arrest, to the commanding officer. Now, he (Mr. Gill) found, by the Articles of War, that no officer was liable to arrest except for an offence committed, and that it was the duty of a person putting an officer under arrest immediately to take steps for instituting an inquiry by court-martial or otherwise. When he stated to the House that Captain Brewster had not been guilty of any offence deserving punishment or scarcely arrest, he thought he was not asking too much when he asked for the removal of an imputation which might militate against his reputation as an officer, or his character as a gentleman. After being five months under arrest, Captain Brewster wrote a letter to his commanding officer, begging it might be forwarded, through the major-general in command of the district, to the Commander-in-Chief, entreating to know under what charge he was detained, and stating that if any offence was charged against him, it might be subjected to whatever tribunal the Commander-in-Chief might think fit to select. To that letter no reply had been given. Subsequently two letters were written by Sir David Brewster—one of them to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and the other to Lord Fitzroy Somerset. The noble Duke, in his reply to Sir David Brewster, said he was aware his son was under an arrest, but that certain regulations were being prepared to suppress Duelling, and it was intended that the two officers (Captain Brewster and the other) should be made subject to them when completed. Notwithstanding this, these two officers were continued under arrest three months longer. There was one other circumstance he wished to advert to, which was, that during the first six weeks of their arrest these officers had been confined to their room, and were only liberated in consequence of the medical certificate of the surgeon that they were suffering in their health from their close confinement. He thought the House would agree with him that this severe punishment was uncalled for, and that some explanation was due to the character of Captain Brewster. He wished to know whether the right hon. Baronet had any objection to communicate to the House a copy of the order of the Horse Guards for the liberation of these Gentlemen, and the admonition given to them.

Sir H. Hardinge would at once state that he could not produce the paper asked for; first, as it was contrary to precedent thus to communicate to the House of Commons matter of detail connected with Military Administration; and secondly, because the case had originated in a private quarrel, the nature of which would necessarily be disclosed in the publication of the admonition issued from the Commander-in-Chief, and the revival of which after it had been honourably adjusted could answer no good purpose. He had attached no imputation to the senior of the officers concerned beyond his having violated military law in taking a challenge from a junior who had conducted himself in a highly improper manner, which, however, the senior had generously forgiven and had become reconciled to his adversary. No doubt generally, in ordinary cases, the Commander-in-Chief would cause inquiry into the circumstances; but in the present instance the quarrel had been purely private.

Mr. Gill said the explanation had been perfectly satisfactory.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.]
House resolved into Committee on the Factories Bill.

The consideration of Clause 2 was resumed.

Mr. Egerton moved that the word "silk" be omitted from the second clause. The provisions of the Bill, he thought, would have a most injurious effect, if applied to the silk manufacture. He did not wish by a side-wind to thwart the benevolent intentions of any party: but the persons connected with the silk trade were anxious that the distinctions hitherto recognized between that and other trades should be continued; and that regulations applied to them should be applied to them only, and not comprehended in regulations applicable to other branches of manufacture. He adverted to the progress of legislation on the subject of the silk trade, and observed, that the present was the first time that it had been included in one general measure affecting other trades, and he was at a loss to understand on what grounds. The general provisions of the present Bill would be very injurious to the silk manufacture, on account of the peculiar nature of that manufacture. We understood the hon. Gentleman also to observe, that a great number of children were required in the silk manufacture; that they were not exposed to unpleasant effluvia in the manufacture, and that the masters afforded every facility for education. He thought it necessary to legislate cautiously with regard to such great interests.

Sir J. Graham assured his hon. Friend that he was anxious to deal with caution in reference to the great manufacturing interest brought under the consideration of the Committee, and he also admitted that the silk manufacture had been treated distinctly from the other manufactures included in the Bill. The effect of his hon. Friend's proposition was to take the silk manufacture out of the operation of the present Bill; and to that he could not agree. If there was any portion of the present legislation more defensible than another it was that which extended legislative protection to children. They were comparatively defenceless, and did not exercise with respect to labour an independent will; and the poverty of the parents induced them too often, in spite of their natural affection, to overwork their children, in order to obtain a larger amount of wages. Thus the Legislature appeared to have thought, and its efforts on this subject—at first confined, at the commencement of this century, to apprentices—were subsequently extended to children generally, if employed in factories. At the present moment, in respect to the silk trade, there was no limitation whatever with regard to the age at which children might be employed, and they might be employed at the early age of six or seven years. There was a limitation with respect to the time of their employment, which could not extend beyond ten hours a day, from the time they entered the factory until they attained the age of thirteen years. There was also another regulation to the effect, that children employed in silk manufactories did not require that certificate of education which was necessary in other cases. He, therefore, thought it was important that with respect to these points the children employed in the silk trade should be brought under the general operation of the Bill; and such was the opinion formed by the Committee which sat in 1841. There was, however, a broad difference between the various processes attending the silk manufacture. The Committee to which he had referred reported that a measure ought to be adopted for the purpose of bringing the children employed in the silk trade within the law, and that they saw no reason why the spinning process of the silk trade should not be placed under the same regulations as spinning in cotton, flax, and worsted mills. With respect to the other processes of "winding" and "throwing," the Committee came to a different recommendation, and stated, that from the great number of children absolutely required, it would be extremely difficult to introduce with regard to those processes the same regulations as were applicable to cotton and other mills. Thus, the Committee in 1841, recommended that the children in the spinning process of the silk manufacture should be brought under the operation of the law as applicable to cotton factories. To give full effect to this recommendation of the Committee, he had to state the course which he should propose to be adopted. He must resist the proposition of his hon. Friend, which would take the silk manufacture entirely out of the operation of the present Bill, and should propose to retain the word "silk" where it now stood; but with reference to the 75th clause, which alluded particularly to the silk manufacture, he would state what he intended to propose with respect to the processes of "winding" and "throwing" silk. They must bear in mind that a very large proportion of children to adults, he believed a proportion of four to one, was employed in this part of the manufacture. He should therefore, propose, instead of limiting the clause as it was now limited, to omit the words "1st. day of October, 1846." The consequence would be that no children in silk manufactories would be employed more than six-and-a-half hours a-day, under the general provisions of the Bill, between the ages of eight and eleven years; but between the ages of eleven and thirteen years the children might be employed for ten hours in "winding" and "throwing" silk; and when they passed the age of thirteen years they would return under the general provisions of the Bill; and the period of their employment would be limited in accordance with whatever decision might be come to in respect to the hours of labour. He had reason to believe that this arrangement would be satisfactory to the silk manufacturers generally; he hoped it would be so to the hon. Member, and that the Motion would be of consequence withdrawn.

Mr. Labouchere had felt some apprehension with regard to this particular clause, but he thought after what the right hon. Baronet had said, that the objections of the silk trade had been fairly met, and that the present proposition would doubtless give general satisfaction. He agreed that it was not desirable to see the silk trade excluded from the provisions of a general Factory Bill. If the Legislature were to secure to the children the blessings of education and to guard them against overwork, it was surely quite as necessary that the Bill should apply to labour in silk factories as to labour in any other factories.

Mr. Grimsditch expressed an opinion that the proposition of the right hon. Baronet would prove satisfactory to the trade.

Sir G. Strickland had been a member of the Committee appointed in 1841 to consider the effect of labour upon children in the silk factories, and he must say, that he had been greatly surprised at hearing the interpretation which the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham) had put upon the Report which the Committee had presented. If he remembered right, it was almost the universal impression amongst the members of that Committee that the silk manufacturers had made out no case whatever for exemption from the provisions of this enactment. It was proved before that Committee that the children were employed in rooms which were extremely hot; that they were employed twelve hours a-day; that during the whole of that time they were either running about or standing on their legs, and that very often they did not cover, in the course of the twelve hours, less than from fifteen to twenty miles of ground. One surgeon, a gentleman of Derby, whose evidence he perfectly recollected, had stated that he was employed by the masters in his district, and that his opinions were very strong against any limitation of the hours of labour. He said that twelve hours' exertions was healthy and useful to the children. Some Member of the Committee asked him if he was the father of any young children himself, to which he replied in the affirmative. "Do you make them stand on their legs twelve hours a-day for the good of their health, and walk twenty miles besides?" was the next interrogatory, to which the only rejoinder was that "they were not labourers." It was impossible that the House should fail to see that the children could not endure such Herculean tasks without contortion and deformity. He was glad the right hon. Baronet had conceded so much as he had: he only wished he had conceded more. He feared, too, that his arrangement would be generally liable to invasion, and he particularly referred to the intended difference between the hours of labour of children under and above eleven years of age, as opening a door for fraud in every possible shape.

Mr. G. Bankes said, that if the hon. Member for Cheshire persisted in pressing his motion he should certainly divide with him. He was the representative of a body of persons in Dorsetshire who were engaged in silk-throwing. On their part he had made a representation to the right hon. Baronet, not claiming any exemption from the protection very properly bestowed by Parliament upon young persons, but stating that the difference between their manufactures and the woollen and cotton manufactures was so great, that the regulations which applied to the one could scarcely be considered applicable to the others. The reply which he had received from the right hon. Baronet embodied the proposal the right hon. Baronet had made that night, and was, he was bound to say, satisfactory to his constituents. At the same time, however, he thought it would be better to leave them altogether out of the Bill, and he should therefore vote for this amendment if it were pressed to a division.

Mr. Strutt thought the hon. Baronet, the Member for Preston, had no doubt unintentionally made most extraordinary mis-statements respecting the Report of the Committee of which he had been a Member in 1841. There was hardly a word which the hon. Baronet had stated which could be borne out. The hon. Baronet had first of all told them that the children engaged in the silk trade worked in a very high temperature. Now, it happened that precisely the reverse was the fact; for, whilst in the cotton trade the temperature was necessarily high, in the silk trade it was necessarily low, and indeed the silk manufacture could not by any possibility be carried on in an unduly heated room.

The hon. Baronet had further said, that it had been proved by a surgeon belonging to the town which he had the honour to represent, that children in silk factories had been known to run from fifteen to twenty miles a-day. Now, he had a perfect recollection of the evidence referred to, and what was the fact? The surgeon in question stated, no doubt, that he had known children run backwards and forwards from fifteen to twenty miles a-day in pursuance of their occupation as silk-workers, but he had stated the circumstance as a curious fact; and he had said that it occurred, not in a silk-mill—not in any factory that came within the scope of the operations of this enactment—but in a mill for the manufacture of sewing-silk, which was conducted on somewhat the same principle as rope-making, and in which it was necessary for children to run from one end to the other of the building many times during the hours they were employed. The hon. Baronet had also said, that it was a common practice to work children in silk-mills from twelve to fourteen hours a-day, and that that labour was stated not to be injurious to health. Now, there was not a single silk-mill in Derby which worked more than ten hours a day, nor, he believed, was there one proprietor of a silk mill in that town who desired to work more. As to the question which had been put to the surgeon about his own children, he did not recollect that circumstance, but he trusted he had shown that the hon. Member had not sufficiently refreshed his memory upon those subjects to enable him to give quotations with any assurance of accuracy. Upon the general question he (Mr. Strutt) must own that, though he would rather the silk trade had been left out of the Bill altogether, yet that upon the whole he was satisfied with the right hon. Baronet's proposal, and trusted, therefore, that the amendment now before them would be withdrawn.

Mr. T. Egerton said, that the general feeling being that the proposal of the Government was satisfactory to the trade, he would not attempt to press the Amendment he had brought forward.

Clause agreed to.

to several Members of the House that he was sure that the manufacturers in Frome, the town which he represented, were satisfied to employ women and children ten hours a-day. At the time he had said this he had felt a conviction that the fact was as he had stated it, but he had not visited the town for three or four years, and, consequently, was not, it seemed, so well aware of all the facts relating to the employment of its labourers as he should have been. The truth was, as he was now instructed, that the children were altogether excluded from employment in the factories at Frome, and that the labour of young persons was substituted. The men spinners worked there for twelve hours a-day, the women and young persons attending the spindles. He was told that a reduction of two hours from the labour period of the day would inflict a serious injury upon the export trade of the town, particularly at a time when the Belgians were so actively competing with them. He felt it right to make this explanation; and he thanked the House for the attention with which they had heard it.

Mr. V. Smith said, that upon the words, "no female of any age," in this Clause had turned in fact the whole of the discussion on a previous occasion, as far as the proposal of his noble Friend was concerned. The chief argument was this—that they were restricting labour in the manufactories, and thereby preventing the prosperity and increase of manufactures, and the competition with foreign nations. It appeared to him that the principal, and indeed the only new restriction in the Act, was the labour of female adults. In two instances the House had decided that they would interfere in behalf of the helpless; not indeed between master and child, but between parent and child, upon the principle that the parents were in such a condition as to make their children frequently, to the injury of health, support them by their earnings. The only argument made use of by the right hon. Baronet the other evening was in favour of the restriction as to married women—that labour in factories might be injurious to women with child, or married women; but he had heard no argument to establish a difference between a man above twenty-one, and a woman above twenty-one, as regarded labour in factories. He should, therefore, be glad if the right hon. Baronet would explain upon what ground he imposed a restriction upon the labour of women who were equally capable of determining how far they should employ themselves for profit as men were of a similar age.

Sir J. Graham believed this was the first time any restriction was placed on female labour, and he certainly felt it was a restriction questionable on principle, and an exception to all legislation on such subjects. He had stated, and believed it to be true, that female adults, as well as male adults, tempted by a love of high wages, and honest gain, were disposed to flock to factories where labour might be obtained for a longer period than twelve hours. On the other hand there was every reason to believe that a limit of twelve hours to female labour was absolutely necessary to their health under the peculiar circumstances more especially to which the right hon. Gentleman had adverted. Now, he was bound to state as with respect to children, so with respect to females, that being the weaker part of the community, and married women being under the influence of their husbands, they were often tempted to labour under a desire of gain to an extent not consistent with their health. This was an exception certainly, to the general rule, which ought to guide Legislation on this delicate subject, but it was under the pressure of these exceptions that his noble Friend had urged the limit of ten hours instead of twelve, which he (Sir James Graham) thought dangerous and inexpedient. He was bound, therefore, to say that, arguing this question on principle, he could not give to the right hon. Gentleman a satisfactory answer. At the same time he must state that a general practice had been established in the greater portion of the large manufactories that the term of twelve hours' labour should not be exceeded by females.

On the question that the blank in the Clause be filled with the word "twelve," applying to the labour of young children and females,

Lord Ashley said, it was not his intention to detain the Committee by any lengthened observations, and he would state in a few words his reasons for urging the amendment of which he had given notice. He would, however, first call the attention of his right hon. Friend opposite to the Report of the factory inspectors. They allowed that in theory these females were considered free agents, yet that in practice they were no such thing. Now, in the Report of Mr. Horner, in October, 1843, he said,

"I recently investigated a case in Manchester, in a large mill, where they are now employing workers above eighteen years of age, many of them young women just arrived at that time of life, from half-past five in the morning until eight o'clock at night, with no cessation from work, except a quarter of an hour for breakfast and three-quarters of an hour for dinner; so that these persons, having to be out of bed at five o'clock in the morning, and not getting home till half-past eight o'clock at night, may fairly be said to labour fifteen hours and a half out of the twenty-four. A theorist may say that these people are old enough to take care of themselves. But, practically, there can be no such thing as freedom of labour, when, from the redundancy of population, there is such a competition for employment." (Hear.)

Exactly so; he understood that cheer of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ward); all he wanted the hon. Member to admit was that which he now stated; the hon. Member might provide another remedy for the evil, but he only wanted the hon. Gentleman to deal with the fact as he found it. But Mr. Horner proceeded:—

"Twelve hours' daily work is more than enough for any one; but, however desirable it might be that excessive working should be prevented, there are great difficulties in the way of legislative interference with the labour of adult men. The case, however, is very different as respects women; for not only are they much less free agents, but they are physically incapable of bearing a continuance of work for the same length of time as men, and a deterioration of their health is attended with far more injurious consequences to society."

This was the opinion of those Gentlemen who had devoted nearly twelve years to the consideration of this subject, telling them as the result of their experience that females employed in factories were not free agents, and that it was the duty of the House to interfere for them as though they were persons having no self-government or control. It was the invariable opinion of medical men upon that point, and he had never heard it dissented from either by persons in the employment of labour or the labourers themselves, that those females could not be considered as free agents. He would now refer to an opinion that was given in the former debate that Mr. Horner had been giving any opinion in favour of a limitation of labour to ten hours. Now, it happened, that Mr. Horner had given a very important opinion on that subject—one of the most valuable he had seen. In his Report of December, 1841, he said:—

"There can be but little doubt that working

ten hours a-day would be more favourable to health, and the enjoyment of life, than twelve hours can be; but, without entering into the question of health, no one will hesitate, I think, to admit that, in a moral point of view, so entire an absorption of the time of the working classes, without intermission from the early age of thirteen, and in trades not subject to restriction much younger, must be extremely prejudicial, and is an evil greatly to be deplored. Some there are, undoubtedly, who by more than ordinary natural energy overcome this disadvantage, but with the great mass it has the effect of rendering them ignorant, prejudiced, addicted to coarse sensual indulgence, and susceptible of being led into mischief and violence by any appeal to their passions and prejudices. With so few opportunities of mental culture and of moral and religious training, it is surprising that there should be so many virtuous and respectable people among them."

Not only that, but to practice that which they might have acquired. Mr. Horner then said, the remedy of such an education, however sure, must be slow in its effects; but much might be done for the existing generation of adolescents, and even adults, by good evening schools, for those at least whose hours of work would enable them to attend schools; and the second remedial measure I have named would save thousands from the public-house and its long train of accompanying vices. Many had said that the reduction of the hours of labour would lead to a reduction of wages: but he would ask the House, whether it were better to have a sound and moral population with a small amount of wages, or a people worse as to their moral condition, but in what might be called a far better financial position? Mr. Horner, who had made this inquiry, had conducted it with the greatest attention and accuracy, and he thought it was not possible for any man to evince more zeal than Mr. Horner had shown in acquiring information upon this subject. But there was one very important fact connected with this subject of wages which showed the accuracy and fairness of Mr. Horner. He gave a long detail of the effect of a reduction of the hours of labour on the condition of the labourer, but at the same time he told them that all the information he had received as to wages had been obtained from millowners only ; that he had endeavoured to obtain statements from the operatives themselves, but without success. Observe that in this great and important question, Mr. Horner stated most fairly that he gave only one side of the case—that he was not able to obtain one opinion from the operatives. That statement, therefore, must be received as Mr. Horner intended it should be, with very great allowances. When he entered into these details, it might appear that he was travelling out of the line he had proposed, but he wished only to put the question upon the great and broad principles of justice and humanity ; and when it was said that his proposition, as compared with that of the Government, was the more inhuman of the two, it was necessary for him to prove that, at any rate, whether they concurred or not in the course he took, the proposition he made could be borne out by certain statements of the operatives themselves. This question of the reduction of wages was no new question. It had even been urged as a preliminary argument against any reduction of labour. It was one of the chief arguments in 1816, 1817, and 1818, before the hours of labour were reduced from sixteen to twelve hours a-day. It was the same in 1833, but in both instances the prediction was contradicted by evidence. He recollected perfectly well that it was said, in respect of those children who were put on half-time in 1833, that they would lose in their earnings ; but had any such result taken place ! Quite the reverse. When he went into the manufacturing districts in 1836, he inquired what had been the effect upon the wages of the children, and he found that in almost every instance—certainly in worsted and in a great part of the cotton manufactures—wages had continued precisely the same, and children for eight hours work got as much as they did formerly for twelve hours' work. There was the same prediction in 1818. But there was a curious statement made at the time, in a petition for restricting the time of labour in the cotton factories, which was presented by Sir Robert Peel, the father of his right hon. Friend ; and in presenting that petition he made these remarks :—

“ He rose to present a petition which, he said, was unanimously signed by a class of men who had rendered as great service to the country by their industry and skill as any body of persons of the same order in society. The

petitioners had come to him most unexpectedly, but he felt that they were entitled to his peculiar attention. They were aware that the attainment of their object must be attended with a reduction of wages ; but, anxious for health, and wishing to enjoy some of the comforts of life, they were willing to submit to that sacrifice. He had had a communication with some of these poor men this morning, and he could not hear that statement, or witness their appearance, which confirmed their statement, without shedding tears. As the House valued the trade of the country, it could not fail to feel for the sufferings and consider the interests of those by whom that trade was supported. How then would the Gentlemen who heard him regard those poor petitioners, who, in rooms badly ventilated and much overheated, were compelled to work from fourteen to fifteen hours a-day ? Young persons might endure such labour ; but, after a certain period of life, it became intolerable. Premature old age, accompanied by incurable disease, was too often the consequence of excessive labour in such places. He had himself been long concerned in the cotton trade ; and, from a strong conviction of its necessity, he brought in a Bill for the purpose of regulating the work of apprentices : but since that Bill had passed into a law masters declined to take apprentices, and employed the children of paupers without any limitation. Hence the law was evaded and rendered ineffective for the object which it had in view, the prevention of inhumanity ; and he hoped it was not inconsistent with our Constitution to legislate for the protection of children as well as grown persons against the harshness of their employers. Those immediately concerned in the cotton trade did not perhaps perceive the injury to health which their workmen suffered, as they were in the habit of seeing them every day ; but the injury was obvious to every stranger. Such facts were detailed in this petition as presented an appeal which could not be withstood by any assemblage of Gentlemen susceptible of common humanity ; and these poor people had no other protection but in that House.”

The Report stated, that the hon. Baronet manifested throughout very great emotion, and his statement was listened to with profound attention. Now if the statements of the hon. Members for Durham and Manchester as to the amount of wages in the cotton factories were correct, he thought they would agree to his position ; because they had shown that the cotton manufacturers were in receipt of such large wages, they could very well afford to give up a portion of those wages ; and if, at the same time that it was shown they could afford to do so, it was also shown that they were willing to bear with the abatement, he could not understand how that House could stand up against it. He would now just refer to some little details connected with the domestic condition of operative families in the manufacturing districts. He believed he would be able to show by these statements, which had been furnished by several families, that there was no reason to apprehend any bad result to the operatives from a reduction of wages consequent on the reduction of the time of work from twelve to ten hours. He would suppose the case of a single woman working in a factory and earning 9s. a-week. He hoped the House would allow him to read these statements, for they would prove the case of the operatives—that they had nothing to fear from a reduction of wages consequent on a reduction of work. A single woman, earning 9s. a-week, would have to pay at least 6d. a-week for washing; the expense of making and mending her clothes would be 4d. a-week; and the cost of her tea, which was, under the existing system, carried to her in the mill, but which, if the period of labour were reduced to ten hours, she might get out of the mill, was 1½d. a-day, or 7½d. a-week. Her total expenses, therefore, in consequence of her confinement in the mill, and her inability to perform certain domestic duties, would be 1s. 5½d. a-week. But suppose the case of the same person under the ten hour system; and suppose that the reduction of one-sixth of the present period of labour was attended with a reduction of one-sixth of her amount of wages. She would then be a gainer of ½d. a-week, because she would be able to wash and repair her own clothes, and to take her meals at home. That was the case of a single woman, stated by herself. But he would refer to another statement of the expenses of a family of five persons, three of whom worked in a mill twelve hours a-day, the father being out of employment, and the mother and two children working in the mill. The mother obtained 10s. a-week, the eldest child 4s., and the other 3s.; making the total weekly receipts of the family 17s. But what were the outgoings under the present system? The expense of washing, which they were obliged to send out, and mangling, was 2s. a-week; it cost them 1s. a-week to employ a woman to assist the husband—who remained at home, performing the domestic work—in cleaning the house; and a further expense of 1s. a-week was incurred by the necessity of sending meals out to the mills. Hon. Gentlemen were aware that, if a family dined together, each person satisfied his appetite, and any food which remained might be kept for a subsequent meal; but if the meals of each member of the family were sent to different mills any surplus food was likely to be wasted. A very considerable weekly saving would therefore result from families being able to take their meals together. But there was another source of loss to be taken into account—that which arose from the cooking being performed by the husband. He (Lord Ashley) believed that no man, whether Frenchman or Englishman, could cook so economically as a woman. The loss which resulted from cooking being performed by the husband might be calculated at 1s. a-week. The total loss of the family was, therefore, 5s. a-week; this sum, deducted from the wages of 17s., left 12s. a-week for rent, provisions, clothing, and other necessary expenses. But he would state the expenses of the same family under the ten hour system, supposing that the rate of wages was reduced in the same proportion as the hours of labour—by one-sixth. The total wages of the family would then be 14s. 2d. a-week; but mark what economy resulted from the happier circumstances in which they were placed. The washing and mangling, which were formerly sent out, would now in a great measure be done by the women, in consequence of their reaching home earlier, and it might therefore be calculated that the cost of washing, &c., would not exceed 1s. a-week. Then his informant calculated that the cost of employing a woman to assist the husband and wife in cleaning those parts of the house which required the hardest work would be 6d. a-week. The total expence to which the family would be put for these purposes would thus be only 1s. 6d. per week, leaving a balance of 12s. 8d. to meet rent, provisions, and clothing. This statement proved, he thought most satisfactorily, that a family which under the twelve hour system received 17s. a-week, and under the ten hour system 14s. 2d., would, under the latter system, effect a saving of 8d. a-week. These were statements with which he had been furnished by operatives themselves; and he would now refer to another communication which he had received from an operative, the head of a family, and a man of considerable ability. His informant took the case of a family of four persons, all working in different factories. What were their expenses? In each case tea had to be sent separately.

"The expence and inconvenience of this system, (said the writer), is, that whatever state of appetite the parties are in, the full amount of victuals sent is either consumed or destroyed, by which much waste is occasioned. In working ten hours a day, three meals would be quite sufficient, and much more conducive to health than four under the present regulation,—dinner between one and two o'clock, and again an evening meal about six o'clock, would be quite ample for the day."

He had been told by operative spinners that, under the present system of working twelve hours a day, their exhaustion was so great, that it was absolutely necessary they should have at least four meals a-day; but that, with a reduced period of labour, they would be content with three meals per day. They stated, that under the existing system, they were obliged to take food even without appetite, as a stimulus to enable them to go through the closing hours of their day's work. The writer of the letter from which he had been quoting proceeded,—

"By this means a meal would be saved, besides the domestic advantages of all taking our meals together. When the writer of this note worked ten hours a day, in the latter end of 1842, he never had more than three meals a-day, all plain food at home. When working twelve hours in the same mill afterwards, he was obliged to have extras (say a little ham) for his tea, but which he found by no means so adequate to the maintenance of his strength as short hours and plainer food. When the ten hours a-day (short time) was going on in 1842, the persons in the mill established a school, and bought themselves forms, &c., and were taught by some of the spinners to write and read; when the mill commenced working twelve hours the school was abandoned, and all desire for learning almost extinguished."

But they must take into consideration that, in consequence of the members of the family being employed in different mills, it was the work of one child to carry their meals to the several mills, and the labour of that child was consequently lost. The general result, then, of the reduction of the hours of labour would be this,—that one meal would be saved, the other meals would be greatly economized, and the labour of the child now employed in carrying the meals might be turned to good account. But there was another consideration more important than any he had yet mentioned. It was calculated, and he believed the statement would be confirmed by every operative spinner, that, if the hours of labour were reduced from twelve to ten, it would have the effect of prolonging, by at least three years, the duration of the working life of the operatives. It had been said, that such a measure would prolong their working life for five years; but he had not the slightest doubt it would prolong it for at least three years. There was only one other fact—a very remarkable one—to which he would call the attention of the House, as showing the moral character of females in the manufacturing districts. He found, from tables showing the number of criminal offenders in England and Wales in 1841, that

He begged to apologize to the House for having detained them so long; but he was anxious to show what were the feelings of the operatives on this subject—that they did not entertain any fear of the effects of a reduction of wages; indeed, he thought he had shown by the statements he had quoted, that a reduction of wages combined with a reduction of the hours of labour, would be to their advantage. Do allow me (continued the noble Lord) to appeal to the House to consider the position in which this question now stands. Let Her Majesty's Government recollect that this is no new proposition—that it is not now brought forward for the first time; but that for twelve years past this question has gradually been growing up to its present magnitude. For twelve years it has been the subject of deep thought and deliberation, and I entreat you to bear in mind the position in which the question now stands. After a majority in this House—and a majority so constituted, comprising the representatives of the greatest commercial constituencies in this Kingdom, and backed, moreover, by the fervid and undying sympathies of the country—after such a majority has affirmed my proposition, do Her Majesty's Government think it wise, do they think it just, to reverse that decision by the simple exercise of official authority? I appeal to the House whether, having excited the hopes and expectations of the people, they will now rescind their former decision, and disappoint those animating and fervid anticipations which are entertained by the great body of the manufacturing operatives? I do hope, from the bottom of my heart, that this noble and august Assembly will consider its own character—that it will not so speedily reverse its own decision; but that it will have some regard to the character it has to maintain before this country, and before all the nations of the world. But do Her Majesty's Government really think that this cause will not eventually triumph? Do they suppose that the principles and feelings which have been excited in the minds of the people will ever rest before the desired consummation is attained? I am convinced that, though you may succeed to-night—not that I believe you will—though you may succeed to-night, the effect of your success will only be to give additional vigour and determination to those who have so long advocated this cause, and to those whose interests are involved. And what will you have gained? If you succeed in your attempt to defeat my proposal to-night, you will have gained nothing but a little prolongation of suffering and toil; and, depend upon it, the sympathies of mankind and the feeling of this country will compel you to surrender your position, and you will surrender at last, when concession shall have lost all its grace, and I fear not a little of its remedial power. The House would of course understand, that if his proposal to limit factory-labour to ten hours should be affirmed, he would move the proviso of which he had given notice, postponing the full operation of the Measure till 1846. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the blank in the Clause be filled up with the word “ten.”

Sir William Clay should oppose the Motion, but he should do so actuated by the same motives by which the noble Lord stated himself to be guided, viz., motives of humanity and justice. He could assert most sincerely, that if he thought the course recommended by the noble Lord, the most consistent with humanity and justice, he would willingly follow it; but such was not his opinion, nor did he think that the noble Lord, or those who acted with him, were entitled exclusively to attribute to themselves the being actuated by these motives. His opposition to the Motion, arose, not from any bigotted adherence on his part to any dogma of economical science, he did not object to the Motion in limine, because it contravened the great principle of non-interference with industry. Undoubtedly, it was true, in the abstract, that there should be no interference in the transactions between individuals, and that the labour market should be left to regulate itself by the operation of supply and demand, but it seemed to him that by the course of their recent legislation and the precedent they had established, they had precluded themselves from standing by this principle. Were it not so, however, he must confess, that he thought there were circumstances in the present times—symptoms in our social condition, mighty causes in operation, which rendered it highly unsafe, impossible indeed, to consider the mere enunciation of that principle a sufficient answer to those who sought a remedy for any great evil in the relations between labourers and their employers. Still, he thought, and he presumed the noble Lord would go with him to that extent—that non-interference should be the rule, and interference the exception—that the assumption should always be, that it was better to let the value of labour, like all other commodities, be regulated by supply and demand; and that the burthen of proof should always rest on those who sought to interfere between the employer and those he employed. It should be shown, first, that there was a great evil only to be remedied by legislative interference, and, secondly, that the proposed remedy would not produce greater evils, would not, in short, be worse, than the disease. Did the case with which the noble Lord proposed to deal satisfy these conditions? In his opinion, it satisfied not one of them. He was by no means convinced of the extent of the evil as stated by the noble Lord. He was still less satisfied that the plan of the noble Lord would remedy what there was of evil. The evils seemed to him to lie in one direction, and the noble Lord's remedies in another, or rather, he believed that the proposed remedies would aggravate the evils complained of: whilst on general grounds, he entertained the strongest conviction, that the measure of the noble Lord was fraught with danger to the welfare of the community, and above all, to the well-being, the comfort, the very existence of those classes whom the noble Lord sought especially to benefit. Now, was there such an evil to be remedied as to call for the amount of legislative interference contemplated by the Motion of the noble Lord? Would the system of factory labour as regulated by the Bill now before the House, (for that was the point to look to) be of so severe, so degrading, so repugnant a character, as to require the further restriction sought to be imposed by the noble Lord? He was of opinion, that there was no proof that such was the case, that the evidence, comparing factory labour with almost every other species of labour, tended to the contrary presumption. Without wearying the House with statistics, or going over ground which had been already trodden, let them look at those facts, respecting which there could be no dispute. With regard to the evidence respecting the influence of factory labour on the general health of those engaged in it, he would only make one observation; that, although there was very great discrepancy in the evidence given by medical men on the subject, yet that the opinion of its highly prejudicial influence on the general health was principally entertained by men who had no personal knowledge on the subject, while those medical men who lived among the factory population, and had the experience of years of the effect of factory labour entertained directly opposite opinions. On this point, hon. Gentlemen would do well to consult the able and dispassionate statements of Mr. Noble, in a pamphlet published by that gentleman last year. But turning from opinions let them look at facts—look at the evidence appended to the sanatory Report, and to be gathered from the publications of the Registrar General. Was the mean duration of life less among the operatives of Manchester than among the operatives of other large towns? On the contrary, it was less than at Liverpool, less, he regretted to say, than among his own constituents at Bethnal-green, and there were the very strongest grounds for believing, that the low state of health of the operatives at Manchester or elsewhere, depended far more on the nature of their dwellings and the defective state of sewerage, and other means of securing the health of towns, than on the peculiar nature of their occupations. With respect to the health of the labourers in factories elsewhere than in great towns, they had the unimpeachable evidence of Mr. Senior in the letter referred to the other evening by his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, and alluded to in the Chronicle newspaper of that morning, that it was above an average. Evidence of a like kind was to be found in the Reports of the Commission of Inquiry in 1834. The conclusion to which the evidence of the hon. Gentleman tended, was strengthened by a reference to the very nature of factory labour—it was very light labour. Mr. Senior, in the letter to Lord Sydenham, to which he had already referred, said, that with the exception of the male spinners (a very small portion of factory labourers, probably not exceeding 12,000 or 15,000 in the whole kingdom, and constantly diminishing in number), the work is merely that of watching the machinery and piecing the threads that break. “I have seen,” so he says “the girls who thus attend, standing with their arms folded during the whole time that I stayed in the room—others sewing a handkerchief or sitting down.” Mr. Tufnel, one of the Commissioners of Inquiry in 1834, in his able Report says, “Of all the common prejudices that exist with regard to factory labour, there is none more unfounded than that which ascribes to it excessive tediousness and irksomeness above all other occupations;” and he goes on to speak of the nature of the occupation, much in the same terms as Mr. Senior. The work of the mule spinners was, however, no doubt laborious, but with regard to that, there was the most extraordinary disparity of evidence. The noble Lord had entered into very elaborate statements on that point. He gave us the results of calculations made, as he said, by one of the most experienced mathematicians in England, the following extraordinary facts. Discarding, the noble Lord said, cases which yet occurred where the mule spinner walks thirty-seven miles a day and taking the average,—

“The distance travelled will be in a mill spinning number fourteen yarns, twenty-two miles; number fifteen yarns, twenty-four miles; number thirty yarns, thirty miles. But this was not all. In estimating the fatigue of a day's work due consideration,” said the noble Lord “should be given to the necessity of turning the body round to a reverse direction not less than from 4,000 to 5,000 times in a day, besides the strain of continually having to lean over the machine, and return to an erect position. The House will be aware,” said the noble Lord “of the great strain requisite after leaning over the machinery, in bringing the body back to an upright position. It often happens, indeed, that the body is bent in the form of a right angle.”

He was quite sure that that noble Lord placed entire faith in these astounding assertions. The noble Lord would pardon him if he expressed his entire disbelief of them, and took the liberty also of saying, that the belief of them by the noble Lord did tend to lessen in some degree in his mind, the weight of the noble Lord's authority, when he saw the little amount of caution with which the noble Lord weighed the evidence tending in the direction of his own views. What, thirty miles a day, and turning the body to a reverse position, and bending the body to a right angle, and bringing it back to an erect position 4,000 or 5,000 times in addition, and this not for one day but continuously! Why, no evidence ought to have convinced the noble Lord of the truth of such a statement. The thing was physically impossible. Did the noble Lord know what was the ordinary day's march of a regiment of infantry?—that which men could keep up. Had the noble Lord never made a pedestrian tour? Had he no opinion as to the number of miles which a man in the prime of life with abundance of food, and in the best health, could walk day by day continuously? Let the noble Lord make an experiment: let him take the most athletic man of twenty-five: let him train him as for a pugilistic encounter, and try for how many days, continuously, such a man could walk thirty miles, and turn himself round, and bend to a horizontal position and raise himself again, 4,000 or 5,000 times—and then let the noble Lord decide whether it could be done for the year round by all the spinners in all the factories which spun No. 30 yarn. But they knew these facts—the work was carried on in large rooms, necessarily, from the nature of the occupation, not over-crowded, whitewashed, ventilated. By-the-way, he did not know why a provision requiring ventilation should not be part of the present Bill. Most of the factories were ventilated, but he thought a discretionary power might be given to the inspectors that all should be so. They knew that the operatives, when trade was brisk, received wages unknown almost to any other class of labourers—60*l.*, 70*l.*, 80*l.*, 90*l.* per annum each family—an amount of annual earnings, implying if well husbanded, all the necessities, many of the decent luxuries of life. Knowing these things, could they think further legislative intervention imperatively necessary? Comparing factory labour with the labour in almost every other trade or calling, rural or mechanical—were they not forced to the conclusion that factory labour was to be further interfered with, not because interference was most wanted, but because it was most easy. But whatever might be the amount of evil admitted to exist in the working of the factory system, how would it be affected by the plan of the noble Lord? In his conviction the measure of the noble Lord would tend immeasurably to enhance and aggravate every one of the evils of which he complained. What were the points chiefly insisted on in the eloquent and affecting speech of the noble Lord? Why mainly these—1st. That the present system of factory labour had the effect of superannuating adult males at an age when, according to the usual duration of human life, very many years of unabated health and strength were before them, forcing them, consequently, to seek in employments uncongenial to them, and foreign to their habits, a wretched and precarious existence. 2ndly. That it tended to substitute female for male adult labour—thus diverting women from their proper sphere of action—the discharge of domestic duties. 3rdly. That by the preference of very young persons, and making consequently, parents depending on their children; it disturbed and perverted the natural relations in the members of families, weakening parental authority on the one hand, and filial piety on the other, and producing thereby all the train of disorders and vice, so eloquently dwelt on by the noble Lord. Now, to which of these evils would the plan of the noble Lord apply a remedy? What were the temptations to prefer the labour of women to men, and of very young persons to that of persons of middle age, it might be said almost of adults? Why they were twofold, first, because it was cheaper; but secondly, and mainly, perhaps, because as the machinery was improved, became more delicate and moved faster, and required less human labour,—it became more essential that that labour should be, that of persons at the precise period of life when there was the utmost amount of quickness and activity, when the nerves of sight and touch, were in the utmost perfection. The noble Lord's own statistics showed that such was the tendency now. Would that tendency be decreased by the proposed measure? Was it not certain that it would be increased? They were about to take off one entire sixth-part of the time within which the master manufacturer was to obtain a return on his fixed capital. How must he meet this new condition of things? Why, by greater economy in his labour in the first place, and by working his machinery faster in the second. He would seek with tenfold avidity to make his engine, with its Briarean power, do more, and human hands less. He would make his giant of iron and brass work faster too—so fast that it could only have for fellow labourers human beings when the young powers of life were in their utmost intensity, and those powers taxed to their very utmost stretch. Such would be the effect of the noble Lord's plan with reference to the evils he especially proposed to remedy; but far more overwhelming was the argument against its adoption to be drawn from a consideration of the irresistible effect of its adoption on the general condition of the working classes—of those who furnished the labour in factories. It would be at once conceded, that out of the gross returns of the manufacturer, of the amount that was beyond what was necessary to replace the floating capital perpetually employed, must be drawn both the wages of labour and the profits on his fixed as well as his floating capital. If they limited the hours within which he worked his machinery there would be less surplus beyond the mere replacing the floating capital, and either wages or profits, must be reduced. Both would be so; but could there be a doubt which would be so in the greater proportion? The capitalist would take care of himself first. In the present state of supply and demand for labour the operative was at his mercy, and in his (Sir W. Clay's) opinion, the absolutely inevitable result of forced reduction of the working of mills to ten hours would be a reduction of wages in a far greater proportion than as twelve to ten. After the most careful consideration he could give the subject, he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary overrated the reduction at 25 per cent. The force of this argument was so strongly felt by the hon. Member for Oldham—certainly well qualified to judge on the question—that, admitting the truth of the proposition as to the result on profits and wages, of reducing the hours of working of the mills—he could only meet it by asserting that, if the quantity produced were diminished, the price of the article produced would rise. A moment's consideration would show, that this anticipation was wholly fallacious. It would be true only if either England were the only manufacturing country, or other countries would adopt the noble Lord's regulations. At present it was impossible to raise prices one farthing beyond those at which they could face foreign competition. England sold in foreign markets, as was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, 35,000,000*l.* annually of the products of those factories now proposed to be dealt with. Now, what would be the result of adopting the noble Lord's proposition? Why inevitably, and as of course, one of two. Either England would still send to foreign markets the present amount of manufactured goods at the same price, and then as he had shown wages must be reduced not only in the proportion of ten to one, but in a much larger ratio, or she must send her goods at a higher price, and thus, to a certainty, lose a portion of her present share of the sales in foreign markets, that displacement of English goods becoming larger and larger each year as their foreign competitors produced, as they then would do, larger and larger quantities of goods at cheaper rates, which could always be done as the quantities increased and thus would the demand for English labour each year become less. To be sure it had been proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton, when examined in 1833, before the Commission of Inquiry, that the English Government should by negotiation with all foreign countries, induce them to adopt a ten hours Factory Bill, in which case the price of the articles produced would be simultaneously raised all over the world; but the House would scarcely think the probable success of such negotiation sufficient ground on which to legislate. Let the House recollect that, in adopting the proposition of the noble Lord, they were taking a step in direct opposition to the opinions of perfectly impartial persons, well qualified by long observation to form a judgment—he alluded to Mr. Horner and Mr. Saunders, whose opinions were quoted by the noble Lord with approbation when they seemed to agree with his own, but whose authority he disregarded

when it went in opposition to his own views. Let them, above all, recollect that they were legislating for classes the most sure to suffer by any error they might commit. The noble Lord had said, apostrophising the manufacturers, "We do not envy you your stupendous wealth. Peace be within your walls and plentifulness within your palaces; we ask but a slight compensation for it." There would seem to lurk in the mind of the noble Lord—perhaps almost unconsciously to him—some vague and undefined belief that manufacturing profits were so vast, that this "compensation" could be deducted from them without inconvenience. That the manufacturers could afford to give twelve hours wages for ten hours work, and not be very ill off. Never was there a more fatal error. In the present superabundance of capital, it was absolutely certain that not more than the ordinary rate of profit could be obtained in any trade, and that rate was a very low one. But the manufacturer would take care of himself; and in the present state of the supply and demand he could do so, and throw his loss on the wages of the unfortunate operative. Should they, moreover, impose on the capitalist burdens he was unable or unwilling to bear, he might (although, no doubt, with loss) transport his capital and skill to other lands—the operative must remain, destitute and helpless, a burthen to himself and to the country on which he would be thrown back for support. Might he, as an illustration of the probable effect of the noble Lord's Motion on the classes he sought to benefit, bring before the House one illustration which had forced itself on his mind? Perhaps, in the whole speech of the noble Lord—powerful and affecting as it was—nothing produced greater effect on the feelings of the House than his statement of sufferings produced by factory-labour on women in a state of pregnancy. He said, that twelve hours' labour is unsafe and improper for women so circumstanced. Does he believe that ten hours would be safe or proper? It was impossible he could think so. But let the House mark the result of what the noble Lord proposed. He would trust nothing to the prudence of the woman herself—nothing to the tenderness or humanity of the husband. He would not permit any woman to work twelve hours, but how immeasurably did he increase the temptation to those to whom it was most dangerous to work ten? From a family earning 80*l.* per annum, his plan would take 20*l.* Will the mother of that family be more or less likely to absent herself from home—from the care of her children, and to work when she ought to be in repose. In conclusion, he would entreat the House to proceed with caution; the Bill on their Table was no mean advance in the direction of the noble Lord's own views. The Bill met the difficulties and remedied the evils pointed out by the inspectors. The work of children was limited; the detection of fraud was rendered easier. No person under eighteen was to work more than twelve hours; no woman was to work more than twelve hours; no young person, no woman, was to work in the night. Were not these important regulations—to be enforced, let it always be recollected, on the free-will of workpeople themselves. Let the House be contented for the present at least, and proceed no further in a path, every step of which, they might rest assured, was beset with danger to the best interests of the country, and, above all, to the interests of the labouring classes. If he might venture respectfully also to offer one word of advice to the noble Lord, he would venture to tell him that there were other departments of British industry where his benevolent labours were more needed than they now were with respect to factory-labour. No doubt elsewhere he would meet with more difficulties; but the noble Lord had shown that he possessed that noblest of all qualities, that enthusiastic perseverance in well-doing, which was not to be daunted by difficulties. Let him go on, and he would be supported, not by narrow majorities, but by the unanimous votes of that House, and the universal approbation of the public.

Mr. Monckton Milnes said, that perhaps his connection with the West Riding of Yorkshire, where this subject had long excited a deep and enthusiastic interest, might be his excuse for intruding for a short time on the attention of the House. He had never risen under any circumstances with so much individual pain as at the present moment, because he rose to speak upon the subject with the conviction that it would be his duty this evening to oppose the Government, with whom he had generally the honour and the pleasure of acting; and he was compelled to do so from a sincere belief that the course which the Government had pursued on this question was one neither of benefit to the country, nor of dignity to themselves. In the course of last year the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department brought forward a factory Bill, and he had this year brought forward another factory Bill. The House knew how the former Bill was met, and how it was foiled; and he might be permitted to say, that he considered the yielding up of that Measure by the right hon. Gentleman last year was just as unfortunate as was the perseverance of the right hon. Gentleman in his present course. He said this, because he believed that it was necessary for the dignity of the Government that the Measure of last year should have been carried. He would have risked his seat to have given the right hon. Gentleman any advantage in his power to have carried that Bill. But the question now came before the House under a different aspect, and supported by a different kind of agitation. The agitation which now met the right hon. Gentleman, and which he now so strenuously opposed, was one in which for the last ten years a large portion of the people of this country had been engaged, which had excited the deepest sympathy, and which had now been confirmed by a majority of that House; and yet, under these circumstances, the House was now asked to rescind the solemn Resolution which, after an adjourned debate of two days, it had come to, without any circumstance of casualty or haste, merely because the right hon. Gentleman wished to take the advantage of any chance or contingency which might by possibility induce the House to reverse its own recent solemn decision. He hoped he might be excused for speaking earnestly upon this subject, because he did feel that it was now almost impossible to meet this question with the same calmness that was most becoming and most just on a preceding occasion. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Tower Hamlets, who had just addressed the House, had indeed undertaken a most difficult task. While every other Member seemed to feel that the question was one of enormous difficulty—while it appeared to be the general opinion, that whether the remedy proposed was right or not, yet the evils were great and undoubted

—while those evils were generally allowed and unchallenged, that hon. Baronet had undertaken the task of representing the whole matter as a mere dream of philanthropic enthusiasts, and of holding up the factory women and children of this country as persons in so happy and contented a position that it would be most impertinent for the Legislature to interfere with them. He had hoped that that part of the question had long since been settled. He thought that the House felt the enormity of the evils, and that a national guilt had been incurred by the miseries of the unrestricted factory system. They knew that by that system they were bringing up millions of their fellow-creatures in a state of degradation almost lower than that of any slave population. They knew that there were thousands of factory children who had no possible means of receiving either moral or religious instruction. They knew that thousands of them had perished on the very threshold of manhood, it being physically impossible for them, from their exhausted strength, to obtain by labour any of the comforts of life. This question had attracted not only the attention of every Member of that House, but also of Her Majesty's Government; for the Government had this year come down with a Bill directly interfering with labour. On that account he said, that the present Bill had been very unfairly treated. He considered that the debate turning so much upon the presumption that this Bill would not interfere with labour, was unjust to the Bill, to his noble Friend (Lord Ashley), and to the Government itself. A great part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government on a former evening, went far more against the principle which it was the object of the Government Bill to establish, than against any modification of it which his noble Friend wished to introduce. It was most true that it did not interfere with the labour of male adults. But, with regard to children, it provided that those under thirteen years of age should only work half a-day—those working in the morning were not to work in the afternoon, and those working in the afternoon were not to work in the morning. This presupposed the adoption of a system of relays, as regarded children. Now childhood, according to this Bill, ceased at thirteen years of age. What his noble Friend wished to do was

this—to extend the operation of this part of the Bill up to the age of eighteen years. The whole scope of his noble Friend's Amendment, as regarded males, was as to the ages between thirteen and eighteen years. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was, that children up to thirteen years should not labour more than six hours and a half a day; but from that age they were suddenly transferred to labour for twelve hours a day. What his noble Friend required was a sliding-scale in this matter, which the Government had so wisely applied in other ways—that children from thirteen to eighteen years of age should work ten hours a day, and that when eighteen they might work as many hours as the factories worked. He hoped the Committee would keep this steadily in mind, that as far as regarded male labour the sole difference was this—his noble Friend wished so to modify the Bill, that children on attaining their thirteenth year should not be at once transferred from six and a-half hours labour, to the enormous labour of twelve hours. Let the House imagine what twelve hours labour was to a boy of fourteen or fifteen years of age. The hon. Baronet (Sir W. Clay) had attempted to make out that this labour of twelve hours was nothing at all. The hon. Baronet did this upon the authority of Mr. Senior, who having started from his villa at Kensington, and having taken a run through the manufacturing districts, returned to his home, and drew up a report representing the factory labour as the lightest of all possible occupations. Now he knew Mr. Senior very well, and he knew him to be a very excellent and intelligent man; but he was sure that if the hon. Baronet or Mr. Senior were to be set to that labour for twelve hours a day for a single week, they would come down to that House with very different feelings on the subject. But after quoting this opinion of Mr. Senior, of Kensington, the hon. Baronet most inconsistently made it a matter of complaint against his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) for having taken the opinions of persons who were strangers to all the localities. The hon. Baronet said, with regard to the medical part of the question, that the information obtained was not from surgeons of the neighbourhood, and therefore they knew nothing about it. He found in the evidence of Dr. Hawkins, before the Committee of 1833, this passage:—

"I am compelled to declare it to be my deliberate opinion that no child should be employed in factory-labour below ten years of age, and that no individual below eighteen should be employed longer than ten hours. As to the reduction of the hours of labour of all below eighteen, I feel the less distrust in my own opinion, because it has the sanction of a large majority of the most eminent medical men who practise in the manufacturing districts."

Now, he thought that the authority of Dr. Hawkins, of Manchester, was much more to be relied on than that of Mr. Senior, of Kensington. The hon. Baronet had referred to certain statistics which had been brought forward with respect to the duration of lives in the factory districts, but to him these statements did not appear sufficiently to allow for the great amount of new blood which was daily infused into those factories from the agricultural counties. There were many healthy adults constantly entering those districts, which must materially affect any statistical statement upon this head. The hon. Baronet had said, that the notion of a young person running thirty-seven miles a-day was an absolute impossibility. It had, he believed, been physically established as a fact, that a child running about all day for its own pleasure would run over a much larger space of ground than almost any healthy man would do. Therefore he would say, that if a child was kept up to his full speed all day, [with the dread of punishment before him, he might perform some such feat as that. But whether the distance was thirty-seven or twenty-seven miles was immaterial; both required a degree of toil which was frightful. Now, when he heard his noble Friend make such statements as these, and when he found it stated in an Address issued by the delegates from Lancashire and Yorkshire, that they had read his noble Friend's speech, "paragraph by paragraph, and that they could affirm from their own knowledge that every statement made to the House was absolutely correct," he was bound to believe that there did exist a very great grievance on this part of the subject. He would now say one word upon the effect of the proposed Measure upon wages. The hon. Baronet had said, that political economy ought not to be introduced into this debate, though he himself certainly did introduce a considerable portion into it. According to the doctrine of wages, as it had been scientifically laid down, it was fully understood that there were at least four elements influencing wages—population, capital, fluctuation of the prices of necessaries, and the standard of living. These four elements together determined the amount of wages. All depended upon each, and each upon all. Therefore, he could not believe, that the mere reduction of one of these elements—all the others remaining the same—could effect that considerable diminution of wages which had been mentioned in the course of this debate. With respect also to the shortening of the time of working the mills, this might be avoided if relays of women, as well as of young persons were established. This Bill required relays of children: the only thing therefore required, was relays of women, and then the machinery might go for any period. There was one part of the Bill which he did not understand—that which required the factories to close at half-past seven o'clock. He did not see why the mills should not be allowed to work the two additional hours during daylight in the Summer supposing there was sufficient labour in the neighbourhood, and a sufficient demand for it. This compulsory closing of the mills was infinitely more harsh, and calculated to excite greater discontent than any condition required by his noble Friend. He would conclude by solemnly appealing to the Committee to look well to it before they rescinded the decision they had already come to. He entreated them to consider under what a very different aspect the Question now appeared before them. It had already gone forth to the country that a majority of the Representatives of the people declared it to be their opinion that women and children were not to be employed in factories more than ten hours a-day. At this very moment they were speaking about it to one another. At this very moment they were telling one another of the glorious result that had followed the exertions of his noble Friend, and that after ten years of unwearied labour this great thing had been at last achieved. The people knew this as well as they (the House of Commons) did, and could any Government suppose, that even if by hon. Members coming up from different parts of the country to vote, they should succeed in rescinding the late decision of the House; could any Government suppose that any such course would turn back into its former channels the feelings of the people, or make them forget what had passed the other night? No! the people would not forget it, and the Government would do well not to think so. He thought it very unimportant which way the majority turned this evening, as regarded the fate of the Measure; because it was already, above all governments and all majorities, absolutely decided. It was impossible now for any Government to stop a ten hours Bill. It was, in every moral sense, as much a part of the law of this country as any part of this interfering Bill which he held in his hand. Wishing from his heart the best in every way to Her Majesty's Government, he most heartily grieved that they had in this matter set themselves against the opinion, against the sympathy, against the good feeling, and against, he believed, the religious sense of so large a proportion of the people of England; and he would now sit down, humbly imploring them, before it was too late, not to persist in that dangerous course, and not drive his noble Friend to extremity. It was a subject he felt deeply upon, and, therefore, he said—not drive his noble Friend to any extremity to which he would be very unwillingly driven, but in which he believed his noble Friend would be supported by a majority of this House. Yes; he believed that a majority would support his noble Friend in an Address to the Throne, declaring to Her Majesty that the only resource was in her benevolence, and in her noble and generous feelings against the short-sightedness or rather blindness of her Ministers.

Mr. Vernon Smith wished to say a few words in support of the proposition he threw out just now. His noble Friend had said that he was surprised at his making such a proposition, but he did it conceiving that it would do away with the objection to the Bill on the ground of its imposing restrictions on labour. He believed that the whole of the arguments urged the other evening upon the question, at least those coming from Her Majesty's Government were founded upon this principle—that the Legislature ought not to interfere with the labour of the people. How these arguments were more applicable to a ten hours' Bill, he was at a loss to conceive. It appeared to him that the arguments applied with equal force to their own Bill, for they had declared a limit beyond which infant labour should not go. When he proposed that unmarried adult females should exercise their own discretion as to the length of time they would labour, his noble Friend answered that females in manufacturing districts were so ground down, as not to be free agents. Now, if that applied to them, he thought it equally applied to a large portion of the male population of this country. He would ask whether the male labourers of this country were perfectly free to choose what work they would do, and what wages they would receive, and whether it was not the case, that it was always more in the power of the masters to say you shall work, than in the power of the labourer to say, "I will not." He thought his noble Friend had not answered that point. But they were not interfering with the great principle that regulated these things, namely, that the employer and the employed should settle between them the rate of wages. He would now look at the regulations which were proposed by this measure. They had, at all events, declared that they would interfere on behalf of children. On what score. On the score of their helplessness, because it was alleged that the parent would work their children, to aid in supporting their families, to the prejudice of the health and morals of the children themselves, and because the working of women and children interfered with all the domestic relations, unhinging the whole scheme of society by making men of forty years of age able to live upon the work of their wives and children; whereas, in all the other relations of life the wives and children were supported by the man. All and all that his noble Friend wished to do was, to insert the word ten instead of twelve. Now, if the Legislature had never interfered at all, he confessed, that he should have thought that they had acted rightly. But in 1833 the pressure was so great from without that all parties were determined to interfere on behalf of children. That point, therefore, as far as interference went, was settled. The question now proposed to him, therefore, was, whether a child was more capable of working ten hours than twelve? He could not hesitate a moment in declaring it to be his opinion that ten hours was a better period than twelve. He thought no man could doubt that at that tender age ten hours was a more proper period than twelve. He had never heard any man say that he thought it was beneficial, or that it was not prejudicial, for a child to work twelve hours a day, or that a child could work that number of hours without prejudice to health, morals, and religious education. The argument of most power which had been advanced against the diminution of power was that which was urged by the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He said, "Beware of what you are about!" and borrowing a metaphor from the noble Lord, but using it in a different sense, the right hon. Gentleman said, "You are laying the axe at the root of the tree;" but the noble Lord spoke in reference to the morals of the people, whereas the right hon. Gentleman used the words as regarding money and commerce, which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think would be put in jeopardy if they were to diminish by two hours a day the exhausted labour of the poor children of this country. Now, he remembered, in the debate of 1833, a Gentleman with whom he did not much agree in politics, but whom at the same time he considered a person of considerable talent and humour—he meant Mr. Cobbett—he remembered that gentleman saying—"That he had heard that the greatness of this country depended upon its navy; that at other times it depended upon the learned profession, and at other times upon its great Statesmen; but he never till that moment heard that it depended upon the overworking of little girls in factories." It had been said, that a reduction of 25 per cent. in wages would be the result of this limitation of infant labour. How that could be when the reduction of labour was only one-sixth, he could not understand. If there was any honesty in the working of the Bill, the diminution of wages could not amount to more than the diminution of time. But he would venture to say, that though the diminution of time was one-sixth, the diminution of profitable labour would be much less, because the last two hours would be the least efficient, owing to the exhaustion caused by the previous ten hours of labour. But he could not think that the commerce of this country was really in so ticklish, hazardous and perilous a state as to depend upon so small an amount, more or less, of additional labour. But he must own, that if that was the case, he was not prepared to say, that the morals of this country were not to stand beyond even its commercial greatness. He was not prepared, at any moment of his life, when he was told of what was going on in these factories among the children, and that they were being brought up decrepid and depraved, to go on overlooking their condition, and regarding only the advantages to be derived from extended commerce. But he took a wider view of the question than this. He must own, that if the proposed diminution of labour should induce some evils as regarded our commerce, it appeared to him that the change would be attended, on the other hand, with great advantage to the country. It might diminish wages to a certain money amount, but he was prepared to make up for this by giving an additional hue of health to the people, and rewarding them in moral wages, which would be of more value to them than money itself. [An hon. Member: "How are they to live?"] His hon. Friend asked how were they to live? Why, there was no danger in this country, of their starvation. [Cheers.] He would repeat there was no danger of starvation of any one in this country, and he hoped that the cheer of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was an assenting cheer to the fact that there was no such danger. Well, what was the question, then, he had to decide? It was whether the amount of money wages was of more value to the people than the greater amount which this measure would give them of a moral and a religious education, and a vigorous frame. He believed that advantage was not derived in the manufacturing districts by those who enjoyed a higher rate of wages than what was received by the great bulk of their own class. He was told that those persons were not the most moral, the most thrifty, or the most careful of their families, but that it often happened that having a higher amount of wages they were induced to spend it profligately, and become spendthrifts. He was only stating what he had been told occurred in the manufacturing districts, where particular persons were paid higher wages than the rest of the society from which they sprung. His object would be to put every person in this country upon the footing of as good wages as they could earn. That seemed to be a very general opinion, and no doubt that would be the object of every wise Legislature. But he did not think that there was any advantage in keeping a particular set of men up by legislation at a higher rate of wages than others could earn; therefore he did not think that very high wages, beyond those usually earned by any particular class, were advantageous to the people themselves. He would much rather allow them some portion of time, which they might devote to education, recreation, and exercise. By so doing, they would raise up a much healthier and sounder population than by allowing them to earn the utmost amount of money wages that they could obtain. The House would do well also to look at the effect of the present system; it was an encouragement to the men to throw the work upon the women and children, and thus new motives were given for forming early and imprudent marriages; the husband would reckon upon being maintained by his family, instead of his family being maintained by him. This was a condition of society it would of all things be desirable to avoid; and if a risk were to be run he was willing to incur it, for the sake of the improvement of the health and morals of the people. He had understood, that by an agreement between the noble Member for Dorsetshire and the Government, the debate on this question was to be taken on the first Clause of the Bill. It had been so taken, and now the House was involved in numerous difficulties by having passed over other Clauses, and by a re-debate of the question of ten or twelve hours' labour. In his experience of Parliament, he had hardly known a question better decided in all respects than this had been on Monday last. Sufficient notice had been given; the debate had been adjourned; and Gentlemen had had abundant time to consider the votes they should give. Government had taken two divisions on the same evening, and now they were preparing to take a third. He had no doubt of the courage of the right hon. Baronet to take another division, but he (Mr. Vernon Smith) doubted the policy of attempting to revoke a decision so deliberate, without a single new argument or a fresh scrap of information. The only difference was, that the Government had since made some fresh endeavours to gather round them their usual allies, well knowing, too, that on the former occasion not one of their independent supporters had ventured to say a word in their favour.

Mr. Cardwell was desirous of addressing the Committee, not because he thought he could throw any new light upon a subject which was already exhausted—but because it had happened to him to pay attention to this question from a period antecedent to that at which it had been taken up by the noble Lord; and although he had not the good fortune of arriving at the same conclusions with him, yet he begged to assure him, and he did not think he asked too much in claiming credit for the sincerity of this assurance, that the main object present to his mind had always been an earnest hope that, in any measure which Parliament might devise, they would at least do nothing to impede—they would if possible do much to promote—the growing prosperity of the great operative classes of the country. Now this question had been divided, with reference to its popularity, into two sides, in a very remarkable way; and it had been stated that one side took a purely commercial view, while the other rested entirely upon a basis of morality and humanity. One hon. Member, who stated this distinction in strong terms, had borrowed, perhaps unconsciously, the language of the classical historian of Lancashire, who spoke of “passing children through fire to Moloch, and through filth to Mammon;” and such was the tone in which it was thought right to speak of those who ventured to differ from the noble Lord. Now, he altogether denied the soundness of this distinction. He did not deny that it was possible to take a purely and strictly commercial view of this question. He did not deny that it was possible for a sordid man to think of nothing but how he might extract from the toil and sufferings of others the largest fortune for himself. But he did deny that they could altogether discard the commercial view of the subject, and rest solely upon considerations of morality and humanity. Did they know what they were talking of? Was it possible for any man who had the least experience on these subjects—or, if he had no experience, who, in the absence of it, applied to the matter a common capacity, not to know how much both the physical and moral comfort of the manufacturing classes depended upon the commercial view of the question? It was scarcely possible for any of them not to know that the success of the manufacturer of this country could do a great deal more for the poorer classes than the widest efforts of the most diffusive charity, or the happiest results of the best-contrived Legislation. And so he said, not to consider that part of the question—to discard altogether the commercial view—would be a course quite unworthy of the dignity of the British House of Commons, and would lead to consequences which the very people intended most to be benefitted would necessarily be the first to rue. It would be admitted on all sides, that on the subject of labour there were two points which ought always to be kept in view. First, that a real and efficient protection should be afforded to those, who by reason of tender years, were unable to protect themselves, and the other great point was, to leave as free as the winds of heaven the labour of those who were able to protect themselves—to leave free to the management and economy of the parties interested, that labour which had been so often and so justly described in those debates as the only property they possessed. Now, if they did not intend to render all their statutes nugatory, and to make utterly useless all that they had hitherto done on this subject, they must have the cordial co-operation of those whose interests were so deeply staked in it, and to obtain that cordial co-operation, the most calm and dispassionate inquiry, the most grave and considerate legislation, would be necessary. He gave credit to the Government for having addressed themselves to the inquiry in this spirit; and they had laid a Bill upon the Table of the House, which gave increased protection to those who were unable to protect themselves, and which left free the labour of those who were well able to protect themselves, and to guard their own interests. (But as these two classes worked together under the same roof, and in connection with the same machinery, it necessarily happened that these two objects, in all their integrity, were not compatible with each other; and that would therefore be the best arrangement which should be found to combine them in the happiest degree. The present Bill accordingly limited the labour of women and children—it afforded to them the opportunity of attending, to a small extent, at least, to their domestic duties—it secured to those of tender years something like an useful education—it afforded to those who most needed it some little leisure time—and, surely, these were advantages which entitled the Bill to the support of Parliament and of the country. If he were not to have the Bill as it stood, he should like at least to know what was the alternative. He should like to know what was the specific proposal of the noble Lord and those who voted with him. One hon. Member (Mr. M. Milnes) said, that he would speak with great caution on the subject of relays. How far he had kept his promise the Committee perhaps would judge, for he had expressed some opinions on that subject which, he confessed, he had never heard before. But this caution was the very thing he complained of on the part of those hon. Members. He wished to know whether those hon. Members wanted an uniform Ten Hours' Bill. He wished to know whether the noble Lord would admit relays? If he would admit the system of relays, he would tell him that he had no right to say that he had the support of the large body of the petitioners on this subject. He (Mr. Cardwell) knew that the petitioners who had signed the petitions to that House, and that the deputations which had been received by the noble Lord, wanted an uniform Ten Hours' Bill, and that if the noble Lord did not support such a measure, he was not entitled to claim the authority of their sanction. If the noble Lord did support such a measure, if he excluded the system of relays, then he said that he would leave the children working in factories worse—not only than they would be under the present Bill—but worse than they were at the present moment—worse than he had found them. He would be the last to attribute motives, and he firmly believed that those Gentlemen in the House who supported the motion of the noble Lord were influenced by motives of the purest sincerity and philanthropy. But all men were liable to be deceived, and he would suggest to the noble Lord it was just possible there might be designing persons in the world, eager to deceive him on this subject. He would seriously advise them to consider whether, under an uniform Ten Hours' Bill, the adults would not work less and the children more—whether more labour would not be extracted from the worn-out sinews of the children—and less obtained from the fair industry of the men. He said that this would be an evil, which, for the sake of morality and humanity alone, the Committee were bound to guard against. If the noble Lord did not support a uniform Ten Hours' Bill—then he could not claim the support of the petitioners. But, with or without relays, he believed that such a measure was not practicable. True humanity was practical, and he conscientiously and confidently stated that he believed the motion not to be consistent with true humanity. They had heard some strange doctrines on the subject of reduced wages. It was difficult to say whether the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. V. Smith) thought high or low wages the best. If he applied to the propositions of the hon. Gentlemen any of those ordinary principles of reasoning with which he was acquainted, he should arrive at the conclusion that low wages were a check on profligate expenditure, restrained imprudent marriages, acted as an encouragement to economy and the other moral and social virtues—and were, upon the whole, precisely that kind of blessing which that House, in its wisdom, should endeavour to secure to these operative classes, for whose welfare the hon. Gentleman was so particularly solicitous. But he had been surprised at what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire on the subject of reduced wages. The noble Lord had seemed to say that the amount of wages must decrease in exact arithmetical proportion to the hours of labour—and the right hon. Gentleman went still further, and expressed his surprise that any other calculation could have ever entered into the mind of mortal man. Why, what was the expense of those establishments? What capital was sunk in the great manufacturing concerns of this country? Were there not great and vast expenses besides the payment of wages? and there must be a profit to the manufacturer over all. He ventured at least to say for those with whom he was acquainted, that if there were to be no profit, they would retire, and the noble Lord must find a set of philanthropists who would undertake to carry on the manufactures and commerce of the country for nothing. He was afraid that no such men were to be found; and as it might be taken as a postulate on this question, that the manufacturer would have interest for his money, so, out of the margin which lay beyond the payment of the other necessary expenses, the wages must come, and the reduction of those wages must depend upon the profit of the manufacturer. The reduction of profit might perhaps be, as had been stated on the high authority of the right hon. Baronet, 25 per cent.; but whatever it was—whether more or less than that—it certainly could not be in proportion to the time of labour required of the workman. Whatever it might be, it would press upon the comforts of the working classes, and the House ought to hesitate before they sanctioned it. Another element which the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten was, that the machinery, if it did not wear out, became superannuated by the constant introduction of new inventions, and so there was a frequent call upon the manufacturers for a fresh capital. He would not further refer to this point; but his account of the manufacturer's expenses would have been very incomplete without an allusion to it. But it had been said that the labourer would get comforts in the lieu of wages, and the hon. Gentleman had spoken in poetical language of obtaining a full compensation for his diminished income by an additional hue of health. Now in the experience which his time of life had permitted him to acquire in the manufacturing districts, he had heard innumerable complaints of reduced wages. He had known what suffering had been caused by shortened hours of labour. He had heard often of a fair day's wages for a fair day's work; but he had never heard of a trades' union to enforce short hours on the masters, and an extensive combination to force the noble Lord's measure on Parliament would never be seen in this country. But if the operatives did not agree with the noble Lord on the subject of wages, and if there were many who favoured his present proposal, he could assure the Committee that they thought that this proposal could be carried out without any reduction of wages; and when he was told of the petitions in favour of it, he remembered the placards posted by torchlight on the walls of Manchester—"Less work. More wages. Sign for the ten hour Bill." If there was such a variety of opinions on the subjects of political economy in that House, it was no wonder that the operatives of the manufacturing districts fell into errors on such questions. They thought that the reduction of the time of labour would lessen the produce of the manufacturer, and, consequently, prevent the same amount of competition. But the exact opposite was always the result. It was a matter of history that interference with labour had always been followed by great improvements in machinery, and what was the inevitable result of improvements in machinery? the exclusion of adults from the factory, and the increased demand for infant labour. But there was another thing. If they limited the hours of labour, then they must have increased establishments in order to produce the same amount,—they called into existence a new manufacturing population,—and on the first revulsion of trade a larger community was left to suffer and to starve. He was now arguing not upon principles of political economy, but upon those of the noble Lord—he was now pointing out the evils which followed from the increase of that canker which was said to eat to the core the social happiness of the working classes. But supposing the idea to be correct, and that home competition would be diminished, could they at the present day, under the present circumstances, safely venture to disregard competition from abroad. Take the case of Belgium. Belgium had our machinery. It was no answer to say they got it under the measure of last year. They had it before. But it might be said that they had not capital. Only let them put restrictions enough upon the trade at home—and it would soon be seen whether capital would be deficient abroad. Belgium had coal; she had a population willing to work long hours—satisfied with a diet to which fortunately the people of England had never yet been reduced to submit—and could it be said that her competition was not to be dreaded! If they thought that their commerce was so secure that they could take liberties with it—if they thought that they were running a race, in which they could afford to carry weight—if they thought that foreigners were not watching them with the utmost jealousy, and availing themselves of their mistakes with the greatest promptitude—they made a mistake which experience would teach them to discover. He implored them to be wise in time. They were sowing the wind and they would reap the whirlwind. Under the semblance and in the guise of humanity, with the loudest applause of the best intentioned men,—disregarding the warnings of those to whom, by a rather broad implication, they denied those chivalrous sentiments of morality and humanity, which they assumed for themselves and their opponents willingly conceded them,—he greatly feared that they were striking a fatal blow at the commercial prosperity of England. And at what period? At a juncture in the history of British commerce, perhaps the most interesting which that eventful history had to tell. There was a circumstance in regard to Great Britain which was capable of being stated effectively in the shape of a paradox : and it was this : her commercial prosperity was owing to the fact that the master-manufacturers paid the lowest wages, while the operative received the highest wages of any country in the world. The explanation was obvious enough. The master paid the largest wages, but he obtained in a still greater proportion the best return of work. The operative received not merely the highest nominal wages,—but wages so much higher in amount as to command in this highly priced country the largest quantity of the necessaries of life. This end was brought about by the energy, management, and economy of the people of this country, and all was consistent with a gradual and regular amelioration, such as the Bill upon the Table offered to the infant manufacturing population. He firmly and conscientiously believed that if the Legislature pursued the sober and steady course upon which for some years it had been acting, the prosperity of Great Britain would be as unlimited abroad as it was happy in its results at home. The worst enemies of the country at large, but above all of the operative classes, were those whose mistaken zeal urged them to follow the blind impulses of humanity without carefully deliberating on the consequences. They were doing all they could to deprive the operative classes of what was of more consequence to them than the most extensive charity, than the anxious protection of the Legislature—he meant commercial prosperity.

Mr. Brotherton said, that this question had agitated the country for twenty-eight years, and it was time that it should be settled. He remembered when cotton machinery was worked by hand, and when it was not usual to work more than ten hours a day. But when the steam engine was introduced, the hours of labour were gradually increased. In 1802, Sir R. Peel had introduced a Bill for regulating the employment of apprentices. Since that time four Acts had been passed, all of which had been, in a great degree inefficient and unsatisfactory. In 1815 another Measure had been brought forward limiting the labour of those under eighteen years to ten hours and a half. A Committee had then been appointed to investigate the subject, and he, entertaining the same opinion then as he did now, had furnished the late Mr. Nathaniel Gould with facts which were recorded by that Committee. He could have no desire that the manufacturing interest should suffer, because many of his friends were connected with it ; he might be mistaken in his views, but he hoped the House would allow him shortly to state his reasons for them. He did not look at it merely as a question of humanity, but also as a question of policy, and on both grounds he was prepared to justify the vote he had given a few nights ago, and which he intended to repeat. He was not of opinion that the House was called upon to depart from the principles on which it had legislated ; for what was the practice of the trade before Parliament began to legislate on the subject? In 1819 Lord Kenyon stated in the House of Lords that more than three-fourths of the factories in Lancashire worked fourteen hours a-day. It had been contended that if the demand for employment were perfectly free, there would be no occasion to legislate. He was not of that opinion. In 1835, 1836, and 1837, when trade was brisk, more than 2,000 convictions under the Factory Bill, and penalties to the extent of more than 6,000*l.* were inflicted for overworking. At present in certain mills they were working fourteen or fifteen hours a day—females and married women were employed to that excess. He begged to remind those who were opposed to legislative interference, that from the highest authority a restriction had been put upon labour—"Six days shalt thou labour," and rest on the seventh day. That was a direct contradiction to the political economy of non-interference with labour. Those who contended for non-interference must go the length of saying that if we could not compete with foreigners by working for ten or twelve hours the time must be extended, and that if six days were not sufficient, toil must be continued on the seventh. The question was, were ten hours in the day sufficient? He thought it amply sufficient for man, woman, or child. He was ready to admit that factory labour was not unhealthy ; on the contrary, when it was not excessive, he believed that it was as healthy and pleasant an employment as any in which persons could well be engaged. Although he had taken part in promoting every Measure of the kind hitherto passed, he had never been able to obtain due protection for women and children ; how could domestic comfort exist, or education proceed, while the people were doomed to endless toil ! If they kept moderate time they had nothing to fear from competition. He admitted, that if they did restrict the hours of labour to a great extent, it must, necessarily, increase the cost of the article, but then the question was who was to bear the increased cost? He had seen a calculation made at a particular mill, of the amount which would be lost to the consumer by a reduction of the hours of labour. He admitted that there would be an increase in the cost of the article, but it was necessary for hon. Gentlemen to see the way in which this would operate. Let him take the case of the purchase of foreign materials of an article to be manufactured—cotton for instance—which on exportation had to enter into competition with the produce of foreign countries, the difference between the price of the raw material, and of the manufactured article, would be the return for labour, interest of capital, and profit. Therefore, to compete with the foreigner they might have to make an improvement in their machinery, and in that case the production might not be reduced. They had reduced the number of working hours from seventy-six to sixty-nine without decreasing the amount exported. In 1816 there were 10,000,000 lbs. of cotton twist exported; and in 1843, after the reduction in the number of hours, there were 130,000,000 lbs. In 1832, in factories where thousands of persons were employed, the average rate of wages for every person—man, woman, and child—was from 9s. 6d. to 12s. a head. He had got a return from the same factories of the number employed in 1844, and he found that the average rate of wages was nearly the same—perhaps it was a little more than the rate of 1832. The work and the wages, too, of the factory workmen were more regular than were those of any other class of labour; and if there was any loss of profit, it was a loss which fell upon the master and not upon the operative. It was not so with many other kinds of labour. With respect, for instance, to the handloom weavers; they were a class whose occupation was not carried on in factories, and one man ran down another and decreased the amount of wages; but the same was not the case in factories, where the wages of all employed must rise and fall together, and the result was, that there was very little fluctuation in the amount of wages of the operatives. In his opinion, there ought to be one uniform time for the work of all engaged in factories where machinery was used—and he was, for his own part, persuaded that that course alone would really operate for the benefit of the workmen; for if one portion of the mills were to work short time, and the other portion to work for a different period, it would be productive of great mischief. He did trust that no person under twenty-one years of age would be allowed to work for a greater number of hours than that named in the noble Lord's Amendment. The calculation to which he had referred just now was, that the duty on the raw material of cotton was equivalent to the amount of any reduction of wages that might take place, and that six-sixteenths of a penny per pound would cover such reduction as might take place in wages by the operation of a ten hours instead of a twelve hours' Bill. But he did not believe that, in reality, wages would be reduced—and, even if they were, let it not be forgotten that the operatives worked for the bread-tax—and if they could not compete with the foreigner without that tax being taken off, as well as the tax upon cotton, those taxes must be removed. He thought that the Legislature would feel it was their duty to remove those burthens that pressed upon the manufacturing interests; and then, if they would only come forward and pass an uniform and effective Bill, he was persuaded it would give the greatest satisfaction to the manufacturing classes generally, and that the people would be prosperous, contented, and happy. He should, with these observations, vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord

Lord J. Manners assured the Committee that it had been his intention to have given a silent, though by no means an indifferent vote in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord; but in the early part of this debate the hon. Member for Manchester had thrown out such a challenge to him that he felt himself bound, in fair play and generosity, to rise and answer that challenge; and he begged to assure the hon. Member that if he had hitherto refrained from giving the House what he was pleased to call the benefit of his experience and observation upon this question, it was because he had not thought that anything he could add to the subject would be worthy of being intruded upon their attention, and that in private he had never hesitated to give that fair description of the great manufactories which he was now prepared to give in public. The hon. Member had asked him, and those hon. Gentlemen who had accompanied him on the tour he had made in the manufacturing districts, if they had seen, in the course of it, what would bear out the harrowing descriptions and details which had been brought before the House by the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. He had pleasure in saying that they had not. But, if he might be permitted to draw a general description of what they did see, he should say that the general characteristic of the districts they had visited was a small town (if he might so term it) of well-built cottages, those cottages of two stories in height, with two rooms on each story, with large windows, plenty of furniture, capacious back-yards, and a plentiful supply of coals and water—their occupants paying, on an average, 3s. a-week for rent, which in general, he believed, was stopped out of their wages. They saw signs of much discipline and supervision exercised over the occupants, every shop being licensed by the mill-owner, and every one being dependant upon him for the exercise of his calling. With respect to the workpeople themselves, he agreed with what had been stated by the noble Lord the Member for Lancashire (Lord F. Egerton) the other evening, as to the impossibility of mere tourists arriving at any very sound conclusion upon that part of the subject—because it was unquestionable that an appearance of health might exist without the reality of it—and ruddy cheeks might be the result of excitement, as well as of health. With this caution, however, he had no hesitation in saying that the general appearance of the young women in the manufacturing districts he had visited in the course of his tour, had struck him as being healthy. He believed, too, that, in reference to wages, the amount was nearly uniform, and that it averaged about 9s. or 10s. a head, man, woman, and child—and that thus, taking them by families, 30s. a-week was about the average receipt of the combined inmates of each of these cottages, an amount sufficiently ample to secure them the comforts and conveniences they require. He had come to the conclusion that these comforts and conveniences were at the disposal of the manufacturing population of the large establishments. He would now proceed to answer a question which the hon. Member had put to him of a more particular kind. The hon. Member had asked him whether he had had any talk with any of those workpeople who had gone from the rural into the manufacturing districts. He found, in a brief note he had taken at the time, the following memorandum:—In one cottage they had entered, they found a woman with ten children where she came, and having asked her whether she would prefer to go back into the country districts, she laughed at the idea, and said, “No, not on any account.” This woman they had found, he ought to add, cooking for herself and family a meal of beef and potatoes. He had now, he thought, fairly replied to the challenge which had been thrown out to him by the hon. Member—and he had done so with the more pleasure because it had enabled him, at the same time, to pay a deserved tribute of praise to the conduct of the large and wealthy manufacturers whom they had visited—and of offering a few observations in support of the proposal of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire—against which proposal he did not think that the tribute he had paid to the manufacturers at all militated. For what was that proposal, and what the allegation? The proposal was, to limit labour to ten hours a day, and the allegation, that the consequence of working the mothers of families for twelve hours a day was that inversion of nature which was so injurious to the physical and moral condition of the working population. He believed that the statements of the noble Lord were correct—and that the instances which he (Lord J. Manners) had produced, which seemed to bear out a contrary proposition, were chiefly to be met with in the larger country establishments—whereas the noble Lord’s descriptions related principally to the condition of the factory population in the great manufacturing towns—he was sure that he himself and those who had travelled with him, had seen side by side with the prosperity of Turton enough of the misery of Bolton, to make him believe that the same county may easily at the same time, “bloom a garden and a grave.” Let the question, then, be divested of all extraneous matter, and what did it come to? Were the Representatives of the people of England of opinion that twelve hours, instead of ten, were a fitting duration for the day’s labour of English matrons and young children? But was the question, and the solution of it seemed to him easy; but then came the hon. Members for Manchester, Stockport, and the rest, and pleaded two propositions in bar; first, that the commerce and manufactures of this great Empire would be destroyed, unless these mothers and children were allowed to work twelve hours a day; and, in the next place, that the wages of the work-people would be reduced. But with something like indignation, and with something like contempt, he begged to ask, was this possible? That the commerce of this great Kingdom was dependent on longer toil by two hours than it was fitting for man to endure! Yes! that will be the confession made by the rejection of the noble Lord's proposal? It was saying to this country—it was affirming in the face of all Europe—that the whole secret of our vast manufacturing power lay in the one hour before sunrise, and in the one hour after sunset, which we snatched from the poor people of England. And this too, after all they had heard of the iniquity of protection! This, then, was the protection they would declare to be necessary for their manufacturing interests? He should rather have imagined that the protection of their manufactures existed in the exemption of machinery from taxation. He should have rather imagined that it existed in the power of a manufacturer to assemble round his dwelling any number of people he pleased, to make addition to his wealth by means of that machinery, if trade were brisk; and who, if trade were dull, would have no claim upon that wealth which they contributed to swell. He should have imagined it to consist in the fact of the very rooms in which that machinery worked, and of that machinery itself, paying nothing to the relief of the poor, or towards the burthens of the State—but now it seemed that the only species of protection which was looked upon as essential, consisted in the over-working of mothers and infant children. He did not believe—he could not believe it; but if it were indeed so, then he must state his sincere conviction, that be their legislation what it might, though they might continue for a short time, a protection of this wholly indefensible nature, they might depend upon it they would not be able to maintain it long. Neither did he think that such a protection would be worth maintaining. Again, as to the allegation about the effect of this proposed reduction of the hours of labour upon wages. They were told that it would create a reduction in wages to the extent of 25 per cent. But he would remark, that if this allegation were true, on the face of it, it would completely annihilate the other, for not even the most devoted free trader would be prepared to assert, that with a reduction of 25 per cent. in the wages, competition with the foreigner is impossible under a ten hours' Bill. His opponents then must make choice of the one bugbear, or the other, for employed together they would eliminate each other. But he had too high an opinion of the humanity of our great English manufacturers to believe that such would be the case. He could not help feeling that on the contrary, there would be no necessity for such a result—and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite to put to himself this question—whether he really believed that the three or four hundred master manufacturers who had signed petitions in favour of the proposal of the noble Lord below him contemplated any such reduction in the amount of the operatives wages, or whether the hon. Members for Stockport, Manchester, or Durham themselves contemplated any such result? He could not believe that those who had expressed themselves in favour of this proposal had done so with the idea that it would produce the fearful results that had been predicted of its operation. He believed, on the contrary, that the Committee might justly and wisely, because humanely, accede to the proposition of the noble Lord. To that proposal he (Lord J. Manners) gave his cordial and unqualified support—with no lingering regret, however, as some appeared to have done, that it infringed upon the principle of non-interference with the free exercise of labour, but because he believed that the great inquest of the nation was called upon to legislate on this question—and because, if they did not legislate upon it, and in this spirit, the hour was near at hand when they would cease to be, not only in deed and reality, but in very name and theory the representatives of the people of England. On these grounds it was that he had voted on a former night; on these grounds he should so vote again; and he must be allowed to ask whether the decision that was come to the other night did necessitate some far stronger reasons than were then offered to the Committee, before it should now reject the noble Lord's proposal? Sir, said the noble Lord, in conclusion, there may have been, in the opinion of some, a doubt as to the prudence of the decision of a former night. Can there now be any doubt as to the madness of reversing it? By that decision you told the toiling people of England that party difference or indifference to this question was at an end, and that the Legislature was prepared to interfere in behalf of labour—to interfere for the shirt maker of London—for the poor workman of the metropolis, and in behalf of want and poverty wherever they are to be found throughout the broad Kingdom of England, as well as in favour of the operative spinners of cotton and of flax. By that decision, you caused joy and smiles to prevail where, before, was nothing but despair—and yet that decision you now propose to reverse. You then held out to the parched lips of toil and neglect the cup of hope—will you now dash it to the ground untasted? I would entreat this House, I would implore this Committee, to reflect for a moment on what has occurred during the last three years. Have you learnt nothing from the manufacturing insurrection in the north—have you learnt nothing from the agrarian rebellion in Wales—nothing from the indifference with which your labourers in Cambridgeshire and elsewhere regard your flaming homesteads, and fired corn-ricks? Do all these things teach you nothing? Methinks, when the storm does arise, and the waves of anarchy begin to break upon the barriers of the Constitution, and when all you hold dear and value shall be swept away in the general desolation a poor consolation it will be to you to reflect that such a melancholy result has arisen from your refusal to interfere in behalf of the over-worked labourer who toils beyond human endurance at the manufactures of England, albeit that refusal may be in accordance with the strictest canons of political economy.

Mr. Ward said, they had been told by the noble Lord that, although they might doubt the prudence of the decision to which the House had come the other night, there could be no doubt of the madness of reversing it; but did the noble Lord recollect the interests which this decision involved, and if they tampered with these interests, without the most pressing necessity,—if they dealt with them without seeing their way clearly, could any madness be equal to that? He had doubted whether he ought to reply to the noble Lord, for the first half of the noble Lord's facts bore against his own conclusion. The results of the noble Lord's experience were most favourable to the manufacturing system, and disproved the universal misery which it was charged with producing. The noble Lord said that the population lived in good houses, and had comforts which were out of the reach of the agricultural labourer. That they were all in full health, and that their wages were uniformly on an average of 9s. or 10s. a-head, and this in those places which the hon. Member for Knaresborough was in the habit of representing as a Pandemonium to which labourers were removed from their Buckinghamshire Paradise. The wife of one of these agricultural emigrants was cooking beef for the children, which the agricultural labourers never tasted in Buckinghamshire. The noble Lord, however, had suppressed an answer which, as he understood, he had received from another of these misguided, and deceived, emigrants from the agricultural districts, who told him that "he would rather be transported than go back." In short, if he had not heard the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, which certainly had shown them how much inconsistency could be compressed into a single speech; he should have thought the noble Lord's speech the most inconsistent speech ever delivered, for after disproving all the facts on which the necessity for interfering at all with the Factory System was defended, he came to what he called a just and humane conclusion, which struck at the root of the whole of the comfort and happiness the noble Lord had himself described. Amidst the differences which this question had created—and he had never known a question in that House which had provoked so many differences—it might, perhaps, be something new if he ventured to mention one or two points on which they were all agreed. They were all agreed that there was a great pressure upon the labouring population—not confined to one class of manufactures, he could show its existence to a great extent in the town which he represented—that all were over-worked; and that the stern necessity of living induced this condition of the people, compelling the children almost universally to be called to labour too early, and forced to labour too long a time; so that there was not time for education, for wholesome recreation, or for religious and moral instruction. They did not want Dr. Bisset Hawkins to tell them that it would be better for children, or that it would be better for all classes, to work ten hours instead of twelve. They did not want Mr. Horner to tell them that all classes of the population were overwrought. There was no doubt of this. They did not want to be told that they were not free agents. Who was a free agent?—or that their social and moral condition would be better if they laboured only ten hours;—or that excessive labour tended to debase human nature, and to prevent acquirements. He admitted the evil as fully as any advocate of a ten hours Bill; and sitting there as the Representative of one of the largest working men's communities, he would not consent to be twitted with any heartlessness, or indifference, to their sufferings because he did not concur in the remedy proposed. He, and those who thought with him, were called Doctrinaires, Utilitarians, and Theorists, but he held on the contrary that they were the Theorists who thought they could alter by Act of Parliament the conditions of life which pressed hardly, and harshly, on the population of this country. The noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire told them that he had urged this measure in former years; that the present expectations in the operatives were moderate; that they were prepared to expect a fall in their wages; and the hon. Member for Northampton said, that small wages would be a premium upon the morality of the working classes. He gave them the statistics of the poor—he spoke of the way in which a married woman, and a single woman, conceived that the cost of their living would be affected respectively by the changes to be introduced. But he (Mr. Ward) feared that little faith was to be placed in such calculations. He regarded the decision of Monday night as a most unfortunate one: it had awakened and given an impulse to wishes, and feelings, and hopes, that no reasonable man should ever encourage. It had given an immense impulse to the Chartist feeling of the country, associated as it was—and nobody knew it better than the hon. Member for Knaresborough—with the idea of the power of that House to regulate labour and capital; and which he (Mr. Ward) believed to be most mischievous. He had seen all the theories, which he had heard in the course of this debate, advocated strongly by Mr. Feargus O'Connor and Mr. Oastler; and he must tell his noble Friends near him, the Members for the City of London, and for Sunderland, that nothing had given him so much grief as to see such fallacious doctrines clothed with the authority of their respected names. He was bound to say what he thought. The noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland, whose opinions he had hitherto held to be most clear on these points, had certainly advocated doctrines which he had never heard advocated before by men, whose opinions he for one had regarded as too ridiculous to be seriously discussed. Look too at the contradictions in which the advocates of the present measures had involved themselves. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton told them that ten hours were better than twelve—that the present system was prejudicial to morals, and religion, and education; but he began his speech by saying that he was opposed to all interference with any kind of labour—with adult labour in particular; and then he concluded by saying, he was going to vote for the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. He seemed to think it a matter of trifling consideration, when he asked him how the population in the manufacturing districts was to be fed? He said, no man could actually starve, and appealed to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department to confirm his statement. Improved health and moral vigour, he thought, preferable to high wages; and these blessings he seriously preferred to the operatives in the factory districts, than to sink, in what the hon. Member for Knaresborough would call the Union Bastiles. If this were not his hon. Friend's meaning, he supposed they were to go back to the system of out of door relief. His hon. Friend afterwards said he wished every man to earn as good wages as he could, and he thought that a slight curtailment of the hours of labour would not materially affect the wages of the manufacturing population as a class. Upon that question—the question of wages—he must entreat the Committee to recollect what it was they had to deal with—to recollect that the home trade of this country, upon which he knew some hon. Gentlemen opposite relied, would be totally insufficient to supply the gap, that would be created by the slightest Legislative Act that would affect our foreign trade. They had been told by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government that out of the export trade of 50,000,000*l.*, 36,000,000*l.* belonged to these trades, which it was now proposed to interfere with. If they tampered with, if they added to these vast interests the proposed reduction in the hours of labour, to the burthens which already pressed upon the manufacturing interest—such as the duties on the raw material—the absolute monopoly which existed in this country on food—and he only rated it at the price of the agriculturists themselves—he would say, if to this they added the additional burthen of this ten hours Bill, a gap would be created which no new manufacturers would step forward to fill up. Once cut off an amount of production equivalent to seven weeks in the year, and how did they think it was to be filled up? It was said there would be fresh labourers employed under this ten hours Bill. He doubted that fact; he doubted whether any one would be found to build new mills upon so precarious a tenure; for they must recollect that they were told that this ten hours Bill was but the first step in this kind of legislation. The noble Lord who had just spoken had said, that when they had dealt with the factories by limiting labour, they must legislate for other classes in a similar spirit. They must be prepared to take up the trades of London, in which female industry was so fearfully overtaxed, the iron trade, and many other branches of manufacture. He could point out towns engaged in the iron manufacture which left the alleged immorality of the cotton mills far behind. If they held, that the working classes would be as well off, and would receive the same amount of wages when the hours of labour were reduced, the argument amounted to this, that they might reduce them not only from twelve or fourteen, as at present, to ten or eight, but even to one hour daily. There was evidence in abundance, to prove that within three months of the passing of this Bill, the workmen expected to get the same amount for ten hours that they now got for twelve hours. This was the operative theory upon the subject. They thought that if they produced less, there would be increased competition on what they did produce, and that the manufacturer getting a higher price for a smaller quantity of goods, would be able to give higher wages to his men. They said that this would be an advantage to the community at large, for that if the same demand for goods continued as existed then, it would call more labour into employment; and if, with labour restricted to ten hours, full employment was not given, the period might be reduced to eight, as it was better that all should work for eight hours than that some should not be able to work at all. But who would invest their capital in new mills upon such terms? No one: and then our foreign competitors would step in to fill up the gap which we had ourselves created. The hon. Member for Ashton (Mr. Hindley) thought, that as we had taught the world to overwork itself, we ought to set the generous example of showing them that they ought to restrict the hours of labour; but he (Mr.

Ward) feared that the Universal Peace Society, of which the hon. Member was also President, would prove quite as feasible a scheme, as the attempt to persuade Foreigners not to take advantage of every restriction in British industry. And what would be the consequence if they did? He recollected, in a work attributed to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the President of the Board of Trade, a year or two ago, that the depression, and the misery which this country was enduring in the midst of high civilization, and universal peace, were traced to a diminution in our foreign exports, amounting to not more than one-fifteenth as compared with 1841. The writer said it was the paralysis of our foreign trade that was the cause of the paralysis at home, with all its fearful accompaniments, and yet the decrease was only one-fifteenth. He had no wish to trespass at any length upon the House, and his only apology for the time he had occupied was the strong sentiments which he entertained as to the importance of the question under discussion. He would admit, that to reverse the decision which they had come to the other night would have its disadvantages; but he trusted that if the House of Commons saw that it must prove most perilous to the manufacturing population, it would not shrink from doing what he believed to be its bounden duty to all. The theories which were now afloat, and which were encouraged by the highest sanction of the press, coupled with this unfortunate vote—for so he regarded it—were calculated to reverse all ideas of the proper relation between labour, and capital in this country, and to give an impression of the powers of that House which no act of that House could ever realise. He found the Government accused by those journals which usually supported it, of bringing the Queen's name into contempt by standing between Her Majesty and the boon, which she would so willingly grant to the women, and children in the manufacturing districts by reducing to a reasonable standard the daily labour of her sex and their offspring. Was there a man who believed that the Queen could do this? Was there a man, who believed but that there was a necessity that overruled them, and prevented them from doing it? If the noble Lord in his present view was right, and the Member for London had continued ten years in power, without diminishing the hours of labour, he was responsible for all that the women and children of this country had endured since he first came into office. If he (Mr. Ward) thought that the period of labour could be reduced without an injury to our trade, and a diminution of wages, he would at once not only support a ten hours' Bill, but, as an amends for past neglect, he would go to an eight, or a six hours' Bill at once, and give the people the means of earning their livelihood upon easier terms than their boldest advocates now proposed. But they must not stop there. They must not confine the boon to the Factory Districts. What did they mean to do with the agricultural population? He knew something of them—he had seen the wretched shifts to which their miserable families were reduced—he had seen their joy when the sun shone on a winter's day because they could not afford fire—for they seldom saw fires in the cottages of the central districts of the kingdom. Could they leave these poor creatures, who were living on the smallest pittance, in their present state? Yes, the noble Lord would say, because they did not pretend to interfere with wages. But they would be, in fact, doing so, if they imagined that they could reduce the hours of labour without decreasing wages. What was it that drove men to the necessity of overworking themselves and their children? The struggle for bread. Could they find no means of relieving their destitution? He thought he could, but the supporters of the Corn Law could not; and yet the noble Lord taunted him with inhumanity—not personally, because he could not speak unkindly to any one—but he assumed a sort of superior humanity in that House, which he would venture to say many of his countrymen would regard as extremely suspicious, so long as they saw him voting for a measure, which had a direct tendency to increase the price of their food. They must not mince these matters—they must not let one side of the House have more claims to humanity than the other. He believed he could show the noble Lord more suffering amongst the working classes, arising from the Corn Laws, which, as he had said before, raised up, as it were, a wall of brass between the people of the town he represented (Sheffield) and their food; more misery, he repeated, could be shown as resulting from this, than from any other cause. He did not accuse the noble Lord and hon. Members opposite of inhumanity, but he would not be taunted with heartless indifference towards those whom he represented. The right, hon. Baronet opposite had gratified him by admitting that in principle the restriction of adult female labour was indefensible. One of the greatest exaggerations which the noble Lord had committed, was contained in his statement with reference to the employment of married females. If anything was susceptible of proof it was that the number of married women employed in factories was very small. In Mr. Ashworth's mills it was proved that there was only one in 800. He had now stated his opinions. It was the interest of the working classes to which he was looking in the vote that he should give, for the capitalist would take care of himself; but so strongly was he convinced, that in the course which he was taking, he should but serve the real interests of them whom he represented, that he would not mind vacating his seat next week, confident that he should convince his constituents that he had consulted their interests by opposing any Legislative interference with their free arguing as working men.

Sir R. Inglis said Her Majesty's Ministers had proposed a Bill which, right or wrong, was regarded as right by almost all their opponents, and which was regarded as wrong by almost all their supporters. The most experienced Member of the House of Commons could hardly recollect such a discussion as the present, in which Her Majesty's Ministers found themselves in opposition to about 97 out of those who on almost every other occasion gave them their unhesitating confidence; and, with the exception of the hon. Member for Clitheroe, almost every Member who had risen behind the Ministerial benches had uttered strong denunciations against them, whilst on the other side three hon. Gentlemen had risen together to the rescue. He alluded to the hon. Member for Sheffield, the hon. Member for King's County, and another hon. Gentleman, all of whom rose at the same time as he believed to support Her Majesty's Ministers. He certainly was correct in his opinion as to the hon. Member for Sheffield, and he believed he was not wrong with respect to the other hon. Members. The proposition which the Committee were called upon to affirm was substantially this;—Whether they would rescind a solemn decision which had already been come to; not suddenly, but after an adjourned debate; to which a larger majority gave their support than the late Government had during the last year of its existence—a decision which Her Majesty's Ministers thought proper to assist an hon. Member opposite in endeavouring to contravene. He believed that according to the ordinary practice of the House the decision on the word "six" in one line of a Clause would be considered as binding for the rest of the Clause, and when he remembered that a second division took place after about thirty members had retired, he could not but complain on the part of the independent Members that an attempt was made to stultify the previous decision. It was true that in the case of the malt tax a preceding Government pursued a similar course. They thought it desirable that an impost, amounting to 5,000,000*l.*, which was essential to the maintenance of the public credit, should not be sacrificed without any previous consideration. Lord Althorp complained that the House had been taken by surprise, and proposed to rescind the resolution; but he warned the right hon. Baronet now at the head of Her Majesty's Government to beware of following such an example. The question now was not whether the poor should have a pot of porter the fractional part of a halfpenny cheaper, but whether the House had not encouraged hundreds of thousands to expect a certain remission of their labour under the authority of a formal decision of the House; and he would ask whether it would be safe, whether it would be consistent, he might almost ask, whether it would be decent, to dash the cup of hope from their lips? He had this morning received, along with the other Members who supported the proposition of the noble Lord the other night, addresses from the workpeople of Leeds, Bradford, Keighley, Huddersfield, Dewsbury, Ashton, Bolton, Manchester, and some other places, thanking the House for the vote to which it had come on Monday night last; and he could not read some of those addresses without feeling a deep sympathy with those whose hopes would be so fearfully disappointed if the Government should succeed in carrying their proposition. The people of Leeds said they gave their joyous and hearty thanks to the 179 Members of the House of Commons, and above all, to his noble Friend, Lord Ashley, for the part he had taken: he felt it an honour to call the noble Lord his friend. He had listened with deep attention to the statistics with which he had commenced the present discussion. He believed the triumph of last Monday had fixed the fate of the Bill, and he would tell his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, who had led the House for the last two years and a half, that, whoever might fill that post, whether his right hon. Friend, or the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, or his noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire, that the Bill was virtually carried. His right hon. Friend might postpone its operation by rescinding the previous vote, but he, looking at the appearance of the Committee, trusted that his right hon. Friend would be disappointed in the attempt. Whether successful or defeated let not the Government deceive themselves with the expectation that they must ultimately triumph, when there was such a manifestation of public opinion and public principle arrayed against them. On the last occasion when they were engaged in a conflict with their own supporters,—it was on the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill of last session—he then told them respectfully, but firmly, that they would be compelled to relinquish that Bill, and urged them not to endeavour to drag their supporters through the dirt, inasmuch as a portion of that dirt must stick to themselves. He would tell them now most respectfully, but with a deep conviction on his part, that although their opposition to the measure of his noble Friend might meet with a temporary success, yet in the course of another year or two they would be compelled either to come forward as they had done in the case of the Ecclesiastical Courts, with a Bill totally different from the former one, or with a Bill embodying nearly all the propositions which his noble Friend had endeavoured in vain to recommend to their notice. Adopt them they must, but in the meantime they would lose all the grace of concession, and expose their fellow subjects to the bitter disappointment of seeing their hope suspended for one or two years more. Let them recollect that they were dealing with the bodies and the souls of their fellow-men; because, one of the consequences of the present state of things was, that no time was allowed for education, and that their Sundays were necessarily devoted to repose only, after the severe labours of the week. He had listened attentively to the speeches of the right hon. Baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government and the hon. and learned Member for Clitheroe, but did not find anything in them that did not apply, at least, as strongly to the existing law. The hon. Member for Sheffield would not interfere with labour at all. The noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire interfered with labour, but on principle. The question, however, as to principle, was really carried, and it only remained to be seen whether it would be reduced to practice in 1844 or 1846. Such was the modification proposed by his noble Friend of his original proposition, that if there were a fallacy in his principle, or an error in his conclusions, the power of correcting either remained in their hands, as the measure would not take effect until the 10th of October, 1844, when the hours of labour would be limited to eleven; and the minimum would not be attained until the 10th of October, 1846. During that period, if the House discovered they had committed, through their humanity or excursive benevolence, any such error in their political economy as would require them again to interfere, for the sake of their pounds, shillings, and pence, they would have still the power of retracing their steps and removing the evil. He was convinced that there was no danger by a diminution of wages when it was accompanied by an increase of the physical comforts of the people, wages might be less on any given day, yet more, taking the year together, by being equally distributed, instead of there being occasionally great want of employment. He might take higher ground in support of his view, but he did not think it necessary to do so, inasmuch as he thought he had made out his case, and that the labourers in cotton factories would derive more advantage from the diminution of labour proposed than they would from the two hours extra pay. It was admitted on all hands that the last two hours' labour was the least profitable to the master, and the factory statistics proved that it was within the last two hours that accidents to the children most frequently happened. On that account alone he considered the limitation proposed by his noble Friend desirable, because it seemed clear, if the hours of labour were diminished the repetition of these frightful calamities, which caused often the loss of valuable life, and more frequently a race of deformed beings, would be prevented. Those who supported the proposition of his noble Friend were taunted, and on high authority, with the sufferings of the agricultural population, and it was even said, that women were to be found, during the inclement season of winter, labouring in the fields for six or seven hours a day, without the power of obtaining in the wettest weather a change of clothes. He certainly was not aware of this, and he would ask any one, in or out of the House, to point out, if they could, in what county of England women were to be found during the winter labouring in the fields for six or seven hours a day. Without regarding the thing as impossible, he had never heard of it. But whether the sufferings of the agricultural population were great or small, this at least he could say, that they had not the same means of obtaining redress for those sufferings as the labourers employed in the factories. It was in the power of that House to stop the great machines by which the operations of the factories were carried on, and if they exercised that power, they could, of course, regulate the labour of those by whom the operations of these great machines were conducted. The House, therefore, had a power in this case, which they had not in reference to the agricultural labourers of either Dorsetshire or Bedfordshire, and one result of exercising the power they possessed was, that in the ratio they diminished labour they would increase the time for acquiring moral and religious instruction. There was no legislation applicable to the agricultural labourers; but it was different in the case of factory labourers. Having on a former occasion stated his general notions on this subject to the House, he would say no more at present than to thank the House for the patience with which they had heard him.

Mr. C. Buller said that Her Majesty's Government intended that night, as they understood from the statement made on a former evening, to resort to the extreme step, on the eighth Clause, of making absolute nonsense of the Bill, by endeavouring to induce the House to nullify the decision which they came to the other night. He thought that they had a right to expect that the Government would at least have laid some ground for such a course by adducing such fresh arguments and information as might justify a change of opinion and vote. To his surprise, however, no Member of the Government had risen to advance a single argument in favour of the extraordinary and violent course proposed by it: and in coming to the discussion of the present evening, he found that he had to grapple with no single supporter from the other side of the course taken by the Government, except the hon. and learned Member for Clitheroe. He admitted that this was no easy task, after the able speech which they had heard, and the force with which the hon. Member had put forward his views. He was sure that he could not pay that hon. Gentleman a more effective compliment than by confessing that he had been betrayed into cheering the very arguments used by that hon. Gentleman in arguing against the opinion which he had felt himself called upon to adopt. His hon. Friend, the Member for Sheffield, had taken the same side, in a speech, which he must take the liberty of describing as not being quite so remarkable for the strength of argument, as for the strength of the language which he chose to apply to all those who differed from the opinion which his hon. Friend had adopted. His hon. Friend appeared exceedingly hurt, as well he might be, at the notion that he and the other supporters of the Government plan should be thought less humane and considerate than the supporters of the noble Lord's Amendment; and very sensitive as to any language that tended to countenance such a supposition. He certainly did not believe that his hon. Friend, or those with whom he voted, cared less for the interests of humanity and justice, than the supporters of the Amendment; but when he gave his hon. Friend credit for the utmost humanity in his vote for twelve hours, he thought he might fairly ask him to give those who ventured to hold a different opinion credit for some little share of common sense. He felt, however, that the vote which he had given the other night was one which required explanation. He would at once admit that the vote which had been come to by the majority the other night was fraught with most important consequences. It must produce great effects, for good or evil, on the condition of a great mass of the people. If the majority were wrong, undoubtedly its vote would interfere most seriously with the great staple industry of the country, with our main foreign export, with the employment of capital, and with the subsistence of a large portion of the population. But if, on the other hand, the majority was, as he believed it to be, right, then it might take credit to itself for effectually grappling with a mischief of the most pernicious character, a mischief which if not grappled with, and the Government would not grapple with it, threatened to be productive of very dangerous consequences. If the view of the majority was sound and wise, it would be the first great step in a bold and new course of legislation, adopted with a view of alleviating great moral and physical suffering, and of averting national dangers which their old principles of legislation were not calculated to deal with, but which, if not dealt with, must peril the peace, institutions, morality, and greatness of the country. When he voted with the noble Lord, he deliberately adopted a new and bold principle of legislation. He exposed himself to the charge which was thrown out against all who voted with the majority, that they were voting against all principle; for he voted, he was quite aware, against the principle on which legislation on these matters had hitherto been conducted; a legislation which, while it contented itself with protecting the property of the rich, shrunk from giving its protection to the poor, left the helpless to take care of themselves, and paid no attention to the revolutions which the progress of time brings about in the social condition of nations. New evils require new remedies. A new social state, such as that of England had become in the present century, required new principles of legislation. Could it be said that this was a view of the matter in which no thinking man concurred with him? He would venture to say that no unprejudiced man who looked at the alteration which had been operated, in the course of the last century, in the social condition of the people of this country, could contemplate that alteration without feelings of apprehension. A hundred years ago the great mass of the working people of this country were agricultural, with little community of interest, scattered over the country, without any means of intercommunication, without intelligence, without any idea or capacity of acting in concert, without any power of combination, and entirely influenced by institutions, feelings, and habits which taught them implicitly to act under the guidance of those to whom they had been accustomed to look up with hereditary awe, and, he might add, with hereditary attachment. At that period the population of the towns was limited, and the manufacturing portion were principally skilled artizans, who got high wages, were possessed of great intelligence, and were well able to protect themselves. What was the case now? Millions, he might say, of men had collected together for the first time, in certain limited spaces; millions, not skilled artizans, but men carrying on, in their several classes, some one particular branch of industry, which they practised from the first moment at which they could work, till they could work no longer,—the great mass of them, in fact, just as unskilled as the rudest agricultural labourer. Thus large masses of unskilled, needy, impoverished labourers were collected together, subjected to terrible privations and discomforts from their very agglomeration;—from the same cause almost at the mercy of their employers;—and from the same cause ready and apt to combine for mischief. Was this a state of things which Parliament could regard with satisfaction? Was it a good state of things? Was it better for the working people? Was it better for the rest of the community? What was the physical condition of these unfortunate people thus collected together? Was it a satisfactory one? He would not go into any lengthened details, but let him simply ask the House to remember what had been shown to be the comparative duration of life in Manchester, for instance, and in the county of Wilts, an agricultural district. In Wiltshire the average duration of life was thirty-three years: in Manchester, it was only seventeen. He did not mean to say that this difference in the duration of human life sprung solely or mainly from the nature of factory labour: but it clearly must arise from the circumstances taken all together, under which that labour was carried on in the great towns. Now, it could not be doubted that the evils of this physical condition were calculated to grow worse in every succeeding generation. A people whose life was reduced to one half of the usual average of the labouring class by no accident, no sudden disaster, no chance epidemic, but by the constant action of circumstances unfavourable to health and longevity, were not likely to propagate a vigorous and healthy race. He thought that no legislature could view with indifference a state of things that thus shortened human life, and tended to deteriorate the species. In some respects, no doubt, the factory labourer was better off than other unskilled labourers. But he did think that there were circumstances in that kind of labour that tended to the injury of health. The mere temperature in which they worked must tend to this result. There were these poor people working for hours and hours together all day long in an Indian temperature, and then turned out to go home and sleep in a northern climate. Nor was their social and moral condition at all satisfactory. No man could venture to say that they were properly educated. No man could say that their religious wants were properly attended to. No man could say that their moral condition was wholesome or natural. The mode of employment was such as to subvert all the ordinary relations of the sexes as to labour; the women and children did the hard work, the men occupied themselves with the household duties. The women and the children supported the men by their hard labour; though every one must admit that nothing could be of greater importance than that women should be limited to the discharge of their own proper functions. The political bearings of this state of things called for earnest consideration; for it could not but be acknowledged that the number of people thus collected together, with manifold subjects of complaint, with great facilities for combination, with no attachment, as a rule, to their employers, in a condition eminently open to the machinations of agitators—were circumstances fraught with much danger to the country, unless a speedy and effectual remedy was applied. Those who might shrink from the taunt of being actuated by mere humanity would find plenty of justification for legislating on this subject on grounds of mere interest. It was the interest of every friend of order and property to provide the remedy for a social state that could not continue without danger to both. And in looking for a remedy, it was consolatory to think that in the very circumstances which excited alarm there was one counterbalancing advantage. The very proximity of these masses of labouring population placed them more completely under the control and direction of Government, and afforded greater facilities for applying the various remedies which were needed—for properly organising these people, guiding them by religion, bettering them by education, restraining them by police, ensuring their comforts by sanitary regulations, and checking the growth of mischievous social habits among them by legislative interference. It was their duty to do so if they regarded their welfare—their policy to do so if they looked to their own safety. They had neglected the calls of duty and policy—they had allowed this vast population to grow up with the scanty provision for religious guidance which the chances of the old parochial division of several centuries ago had furnished—with the schooling which sectarian competition supplied—in such dwellings as the caprice or avarice of builders and ground-landlords ran up for them; and they had allowed, without any attempt at interference, the growth of that monstrous subversion of the ordinary relations of society which pervaded the whole labouring population of these towns. There was no thinking man that was not appalled at this state of things, and the prospect of its unchecked tendency. It is not a mere question of sentiment. Political economists did not regard it with unmixed complacency. Even Mr. McCulloch, no sentimentalist, shook his head, and confessed that the growth of huge masses of manufacturing population was a source of alarm. But he only shook his head and confessed his fears: he suggested no remedy. His noble Friend ventured to grapple with the peril. One frightful, acknowledged evil he saw, and asked them to check, by preventing the weakness of youth and sex from being worked more than the usual period required for the labour of strong men in all other branches of industry in this country. He asked nothing more. He said ten hours' labour is the usual day's labour of grown-up men in this country. There is one immense branch of industry in which poverty and competition have compelled women and young persons to work more than this. Step in and aid them; and prohibit their working more than the full day's labour of men. Even if this prohibition should prevent men doing so, still prevent this mischief; and it would be no great evil if even the adult male cotton-spinner were indirectly prevented from overworking himself. The Government trembled at this proposal. They forgot the mischiefs of our present state—the perils of the future; they shrank from change; and dignified their inertness by the high sounding name of adherence to principle. But he would say these were among the fallacious pretexts by which selfish wealth had always showed its indifference to the well-being of the poor—by which incapable legislators had sought to rid themselves of the duties of Government. Such he conceived to be the importance of the object which the noble Lord sought to attain. His measure would reduce the toil of women and young persons within the limits of the usual day's labour of men in this country. It would tend to the improvement of their health: leave them more, though by no means enough of time, for education, household duties, and relaxation; and check the present disposition to the use of stimulants. His own expectation was that it would do this to a much greater extent than the mere amount provided by the Bill. He thought in all probability that it would at least in a great many mills induce the master to substitute the labour of men for that of young persons and women. It was known that vast proportions of the young men were now out of employ. They were told now by Mr. Horner that there are hundreds of young men working as piercers for less wages than those of young women. When you could no longer employ the women and young persons for twelve hours, what would be the difficulty of getting the unemployed, or those now employed at less wages to work for the higher wages now given to the women? The natural state of things would thus be restored, men would do the hard work, and women would be entirely left to their household duties. But, in many cases the limiting the labour of women and young persons, would undoubtedly limit the labour of all ages and all sexes. The mill would only go for ten hours. He must confess he thought this a very desirable result. He should like to see the workmen in our factories work no longer hours than the great body of labourers in the country. It was said that the opinion of practical men was altogether against the view of his noble Friend; but, with all respect for practical men, he was not always particularly inclined to take their opinions on matters affecting their own particular interests. They had always some paradise of a mill of their own or a friend's to bring up in proof that the particular complaint advanced was without foundation; there was always some statement that trade would not bear the weight of a single feather more, and the particular thing proposed to be done was invariably the feather which would bear down the scale. The present Bill, according to some of these practical men, was the feather which would bear down commerce. Comparisons every body agreed, were odious, but he could not help calling to mind that, in like manner, every measure which had been proposed for the removal of negro slavery had been objected to by a number of practical men, each of whom possessed some heaven on earth in the West Indies, whose negroes lived in the utmost happiness; and whether the proposal was to abolish the flogging of women, or the use of the cart whip in the field, it was always asserted by these practical authorities that that particular change would effect the ruin of the West Indian interest. He was ready to pay the utmost attention to the arguments and proofs adduced by practical men; but arguments and proofs he must require from them, for he would not be deterred by their mere vague assurances of the danger of interference. Nor was he much influenced by an argument, in terrorem, used by the right hon. Baronet, (Sir R. Peel), as to the consequences of interference to the extent proposed by the noble Lord. "If you do what you propose now," he said, "where will you stop? If you interfere with the cotton trade, you will interfere next with the screw-makers, the potteries, the button-makers, domestic servants, agricultural labourers, with all trades and businesses." He would at once inform the right hon. Baronet that, as far as he was concerned, his tendency would be to apply the same principle which the present Bill applied to factories, to every other case of a similar nature, up to the point at which he should be stopped by decided inconvenience, or absolute impossibility. Wherever the same interference would do more good than harm, he would interfere. Government themselves proposed to interfere with a twelve hours' limitation; his noble Friend, on precisely the same principle, thought ten hours a proper limit to factory labour. On the same principle, if there were any other branches of industry which Parliament could regulate as easily and safely as it could the labour in factories, he (Mr. C. Buller) would apply to them precisely the same principles as they applied to the factories. He did not know enough of the particular circumstances of the earthenware and button and screw manufactures to pledge himself as to the course which he would pursue with regard to them; but as far as he knew of them, he could not conceive why they were not subjected to the same regulations as were deemed applicable to factories. With regard to domestic servants, he did not think interference would be so beneficial as to counterbalance the immense evils of the domestic inquisition which it would necessitate. In some classes domestic servants might be overworked; but these did not comprise the great body of the class; and certainly gentlemen's servants were not a body whose sufferings excited much of his commiseration. Then with regard to agricultural labourers, they certainly were not generally overworked. In other respects they had much to complain of. They were too often ill-paid, ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-lodged; but Nature herself, the vicissitudes of night and day, prevented a general excess of out-door labour. As for the hard work in harvest, mentioned by the right hon. Baronet—who would complain if the long hours of labour in the factory prevailed only during two or three weeks of the year, when absolute necessity, arising from natural causes, required them, and if the labourer were stimulated to a brief occasional exertion by high pay, generous food, and the custom of the country, which made harvest a period of festivity, as well as of labour in common? But these, in fact, were the kind of terrors that were always held out to scare them from attempting anything for the benefit of the great body of the people. The wisest of men had said, "The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way: there is a lion in the street." He never saw such a man for lions as the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. He elevated every cat, or shadow of a cat, into a lion, and said, "For God's sake don't go along the street, or you'll be eaten up." But the two right hon. Baronets had advanced more substantial arguments against the amendment of the noble Lord. One of them had taken great pains to show that the proposed reduction of the hours of labour would exclude our manufactures from foreign markets; the other that it would occasion a large reduction of wages. These were arguments of a commercial nature, which the friends of humanity doubtless could not overlook; for if they were sound, they would be decisive against the humanity and justice of the noble Lord's amendment. There surely could be no real humanity in any attempt to better the condition of the labourer, that should end in depriving him of the means of earning his subsistence. But before he proceeded to discuss these two arguments separately, he must attempt to set them, and, if possible, the two right hon. Baronets who had made them, together by the ears. The one right hon. Baronet went upon the argument that the agreeing to the proposition of the noble Lord would prevent one main branch of our export trade from being able to meet foreign competition, in consequence of our manufacturers being compelled to raise the prices of their goods; the other right hon. Baronet said that prices would not be raised, but that wages would be lowered, to compensate for reduced profits, and that the labourers would be the sufferers. But these arguments could not both be correct; for one assumed that prices would, the other that they would not, be affected by the reduction of the hours of labour. The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had expressed much alarm at the prospect of the change raising prices and preventing our contending with foreigners in neutral markets. He had most impressively called the attention of the Committee to the magnitude of the export trade, which such a measure would effect, and the numbers dependent on it. These were considerations that could not be too strongly impressed on the House. The right hon. Baronet had then gone on to dwell on the danger of placing any restrictions on manufactures that would at all increase the difficulties of competition with foreign rivals. He hoped that these alarms of the right hon. Baronet, and these admissions, would be borne in mind in the next discussion on the Corn Laws. It was said that the reduction of the hours of labour from sixty-nine to sixty, would diminish one seventh of the labour in factories. He thought this might be disputed: he thought it very questionable whether the last two hours of a person's daily labour were equivalent to two hours of earlier labour. There was one curious fact which had been mentioned in private by an hon. Member who, by the way, voted against him, it was a fact connected with factories in Scotland; and it was so well worthy of attention in its bearing upon the question before them, that he felt it necessary to refer to it. The statement to which he referred was, that for the first fortnight after a period of rest and relaxation, the operatives in those factories produced ten per cent. more than at any other period of their employment. Indeed, could it be doubted that in the last two hours of the twelve in which persons might be employed in factories, there was less labour performed than in the other hours? He would, however, grant, for the sake of argument, that the reduction of produce would be proportioned to the reduction in the hours of labour. Let them calculate with precision what the effect would be. For this purpose, he should take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to a statement similar to that by means of which his hon. Friend the Member for Salford, who was one of those insane manufacturers that did not understand their own interests, had calculated the amount of that reduction. The calculation which the hon. Member for Salford had made as to the amount of the reduction agreed with the calculation in a pamphlet published by Mr. Kenworthy of Blackburn, a very large manufacturer, who rose from being himself an operative, who was now the partner of the hon. Member for Blackburn, and who was very well acquainted with the subject. The calculation was, that the cost of manufacturing a pound of raw cotton into a pound of yarn—that was not exact, for he was told that it required about nine pounds of raw cotton to make eight pounds of cotton yarn; but as it would be seen that the difference would tell in favour of his argument, he was justified in omitting it for the sake of simplicity;—the cost of manufacturing a pound of raw cotton into a pound of yarn, No. 36, was at the highest 3d. Now, they said that the diminishing the hours of labour would diminish the produce of manufacture in proportion to the number of hours reduced: and in the same ratio increase the cost of production, if wages, profits, and expenses remained the same. If they reduced the hours from sixty-nine to sixty by a ten hours' Bill, they would increase the cost of production in the same proportion—that was, the manufacturing the pound of yarn would cost  $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ , instead of 3d. The reduction of the present hours of labour by an eleven hours' Bill, would in the same way increase the cost of production from 3d. to  $3\frac{5}{8}d.$  Therefore, the increase of cost of manufacture by a ten hours' Bill would be  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a penny, by an eleven hours' Bill it would be  $\frac{5}{16}$  of a penny. Now the duty on raw cotton was  $\frac{5}{16}$  of a penny per pound. Take off that, and they would exactly diminish the cost of production to the whole extent that an eleven hours' Bill would raise it. They would diminish it so as to prevent a ten hours' Bill raising the cost more than  $\frac{1}{16}$  of a penny, or half a farthing. Now the price of a pound of yarn was given by Mr. Horner at 1s. Half a farthing advance on 1s. is just one per cent. The right hon. Baronet stated that the effect of the reduction would be ruinous to the manufacturers, in consequence of the competition of foreign manufactures; but if the right hon. Baronet wished to relieve the manufacturers from the effect of that increase in the price of production he could find the means, not by repealing the Corn Laws, or by any remedy which it would be difficult to apply, but by the repeal of a tax kept up for financial purposes alone, which was upheld by no interest of any kind, and which he was not sure would not at any rate be repealed whenever the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward that budget, to which every body was looking for the repeal of the particular tax that pressed on him. If the right hon. Baronet wished to relieve the cotton manufacturer from the pressure of the increase of price caused by diminished hours of labour, he had the means in the removal of the tax on raw cotton. That abolition of the tax on raw cotton would reduce the loss on the ten hours' Bill to almost nothing, and reduce it to absolutely nothing in the case of an eleven hours' Bill. That was a question between the labouring class and them, and they would advance their interests and remove from them any pressure from this alteration by giving up the duty on raw cotton, a duty which produces but half a million a year, and which they might without difficulty relinquish with a surplus revenue. If Her Majesty's Government were desirous of relieving the manufacturers from any of those effects which they said would be produced by a reduction of the hours of labour, let them remove the tax on raw cotton. The budget would show whether they were sincere or not in their desire to guard the manufacturers against this danger.

He would now deal with the argument which had been brought forward by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and which was altogether of an opposite nature. He said that he did not believe the increase of price caused by the reduction in the hours of labour would fall on the manufacturer, but that it would fall on the operative; and in reference to that portion of the subject, the right hon. Baronet made a statement from Mr. Horner, which he did not understand. He understood one part of it, however, namely, the page from which the right hon. Baronet quoted, and he referred to the data in that page, and made calculations from those data, which he had gone over more than once, and which he believed to be correct. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet in thinking that the reduction in the hours of labour would cause a reduction in the amount of production; that our dependence on foreign markets would prevent the price being raised; that the increased cost of production must fall either on profits or on wages; and that the labourer being the weaker party the reduction would ultimately fall on his wages. Agreeing thus far with the right hon. Baronet, he did not by any means agree with him as to the amount of the reduction, for it seemed to him that the right hon. Baronet had arrived at his conclusion by stopping short in the middle of his calculations. He would show this by going over and carrying on the calculation of the right hon. Baronet. By his hypothesis as much cotton per week must be produced, as would, after replacing the cost of the raw material, and some other fluctuating expenses, sell for

Now, suppose the production to be diminished by nine hours out of sixty-nine, and a proportionate reduction of produce to take place, the value of the total weekly return will be to 498*l.* 12*s.* as 60 to 69, that is, it will be 433*l.* The loss of produce will be the difference between 498*l.* and 433*l.*, that is, 65*l.* per week. This, it was said, would have to come entirely out of the wages of the workmen, which being now 302*l.*, would then be 237*l.*, being a reduction of barely more than 21 per cent., or a little more than one-fifth instead of one-fourth, as sometimes assumed in the course of the opposite arguments. The 433*l.* produced will be divided into 196*l.*, to replace fixed expenses, and 237*l.* for wages—wages being reduced for each man from an average of 12*s.* 6*d.* to 9*s.* 10½*d.* per week. Here the right hon. Baronet stops. I say he ought to go much further to ascertain the results of the change. What is the result which he has thus got to in the state of the cotton trade and labour market? The result is, that the price of cotton manufacture will, by this hypothesis, be the same as before, the demand the same, and the profits the same—the only change being in the amount of wages, which will fall one-fourth, and the supply of manufactured cotton, which will be diminished by about one-seventh. This diminished supply will have to be met by increased production. Prices being unaltered, Great Britain will still have the sure command of the foreign market as before. The customer will still want the sixty-pounds' worth of goods which will not be forthcoming, and still come to us for it; and we shall, owing to the reduction of wages, be able to supply this deficiency as we did before, only we shall have to build a fresh mill producing that amount of cotton. This amount will be raised at a cost of 65*l.* per week, of which, at the new rate of payment for wages, about 29*l.* 8*s.* will be required to replace fixed expenses, and 36*l.* 12*s.* for wages. The result of this will be, that the same amount of cotton as before will be raised, and for the same cost; but in order to ascertain the total amount of wages that will be paid before and after the proposed change, we must add this 35*l.* 12*s.* to the 237*l.* paid before. The total amount paid in wages will then be 272*l.* 12*s.* Therefore the total amount of wages paid after the change, will be 29*l.* 8*s.* less than that paid before, being a reduction of nine per cent. Each workman's wages will be reduced, but new labourers will be employed. Or state it in another way. By cutting off nine hours of labour from the sixty-nine, you will render it necessary to employ more labourers than you had before, at reduced wages. But in order to set these labourers to work, you must expend so much money in rent of mill and machinery, and other fixed expenses, as will amount to 30*l.* on a weekly expenditure of 498*l.* This 30*l.* will have to be borne by the wages of the labourers, the total amount of which will, therefore, be to that extent less than it was before the change. That is, wages will be reduced from 302*l.* to 272*l.*, or just about nine per cent. Now these were the deductions which he made. He had shown that if Ministers were afraid of the effect of a reduction of hours, in giving an advantage to foreign competition, they had the remedy in their own hands. We have a large surplus, to what better use could they devote it? At least, don't let those, who could remove the whole danger by giving up the duty on raw cotton, talk of the noble Lord's Amendment as fraught with indefinite mischief. If, on the other hand, the result should be not an increase of prices, but a fall of wages, he had shown that the amount of that fall would be only nine per cent. This was a fall in wages which he did not hesitate to say would, in his opinion, be fully compensated by the increase of comfort and economy that would result from the women attending to their domestic duties. Those who took the same view of the subject which he took, were charged with maintaining that low wages were favourable to morality and comfort amongst the people. Now he would ask, had the comfort of the people always been in proportion to the amount of their monied wages? He had seen labourers in different parts of the Empire, and the highest paid labourers he remembered to have seen, were men employed at the collieries in the north of England—in Durham; but the work at which they were employed and their own habits caused such a total absence of domestic comfort and economy, and proper management, that he had frequently seen numbers of the labouring people at half the wages of those men in the collieries, who were, as a class, possessed of a greater share of comforts. It was not to be supposed that they would in the case before them diminish the comforts of the labourer in the proportion that they diminished his wages. No; he maintained that if there was an increase in the domestic economy and comfort of the labourer, with such a reduction as this would effect, it could not be looked on as a disadvantage. There was one other argument which, however unwilling he might be to occupy the time of the House, he felt it necessary to notice on that occasion—it was an argument which had been much hinted at in private quarters, but which had not as yet been brought fairly before the House in a way to be grappled with. It was said that the Corn-Laws were concerned in this question—that the Corn-Laws were menaced by the proposition to reduce the hours of labour, and hon. Members were told that if they ventured to agree to this proposal, they would be guilty of such an interference with manufactures, and throw such additional burthens on our foreign exports that the Corn-Laws could no longer be maintained: so that though some of the principal members of the League in that House opposed the Amendment, they did so only as a blind, in order that it might not be seen that the noble Lord was in fact doing the work of the League. He (Mr. Buller) would not say that there might not be something in that. It was not his business to defend the Corn-Laws; and in this case he did not think they were necessarily concerned; for he had ventured to argue that any burthen thrown upon our manufactures by the adoption of the Amendment, would be compensated by the reduction of the duty on raw cotton, that would give all the relief requisite, and to which the same objections could not be made that were made in reference to the Corn-Law, for there was no Anti-Tax-on-Raw-Cotton League, nor any league in opposition to that. But he thought he thought he could put the matter in such a light that the advocates of the present Corn-Laws might be induced to think that voting against the Amendment might also be attended with some danger to the maintenance of the sliding-scale. If the House were now to rescind the vote which they had come to on a former night, the public would know how they voted, they would see who changed his vote, and who maintained the opinion which he had formerly declared—they would know where the whip had been applied, and they would see who were absent, and who were suddenly present. The public would see, if the present system were supported by the friends of the Corn-Laws, on the ground of their being menaced by the proposition; and if they rescinded the vote they had already come to, it would be supposed that they had sacrificed humanity and policy to the support of them, and that, in consequence of such a desire, they had dashed the cup away from the lips of the operatives. The intelligent and thinking classes would be led to believe that humanity and policy together had been sacrificed for a peculiar interest; they would feel that the Corn-Laws had been made a pretext for maintaining another evil, and that to such a feeling the education, the moral and social relations, and the physical well-being of the people had been sacrificed. What would be the feeling of the operative when he worked the additional two hours at his task? Would he not feel, at his hard and prolonged labour, that he was not working during those hours for his bread, but to pay a bread tax? If hon. Members who put forward the argument that the Corn-

Laws were menaced, regarded their own interests—if they wished to support the Corn-Laws, they would not induce the people of this country to believe that they were connected with the maintenance of every abuse and evil which existed in the social system. He had now stated his reasons for the course which he had taken; he had put forward arguments which were convincing to himself, but perhaps it would be too much to expect they could convince those who were opposed to him. The utmost he would ask was, that they would not say he voted against principle and common sense; that they would not refuse to give him credit for common honesty; and, at all events, that he had made out at least a plausible case in support of the course which he had taken. The House of Commons would, he trusted, consider the importance of the question before them—the effect of rescinding the vote which they had already given—a course which was most unusual, and whether right or wrong was always dangerous, and of the gravest importance—he trusted they would consider that they might, by their course in this matter, give rise to feelings which had not before existed. He gave full credit to Her Majesty's Ministers for the honesty of the convictions which induced them to oppose the proposition which had been made, notwithstanding the unpopularity of that opposition; but he would call on hon. Members to recollect that they voted in favour of the proposition of the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) a few nights ago, and he would ask them if they would be less bold to-night, or less confident in the justice of their cause now, when they were called upon by the Government, against parliamentary precedent, to rescind their own determination; it was a gratifying vote, the vote of the other night; it was pleasing to witness the union of all parties and all interests in the cause of humanity; he was sure the same feeling which animated them before would animate them now, and that they would not be influenced by the presence of some, or the absence of others, to change the resolution they had come to; and that there would be no difference in their decision to-night from that which they had already come to, but that they would boldly persevere in that course of humanity and sound wisdom which the House of Commons had done itself the honour of adopting.

Lord F. Egerton rose for the purpose of removing an impression which a statement of the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) with respect to a manufacturer in his (Lord F. Egerton's) neighbourhood was calculated to make. The noble Lord stated that Mr. Peter Holroyd had refused to employ a man because he was forty-three years old; now he was authorised to state that Mr. Holroyd had no recollection of having done so.

Mr. T. Duncombe wished to know if it was the intention of the Government to permit the House to go to a division without allowing hon. Members an opportunity of having the opinion of one of Her Majesty's Ministers on the proposition now before them. The House had a right to some explanation, when it was called on to come to a vote diametrically opposite to that which they had come to the other evening. The people of this country were prepared for any injustice on the part of that House or the Government; but when they were now called on to agree to the grossest inconsistencies, they ought to have some reason assigned for doing so. The hon. Member for Sheffield said, that he could go cheerfully amongst the operatives of the town which he represented, and meet them upon the vote which he was about to give this evening. But might not those operatives be entitled to look upon this appeal as an insult to them rather than otherwise? Would the hon. Gentleman have been so freely prepared to go amongst them if those operatives had votes at their disposal for the town of Sheffield? If so, and the hon. Gentleman were to appeal to them, he thought the hon. Gentleman would find that his seat was in great peril. Only two years ago he (Mr. T. Duncombe) presented a petition to this House, signed by upwards of 3,000,000 of people, chiefly in the manufacturing districts, and one of the paragraphs in that petition he would beg to recall to the attention of the House. That paragraph pointed out as a subject of complaint that the hours of labour in the manufacturing districts were too long, and that the atmosphere which they were compelled to breathe for so long a portion of each day was highly prejudicial to their health. When he presented this petition, he asked the House to allow the petitioners to appear at the Bar, and be heard in support of the statements which they made. The House, however, refused to accede to this request, and told him (Mr. T. Duncombe) to bring forward specifically any of the grievances complained of by the petitioners, promising to give to them their best attention. The noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire had brought forward one of the very grievances complained of in this petition; the House had given the subject its best attention, and had come to a vote of relief; and now Her Majesty's Government came down, with all their supporters, for the purpose of reversing the decision which had then been come to. Look at it as people might, this question was really one between avarice and humanity; between an insatiable thirst for gain on the one hand, and the amelioration of the moral and physical condition of the people on the other. Honourable Gentlemen might talk of humanity-mongering, and a spurious humanity, but as the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard had said, it was the very principle of humanity which had stood forward, some years ago, in behalf of the slaves of the West Indian colonies, and succeeded in carrying the great measure of negro emancipation; and this spirit, this spirit of spurious humanity, as Gentlemen are pleased to call it, would, he sincerely believed, sooner or later, set free the white slaves of this country. Gentlemen might treat this question as they pleased this evening, but they might depend upon it that was one, the settlement of which could not be any longer delayed. There were very few persons connected with the manufacturing districts who did not think that the measure of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire was a good one, and one which must have an advantageous effect upon the condition of the working classes. Being firmly of the same opinion himself, he should give that proposition, on all occasions, his earnest and best support.

Sir J. Graham [on rising to speak, was met by considerable cries of "Adjourn," and "Go on."] The right hon. Baronet said, I can assure the Committee, that if I knew what their wishes were as to proceeding or not with this debate this evening, I should endeavour to meet it. If it be your pleasure that we should go to a division this evening I should wish to address you very shortly in reference to the merits and present position of this case. Having already, on the former occasion, addressed the Committee on this subject at considerable length, I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible on the present occasion. [Mr. Hindley here moved that the Chairman report progress.] The right hon. Baronet however continued. As I believe I am in possession of the House, I must beg to be allowed to make the few observations which I have thought it my duty to offer on this subject. If I could agree in opinion with the hon. Member for Finsbury that the moral and physical condition of the people would be improved by the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, no one would more cheerfully acquiesce in that proposal than myself; but it is because I do not think that it would have this effect, that I feel it to be my duty to persevere in the opposition which I gave to it on a former evening. Notwithstanding the threat of the hon. Member for Pontefract that Her Majesty would be addressed to remove Her present Ministers if this measure be carried in the form which I propose—notwithstanding the prediction of the noble Lord the Member for Newark, that the country would be thrown into convulsion, unless the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire were affirmed—notwithstanding the unfriendly opposition of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford, and the combined attack, rather an extraordinary one, of the hon. Baronet and of the hon. Member for Finsbury, I am bound to say, that considering all the circumstances I never remember a case upon which I less hesitatingly came to a conclusion as to the course I should take, than on the present occasion—and the result is, that I feel it to be my imperative duty again to divide the Committee upon this important question. With regard to the charge of taking the House by surprise, I beg to remind the Committee that I endeavoured to avoid any pretence for such an accusation the other evening, when, after the division on the second clause, I stated distinctly that I should feel it to be my duty to take the sense of the Committee again upon the principle involved in the eighth clause; and I will state the reasons which led us to come to this determination. I am bound to state that I was taken by surprise, more or less, at the result of the division on a former evening. The hon. Member for Finsbury says it would be useless to attempt to deceive the country. I am not one who has ever been inclined or accustomed to do so, and, therefore, I state fearlessly that I was certainly astonished by the vote which was come to the other evening, when it was my misfortune to vote against the noble Lord the Member for London, and several other Members of the late Government. I was the more surprised, because I recollected, in 1838, and again on a more recent occasion, so late as 1839, giving my cordial and strenuous support, in aid of their administration, to the very course which the present Government is now adopting. After the vote of the other night, I felt, that, considering the great interests which were at stake, time should be given to reconsider the question and that as the division was not one of party, on the contrary, party seeming to be dissolved in reference to it, some short interval should be allowed to enable public opinion and discussion out of doors to operate in some degree upon the decision which this House might ultimately adopt. I thought it of great importance, in arguing upon a case depending in great measure upon facts which might have been erroneously understood, that time should be given for communication with those districts in which those facts could be best verified. The noble Lord the Member for London rested his vote the other night very much upon the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds, who stated that 300 master manufacturers of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and forty-three of the city which he represented, were in favour of the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. This was a statement, which was certainly calculated to produce a very great effect against the measure which we proposed; and it became advisable on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to take steps to ascertain what the feeling really was in the city of Leeds and in the cotton districts of Manchester and other parts of Lancashire and of the West Riding. Now, a deputation from Leeds waited on my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to day, headed by Mr. Marshall, and they declared that all the great flax manufacturers of Leeds were strongly adverse to the noble Lord's proposition. With regard to the woollen trade, some information has also been received, but it does not go to the same extent. There appears to be a greater division of opinion amongst the woollen manufacturers than amongst the manufacturers of flax upon this subject. I think it seems, however, pretty well agreed amongst them, that although they might concur in an eleven hours Bill, they strongly object to a ten hours Bill. But a more important question, is, what is the nature of the communications received by the Government from the great manufacturing interest of the county of Lancashire. It would be impertinent at this late hour for me to refer to written communications; but I will state as shortly as I can to the Committee a summary of their contents. And I can assure the Committee that that great and important interest has been taken entirely by surprise by the vote which the House came to on a former evening. I have received a deputation to day of eight or ten gentlemen, employing no fewer than 8,000 workmen amongst them, and representing no less than 140 firms of the cotton trade of Lancashire; and the summary of their communications is to this effect:—That 129 of those firms join in earnestly entreating the House not to abridge the twelve hours of labour in factories; seventeen others consent to the proposition for limiting the labour to eleven hours, and the remainder four only in the number can be considered as favourable to a ten hours Bill. Now, I have been asked by the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard (Mr. C. Buller), to give the Committee some new arguments, and some fresh reasoning to induce it to reconsider its decision of the other night. I am bound, in answer to that appeal, to state, that whether it be from the weakness of my reasoning powers or possibly from the exhaustion of this subject, I have no fresh arguments—no additional reasons to offer—having stated already most fully all the arguments and all the reasoning which occurred to my mind as conclusive on the subject. I have dispassionately and carefully considered those reasons and those arguments, and the conclusion to which they lead irresistably, before I stated them to the House; and subsequent consideration and subsequent inquiry have only contributed to strengthen my conviction that the course proposed by my noble Friend (Lord Ashley) is, beyond all doubt, that course and that measure which is most fatal to the interests of those whose cause he espouses, and whose welfare he, in common with us all, is most anxious to promote. It has been said, the working operatives are themselves willing to submit to a great decrease of wages, should it be necessary, as consequent on the proposed limit of time. I must say, however, that I should conclude from the language of a letter I have in my hand, signed by Mr. Hoare, the chairman of a deputation of workmen now in London, that a priori they feel sensible that a reduction of wages will not be the certain result of a diminution of the hours of labour. The hon. Member for Knaresborough assents to that proposition. If so, and I am right—[Cheers.] and the hon. Member cheers me and assents to it—then, I say, satisfied as I am that they are grossly in error on that point, believing that a large and an early reduction of wages must result inevitably, I am satisfied that disappointment of the most poisonous kind would ensue from the success of the proposed restriction. It could not fail to lead to enmity between the master and their men, to strikes for an increase of wages, to wide spread tumult, to protracted discontent, and to consequences endangering both life and property:—therefore, there is no effort I would not make, there is no odium I would not incur, rather than run the risk of occasioning such disappointment and of fostering delusions which must end in ruin. [Mr. Ferrand: "Give the proposition a trial."] The hon. Member says—give it a trial. But there are certain experiments from which, once tried and failing, there is no return. The risk is too great. This, therefore, is an experiment I am not prepared to make. Then, it is said, agree to this proposal, and it will be a final settlement. But, Sir, the House must bear in mind what was stated on a former evening, by the hon. Member for Oldham, who has been all along the most active and faithful coadjutor of the noble Lord (Lord Ashley). He told us that a ten hours Bill would not, and ought not to be received as a satisfactory settlement of the question; and that he will never rest satisfied until he obtain a Bill to limit the hours of labour to eight. Is this, then, the settlement—is this the conclusion at which we are to arrive by agreeing to the noble Lord's proposal? But it is put in the shape of an alternative, and the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard says, either my right hon. Friend (Sir R. Peel) was wrong when he warned the House as to the effect of the measure in regard to foreign competition, or I was wrong, when I stated the great reduction of wages which I thought would inevitably ensue. My belief is that if our manufacturers, with expensive machinery, are compelled to work only ten hours a day, while their foreign rivals work fourteen—if our operatives are limited to sixty hours a week, while their competi-

There could be no doubt but that the memorial contained the names of the principal flax manufacturers of Leeds. It was stated in this memorial that the great body of the flax manufacturers, and also of the woollen manufacturers, had signed it, and the prayer of the memorial was this. They stated then, in their memorial, that the mode of working the mills in Leeds and its neighbourhood was not oppressive to the working people, nor injurious to their health, and that a reduction of labour to fifty-eight hours in the week, as proposed by Lord Ashley, would be followed by a serious reduction in the earnings of the working people; that it would cause great distress, inflict great injury, and increase the difficulty of persons in this country contending against foreign manufacturers. His hon. Friend who had just sat down had stated that the master manufacturers did not desire a twelve hours Bill, but were satisfied with eleven hours. His hon. Friend had said distinctly that this was their wish, and he should now let them speak for themselves. The memorialists respectfully represented their earnest desire that no legislative enactment might be passed interfering with the present practice in the mills in that town and its neighbourhood, and praying that Her Majesty's Government would withdraw the Factory Bill, if the House of Commons insisted on retaining the provision moved by Lord Ashley.

Mr. Beckett hoped he might be allowed to appeal to his hon. Colleague, as to whether the feeling in Leeds was not in favour of an eleven hours Bill.

Mr. Aldam observed, that the memorial presented by the deputation had the name of almost every flax manufacturer. There had not been one refusal to sign it. It had been taken round without selection, and the same was the case with the woollen manufacturers. There were in that trade but two refusals; one from a person not in the habit of signing memorials, and the other from a person in favour of a ten hours Bill, because with it, he said, they would get rid of inspectors, and all trouble whatsoever. With respect to an eleven hours Bill, he must say that public opinion in Leeds was favourable to such a measure. The opinion of the manufacturers, then, in general, was against a ten, and in favour of an eleven hours Bill. It was, however, but fair to state that the adoption of an eleven hours Bill would not make any material difference in the ordinary hours of working. In flax mills, eleven hours and-a-half was the ordinary time of working, and in woollen mills eleven hours. That was the average time. If the mill-owners were anxious for an eleven hours Bill, it was in order to bring about a final settlement.

Mr. Mitchell had consulted an eminent flax spinner upon the subject of the ten hours Bill, and he stated that the effect of such a measure would be to withdraw one-sixth of the males employed in driving, weaving, and plashing flax. He had, 4,000 men employed in his manufactory, and one-sixth of them would be thrown out of employment by a ten hours Bill.

Mr. Muntz wished merely to notice a paradox stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Clitheroe. He said that no masters paid so little as English manufacturers, and that no men received so much as English workmen. Now, he believed that no manufacturers paid so much as English masters; and some conversation he had lately held with a foreign manufacturer confirmed him in this opinion.

The Committee divided on the question that the blank be filled with the word "twelve":—Ayes 183; Noes 186: Majority 3.

Sir J. Graham: As the Committee has decided against both ten hours and twelve hours, I think I shall best show my respect for the decision of the House as well as my regard for the great interests concerned, by postponing until Monday all further proceedings as to this Bill.

Lord Ashley: Sir, no man is more ready than I am to bow to the decision of this House; and although I ventured at the outset to make a solemn appeal to their feelings, I will never presume to impugn, even in thought, the justice or humanity of this great assembly. But, though defeated now, I have a right which I shall endeavour to assert on every legitimate occasion. I shall persevere to the last hour of my existence, and I have not the slightest doubt that with the blessing of heaven I shall have a complete triumph.

LIMITATIONS ON THE HOURS OF LABOUR.]

Lord Brougham rose to present a Petition from the Coal and Ironstone Miners of Lanarkshire, in which they complained of the distress which they endured in consequence of the course which the Legislature had, two years ago, deemed it proper to take for the regulation of their labour, (the Mines and Collieries Act) by which many females were deprived of the means of earning their subsistence, at an age when it was impossible for them to undertake any other species of employment. The Petitioners therefore besought their Lordships to allow those females, under whatsoever restraint or regulation their Lordships might deem fitting for their protection, to resume the only employment by which they could earn a livelihood; and, if not too late, to save them from the consequences of that cheap humanity—of that vicarious generosity—of that false philanthropy which at present seemed to have obtained possession of the Legislature. He could not present that Petition without taking the opportunity of expressing the sentiments he entertained, respecting that easy virtue which seemed to obtain among a large portion of the Legislature. It was a one-sided humanity, as well as a false humanity, inasmuch as it professed to maintain the rights, to support the interests, and to relieve the sufferings of those individuals who were its chief object, while it inflicted, at the same time, the deepest wounds, through hypocritical and short-sighted policy, on the very parties whose interests it professed to have at heart. He had been for a very long time a fellow-labourer with others in many good works for bettering the condition of the working classes. He had constantly, throughout his political life, been their advocate and supporter, when oppressed, according to his feeble means—would that his means had been ample in proportion to his good wishes and anxious desires! He had attempted to improve their minds as well as to extend their comforts. Surely, then, he, who had always exerted himself to promote the good of the people—he, who never in his life had given a vote, or written a line, or said a word, that tended to their oppression or neglect—but who had endeavoured, through good report and evil report, to do whatsoever he could to serve their best interests, temporary or permanent—he, who had studied to keep up the rate of their wages, and to keep down the price of their food—he, surely, had some right to be heard, when the question related to the comforts, the subsistence, to the labour and to the hardships which were the lot of the working classes. When it was said that many were engaged in unhealthy occupations—that many were worked too hardly—that frequently they laboured too heavily, and were too lightly fed; while all this must be admitted, still, he feared that those privations, those sufferings were the inevitable lot of humanity, and ever attendant upon man in an advanced state of civilized society. But he would not be perverse enough to call them oppressions—he would not be rash enough—he would not be impious enough to call them oppressions on the part of man, until he had heard from some learned doctor how much of these evils could be removed by human means, and human laws; and how much of them were the inevitable consequence, the unavoidable result, of the mysterious decrees, the inscrutable dispensations of an All-wise and All-mighty Providence. Therefore, he said, “Show me any means, within the scope of human laws, to remove those evils—show me any better course of Legislation to do away with those sufferings—show me any better rule of conduct by which our governors may be able to avoid those mischiefs—and then, if those means be not resorted to, we may use the word ‘oppression.’” But, until that was demonstrated to him—until it was proved that the means of removing these sufferings were within their reach, and were neglected—he would not admit, that the evils complained of were the mere result of oppression, though he allowed that they were heavy afflictions and deplorable calamities. But certainly he would never be a party to anything which, under the semblance of humanity, was calculated to inflict greater evils on the labouring population of this country than even those which they now complained of. And now, he would ask, was all their sympathy to be confined to the spinners of cotton and carders of wool? Was no suffering to be found amongst other classes of society? Could any half-dozen of occupations be named in which workmen and workwomen were employed, with respect to which no right to claim compassion could be found, and if compassion, according to the new and pernicious doctrine of the day, a call for legislation? Not a few of the many occupations in which the people were employed called as much, on various points, for legislative interference, as did the number of hours during which children ought to be employed in cotton factories. Here he begged leave to state the opinion of a great authority on this subject. Coming from so grave a quarter—coming from a man who was so thoroughly conversant with the question—coming from one whose whole public life was devoted, as far as in him lay, to the benefit of the people—coming from an individual who, to the last hour of his life, laboured for their good, and who now for an instant took the part of the upper classes against them—he meant the late Sir Samuel Romilly—that opinion ought to be received with respect by all parties. What was that eminent person’s answer to him when he demanded his assistance, on a similar occasion, many years ago? He requested Sir S. Romilly to afford his support to a Bill which was then pending in the other House of Parliament, to which he (Lord Brougham) was friendly. The object of that Bill was not the restricting the hours during which children should be employed, but was meant for restraining the ages under which children should not be suffered to work in factories; and what was the answer of that great and good man? “I,” said he, “will do no such thing as support such a Bill. Can you stop your legislation there? Have you no recollection of other trades? Do you forget the glass-blowers—the coal-heavers

—the steel file-makers, who are inhaling the seeds of pulmonary disease ‘from early morn till dewy eve’—the painters, who breathe an atmosphere poisoned by the fumes of white lead—the brass-founders, who handle and manufacture brass in all its forms, and who are in consequence paralyzed by it?” To this he (Lord Brougham) replied, “Do not urge all this—do not prevent me doing what I propose to do, by shewing me other evils which I cannot remedy; and in the case of children who are not their own masters, surely the Legislature may fairly interpose its protection where that protection is shown to be required.” Sir S. Romilly, however, replied, “Beware how you proceed in this matter, reflect that Providence has so ordered it—and doubt whether you can interfere satisfactorily. Above all things (said he, and this particularly referred to the employment of children) above all things, beware that you do not introduce something artificial in the place of those parental affections which Providence has, most wisely and beneficially, implanted in the human breast. Beware, lest, in taking this course of legislation, you proceed to stifle, to drown, to extinguish those natural affections, which are the real and legitimate support and protection of children.” Some might be disposed to go farther, and others less far in this sentiment than Sir S. Romilly; but he was sure that all their Lordships must admit, that this observation, in both its branches, was one which well deserved attention, and should be received as a warning how they interfered with the workings of nature, and the dispensations of Providence. Nothing is so dangerous as finding an artificial substitute for the natural instincts and affections. The substitute once found, nature will cease to work, and you will soon be aware how impotent an agent you have in place of an all-powerful one. All must admit, all must deplore the wants and sufferings which too many of our working classes endured; but to alter this state of things was an achievement beyond all human power. These things are all the natural consequences of the laws by which society was governed, the natural consequence of that divine ordinance by which man, ever since his primeval curse, became doomed to eat his bread by the sweat of his brow. If any one wished to ascertain whether these miseries were confined to manufactures, let him go into the country—let him view the agricultural districts. He would there see men, injured only to agricultural labour, growing prematurely old at forty, and decrepit at fifty; while in the factories they would find the man of fifty or sixty in a far different condition, in possession of his limbs, and comparatively active. They would then perhaps change their opinions with respect to enforcing restrictions on manufacturing labour. Let them read the most lively description that ever was given of the wretchedness attending an agricultural life and compare it with the manufacturer’s lot, and he feared the two things would present a very different aspect. The poet of great eminence, to whom he referred, and who lived in an agricultural district, had described, with all the accuracy of a Dutch painter, what he knew to be the sufferings of an agricultural life; if he had lived in a manufacturing town, he would have had another field to work in, and he would have described factory life as closely as he had done that of the village, and he thought he would have drawn a less highly coloured picture. Now, how far was this course of legislation to be carried? Were they to call on the Legislature to provide so that dropsy should not be the lot of one man in consequence of his exposure to atmospheric changes, or that other complaints arising from their employments should not afflict other men? Or, to come nearer home, would any noble Lord or hon. Member of the other House consent to a law which would prohibit his coachman from driving him or his wife to a party and then waiting for him between the hours of eleven at night and five in the morning, to the inevitable injury of the servant’s constitution? Would they consent to repress horse-racing which was carried on for the sake of breeding horses and gambling—he meant no offence by this expression, but he believed the fact was generally admitted—by the introduction of a measure to prevent an infant from being taken at seven years of age and half starved, and whole stunted, that he might be reduced to the condition of a dwarf at twenty, to meet the requirements of the handicap? Was that, he would ask, the course of legislation they were to proceed in? Such, however, was the career which was opened to them by those who exclaimed so much on the subject of factories, and were, as is very customary with all men, extremely prodigal of their own advice and of other people’s money. But then, it was said, that the whole system as regarded women was contrary to nature, that they should not be suffered to toil. He believed, in one occupation, it was very unnatural that they should labour; he knew that it was impossible for them to pay proper attention to the nursery, and suckling their own children if they were hired to suckle other people's. And those who read Tansillo's poem might expatiate on the subject. But he would ask how many wives, and sisters, and daughters of their Lordships, and of Members of the other House of Parliament, voluntarily exempted themselves from following what, in this respect, was called the first law of nature? They excused themselves from undertaking that duty because their various avocations interfered with it; not necessary avocations, but mere amusements and pleasures. But they were told that the children of women employed in factories were swept down in scores in consequence of their not being able to attend to them. Now, he conceived that the petition which he now presented to their Lordships bore out a very different view of the case, and in fact proved de presenti and de praterito all that he had said speaking de futuro two years ago, when the Bill to which he had alluded was before their Lordships' House. He could now clearly state, and predict to their Lordships, what the question would be; it was this; whether ten hours' work was to be paid for by twelve hours' wages? If such a principle were adopted, away at once would go the profits of the manufacturers. Those two hours were all important to him. He could not contend with foreigners if he were obliged to give the same wages for a less amount of labour. And let it be recollected, that in France, in Germany, in Switzerland, nay more, in America, where the raw material existed, as well as the hands to work it, no such restrictions were known. It would be impossible for the manufacturer to proceed, without lowering his wages. But some thought that Parliament might interfere—that nothing more was wanting than the wisdom and humanity of the Legislature to reduce the hours of labour, and at the same time, to prevent wages from being lowered in the same ratio as the time of employment was contracted! O lepidum caput! if, indeed, any word referring to the head could be applied at all to such reasoners. Was it possible that it could be soberly believed by persons suffered to go about at large, that a man could be forced by Act of Parliament to pay wages out of his own pocket merely for the purpose of keeping other people employed? And if he did not—if he dismissed his hands—was the sight of an idle man starving, more pleasing to humane minds than that of a man at once well worked and well fed. It was argued, that the proposed alteration would be greatly conducive to health. The ability to eat heartily was an acknowledged concomitant of health; but with decreased wages, how was the operative to satisfy nature? Would his situation be at all improved? He firmly believed that those who now maintained the principle of reduced labour would eventually discover their error, and find that the best friends of the poor were those who did not restrict nor interfere with their industry. He was as certain as that the sun would rise to-morrow, that many months would not pass over their heads before men would be awakened to a sense of the follies they were now committing, begin to reflect in good earnest, and find that he was the best friend of the poor who did what he could to help them and did nothing to injure them in pursuit of a vague fantastic theory which his own imagination might have conjured up, or which other men's hallucinations might have inoculated him with. He hoped and trusted that meanwhile no harm would be done to the working people, for whom it was chiefly that he now spoke—to the manufacturer, whose interests were the interests of the working people, and who in fact could have no interests apart from them—and that no page would be added to our Statute Book before it was too late to reflect on the mischief and the misery which might result from it—sanctioning any such pernicious principle (if he so might call it) as that of which he had now deprecated the assertion. Depend upon it, we could not stop here. If we were to legislate for these workpeople, we must for all others. Women in our collieries had suffered much; and he was one who had agreed (reluctantly, and protesting against carrying it further, and predicting those consequences which had happened) to a measure for ameliorating their condition. But there was a spectre which haunted him more than it did the manufacturer; which haunted him as the friend of the labourer, and, above all, of those very children themselves—it was the mischief of Parliament interfering to prescribe how much work a man or a woman or a child should be called upon to endure. Of the two, he protested he would rather have a bill to regulate the rate of wages, and fix a minimum of wages, than a bill to fix a maximum of work. He held the one just as much against all principle as the other; but the first would not produce so much mischief; and it would be entirely nugatory—you could not fix the rate of wages: you might succeed in restricting the quantity of labour; and he solemnly protested against the tyranny of curbing the poor in the exercise of their labour, the use of all the wealth they possessed. Those who said the Legislature could compel employers to give twelve hours wages for ten hours' work did not know what they were talking of, they were utterly ignorant of everything that had any practical bearing on the question. Let them talk elsewhere than in Parliament, and of other matters than these. They were talking of subjects as utterly unknown to them, and of which they were as hopelessly ignorant, as of what was passing in another planet. Humanity—anything that deserved the name of humanity—they had not studied. There were some of the parties who had occupied themselves in this matter for whom he entertained a very sincere esteem, and who, upon other subjects, he believed were well-informed and able men; but he hoped it would be taken as no disrespect when he said, that this only made the matter so much the worse, for nothing did so much injury to a question of public concernment as very conscientious and able men taking hold of extraordinary fantastical notions; they were more dangerous when so occupied even than hypocrites. To show the extent to which the mania for this system of legislation had extended, he would just mention that two Bills had been sent to him, ready drawn up, with a request that he should bring them before Parliament—but which he refused to do—for the relief, as it was said, of two distinct classes of work-people. The one called his attention to the much greater sufferings of sempstresses in London, Westminster, and country towns, working from early in the morning to late at night; fed on an extremely miserable pittance—on bad or second-rate, cheap, indifferent, tea and bread—little or no animal food. These were extreme cases, no doubt—such was not the state of all or nearly all; he hoped in God it was not so, at least. But their wages were low from the vehement competition. Every poor girl who had no rich parents to support her, and who chose conscientiously to lead a chaste life, was a competitor for that kind of work, and the consequences were, naturally, most lamentable. They suffered exceedingly: and the diseases, of which a frightful catalogue had been presented to him with one of the bills (which he should never present, as it was not his duty to present such impossible speculations to their Lordships), the diseases, arising chiefly from their posture of work,—diseases of the digestive organs and of the lungs, were of the most fearful character. The second class, on whose behalf the other Bill had been drawn and handed to him, was the class of workers in brass and steel. But his answer had been, that if Parliament legislated for these and other such cases (for there were other cases even worse) Parliament would become a nuisance to the nation instead of its protector, by the utter disregard it showed to the necessity of man's position in this world, and to that first fact and law of our existence—which he once had occasion, for another purpose, but in favour of the working classes (for it was against the Corn Laws), to allude to—the law of labour—

“Continuū habet leges æternaque fœdera certis
Imposuit natura locis, quo tempore primum
Deucalion vacuum lapides jactavit in orbem.”

Yes, this was the law of our existence, that man should live by the labour of his arm and the sweat of his brow. It was not fit to repine at it—they might lament it; and they should do all they could to relieve it, nothing to aggravate it; and, therefore, he for one, was against all interference with the free application of human industry. It was no answer against his argument, to say, “Why do you not repeal the Corn Laws?” He did not wish to do the wrong thing, lest he should injure the effect of the right thing. He was against such interference, as calculated to produce nothing but misery to workmen and masters—especially to the workmen; and it was his business to do his best to prevent such grievous error, which, in others, was only a misfortune or a venial fault, but in those who governed would be a crime. Their Lordships being a body eminently Conservative, from their reluctance to enter upon wild and hazardous speculations, it was more important sound views should be maintained and kept up, and applied in practice among them.

The Marquess of Normanby said, that he wished to say a very few words on the subject of the prayer of this petition. He did not at all wish to enter at present upon the subject of a Bill which he believed was at present in another House, but of which it was not certain whether it would ever reach their Lordships, or, if it did, in what shape it would come to them. He merely wished to guard their Lordships and the country against being carried away by the eloquence of his noble and learned Friend into the belief that this petition correctly stated the general feeling of the country, and particularly of those interested in the subject, as to the effect of the Act prohibiting the working of females in Mines and Collieries, a Measure which both Houses had, almost unanimously consented, to pass, and which had been brought before the Legislature in consequence of a Commission issued when he (the Marquess of Normanby) was a Minister of the Crown. The Report of that Commission, as their Lordships would doubtless recollect, contained a collection of facts so startling and appalling, as to lead to a general conviction that some legislative interference was immediately and imperiously called for for the protection of those unfortunate females.

Lord Brougham said, when his noble Friend talked of protecting the weaker sex from oppression, he just wished to say, that if any case were shown in which women were compelled to labour, legislation would be all very well; but women thirty or forty years old were restrained from labour in the Collieries—a time of life, he thought, when they were quite able to decide for themselves whether they wished to undertake this employment or not.

Petition laid on the Table.

SUICIDE IN A POOR LAW UNION CELL.] The Bishop of Exeter said, he did not mean to trespass long on their Lordships' attention, but he had to submit a Motion in consequence of what had been done by a Board of Guardians in Cornwall. When he moved for Papers relative to Chaplains in Workhouses, there was one Union on which he had made particular remark—that of Penzance—and upon the mode in which the Board of Guardians for that Union had proceeded as to their Chaplain. He had stated that when the Commissioners had, with respect to the appointment of a Chaplain, declared their confidence in the Board, they must have forgotten how far the Guardians had been culpable in a certain tragical case. The Board had, naturally enough, challenged him as having made a statement affecting their character; and he complained not of this as a breach of privilege; he should be ashamed to skulk behind "privilege of Parliament"—in such a case nothing would be more intolerable than the tyranny of that or the other House if any of their Members were to make attacks on absent persons, and then complain of their defending themselves. This case he would state very shortly. The subject of it was a woman whose habits had been peculiar—she having dressed herself as a man and worked as a man; but her character, as far as chastity was concerned, had been good, and there had been much of good in her character. She was compelled to become an inmate of the Penzance Workhouse, where she suffered what she thought injustice and injury, and whence she went out to service, from which, however, she was obliged to return with an order to the relieving-officer for re-admission, which order she presented, but being (as it was said) at the time under the influence of liquor, she was not admitted into the "probationary" ward, but was thrust into a cell called the "refractory" ward, which was, he had been assured, only seven feet square, and which, he had been further told by an ex officio Guardian, was immediately contiguous to the "dead-house," in which those who had died in the Workhouse were deposited until buried. The woman had strong superstitious feelings, in consequence of the contiguity of the cell to the "dead-house;" she, therefore, when told she was to be taken into that cell—as being in a state of intoxication (as to which, however, there were different statements), said, "I am willing to go anywhere, but do not put me into that frightful place!" He (the Bishop of Exeter) believed he was correct in saying that the parties had no right, under such circumstances, to put her into that prison,—which, however, they endeavoured to do, and would have done, but that she made her escape and took refuge in the room where she had previously slept—the women's bed-room; she went to bed with one of the women, but had not been long there when the Master of the Workhouse came in, the women being all in bed, and insisted upon her getting up, and going with him to the "refractory" cell. She remonstrated; but as he persisted, she got up, and dressed herself partially, not being permitted to dress herself entirely; she was then driven across the yard (without shoes) to this cell, personal violence being meanwhile employed by the Master, who pushed her so violently that she fell in the yard, and even that was not enough (she abused him, it was true), he thought fit to strike her more than once before he thrust her into the cell, where she was kept all night, not for any offence, but merely because it was the regulation of the house that she was not to be admitted into the house before being examined by the medical officer and pronounced fit for the "probationary" ward. She was the next morning so examined and pronounced fit, and admitted into that ward, where she slept that night, and next morning made her escape, for the purpose of making her complaint to the Guardians; and having got over the wall, which her masculine habits enabled her to scale, she went to a public-house to wait until it should be time to attend the Board; there she had a single half-pint of beer (and the master had on oath admitted that she was not at all intoxicated); and, meeting one of the Guardians, she stated her intention of appealing to them, and implored him to be her friend when she went to the Board. In the anti-room she met the mistress of the house (wife of the master who had so treated her), and that person immediately insisted that she should not see the Guardians; and, though the woman was not then an inmate of the House, ordered her to be taken again to that hideous cell, she entreating that it might not be so, and declaring that the consequences would be fearful—that, in fact, she could not tell what might not be the result—and resisting so that two or three men were required to carry her to the cell, one of them dragging her by the hair of her head and another by her feet; loud remonstrances were made by more than one "man" present, who implored them to recollect her sex; she received some serious and severe injuries in the scuffle, and ultimately was lodged in the cell, the time then being about noon. The master of the House (not then being present) being at his dinner—an hour or two afterwards, a woman came exclaiming "Mary Miller would hang herself!" to which the master replied—"Well, and let her hang!" Now he (the Bishop of Exeter) did not believe that the man seriously meant that, he had no doubt he only regarded it as an idle threat (which he was perhaps accustomed to hear from persons in her position), and he believed, that those words brutal as they were, did not proceed from any indifference as to whether the woman committed suicide; but it would at least show that the master had not the feelings of a man when he thus could speak on such an event being described to him as likely to occur. The master went on with his dinner. A few minutes afterwards another woman came, exclaiming, "Come, or you will be too late. She will hang herself; she has tried it once, and is about to attempt it again!" "I'll stop that," answered the man, and he immediately had recourse to his handcuffs, examined the screws, &c., and while making this investigation a third woman came in, announcing that the poor creature had effected her purpose, and that she was indeed, dead. On this, he proceeded to the cell, and found she was dead. He, then, however, indicated nothing of the feeling that other men would probably have shown. The poor creature was persecuted even after death. They would not allow the ordinary decencies to be bestowed upon the corpse. At the inquest the greater portion of the circumstances he had thus narrated were proved; but the Coroner would not allow evidence to be given of what had led to her great excitement. He said the question was not what was the cause of the act of suicide, but whether she was sane or not at the time. He (the Bishop of Exeter) was not going to find fault with that high judicial officer in the discharge of his functions, and if the Coroner had stated that, he doubted not he had stated it on his belief as to his duty; but the Coroner was one of the Guardians. Subsequent investigations had taken place before the Guardians, in which all the circumstances he had stated were elicited. This was the resolution to which the Board came:—

*Penance Union Adjourned Board Meeting,
October 13, 1840.*

"The Board having gone into the case of Mary Miller, and the Coroner having read over the evidence on the inquest, and the Board in addition having obtained every information in its power—Resolved, that the Board does not consider that there has been any punishment inflicted on Mary Miller which has not been entered in the Punishment-book; and with reference to any irregularity committed to wards the said Mary Miller by any of the officers, this Board is of opinion, that the statements to that effect are unfounded and untrue, with the exception, that the refractory ward was not absolutely necessary as a place of security in this case on the 29th ult., and that the Chairman shall admonish the governor to avoid a similar use of that ward in future."

An investigation was afterwards entered into under the superintendence of Colonel Wade, the result of which was, that every fact which he (the Bishop of Exeter) had stated to their Lordships was proved. Colonel Wade made his report to the Commissioners in London, and they immediately sent down a peremptory order for the dismissal of the master and mistress, with this remark:—

"Inasmuch, as the excitement of Mary Miller's feelings, which led to suicide, appears to have been the immediate consequence of the unjustifiable violence with which she not being then an inmate of the workhouse, was taken to the refractory ward—i. e. the prison."

One might have thought that the matter would have ended there. But it had not. The Guardians had, in the first instance, declined to comply with the order of the Commissioners; they had addressed to the Commissioners a memorial entreating of them to allow the master to retain his place. But the Commissioners had again expressed, and in still stronger terms, their reprobation of the man's conduct, and had peremptorily insisted on his removal. The Guardians had then found it necessary to remove him, but had thought fit to offer him a vote of thanks. Such was the conduct of that Board of Guardians, and it was for such proceedings that he (the Bishop of Exeter) ventured to say that those Guardians ought not to have the confidence of the Commissioners. It was well, he thought that the subject had been brought under their Lordships' notice. The great security which the people of this country had for the tolerable exercise of the enormous powers given to the Boards of Guardians in this country was to be found in the fact that for any gross violation of duty they were amenable to the judgments of that House and of the other House of Parliament, so that their enormities would not, at least, pass without reprobation. Unhappily, however, words were all the punishment which their Lordships could inflict in the instance to which he was then adverting. But those Guardians might, at least, be made to know the sense which their Lordships entertained of their conduct. He believed that if the papers for which he moved were communicated they would prove the truth of every material circumstance which he had stated. He hoped their Lordships would give the country the advantage of having all the facts established upon incontrovertible evidence. The possession of the knowledge which would thus be communicated would be at all times desirable, but would be more especially so at a period like the present, when the attention of the Legislature was about to be called to some measure for amending the Poor Law Act of the year 1834. He should not make an apology for having trespassed on the time of their Lordships, for he was sure that in that case no apology was necessary. The right Rev. Prelate then concluded by moving, "That all communications to and from the Board of Poor Law Commissioners, relative to the case of Mary Miller, be laid before their Lordships."

Lord Wharnccliffe said, upon the right Rev. Prelate's own statement, the Commissioners had dismissed the master of the Union Workhouse. Three years had elapsed since these things occurred, and since then there had been three elections of the Board of Guardians of that Union; so that it was not likely that any charge could be substantiated against individuals. If the House, under all these circumstances thought that the paupers ought to be produced, he on the part of the Government had no objection to their being produced.

The Bishop of Exeter said, if the noble Lord could say that the individuals composing the present Board of Guardians, or any of them, were not the same as those who formed the Board to which he referred, he would not press his motion.

Lord Wharnccliffe could not speak positively, but he believed that at least one-half of the present Board of Guardians were not re-elected members.

The Earl of Radnor observed, that even if all had been re-elected, their re-election was a proof of the ratepayers having been satisfied with their conduct.

Lord Campbell observed, if the papers were produced, it had better be for the purpose of their being sent to the State Paper Office, there to be kept for some future historian of Poor Law Unions.

Lord Kenyon regretted the noble and learned Lord should have made that observation. He certainly thought it was well that the House should know in an authentic shape the sufferings of this unfortunate person, and by whom they had been caused.

Lord Campbell said he had alluded to the length of time that had unfortunately elapsed. If the case had occurred recently it might be desirable that the matter should be brought before them, and that it should be investigated with a view to punish the offending parties. But, after a lapse of three years, any attempt at interference on the part of that House would be useless. The facts were already notorious, they were known to all the world; and it could only be with a view to remove the Guardians that their Lordships could properly be called upon to take any notice of the case. But the present Guardians could not be removed, as they had been elected since the circumstances had occurred. He could therefore see no reason why those papers should be produced.

The Bishop of Exeter said that the noble and learned Lord had dealt with the case as if, because it had occurred three years ago, it was unfit to be made the subject of investigation at present. But he begged of their Lordships to recollect what had been the history of their legislation with respect to the Poor Laws during the last three years. During that period the discussion of the subject had been deferred from year to year, in order to afford them a convenient opportunity for taking the whole case into their consideration. They were this year to consider the subject, and he agreed with the noble Lord who had spoken from the cross benches (Lord Kenyon), that nothing could be more desirable than that Parliament should, at the present time, know what were the enormities which were committed with impunity under the present law. He said with impunity, for let them recollect that all that the Commissioners could have done in that case had been done by them. They had insisted on the removal of the master of the workhouse, but they had no power to inflict any other punishment. It was evident that if the cruelty and the inhumanity of the master had been practised in a more secret manner, his conduct would not have been unacceptable to the Guardians. They had even done that which, he believed, no other persons in this country would have done—they had rewarded him with their thanks. He thought it very desirable that they should have such facts before them when they were about to consider the Poor Law Act. It had been said that some of those persons had been re-elected as Guardians, and that that could only take place in consequence of their having possessed the confidence of the rate-payers. After such a statement as that, and after the manner in which his motion had been met, he felt compelled, by a sense of duty, to press that motion. He, therefore, moved that these papers be produced.

Lord Wharnccliffe said, that he could see no reason for moving for the papers, unless something was to be founded on them. It appeared, undoubtedly, that very gross conduct had been committed by the master of the workhouse, and that the Guardians had supported him; but that the Commissioners had insisted on his dismissal, and that he had accordingly been dismissed. A new election of Guardians had, however, since taken place, and he did not see what motion could, at present, be founded on those papers. If the right rev. Prelate meant to found a motion on them there could be no objection to their production. But he would beg of the right rev. Prelate to consider the inconvenience which would arise from moving for papers for mere curiosity, and for no other purpose.

The Bishop of Exeter said that as the facts were admitted he should not press his motion. He should therefore withdraw that motion.

The Marquess of Lansdowne said that if the right rev. Prelate had pressed his motion he should have offered no opposition to it; but he wished to advert to a circumstance of recent occurrence. The right rev. Prelate had lately thought it his duty to allude to a recent transaction relating to the present Board of Guardians of Penzance. It would be in the recollection of the House that the right rev. Prelate had a short time since made a statement which involved a very heavy censure of that board, as well as of a clergyman whom they had appointed to officiate in the workhouse. Now, he had no personal knowledge of the matter, but he had been informed by Gentlemen of the highest respectability residing in that part of the country where the circumstances were alleged to have occurred, that the statement of the right rev. Prelate was inaccurate, and that the Board of Guardians had addressed a communication to the Commissioners, in which they justified themselves from the imputations cast upon them, and stated the grounds upon which they considered themselves to be deeply indebted to the clergyman in question, for the manner in which he had during a number of years administered the consolations of religion in the workhouse. The communication which they had thus addressed to the Commissioners contained the vindication as they conceived of their conduct, and he thought it would be but fair that that communication should be laid before the House, as it was written in answer to a statement made to their Lordships by the right rev. Prelate.

The Bishop of Exeter said that if the noble Marquess moved for the communication in question, he should most cordially support him.

The Marquess of Lansdowne then moved that there be laid before the House a copy of any Communications addressed by the Guardians of the Union of Penzance to the Poor Law Commissioners, relative to the appointment of a Chaplain in the Workhouse of Penzance.

The Bishop of Exeter would suggest to the noble Marquess that it would be advisable to enlarge the terms of the motion, by moving, "That there be laid before the House a copy of all communications made to and from the Poor Law Commissioners respecting the appointment of a Chaplain to the poor-house of Penzance." They would then have the whole case before them, and not merely an ex parte statement.

Lord Wharncliffe thought it would be better that they should have the whole of the correspondence laid before them.

The Marquess of Lansdowne said, that he had no objection to adopt the suggestion of the right rev. Prelate. He should, however, introduce a further amendment, by moving for

"Copies or Extracts of all Correspondence between the Guardians of Penzance Union and the Poor Law Commissioners, relative to the Appointment of a Chaplain in that Union."

It was possible that the communication of the Board of Guardians might contain allusions to the statement of the right rev. Prelate, and to what had passed in that House, which it might be proper to suppress.

Motion of the Bishop of Exeter withdrawn; Motion of the Marquis of Lansdowne agreed to.—House then adjourned.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.] Sir James Graham: Sir, it is now my duty to refer to the Order of the Day respecting the Factories Bill, and I am sure the House will excuse me if, on moving that the Order of the Day be Read, I shall, upon the present occasion and under the present circumstances, venture to trespass for a short time upon their indulgence. In commencing the observations which it will be my duty to submit to the House, I beg leave, in the most emphatic manner, on the part both of myself and of my colleagues, to express that deference which as the servants of a constitutional monarch, we owe to the opinion and vote of this Representative Assembly. I hardly know a duty more imperative than that which is imposed upon a Ministry by the deliberate expression of opinion on the part of the House of Commons; certainly I know but one duty which is and ought to be paramount:—it is this—that no Minister of the Crown, even acting in obedience to the declared wishes of the House, should make himself responsible for any act or adopt any policy which in his conscience, his sober judgment, and after mature deliberation, he believes to be inconsistent with the well-being and prosperity of this country. I know no other limit to our deference to the House; but this is imposed upon us by our conscientious judgment; and it must be religiously observed. Now, Sir, in the interval which has elapsed since we last met and discussed this question, my colleagues and myself have maturely deliberated on the position in which the question is now placed, and it is right that I should remind the House of what has already occurred. On Monday last, in concert with my noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire, we took a discussion upon an early part of the Bill, namely, the interpretation Clause, on which was raised the question whether the labour of young persons should be restricted to ten hours or to twelve hours per day. This is almost the question in terms, but virtually it was that upon which the Committee was called to decide, and I, upon the part of Government, contended for the necessity of the maintenance of the existing law, which imposes no other than a twelve hours' restriction upon labour. My noble Friend, with perfect consistency, and persevering in the course, which, on two or three occasions within the last twelve years he has adopted, raised the question that ten hours should be the period to which labour should be restricted. There were two divisions on that occasion. In the first instance, the question was whether the limit now existing should be continued at twelve hours, and upon that occasion my noble Friend prevailed over the Government by a majority of nine. A second division then took place when the proposed limitation of ten hours was affirmed by a majority of eight. Being unwilling that any suspicion should exist, of the House having been taken by surprise, I stated on the part of Government, my intention of appealing again to the Committee on this important matter, upon the eighth Clause of the Bill, in which, but in a more substantive form, the same question was again to be raised. This was the question we again discussed on Friday last, and on that, as on the former occasion, I proposed that twelve hours should be the limit of labour to be imposed upon young persons. Her Majesty's Government were then defeated by a majority of three. My noble Friend immediately, as on the former occasion, proposed in distinct terms that ten hours should be the limit; Government again resisted that proposal, and succeeded by a majority of seven. The effect of these adverse decisions on the Bill, as it now stands, is to place the Bill in inextricable confusion. The interpretation Clause now bears the opinion of the House, that ten hours shall be the limit of the labour of young persons. [Mr. Hindley: Ten hours and a half.] If the hon. Member will allow me to make my statement I can assure him that I have no intention to misrepresent the case; if I should fall into an error, he will doubtless correct me when I sit down. Well, Sir, I was stating that the effect of the amendment of the interpretation Clause, which now stands part of the Bill, is to enact that it was the opinion of the Committee that ten hours shall be the limit to be imposed on young persons. But on Friday last, when that proposition was in a more distinct form propounded to the Committee, they negatived the resolution to which they had previously come. These are circumstances which demanded, and which have received, the most attentive consideration on my own part, and upon that of my Colleagues. In matters of this kind it is highly improper to act with precipitation, or to be influenced by any motive which can have the appearance of heat. We have, therefore, deliberated dispassionately, calmly, and carefully; and I am now about to announce the decision of Her Majesty's confidential advisers. Sir, there are three courses which, as it appears to us, are possible in the present state of this affair. Any course to be adopted on the part of the Government must at once be firm, simple, and intelligible, and within these limits there have appeared to us, upon reflection, to be three courses open to us. Since the House has at different times and by different votes affirmed that the hours of labour shall not exceed twelve, and have also affirmed that they shall not be limited to ten—so, it would appear that between these two points there is some third point at which it would be possible to effect a compromise. Now, for the sake of brevity in arguing the matter, I will assume that the period of eleven hours is this possible point. Then there is another course which it is possible for us to adopt; namely, to ask of the House permission to remove from the Order Book this Order of the Day, for the avowed purpose, under these circumstances of not proposing any alteration in the existing law. There is also a third course open for us to pursue, and that is to ask the House to rescind this Order of the Day, in the anticipation and for the purpose of the Government asking leave to introduce a new Bill, comprising such points of regulation as have already received the assent of the House, or as seem likely to meet with its future approbation. Now, with the permission of the House, I will advert to each of these three propositions. In the first place, I think it desirable to recall the attention of the House to the facts which have occurred with reference to this subject since the present Government became the responsible servants of the Crown; and I will remind the House that previous to the commencement of the Session of 1842 my noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire published a letter, in which he declared that he had ascertained from Ministers, on enquiry, what were their intentions with respect to a limitation in the hours of labour carried on by young persons in factories, and that these intentions were not to depart from the then and now existing regulation imposing twelve hours' restriction. This was on the eve of the meeting of Parliament in the year 1842. But on the 7th of February in that year, my hon. Friend Mr. Stuart Wortley asked me what were the intentions of Government on the subject of regulating labour in factories, and I will ask the House to permit me to read my answer. It was in these terms:—

"As to the second question which his hon. Friend had put to him, whether the Government intended to bring in any measure for the regulation of labour in factories, he had to state in reply that he had found a Bill in his office which had been prepared, he believed, by the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Fox Maule), in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee that had sat on the subject; and he proposed to bring in that Bill with some alterations. He might, however, mention, that those alterations would materially affect the regulation of infant labour between the ages of nine and thirteen, as at present by law defined; and it was also proposed to make some alterations as to the regulation of the labour of what were called young persons—that was, persons between the ages of thirteen and eighteen; but it was not his intention, on the part of the Government to propose any such regulation as in some quarters had been strongly recommended, as to the limitation of the time of labour in factories of young persons between the ages of thirteen and eighteen, as some persons hoped, to ten hours a-day."—Hansard.

I beg the House to observe that in the first Session of the present Parliament, and on nearly the first day of that Session, I gave the answer upon the subject of factory legislation which I have read to the House. But, in addition to the question put to me by Mr. Stuart Wortley, my noble Friend, the Member for Dorsetshire, asked me, "Whether the regulations he proposed with respect to employment of children between the ages of nine and thirteen were those which had been recommended by the Committee of 1840; and whether I proposed any diminution in the number of working hours in regard to young persons between the ages of thirteen and eighteen?" In answer to this, I declined going into the question, but I told my noble Friend, "That no limitation in the hours of labour of young persons was contained in the Bill." Sir, I have read these extracts, not for the vain and improper purpose of taunting any persons who may have seen cause for a change in their opinions with respect to this matter, but I have read them to the House to show, that as in 1833 and 1839, so in 1842, I, for myself individually, have firmly adhered to the opinion that any limitation of labour beyond that of twelve hours was inexpedient; and on the part of my Colleagues, with their full sanction and authority, when the question was raised last year, I stated that the united Cabinet had also come to a similar determination. It would be needless to pursue the matter further into detail than to state that in the last Session of Parliament I thought it my duty to lay on the Table of the House a Factory Bill containing clauses in which the limitation of twelve hours was maintained; and I will now proceed to discuss the merits of the three possible courses which are open for us to pursue regarding it. And first, as to that of compromise—or the substitution, in lieu of twelve hours as we proposed, or of ten hours as the noble Lord has proposed, a limitation to eleven hours of labour. Now, Sir, I am quite prepared to admit that I do not quite go the length of a high authority, Mr. Burke, who has recorded his opinion, that "Government after all is an affair of compromise," but I do say that on many occasions, the expression of feeling upon the part of this popular assembly forms a ground upon which compromise is not only justifiable, but often expedient. But, Sir, to render compromise either justifiable or expedient, there are two points indispensable. In the first place, the point to be conceded must be deemed safe by those who make the concession; and, in the second place, the settlement effected by the compromise must hold out a fair prospect of being a lasting one. Now, it is with unfeigned and heartfelt respect for the great body of Gentlemen by whom Government have been generally supported, and amongst whose ranks I am proud to find myself, that, looking at this question coolly and dispassionately, I am bound to state upon the part of the Cabinet, that the compromise to which I have adverted, appears to us not to hold out any prospect of utility or to be of itself expedient. I do not wish to argue this matter unnecessarily, but still, for the sake of vindicating myself and my Colleagues, I must touch on some of the prominent topics. I hold, in the first place, that this compromise would be most injurious to the master manufacturers. A diminution from twelve to eleven hours of labour sounds at first like a small diminution, and a trifling matter; but I beg the House to consider, that when it is applied so as to prohibit the use of machinery, it is equivalent to a prohibition of not less than three or four weeks in the year. Now, this is a matter of the most important nature, and since I last addressed the House with reference to it I have received the most circumstantial information from the highest authorities, in the woollen as well as the cotton districts, and I am assured positively, particularly from the cotton districts, where the machinery in use is most complex and expensive, that such a reduction in the hours of labour as would be effected by an eleven hours' compromise, would, when trade is brisk, when the demand is steady, and when an opportunity is beginning to show itself of affording to the master manufacturers a chance of retrieving their past losses in adverse times when the demand was not brisk, and when they, in order to keep their work-people together, worked their mills at a loss—I say that I am assured that such a diminution of hours of labour at such a time, would touch not only the profits of the factory, but, in the judgment of my informants, it would endanger the continuance of the employment of machinery. I say, that such a diminution of the hours of labour would be highly injurious to master manufacturers, and, in my opinion, the prosperity of manufactures is bound up with the prosperity of the State. But, bound up as is the prosperity of the one with that of the other, I cannot separate it from the well-being and comfort of the labouring classes, and in my judgment, the diminution of one hour of adult labour would end in a most bitter disappointment to them. I am quite satisfied—though it would be tedious to repeat the whole argument, and this is not the fitting occasion to do so—I am quite satisfied that in proportion to the reduction of time and labour, must be the immediate and corresponding reduction of wages; and unless the master manufacturers are to submit to an extinction of profits, the diminution of profit must be added to the direct diminution of wages, the reduction of which, notwithstanding the assertions of the hon. Member for Liskeard, cannot, I think, be fairly estimated at less than from 15 to 20 per cent. If it be admitted that a diminution in the number of hours would be most injurious to the masters, that it would also end in bitter disappointment to the workmen, then I ask the House whether it be possible that a measure which will produce two such effects can fail of being other than most dangerous to the country. My own opinion is, and it is also the opinion of my Colleagues, that any measure which would produce effects like these cannot fail of being dangerous in the extreme. In the first place, I am quite satisfied that the workmen are at present labouring under some delusion on this point, and that they do not anticipate such a reduction of wages as I believe would be inevitable were the Measure adopted. What would be the effect of that disappointment? I am sure that they would stand out most resolutely against such a reduction of wages as unnecessary and unjust. We hear at this moment—unless I am much misinformed—that with twelve hours of labour, with a high rate of wages, with an improved state of trade, the workmen are in many places dissatisfied with their earnings. And I have no doubt but that, if we came to force a legislative reduction of wages, the effect would be a very general strike throughout the manufacturing districts—which, in combination with other strikes with which we are now threatened, would lead to the most fatal and dangerous confusion. I must say—and I hope that nothing that falls from me may be construed in the nature of an invidious taunt, because I should ill discharge my duty, and ill testify to the House the feelings by which I am actuated, did anything of the sort escape me—but I must say, dangerous as I conceive the Measure in itself to be, that some arguments by which the proposed change has been supported are more dangerous still. Now, I do not know whether or not to mention the names of the hon. Gentlemen who urged these arguments, but I heard it contended on Friday night that a large diminution of wages would not be detrimental to the working classes. It was said, Sir, that there were moral wages more important than even money wages—that high wages led to immorality and to improper conduct, and that even if wages were greatly reduced, starvation was not possible in this country. These I conceive to be most dangerous arguments. I believe that a large reduction—a forced legislative reduction in the price of the only commodity which the operative possesses—namely his labour—a reduction, too, which I believe to be unjust—would be attended by a great deterioration in the workman's moral character; and that, so far from improving his conduct, it would drive him to despair and involve him in the commission of crime, of which he would otherwise never dream. And it is no consolation either to the Legislature or to the unhappy individual smarting under a legislative loss in the value of the only commodity to which he has an undoubted right (and surely he has a perfect right to the free exercise of that commodity in any way he pleases); it is no consolation to tell him that we will repay him in the moral advantages of his condition for the reduction of his wages, and that there is a poor law in this country which prevents the possibility of his starving. I pass on to another argument, hardly less terrifying and alarming—I allude to the argument, that we have now arrived at a new social state; that we should therefore depart from the fixed principles which have hitherto guided the wisest men of this and every other country, and meet our alleged new social condition by new principles and new schemes of legislation. Hitherto interference with the free market for labour has been considered dangerous, and only to be justified by some very strong reasons in certain cases of exception. That rule is now to be inverted; it is proposed to make legislative interference the general rule, and to acknowledge no limit—not even the necessity of the case—but only the possibility of interfering. If that doctrine is to prevail, it will be much better for the House not to deal with the complicated question of the maximum of labour, but to establish at once the minimum of wages. Sir, a more dangerous course was never suggested for the adoption of a legislative assembly. I must say I have seen within the last eight-and-forty hours the use of a very apt expression upon the subject, an expression to which I am disposed to give my consent. I do not think that it is an exaggeration to say that this is the commencement of a “Jack Cade” system of legislation. Sir, I must just notice one other argument, which I must say fills me with alarm, and that is the argument, that it is desirable to take this step with the view of checking intense competition. Now, competition in this matter, inasmuch as it is the great regulator of produce and price, if coincident with profits, promotes the interest of the community. But I contend that this legislation, so far from tending to diminish competition, must have the directly opposite effect. If the demand in the market be the same, and the work to be done be the same, the inevitable effect of your diminishing the power of executing it, will be that fresh factories must be built and fresh capital must be needlessly sunk in machinery. The sinking of capital is itself no small evil, but if you prevent the running of machinery for twelve hours, the effect will be the shifting of the burden to the working classes; fresh machinery will be built; needless outlays will be incurred; there will be a fresh demand for the labour of young persons and children; population will be stimulated, profits will ultimately fall, and the condition of the working classes will be permanently and hopelessly injured. According to my views, I would say that I cannot conceive that it ever can be conducive to human happiness to impose limits upon human industry. I think that it never can be conducive to the interest of the State to reduce the profits upon capital—to restrict industry at home—to give premiums upon competition abroad—and to impose penalties upon the employment of machinery, and even on the employment of British capital in manufactures, and yet I think that these results would follow from the adoption of the proposition of my noble Friend. I have now dealt with the first part of the subject—I hope not at too great length. I have stated the reasons which induce me to think—that a compromise even to the limited extent of eleven hours, would be dangerous to the State, and inadmissible in policy. I will now glance at the second branch of the subject of a compromise, namely, would there be a reasonable probability of its permanent continuance. And here I must be permitted to pay a well-merited compliment to the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. He has, in the most disinterested and honourable manner on all former occasions, adhered to the prosecution of this object, which he believes to be indispensable to the well-being and happiness of the working classes. He has excluded himself from power—power, which is an object of such fair ambition to men born in the station and endowed with the talents of the noble Lord. He has made great sacrifices to accomplish that which he thinks right—he has sacrificed that which is far more painful than the surrender of mere ambition—he has placed himself, I will not say in hostile collision with, but in an attitude of opposition to, those political Friends whom he respects and esteems. But it must be remembered that my noble Friend, so earnest and indefatigable a champion of any cause which he adopts, has in the most solemn manner, in speaking and in writing, declared two years ago as well as two months ago, and on Friday last, that he will never rest from his labours until he has obtained a ten hours Bill. Would, then, a compromise of an eleven hours Bill be a satisfactory one? Would even a compromise of a ten hours Bill be satisfactory? I am satisfied the matter would not stop there. Has not the House had the advantage of a direct warning from the hon. Gentleman next in authority to the noble Lord upon the subject, the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Fielden) that if a ten hours Bill were to be carried to-morrow, it would be unsatisfactory, and that nothing but an eight hours Bill will satisfy the working classes. But I hold in my hand a more important declaration still. These are the expressions not of the advocates, but of the principals in a cause; here is a declaration adopted no later than yesterday, by a meeting of delegates from the cotton spinners and other factory workers in Manchester; and they state:—

“ That notwithstanding the defeat of Lord Ashley upon the ten hours Bill, a defeat brought about by the official influence of Government, we are resolved never to relax our exertions until a ten hours Bill is carried through Parliament, and that we will avail ourselves of every advantage which the Constitution affords us to bring about such a limitation of the labour of children and young persons in factories.”

Now Sir, I say, that as between an eleven hours Bill and a ten hours Bill, were I to think of a compromise, I would say, considering all circumstances, that it would be most wise on the part of Government—on the part of this House, with a view of arriving at some durable settlement—that it would be most politic, most expedient, to go the length of a ten hours Bill at once. I therefore discard any thought of compromise on the part of Government from my consideration. I will now proceed to the second course open to us to adopt, namely, to ask permission of the House to discharge this Order of the Day, with the view of allowing the existing law to remain in full force, and unaltered in any respect. Sir, that would be a possible course—it would be, as compared with a compromise, in my opinion, a preferable course; but still, in the Bill already in Committee several most important amendments of the present law have received the sanction of the House, particularly one, which respects the limitation of the hours of labour of children—that portion of the working classes which forms an exception to the general principle, and is most entitled to the care of the Legislature. With respect, then, to children, a great change has by common consent been made. The duration of their labour, as fixed by law is now eight hours, the Committee have passed a Clause limiting it to six and a half hours, and have also come, with a view to education—and I will not despair of the education of the manufacturing districts—to a resolution imposing the very important regulation, that children shall not work both in the forenoon and afternoon of the same day. I am, therefore, not disposed to throw away the advantages of the new regulation, sanctioned by the Committee, and of those other arrangements contained in the present Bill, to which I anticipate the assent of the House. I am now, therefore, brought to that third course which I stated was a possible one for the Cabinet to adopt, namely, the possibility of the Government withdrawing the present Bill and asking for leave to introduce a Bill, not repealing the existing laws upon the subject, and re-enacting them; but a Bill for the purpose of amending the present law—introducing into it such improvements and modifications as have either already received the sanction of the House, or are still likely to meet with its approbation. That course we have determined to follow. I am bound in fairness to tell the House, that as we have resisted, so will we continue to resist any departure from the limit of the twelve hours restriction. It is right that I should at once state this distinctly. This declaration may perhaps not appear consistent with that respect which I most unfeignedly feel, and which I have stated that my Colleagues as unfeignedly feel, for the decision of this House; but if we could believe that we have forfeited the confidence of this House—that it was possible to form a Government to give effect to the principle of a Ten Hours' Bill—that principle decided upon by so small a majority; if we believed that all this was the case, then our course would be very different from that which we at present conceive it right to follow. But as the matter now stands—as the House has as yet given us no such intimation as I have hinted at—we conceive it to be our duty not to act hastily, but deliberately to pursue the course which I have indicated as that which we are desirous, and think it most expedient and advantageous to adopt. I am not aware that I have omitted to state anything which my Colleagues wish me to declare to the House. At all events, I hope that the House will acknowledge that I have concealed nothing. I hope, too, that I have said nothing that is inconsistent with the profound respect which I entertain towards a majority of this House, on whatever side that majority may be found. If the House will permit me to conclude with a Motion, I ought, perhaps, to move that the Order of the Day for the resolving itself into Committee on the Factories Bill be read for the purpose of being discharged. If, however, any hon. Gentleman should think that I am taking the House by surprise—if any hon. Gentleman should feel that impression, I shall feel it my duty to ask that the Order of the Day be postponed to Friday, for the purpose of giving the House time to consider what course it may be advisable to pursue. I move that the Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into Committee on the Factories Bill be now read.

Lord Ashley: Mr. Speaker, I think there can be no doubt that the most reasonable course for the House to take, will be that which has been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, namely, to allow the House until Friday next to consider its determination. I, for one, have certainly been taken by surprise, and although my own resolution as to the eventual course which I shall pursue has been in no way shaken, yet I own that I am at present undecided as to the course, with regard to this Motion, which it will be best for the House, and most prudent for myself, to adopt. It is, Sir, totally unnecessary for me to follow my right hon. Friend through the whole of his able statement. The question has already been fully discussed. Everybody has made up his mind on it, and not only has the discussion been ample, but, let me emphatically remark, the whole matter has been most solemnly decided. This great assembly, in their successive divisions, has affirmed the principle that twelve hours' labour is not to be endured; and, therefore, whatever opinion we may be called upon to pass next Friday, I do make to the House a solemn appeal to stand by its decision, and to uphold its recorded verdict. Upon that verdict, upon that decision, I take my stand, convinced, as I said before, that it is not necessary for me nor for any other person to deal with the subject by further argument. I must, however, before I sit down, express my regret that the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State, should have introduced into this discussion observations of a character which were carefully excluded from the previous debates upon this subject. I deplore that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to go out of his way in order to describe the present Motion as "the beginning of a course of Jack Cade legislation." However, Sir, I am not ashamed of, nor will I repudiate the title. Let me ask the House what was it gave birth to Jack Cade? Was it not that the people were writhing under oppressions which they were not able to bear? It was because the Government refused to redress their grievances that the people took the law into their own hands: and I tell the right hon. Baronet and those with whom he acts that, if they take not better care, this will be the effect again; and that, when they designate the people they oppress as rebels, with a Jack Cade for their leader, they are only, in my opinion, adding insult to injustice. As, however, the right hon. Gentleman has said that he will postpone the further consideration of the question until Friday, I will not detain the House any further at present. I have only to repeat, what I said at first, that this question has been most solemnly decided: on the decision of the House, three times recorded, I take my stand; and, as I shall never depart from the course I have adopted, so I trust none of those who voted with me will be found to depart from their solemn and recorded opinions.

Viscount Howick thought that the House could not with fairness and propriety decide upon the question at that time. But what was the course the Government was now proposing to adopt? They were told by the Government that they would not listen to any compromise. They would neither adopt a ten nor eleven hours' Bill, notwithstanding their own inspectors had told them that twelve hours' labour was more than ought to be borne. The evidence of the highest medical authorities went to the same effect, and yet the Government told them they would allow no reduction. What did the Government intend to do? They had been defeated on this Clause, and how did they propose to take the decision? Why, they took the extraordinary course of saying to the House, if you choose to regulate labour to a greater extent than we approve of, then you shall not regulate it at all. That was what the Government presumed to say to the House. At the present moment, let it be recollected there was no check at all on the labour of women. The inspectors appointed by the Government had reported that a check was absolutely necessary—that women, who were not, in fact, their own master, required and should have the same protection as children. Well, the Government said they would regulate this labour by confining it within the limit of twelve hours—the House said they would confine it to ten hours—and then the Government said to these females, and to the House, you shall have no limitation nor regulation at all. He now suggested to his noble Friend, that the course he should take on Friday night should be to resist the discharge of the order. If he allowed the Bill, which had now made such progress, to be withdrawn, what would be the effect? The Government would introduce a new Bill still more objectionable in the shape than the one now before the House—the noble Lord would have to repropose his Clause, and if it were carried again, the Government would drop the Bill. If the noble Lord meant to persevere, let him persevere on Friday next—if he is to have difficulties to encounter, rather let him meet them in the first instance than in the last. Let them go on with a measure in the shape in which their legislation might have some effect, rather than postpone our efforts until the lapse of time brought them to the close of the Session without any result, and if they were to carry out their hostility against the Government, let them act now rather than when the original proposers might be anxious to abandon their measure. He put this for his noble Friend's consideration, and at all events, when the motion was made to discharge the order for further considering the Bill, he, if he stood alone, would say "no" to it. Before he sat down he must say that the right hon. Gentleman had, from inadvertency or some other cause, misquoted in so remarkable a manner the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard as well as those which he (Viscount Howick) had used, that he could not, even with the certainty of future discussion, allow it to pass unnoticed. The right hon. Gentleman, obviously alluding to what he had said, remarked that the supporters of the Amendment were actuated in their proceeding by a sense of the intense competition that prevailed. That was not his argument. He did maintain, it was true, that intense competition was at the bottom of the evil, in consequence of the field of employment being too much restricted. He urged that they could not get rid of the evil, or go to the bottom of it, unless they were resolved to give a wider scope to that capital and labour which were now hedged in; but, he added, though they could not remove, they might palliate it. He further pointed out that the intense competition acted in this manner: it gave the power to one or two individuals to adopt and enforce a system of conducting great branches of manufacture in a manner to which the wishes of the majority of employers were strongly opposed, but that such practices, once introduced, gave so great advantages over competitors, that all, or nearly all, were compelled to adopt them. He said this, at least, was in the power of the Legislature, to restrict modes of carrying on labour which the parties engaged in are themselves disposed to object to. He expressed his belief, with reference to this system of twelve hours' labour for women and children, it was one to which the majority of those obliged to submit to it were strongly opposed. He believed it was their wish, knowing that some effect on their wages must be produced by the change, though not to the extent stated by the right hon. Gentleman, that their wives and children should be protected from an amount of toil which the Government Inspectors, Medical Officers, reported in the paper laid on the Table, was more than they should be required to perform. In the same manner, he asked those who listened to the very able speech of the honourable and learned Member for Liskeard, whether his argument had not been perverted? His hon. and learned Friend stated which he (Lord Howick) believed to be perfectly true, that they had left these parties too long to themselves. He was not going to debate that point now; but the right hon. Gentleman was evidently of the same opinion, because when he talked of this as a question of principle, he (Lord Howick) asked in what respect? It was no question of principle between the Government and those who supported the Amendment. One proposed to regulate the hours of labour as much as the other. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not conceive how it could benefit industry to limit the field of employment. He wanted to know, did not the Bill do this as much as the Amendment? Women were now frequently worked fifteen hours. [No.] Yes; it was so when trade was brisk, and there was a great pressure. [Mr. Ferrand: they are frequently worked eighteen hours.] Well, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to reduce the number of hours to twelve. He, therefore, "placed a limit to human industry." He admitted the limitation should be kept within as narrow bounds as possible; but he thought the result of inquiry had demonstrated that they could not trust so implicitly as some imagined to men, acting for their own interest, in devising what was best for themselves and the community. That this was so, was abundantly proved by the state of the dwellings of the poor, by the neglect of draining, and by the total absence of all proper sanitary and police regulations. The principle of interference with private property was one acted on every day, when any new public work was determined on. In the present artificial state of society, it was impossible to dispense with public regulation.

Mr. Brotherton felt great regret at the announcement which had been made by the Government. He had hoped that, seeing what the feeling of the House was, they would have proposed the medium of eleven hours; and such a proposal would, under the circumstances, have met with cordial acquiescence. It was very easy to say, that eleven hours would not satisfy popular demand, inasmuch as the hon. Member for Oldham declared that he thought eight hours would be work enough; but the truth was, if the change were now made in a proper spirit, agitation might continue, but no feeling in favour of it could be excited. He could not find fault with Government for expressing a strong desire to uphold our manufactures; but their apprehensions were wholly unfounded. We could all recollect when mills worked night and day with water power. That system ceased, yet no ruin ensued. The eleven hours was the time worked in silk and woollen mills already. Why not adopt the same change in the cotton mills?

Captain Rous congratulated the House on the present prospect of getting rid of this Bill. He had risen three times on the last night's debate, without having had the good fortune to catch the Speaker's eye, when he intended to have condemned the policy which interfered with self-government; and not only that, but also the unwarrantable interference with private establishments. For that reason he did not vote on the first debate; but on the last occasion, when it appeared to him it was a sort of party question—when he heard that Gentlemen, who voted for ten hours, acted in the spirit of party, it became his duty to vote for the twelve hours, because it appeared to be the lesser evil. To the Bill now before the House he objected in every sense of the word. Whoever had drawn up this Bill must have been totally ignorant not only of the feelings of the master-manufacturers and of the workmen, but of the system which was carried on in their districts. One of its provisions was, that persons sixteen years of age should be examined by a surgeon. We had heard to-night of Jack Cade, but he believed that the tax collector who had been destroyed by Wat Tyler, for taking liberties with his daughter, did not venture to assume the power which this Bill attempted to assert. It would be impossible to keep up our large establishments, if the master manufacturers did not, instead of dissipating their capital in idle pursuits, spend it to the extent of hundreds of thousands in promoting the prosperity of the country. In all such cases as the present, he placed himself in the situation of those affected by their legislation. Now suppose the House of Commons ordered him to give his servants eight half-holidays in the week, he should at once meet such a demand by saying, "I'll see you somewhere else first!" If a servant asked him for leave of absence on any urgent occasion, in all probability he should give it; but if the House of Commons said, "You shall do so," he should do the very contrary. He supposed the master manufacturers, who were high-minded men, felt as he should with regard to this intermeddling by others in business that did not concern them. He appealed to any Gentleman who had travelled in other countries, whether the moment Government interfered in private concerns, its withering hand did not paralyse every effort to attain success, and from that moment prosperity ceased. Let them look at such countries as Sweden and Prussia, where the people were so well educated that only one out of 377 could not read and write, and where even the children of prisoners were sent to school; and yet such was the deteriorating effect of this eternal intermeddling, that, according to Mr. Laing, there was three times the amount of crime there to be met with as in the same numbers in this country. Governments had quite enough to do to look after their own business; and if our present love of espionage were indulged, in three years this land would become a horrible desert. They must reduce the hours of labour from ten to eight, and no one could say where a limit was to be placed, if this spirit of legislation were once encouraged. The right hon. Secretary for the Home Department said, he did not anticipate that any Administration could be formed, with the noble Lord Ashley at its head, to carry a ten hours' Bill. God forbid there should. The noble Lord would make an excellent Archbishop of Canterbury—but speedy must be the downfall of this country if he ruled its destiny. What was the usual course of their debates? The noble Lord gave a horrible picture of the working-classes in the manufacturing districts. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Ferrand) abused the manufacturers in the most extravagant language, and said they treated their men worse than dogs. [Mr. Ferrand: "No, no."] He was not very particular about the words—but that was the hon. Gentleman's opinion. Well, the manufacturers very properly rebutted this accusation, and said the agricultural labourers were treated worse than dogs again. What was the effect of all this, but that when the poor man returned home after his twelve hours' work, and took up the newspaper to find a little comfort before he went to bed, he suddenly discovered he was a most ill-used, despicable being? Such a dose of these debates could not prove a very good soporific. Was it not quite enough for a man to have drawn a blank in life, without having his mind embittered by perpetual railings against the atrocious policy of those who ruled over him? He had spent many years of his life out of this country, and whenever he returned, he blessed God that there was no country in which the poor were better looked after by the rich, and in which there was such a fund of friendship, hospitality, and good feeling amongst all classes. There was no country, too, in which the labourers displayed so much good common sense as in this; and if they did not, the speeches of the noble Lord and others would have long since driven them mad.

Mr. V. Smith felt called on to correct some misrepresentations of the right hon. Gentleman rather than postpone his vindication to Friday. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman had not on Friday given an answer to the speeches on which he commented to-night. He was still more surprised at his adopting a description from a paper conducted with great ability, but not of the same politics as the right hon. Gentleman, at least since his accession to the present Administration. He neither uttered the words attributed to him by the right hon. Gentleman on the night when he spoke, nor did he see them adopted in any newspaper report which he had read. The right hon. Gentleman had said, that he contended that the Poor Law would be the resource of persons turned out of factories, and also that high wages were productive of immorality. He was anxious on that occasion, as he hoped he always was, not to detain the House long, and to get quickly over what he had to say, when he was interrupted by his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield—he hardly knew for what reason—who asked him how these persons were to live? To that he answered immediately—off hand—that certainly they could not starve. But he was the furthest possible from intending to say, what that hon. Gentleman now represented him as having said, that the Poor Law was to be their only resource against not being able to find employment; but he contended that that law, though he might not approve of it entirely, did serve as a provision for the poor, to prevent their being ground down below the possibility of finding the lowest sustenance. He then proceeded to argue, that the effect of a restriction of labour would be, that the working classes would have steady wages, and in addition to those wages, some leisure to themselves; and he said, that he thought it better they should have moderate wages with some portion of time to themselves, than extreme wages, without any time for recreation, whether of body or mind. He was prepared now, and ever should be, to contend, that it would be better for them to be in that position. He was saying when he was received with ironical cheers, that high wages were occasionally accompanied by immorality, but of course, he added, that he did not mean to apply the word high in this sense, to steady wages regularly earned, but to occasionally high wages received at periods when the demand was very great and excessive labour consequently in use on the part of the workmen. What he meant to say was, that overwork, with disproportionate wages, was often productive of immorality. The reason was obvious; overwork produced exhaustion and a craving for excitement, which led to immorality. He was speaking then only his own opinion; not having read the Reports, he had nothing at that time to quote, but he did not wish to trouble the House with statistics. He had since taken the trouble to read the Reports, and he might refer, in confirmation of his views to the second Report of the Children's Employment Commission, where it was stated that it was common to find men working almost to slavery on three days of the week, in order that they might be enabled to be idle, and often intemperate on the other three. Now, was not this exactly what he had meant? Three opinions were given in this Report, which expressed exactly the opinions he had endeavoured to state. There was that of the rev. Mr. Gilmour, minister of the Reformed Presbyterian congregation of Greenock, who said that high wages tend rather to encourage intemperance than to promote comfort among those receiving them. The sawyers of that town who got high wages, were also intemperate. Mr. Williamson, the procurator fiscal of the same place, said the high wages paid for work very laborious were apt to make workmen dissipated. Over exertion required corresponding periods of idleness, to which the boys were also accustomed. Mr. Hall, of Wolverhampton, said, in a conversation which he had with an employer of a great many workmen, he learned that those who had high wages were often drunkards, not for three days only, but all the week. Though he might not have guarded himself with sufficient care against misapprehension, he contended that he had used the word high in its legitimate sense, and he must continue to think that accidental high wages were not so beneficial to the workman as constant steady wages not accompanied by labour continued during so long a period of the day; and although he did not use the word, he was prepared to adopt it—that they would also be more acceptable to them than higher wages occasionally received, which were attended with injurious effects. But as for what had been put into his mouth by the right hon. Gentleman, he utterly rejected the absurdity of it, and must complain of the iniquity of imputing to him that he had any wish to reduce the working classes to dependence on the Poor Law. Whence the right hon. Gentleman derived this version of his speech, he was at a loss to imagine. The right hon. Gentleman could not have stated it from recollection of his speech for he had not been present in the House at the time. He would only add that he regretted very much that the right hon. Gentleman had taken the course which he now stated it was his intention to pursue. He had hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have taken the first course suggested, of proposing an eleven hours Bill. He believed that proposal would have been perfectly agreeable at the time; and when the right hon. Gentleman said his noble Friend held out such a menace of perseverance that he could not hope to mitigate his opposition, he thought his noble Friend might reply that some of the right hon. Gentleman's assertions had made a compromise impossible on his side, for he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman could pretend to say, with any shadow of reason, that one hour's diminution of labour would be the ruin of the whole country. He could only assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House that, from the long experience he had had of the character of his noble Friend, he believed throwing over the Bill would by no means mitigate his opposition, and that he would persevere in his endeavours. He believed his noble Friend would do so, if he knew that he was striving in a good cause, against both the Government and the people of England, and he would probably not the less do so when, as in the present instance, he was only acting against the Government, and was backed by the wishes of the whole people.

Sir James Graham said, he hoped the House would permit him to offer two or three words in explanation after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had said, that he (Sir James Graham) had put words into his mouth. Nothing, he could assure the House, was so far from his intention, and in order to avoid any thing in the shape of a quarrel when he referred to what had fallen from him, he did not point the allusion by a personal reference to the right hon. Gentleman. With respect to the accusation that he had put words into the right hon. Gentleman's mouth, he had by him the note he took at the time, which was to the effect that "no men could starve in this country, and that high wages led to vice and immorality in the manufacturing districts." He found that this was borne out by the report of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman; so that it appeared that both the Reporter and himself must have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, if he had spoken on the occasion referred to as he had now explained himself. In the Morning Chronicle of Saturday, the right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said, "It might diminish wages to a certain money amount, but he was prepared to make up for this by giving an additional hue of health to the people, and rewarding them in moral wages, which would be of more value to them than money itself." Then the interruption took place to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. An hon. Member asked, "How were they to live? His hon. Friend asked, how were they to live?" ["Order."] If he were pronounced to be irregular, he would bow at once to the decision of the Chair; but when one Member charged another with putting words into his mouth, which was the expression used by the right hon. Gentleman, he thought it was only demanded by fairness that he should be allowed to vindicate himself from the accusation. If the right hon. Gentleman said he had been misrepresented, he was bound to believe him; but in that case both himself and the Reporter, whose account tallied exactly with what he had stated to the House when he last addressed it, must have have been deceived; though of course the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to the fullest credit for what he had stated.

Sir R. Inglis did not rise to anticipate the discussion on this question, but he did wish to address a question to his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, not as a taunt, but in a friendly spirit—with respect to a phrase hazarded in the House by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, who had referred to what "I and my colleagues had done"—to the deliberations of the Cabinet. The right hon. Gentleman stated there were three courses open to Her Majesty's present confidential advisers, and that, on the whole, after full deliberation, without heat, and with entire possession of their tempers, as well as their faculties—they had come to the resolution to recommend to the House the course stated by the right hon. Gentleman. Now, he wished to ask his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, whether it were the form of the Minute of the Cabinet, or whether it were to be taken as the deliberate opinion of Her Majesty's present confidential advisers, that in respect to ninety-seven of those who ordinarily supported their measures, it should be alleged in this House, with their united sanction, that such supporters had concurred in a course which the right hon. Gentleman had ventured to call the commencement of a system of Jack Cade legislation. He sincerely believed he was giving his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government an opportunity, of which if he were wise, he would gladly avail himself, to disown the application of that which he must call—he would not apply any epithet to it, because he would not provoke an angry feeling. He asked the question in order to ascertain whether the head of the Government adopted the phrase.

Sir J. Graham.—I certainly did use the phrase [cries of "spoke."] With submission, Sir, I consider that I am entitled to give an answer to the question which has been put to me by the hon.

Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford in so friendly a spirit. Notwithstanding the friendly tone, the hon. Member for the University of Oxford has contrived to make his question cause as much pain as he could. The hon. Member was well aware when he put his question, that the language in which I addressed the House was not that which was dictated by my Colleagues, but that the expressions which fell from me were those in which I chose to convey their determination, and my honest impressions to the House—and he was also perfectly aware that no one could be responsible for them but myself. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford must also have been aware that the expression to which he referred was not used as my own language. I stated distinctly that it was an expression which I had met with in a particular newspaper—that I had seen it within the last forty-eight hours—and I stated further, that as an individual, I was perfectly willing to give my assent to it, and adopt it. I do think that the House has adopted a system of legislation which may be so designated, but I utterly disclaim the idea that when I used the expression I was speaking the language of my Colleagues. I do trust that when my hon. Friend—if he will allow me to call him so—I trust that, with his kind and friendly feeling, my hon. Friend will not carry an expression which I used in the heat of debate one step further than it was intended by myself.

Sir R. Inglis certainly had known his right hon. Friend so long, that if he were willing to call him by that title, he certainly would be very unwilling to renounce the privilege; and he said this in a cordial and friendly spirit. But his right hon. Friend would excuse him for saying that his question did not refer to the imagination, memory, or judgment from which that expression proceeded; but simply to the point, whether the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had adopted it.

Mr. Bernal was not going to discuss this wide subject on the present occasion, because Friday next would be the proper time. Though he could bear out his right hon. Friend opposite in the statement that in the phrase "Jack Cade legislation," he referred to something which had appeared in a newspaper, he had yet heard nothing from him which could induce him to suppose that he did not affiliate, if he might say so, that term. With respect to the Bill of the Government, he also might claim for those on that side of the House who voted in union with the Holy Alliance on that occasion, the repudiation of any right to be saddled with the name of Jack Cade. All he could say was, if they merited the title of Tylers and Cades, the right hon. Baronet was himself implicated in it, as had been well adverted to in argument again and again. The introduction of the Bill itself was in fact part of that system. The Government had certainly oiled the hinges of the door which was to open on them, and let forth a flood of all that was bad in political economy. It ought not to be forgotten that the initiative had been taken four years ago, nay much earlier, when the Legislature interfered to give protection to parish apprentices. They had been successful thus far, because they had gone step by step, and backed by the feeling of the public at large; and when the sympathies of the public were enlisted in a cause, he defied them to find any political specific which would enable them to stand successfully against the public demands. It would be bad taste and bad policy then to enter further into the discussion, but he would strongly advise his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) to pause before adopting the advice tendered him by his noble Friend on his right, the Member for Sunderland (Viscount Howick). Having voted sincerely with his noble Friend, he hoped he should be excused from saying he rather dissented from the advice. The noble Lord should not encumber himself with such a Bill as the present; it would be like a mill-stone round his neck. It would be quite impossible for him to carry the Bill forward; if he attempted to do so, he would find himself entirely led by contradictions, inconsistencies, and absurdities, at every step he took, and at the end of his exertions, he would not find that he had approximated to his object in anything like the same degree as at the present moment. He would also venture to tender some advice to the right hon. Gentleman. He would ask, did he think he had found a resting place for peace and quietness? After the advice tendered by the Commissioners of the Factory Inquiry, that he must legislate and diminish the labour of adult women, did the right hon. Gentleman think that the nation would be satisfied, that the manufacturing operatives would be satisfied, that the noble Lord would be satisfied, by merely bringing in a Bill to regulate the labour of young children, and the mode of giving medical certificates? He would tell the right hon. Gentleman it was impossible to rest here, and he saw no promise of peace in this determination. His noble Friend would, of course, move, during the progress of the Bill through the Committee, to insert his clauses, and if the title of the new Bill should not warrant the formal introduction of those clauses, they all knew how easy it would be for the noble Lord or any other Member to move an instruction to the Committee to facilitate that object. He pressed the noble Lord to pause for consideration, because he saw that he had listened to the advice of the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, and he bitterly feared at that moment that he was about to throw himself into a gulf of confusion in which he would be lost without a hope of safety.

Viscount Sandon wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Home Department. Did he understand the Bill, now to be introduced, would contain new regulations regarding female adult labour?

Sir J. Graham said, the question put to him by his noble Friend was most important, and one to which he could at once give a decided answer. He had stated, if the House would permit him to withdraw the Bill now under consideration, it would be his duty to ask leave to bring in a Bill not to repeal and re-enact all the existing laws, but to alter and amend the existing law, and that it was his intention to introduce, or to propose rather, such amendments in the existing Bill as had already received the sanction of the House, or as he had reason to believe would meet with general approbation. Immediately before the discussion as to the periods of ten or twelve hours, the House had been called to consider as to the introduction into the Clause of the words "adult females," on which the right hon. Member for Northampton had raised a question—nay, even a debate as to the propriety of that limitation of female labour. He conceived that virtually the House had adopted that limitation, and certainly, it was his intention, in the Bill he should ask leave to introduce, to include a provision as to female adult labour—that no female should labour in a factory for a longer period than twelve hours in any single day.

Mr. Hindley exceedingly regretted the course, which Government had adopted on this occasion. He thought the Secretary for the Home Department had signified his intention to bow to the decision of the Committee on Friday, and that he would have come down prepared to propose that the blank should be filled up with the word "eleven," and give them an eleven hours' Bill. He earnestly entreated the Government to reconsider this subject before Friday next, and to deliberate whether they should not propose a compromise. It could not be supposed for a moment that Government had settled the question. He would tell the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government that he was responsible for the course he was at present taking. He would advise the working classes to abstain from anything illegal or contrary to the principles of peace and good order, but to persist in their demand, and they were certain of success.

Mr. Ferrand merely rose for the purpose of noticing a remark made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when he said that all the parties who supported the ten hours' Bill belonged to the "Jack Cade" party. He understood the right hon. Baronet had adopted the expression; if he retracted it, of course he had not another word to say.

Sir J. Graham said, perhaps it would be better he should explain the expression he had used. He had ventured to assert that the arguments by which the Measure was supported appeared to him more dangerous than the Measure itself; among others which appeared to him more peculiarly dangerous was this—that we had entered on a new state of society, and that a new system of Legislation was necessary for that state of society; that so far from interference being the exception, we had arrived at a point where it should be general, and that there could be no limits to it except those of possibility. He went on to state that such a system of Legislation appeared to him to be fraught with danger; that he had seen the expression of "Jack Cade legislation" applied to it, and to that expression he was prepared to assent. He objected to the system as one of general interference, but he had certainly not intended to use any expression offensive to any individual of that House, much less to a majority.

Lord J. Russell: I rise chiefly for the purpose of begging my noble Friend who brought forward this Question, and who has conducted it hitherto with so much ability and discretion, to take seriously into consideration the course he shall think best to adopt. I am not about to counsel him to take the advice of my noble Friend near me, the noble Member for Sunderland, nor that of my Friend the hon. Member for Weymouth. It is not for me to advise him as to what course he may think fit to adopt. The Question is a very grave and important one, and it is hardly necessary for me to say that I hope he will give it deliberate attention before he states to the House the course he thinks fit to adopt. I am not much moved by the right hon. Gentleman's charge, belonging to me as one who voted for the noble Lord's proposition, of having commenced a system of Jack Cade legislation. I do not feel peculiarly that charge, but I certainly do not wonder that his hon. Friends, the Member for the University of Oxford and others, who have generally prided themselves on maintaining the most Conservative principles of any Gentlemen in this House, should feel hurt at the application to them of an expression which seems to imply that nothing but the most reckless revolution is the end at which the Legislature of the day professes to aim. But with respect to the justice, either of that phrase or of the general statements contained in the right hon. Gentleman's speech, though I may have another occasion on Friday to speak of it, I cannot avoid saying that I must protest against it. I conceive that the general principle by which legislation on these subjects should be guided has been already departed from by all parties, by the Estates of the Realm themselves. What more general principle could we acknowledge than that which tells us that children should be left to the care and affection of their own parents, and that these ties are sufficient to protect them in their nurture and education, and from any ill-treatment by which their health might be destroyed? Such is the general principle which the Legislature should be bound to respect. But have we kept to that principle? No; we have thought it necessary to depart from it, with respect to apprentices in factories, so early as the commencement of the present century, and with the sanction of a person whose name carries the authority that belongs to a man who acquired great wealth by honourable pursuits, and applied it with benevolence and generosity. Under such authority, this system of legislation was commenced. That principle was again adopted in 1833, with the sanction of the the right hon. Gentleman opposite, of whom I had then the honour of being a colleague. But there is another principle which is as sacred, although a totally different one. That principle is, that all adults should be perfectly free to dispose of their labour and industry as they please, that they should make whatever bargains and contracts they will with respect to the extent of their labour, and the remuneration they are to receive for it. Are we bound to that principle? Why, the Government themselves—the present Government—have departed from it in the Bill before the House; and inconsistent as I am, and admit myself to be, they too, have been inconsistent with regard to their conduct since last year, because if there had not been other matters which deferred the consideration of the Factory Bill last year, there would have been, probably, a Bill passed with their sanction, which did not contain the principle of interference with adult labour. For the right hon. Gentleman now to say there are two parties, one wishing to adhere to the rigid principle by which there shall be no interference with industry, and that the others were attempting to carry through a mischievous Jack Cade principle of legislation, to which he, and those who vote with him are opposed, is stating the question in a totally different manner. I confess I do not think I should have been a party to introducing a Bill which interfered with the labour of adult females; but when it is introduced with the authority of Government, supported by the reports of inspectors, and meets with the general concurrence of the House, certainly I will not undertake the responsibility of objecting to a Bill containing that principle, though I might not myself have introduced it. But with respect to the question on which we shall have again to pronounce a decision when it comes before us, it is merely this, whether you should protect young persons by reducing their hours of labour from twelve to ten. That involves the question whether young per-thought, applicable. His arguments were used openly before a full House; the right hon. Baronet was present on Friday, and he did not answer: on Monday, the right hon. Baronet came down to the House and called him names; and he left the House and the country to judge between them.

Sir R. Peel said, his hon. Friend had not entered so fully into details as the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to suppose; but, as the Government had taken a course at variance with the opinion of a majority of that House, and as the Government professed a desire to treat that House with all deference and consideration short of sacrificing their own opinions and convictions, his right hon. Friend had thought it due to the House to state the grounds upon which Her Majesty's Ministers had formed their opinions; and in the course of his address his right hon. Friend had stated that he could not concur in the practical proposal of his noble Friend to limit the number of the hours of labour to ten; but that he thought the arguments upon which that proposal was founded were still more alarming than that practical measure itself. His right hon. Friend had then briefly referred to three courses of argument taken, not on that (the ministerial), but on the other side of the House—namely, the arguments of the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, and lastly those of the hon. and learned Member of Liskeard. The hon. and learned Member must excuse him if he expressed the opinion that his right hon. Friend had correctly represented the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that this measure was not one to be regarded in the abstract, but upon its individual merits. He had attended to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and had a strong recollection of the hon. and learned Gentleman saying that the measure came recommended to him, because it was the first step in a bold and novel system of legislation. He had the strongest impression that those were the words which had been used by the hon. and learned Gentleman; who had also further said, that he was prepared to follow out the measure into all the legitimate and logical consequences involved in the original measure itself. The hon. and learned Gentleman argued that a new state of society had grown up requiring new principles of legislation, and that therefore the old course must be abandoned and a new one begun. The hon. and learned Gentleman went on to state that he would push his principles to their utmost practical extent, and that he would carry legislative interference with labour so far as he could consistently with this, that he did not establish a domestic inquisition more intolerable than the evils he sought to remedy. Now his right hon. Friend had referred to the general line of argument, and had stated that one of the reasons for the decision that had been arrived at by Her Majesty's Government was, that not only they feared the practical consequences of this restriction upon adult labour; but, viewing it as the hon. and learned Gentleman had himself stated, as the first step in a future course of legislation upon the subject, that very consideration confirmed their apprehensions, and induced them to say that they could not advise the House to enter upon such a course of legislation. The hon. and learned Gentleman had protested against the quotation of his speech delivered on Friday; but Mr. Cade might, if living, equally object to quotations made from his delivered so long a time before; and he must say that the principle contended for by Mr. Cade appeared to be not very different from those advocated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. When his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford had asked him (Sir R. Peel) whether he adopted the term "Jack Cade legislation" or not? he did not think it becoming in him to answer such a question. He had not thought it possible that any one would have thought that his right hon. Friend (Sir James Graham) had applied the phrase to hon. Gentlemen either on that or the other side of the House. His right hon. Friend was speaking of the consequences of certain principles contended for on the other side. He rose, however, principally for the purpose of saying that this had never been considered by the Government as a mere departmental question, but as one involving the most important principles. The decision conveyed by his right hon. Friend was not the decision of a Minister, but the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, formed without fear of incurring responsibility, feeling it to be their duty, after mature consideration of the position in which this question had been placed by the decision of a majority and its subsequent reversal. It was impossible not to perceive that the question had been left in a very embarrassing state. The Government had considered all these things, and the determination to which they had come was, that it was their duty to oppose themselves even to the decision of a majority of that House, to give the country an opportunity of first considering whether a measure of this kind would be for the welfare of that class in which all must take the deepest interest—he meant the working class. Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that it would not be for the interest of that class to sanction the proposed restriction on the hours of labour, and although in a minority, they conceived, as he had stated the other night, that they were performing one of the first duties and most important functions of a Government in opposing themselves to that which they believed was founded in error. These considerations had induced Her Majesty's Ministers to come to this conclusion, that it was not wise to expose the manufacturers of this country to that competition to which they must be exposed if you compelled, by your legislation, adult labour in this country to submit to a restriction involving loss of wages, and the diminished production and increased price of the article manufactured. Now, without taunting hon. Gentlemen opposite with taking a different view from that they formerly held upon this question, he would merely repeat what had been said by his right hon. Friend, that the Government had inherited the Bill from their predecessors, and that the same views now taken by Her Majesty's Government had been taken by others when in power. But his right hon. Friend had never implied that if the opinions of hon. Gentlemen were changed, it was not their duty to act upon that change. He trusted that on Friday next the House would be prepared to consider this great subject, not as a party question, but as one involving the commercial prosperity of the country, and the permanent interests of the working men, to enter upon the discussion with that calmness which best befitted the topic.

Viscount Sandon hoped his noble Friend would acquiesce on Friday in the proposal of Government to withdraw the present Bill, and introduce a fresh Bill. From the course which Government had pursued, and from the language which they had before held, he had hoped that they would have come to a different determination. He would recal for one moment the words which the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) made use of when the House decided in favour of a ten hours' Bill by a majority of nine; the right hon. Baronet then declared that he had insuperable objections to a ten hours' Bill, which he believed would be fatal to the commercial prosperity, and injurious to the moral condition, of the country. But how could Government, or indeed how could any one suppose that the difference between a ten hours and a twelve hours' Bill would exercise so baneful an influence, not only on the commercial prosperity but also the social peace of the country? He had hoped that on a previous occasion when he heard the words of the right hon. Baronet, and he was glad of it too, that Government were holding out the olive branch to his noble Friend and his supporters. He was grieved, however, to learn by his right hon. Friend's declaration that evening that such was not the case, and that Government was determined to adhere to its own views. He confessed, that to him it appeared a most unwise course that they should tie themselves down to the proposition that the only and exact amount of interference that the commercial prosperity of this country admitted of was to the restriction of twelve hours. He regretted it the more especially, because by the course which the Government were pursuing, he believed that they were placing themselves in opposition to the public sympathy and to the feelings of the manufacturers themselves, which were running in favour of restriction—nay, he believed that they were placing themselves in opposition to the feelings of the great majority of all classes. He repeated, that he was grieved to find that the Government was raising a new barrier, and restricting themselves to a course which he could not but pronounce most unwise. He held in his hand a letter from a manufacturer, in which he stated that in his opinion Lord Ashley had gone too far in his proposition of a ten hours' Bill, but he willing to take the middle course, and agree to an eleven hours' Bill. When men interested in those matters—when manufacturers themselves said that they feared not some limitation, he could not but regret that the Government had refused all compromise. That course was not to have been expected from the language which they had held. It was inconsistent with their own interests. He could have wished that they had at least maintained their opinions on grounds a little less broad than those on which they had. He was not surprised at the supporters of Government shrinking from pledging themselves to such broad principles. He was, however, surprised to find that a Government which recognised the principle of interference in the cases of women and children should make a wide and insuperable difficulty in interfering with men. If their principles were sound, if their principles were good for any thing, they must, at least to be consistent, repeal all former Factories Bills that in any way recognised the principle of interference.

Mr. Morrison expressed his belief that the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire would not only be injurious to the labouring classes, but that it would injure the export trade of this country. The cotton trade was in a peculiar condition. The competition with America was enough to prevent, in prudence, any such measure as that which was proposed by the noble Lord. It would most materially injure our cotton and woollen trades, with which there was a growing competition. In the United States they had a most formidable rival—the cotton factories not only in Massachusetts, but in almost every State of America, were daily adding to their power of competition with us. In that country, where legislation took place upon almost every subject, they had not thought of interfering with or restricting the number of hours that the labouring classes worked. In that country, from the system of Universal Suffrage which prevailed, the Operatives themselves in part made the laws. They had the power in their own hands of making such laws; surely, then, if the number of hours which they worked was found to be oppressive, they would interfere and place some restrictions on the amount of labour that they might be called upon to perform. Such had not been the decision of the working classes in America, and he believed that, when the operatives in this country understood the question and their own interests, they would adopt the views of Her Majesty's Government. There had been of late, and he thanked God for it, a great improvement in the condition of the working classes. And he begged the House not to hazard a return to that state from which they were then happily emerging, by any such ill-timed restrictions as those proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire.

Lord Stanley begged the House to excuse him for a few moments, as he was anxious to call attention to what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. He was anxious so to do, because the noble Lord had urged two grounds of complaint against the Government, in both of which the noble Lord laboured under a misapprehension. In the first place the noble Lord said, that the Government had placed no importance upon the twelve hours' restriction; and that they were magnifying into vast importance the broad lines of demarcation between the noble Lord and the Government. So far from that being a true statement of the case—so far from Government thinking the matter of no importance, if hon. Gentlemen would only recollect for a moment, they would find that Government had made a most emphatic declaration of their intention to oppose the motion of the noble Lord (Lord Ashley). So far from the Government thinking the subject of restriction of no importance, it was a matter of notoriety that it was in consequence of the difference of opinion between the noble Lord and the Government on that question, that they were deprived of the assistance and support of the noble Lord. That, at all events, showed that it was no unimportant subject to them. The noble Lord (Lord Sandon) said, that by their restriction of twelve hours, they had admitted the principle of interference, and if they opposed his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) they must proceed further, and repeal all former factories Bills. They had, it was true, admitted the principle of interference, but they believed that that interference was justified by the peculiar circumstances of the case. The difference between the noble Lord and the Government was a broad difference in detail rather than in principle, yet involving no unimportant consequences. He believed that he could foresee both to labourers and manufacturers, in the present artificial state of society, evils which admitted of interference in factory legislation; but he also believed that the interference of the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) would frustrate his own benevolent objects, and involve the manufacturing interests in the deepest distress. It was not the principle of interference or non-interference that they were contending for—but whether it were wise, safe, or politic to place additional restrictions upon the labour of the working classes, and whether such additional restrictions should not be compulsory, but permissive. His noble Friend said, that the Government had now made a declaration which was never to be departed from. Was there then to be allowed to them no mitigation—no limitation—was no change of circumstances to allow of any alteration in their opinions? Was their decision to be fixed and unalterable? He complained of the way in which their opinions had been represented. The Government believed that the consequences of their measure would not materially affect the manufacturing interests; but not so with the proposition of the noble Lord (Ashley). His conviction was, that the result of the noble Lord's measure, in the future, would be prejudicial to the interests of the labouring as well as the master classes. He should be deluding his noble Friend (Lord Ashley), it would be unworthily deluding the labouring classes, if he said that these opinions were founded on temporary circumstances: at the same time it was not safe, it was not wise, to hold out any expectation that what they could not do this year they might do the next. He thought it better to state general principles, on which he felt bound to act. All classes would have good grounds to complain, if the Government, falling into the general expressions of humanity, were to give a partial acquiescence, by holding out a hope that in the course of a limited period they might be induced to yield, to get rid of a temporary difficulty. He perfectly admitted that there was no declaration of any Government which was founded, not on broad principles, but public welfare, that would not admit of a gross dereliction of principle. There was no question on which it could be safely said, that no time, no circumstances would alter the opinions concerning it. He believed, on consideration, that the proposition of the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) would produce more of disadvantage than good; and if, in his deliberate judgment and consideration, he believed that that proposition was calculated to bring down evil upon those whom his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) desired to serve, but upon whom, if successful, he would inflict an irreparable injury, he should not be acting a wise, a safe, or honest part, if he did not express such conviction candidly to the noble Lord and his supporters.

Mr. Hawes said that no one could complain of the manner in which the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had expressed his opinions. With regard to the interference with adult labour—if he thought, as he earnestly did think, that it was possible to maintain a more definite time of labour without injury to the great manufacturing interests of the country—then he concluded they were bound so to do. The question having been raised, he thought that both on sound and commercial grounds there was a just reason for the limiting the hours of labour. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, had held out as an argument against a ten hours' Bill, the fear of a strike among the labouring classes; but strikes among the labouring classes did not turn upon questions of wages, they arose from the ignorance of the labouring classes. He regarded the principle of interference as dangerous to the interests of the working classes; but that he held that Government had it in their power to make up to the labouring classes for any reduction that might accrue to their wages from legislative interference. He maintained that he had a right, as Government had raised the question of limiting adult labour, to take that view; if he could carry it farther on social and commercial grounds, he had a right so to do, especially when he expected, by so acting, to gain immense advantages to the labouring classes and the country. The principle of interference had been recognised, and had been tried and sustained by experience; if then, in deference to public opinion, Government must bow, he hoped, by compelling the interference with labour to gain other advantages to the labouring classes, to compensate them for any diminution in their wages that may result therefrom.

Mr. Aglionby entirely coincided with the opinion expressed by the noble Lord, that that was a measure of detail rather than of principle. Whenever he saw any measure brought forward for the benefit of the people, although they might be called Jack Cade principles—he cared not, for hard words broke no bones—he felt bound to give them his support in the discharge of his duty to his constituents and the country. He could not but express his gratification at the plain straightforward statement of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley). He had been led away from the question; his hon. friends around him boldly and plainly denounced the principles of interference, but these were not the principles of Her Majesty's Government. They recognised the principle of interference. The whole of their legislation was based upon that principle. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) could not abandon the Bill. He could see no more danger likely to accrue from limiting the hours of labour to ten, than from limiting them to twelve. He did not disguise from himself that it was a matter of very great importance, but he could not bring his mind to believe, that the safety of the country and our commercial prosperity depended on our non-interference with the factories labour.

Mr. Ewart said, that if the Government had adopted the compromise of eleven hours which was held out to them, they would have been generally supported by the House. All which he had heard convinced him that the Government might have adopted with propriety an eleven hours' Bill. So far from bringing agitation to an end by the course which the Government had pursued, they had rather fanned the flame. They had now, he believed, allowed the time to go by in which it was possible to effect a compromise. He thought that Government had taken a most unwise course in that which they had pursued.

Dr. Bowring did not think that this was a question that could be settled by compromise, and was convinced that any steps taken to produce additional interference between the masters and workmen would be injurious to both. On one side of the House, Ministers had been deserted by some of their most zealous and excitable supporters, and, on the other, changes of opinion had occurred which he deeply regretted. The manufacturers, with few exceptions, were opposed to the proposition of the noble Member for Dorsetshire, and although their workmen were just as strongly and as generally in its favour, he was sure that ere long they would see reason to rue the part they had taken. Nevertheless, the time had arrived when the experiment must be tried; the disposition in favour of trying it could not long be resisted, but those who so eagerly urged legislation forward would soon wish that they had opposed it just as strenuously. The working classes would have to pay the penalty of their enthusiasm in favour of the proposed alteration of the law. They were preparing the way for a frightful crisis. He believed it to be a great delusion that the same wages might be obtained by a smaller number of hours' labour. He had withdrawn from any active part in the discussion, foreseeing that the experiment could not be resisted, and that obedience must be paid to the strength of public opinion.

Mr. Mitchell was persuaded that the reduction of hours would have the effect of throwing many hands out of employ—that the consequence of that would be a reduction of the quantity of goods manufactured, and an advance in the price of them. This unhappy result must do the most fatal injury to the export trade of the country, and encourage foreign competition.

Mr. Escott said, that he voted against the proposition of the noble Lord, for he thought the measure of the Government was likely to prove a salutary change. Though it might not be quite sound in principle, it did appear to him a great improvement upon the existing state of the law. He came prepared to make concessions to the demands of the working classes, but yet, when he heard the speech of the noble Lord, he found no argument in it to show that the change which he proposed would be for the benefit of the people. The noble Lord completely avoided the commercial part of the question, and he, as well as those who supported him, recommended those views by sentiments which could not be too strongly censured. The tendency of their arguments was clearly revolutionary; they paraded grievances, and they threatened violence if those grievances were not redressed, while by no arguments that they brought forward did they show that their proposed measure would remove the causes of complaint. In his opinion, the course which the Government took was the only course consistent with their own honour or the interests of the people.

Mr. Brochlehurst said, that the hon. Member for Inverness had been mistaken as to some of the facts which he had stated. It was not his case, but it certainly was the case of many hon. Members, that they spoke on this question really knowing very little about it. They had not, and could not, have any experience, and so they made up the want of experience with a great deal of philosophy. The right hon. Baronet would hear more that was worth hearing in relation to it in one hour at the Home Office than for a dozen of hours in another place which he was in the habit of frequenting. He opposed all restriction upon labour, and rather required a reason for supporting the limits of twelve hours than for opposing those or any limits.

Order of the Day read.

Committee postponed to Friday.

POOR LAWS (IRELAND.) Mr. French rose for the purpose of complaining that certain Returns, regarding the operation of the Poor Laws in Ireland, for which he had formerly moved, had not been made by the Poor Law Commissioner. He observed that he might have claimed precedence for the question, on the ground that it related to a breach of privilege.

The Speaker said, that the usual practice before making such a complaint a matter of privilege, was to move that the Returns be furnished forthwith, and if that were not done, then to proceed as the hon. Member suggested. On the Order of the Day being read for going into Committee on the Mutiny Bill, the hon. Member would be at liberty to bring forward his statement.

Order of the Day read for the Committee on the Mutiny Bill.

Mr. French would then proceed briefly to lay before the House the facts which influenced him in bringing forward the motion of which he had given notice relative to the conduct of the Poor-law Commissioners, and the reasons which induced him to consider the delay of which he complained to have been systematic and intentional. On the 13th of February, last year, a Return was ordered at his instance, of the number, name, and local situation of each workhouse in Ireland, which had within itself no supply, or an insufficient supply of spring water; also specifying the houses from which the sewerage was not sufficient. On the 24th of March, as no Return appeared likely to be made, he felt it to be his duty to place a Notice on the Book—

“That the documents he had called for were such as, if the Commissioners were properly discharging their duties, must have been within their immediate reach—that the delay in presenting them was a contempt of the authority of the House of Commons, and that he should move Mr. George Nicholls and Mr. Cornwall Lewis be called to the bar, to answer for it.”

A few days after this notice was given, a paper was sent in, professing to be, which it was not, the Return called for. On the 11th of August, 1843, on a motion made by him, a Return was ordered of the number and names of the Assistant Commissioners in Ireland; the names of the districts and unions to which they were attached, and the number of their attendances during the last six months at each workhouse. This was a Return which ought to have been made within twenty-four hours, but it had never yet been given. On the 6th of February, of the present year, a Return was ordered of the dates and places where the military or police had been employed during the past year in enforcing the collection of Poor-rates in Ireland, specifying the number of men employed, and the amount of rate collected. Could any person believe the Commissioners had not in their possession the means of making this Return, and that, if favourable to the working of the Irish Poor-law, it would not have been instantly given? No Return however had yet been made. Under ordinary circumstances he might be disposed to attribute the neglect in furnishing these Returns either to the pressure of business in the Poor-law Office, or to accident; but when he reflected that the continuance of this useless, expensive, and despotic Commission depended entirely on the state of ignorance in which Her Majesty's Government could be kept, as to the real working of the law, and the feelings of the Irish people in respect to it; the conviction forced itself on his mind, that the delay in furnishing the information called for, was, on the part of the Commissioners, wilful and intentional. It would not suit them that the truth should be known. Since the arrival of Mr. Nicholls in Ireland to the present day, this Commission had been misleading the Government, mocking the House of Commons, and impoverishing the country in which it was unfortunately located. He considered the Returns he had moved for, if honestly and correctly given, would be likely to undeceive the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department as to the state of affairs in Ireland; and, should the right hon. Gentleman by any accident arrive at the truth, from his clearness of mind and firmness of purpose, there would in his (Mr. French's) opinion be a speedy end both to Commission and Commissioners in Ireland. He should proceed to lay before the House the nature of the information sought to be brought before them by the Returns he had moved for. On the 7th of February, 1844, by a letter from Ballinasloe, he was informed that

"Military preparations had been made to enforce the payment of Poor-rates, as the people in the neighbourhood of Mountbellew had declared their resolution to resist this obnoxious impost; that troops had been poured in from Athlone and other adjoining quarters. Yesterday 700 soldiers and police marched to the scene of expected action. The peasantry, in number about 300, armed with pitchforks, cut the road across and threw up embankments showing the fullest determination of waging war to the knife even with this formidable force. Fortunately, by the great personal exertions of an active, intelligent, and popular magistrate in the county, Captain Kelly of Fairfield, matters were prevented coming to extremity."

Captain Kelly has received a very handsome letter from the Irish government, for the assistance he that day afforded. Two days after this, February 9th, a statement appeared in the public papers,

"That the entire tract of country between Menlo and Abbert was in open resistance to the payment of Poor-rates; the police had been assaulted with stones by the peasantry when endeavouring to enforce their collection, and but for the exertions of Captain Warburton, the stipendiary magistrate, blood would have been abundantly shed."

In addition to this, he had an important communication to lay before them which he had received from the Catholic dean of the diocese of Galway (Doctor Kirwan), showing how the Act worked in the barony of Moycullen. He stated that

"From the entire district there never had been at any time a dozen paupers in the union workhouse; from the parishes of Moycullen and Killanin he had been informed there was not one—from his own parish (Outerarde) he knew there was not one. For which reasons the injustice of the law was peculiarly felt, and there was a general refusal amongst the people to pay the rate; no person connected with the district would undertake to collect the rate, from its great unpopularity. A collector was sent from Dublin by the Poor-law Commissioners at a considerable salary; he resided at the best hotel in the place—but, as he was unable to identify the rated property, an assistant was employed, at the rate of five shillings a day. To protect him in the performance of his duties, were sent Major Brook, of the 69th Regiment, with two companies of Infantry, Captain Bonham, with a troop of the 10th Hussars, two sub-inspectors of police—Messrs. Coffey and Clune, and a force of constabulary amounting to fifty rank and file, with two stipendiary magistrates, Messrs. Jones and Duff. A large portion of the parish of Kilcummin lies along the shore of the Bay of Galway, and, as the island of Lettermullin was thought inaccessible to the military, it was determined that the Poor-rates in this part of the union should be collected under the intimidation of a naval armament."

It had been stated by an hon. Baronet, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, on a former occasion, that the naval force had not been employed in this manner. He had the authority of his noble Friend Lord Monteaigle, to say, that during his stay in Ireland, the end of October or the beginning of November last, the Stromboli, war-steamer, was sent from the Shannon to enforce the payment of Poor-rate in the vicinity of Clew Bay. To return to the statement of Dean Kirwan:

"Two of her Majesty's steamers, the Dee and the Comet, with two revenue cruisers, and Captain White, of the water-guard, with his force, were all collected and concentrated for this worthy purpose, and this entire naval and military force brought to bear on one parish (Kilcummin), the amount of whose Poor-rate was about 200*l*. The campaign commenced on the 29th of September last, and, notwithstanding this great force, and the enormous expense then and since incurred, one-fourth of the rate still remains uncollected, and much of it must ever remain so, as the wretched creatures from whom it is attempted to be extorted are themselves more fit to be inmates than supporters of a union workhouse."

The rev. Gentleman went on to say—

"Was it possible to procure a return of the expenses incurred by those proceedings; he was confident it would be found that every shilling collected in that district for Poor-rates had cost the county a pound."

It was precisely such a Return as this, he (Mr. French) was seeking to obtain. He regretted more than he could say that Her Majesty's Government chose to identify themselves with the continuance of this odious and inoperative law, to which, according to their own account, they had given a doubtful and reluctant consent—a law from which no possible advantage could result, unless walling in a handful of paupers was to be taken as a remedy for the destitution of a nation—a law upheld wholly and solely by British bayonets, in defiance of the wishes and in opposition to the interests of the country—a law which a dignitary in the Catholic Church has well described as enacted, not for, but against Ireland—a law which the Commissioners of Poor Inquiry long since warned them, if passed, must, after great expense and much discontent, be repealed, and the workhouses built under it abandoned—a law the continuance of which for two years longer, one whose knowledge of Ireland and the feelings of her people could not be disputed—Mr. O'Connell—had told them must inevitably goad the people of Ireland into rebellion—a law which the firmest political supporters of the present Government in Ireland had openly denounced as unsuited and unsuitable to the habits and wants of the Irish people—a law, the operation and effects of which had been admirably summed up, in a letter addressed to the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, by a political friend, Mr. Daly, of Tullamore: who stated that, although the Irish Poor-law passed in 1838, it had not come into full operation in May, 1843. By a Return before the House of Commons it appeared, on the 16th of that month, thirty-one workhouses were then unopened, although on the staff of the Irish Poor-law Department, during that period, one hundred thousand pounds of the public money had been expended—that many Boards of Guardians had expressed their anxiety to close up workhouses already opened for want of funds—a fact so notorious, that it might possibly have reached Her Majesty's Government—that the workhouses already open were not one-third filled with paupers from the strong repugnance entertained by the poor to the system—that mendicancy, in all its loathsome forms, remained unmitigated—that the small farmer, long struggling against local taxation and other charges, supporting himself and his family on the humblest description of food, the potato, had been compelled to yield to the additional pressure of Poor-rates, and become a defaulter; that, one-fourth of the old rate in many cases remained uncollected, yet the Poor-law Commissioners were insisting on the declaration of new rates—that an armed force was required to aid the collection of Poor-rates in many places, in a constitutional sense the strongest possible condemnation of the law; and lastly, as if to form the most glaring contrast between poverty and its supervisors, the cost of maintaining each pauper in the workhouse was estimated at 2*l.* 12*s.* per annum, whilst the allowance of each Assistant Commissioner was stated at 1,500*l.* a-year. Admirable system!—1*s.* a-week to the pauper; nearly 30*l.* a-week to the Assistant Commissioner. He should not trespass longer on the House. He considered he had shown the nature of the information sought for by him would be fatal to the system of the delusion attempted to be kept up by the Commissioners—that it would not willingly be given by them, and that he was fully justified in requesting of the right hon. Baronet that the Returns relating to the employment of military in the collection of Poor-rates in Ireland, ordered on the 6th of February last, be forthwith furnished.

Sir J. Graham said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Speaker was so just and impartial in enforcing the due observance of the rules of the House, that he had been prevented by that consideration from rising to call the hon. Member to order for doing what appeared to himself to be contrary to those rules, viz., raising, on a motion for going into a Committee of the whole House on the Mutiny Bill, a question like this, on the operation of the Irish Poor-law, the conduct of the Commissioners in England, and the Commissioners in Ireland, and other important matters relating to the same subject. As it would be highly improper in him, however, to encourage such a course by following the hon. Member at any length into this subject, he should content himself with observing, that, with respect to the Orders referred to by the hon. Gentleman, of an antecedent Session, they were dropped Orders, and it would be necessary for the hon. Gentleman to renew them. With reference to the more extensive subject brought forward by him, namely, the operation of the Poor-law in Ireland, and the collection of the arrears of the rate, he (Sir James Graham) had already stated to the House on a former occasion, that if, after the Easter recess, it should be the pleasure of the Irish Members of that House to move for a Committee of Inquiry into the operation of the Poor-law in that country, he, on the part of the Government, should have no objection to that course being adopted. As to the other Returns alluded to by the hon. Member, he could assure him that no delay in their production should take place beyond what was absolutely necessary.

The Speaker said, he had not interrupted the hon. Member for Roscommon in his statement, because he presumed that the hon. Member would conclude by moving some Amendment to the Question before the House. Now, however, that the hon. Member had sat down, without proposing any Amendment, he would suggest to the hon. Member that he could not enter upon the subject of the Irish Poor Law when the House was discussing the Mutiny Bill.

MUTINY BILL.] House in Committee on the Mutiny Bill.

Captain Peckell observed, that it had been declared that the Stromboli steamer had been engaged in assisting the collection of poor-rates. He had heard that the Comet had also been so employed, although the fact was denied the other evening by the hon. Baronet, the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty. It was a service not fit for the Navy, and he wished to know whether, in fact, Her Majesty's ships had been employed in this odious service?

Sir J. Graham said, happily a truce at present existed between the hon. and gallant Officer and himself upon the subject of the Poor Law, and he thought it would be a pity now to disturb it. He was sure that the hon. and gallant Officer, who had served so long under the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, the Member for Ripon, was perfectly aware that he was incapable of making a statement with the view of deceiving that House. The facts were, that on a remote portion on the coast of Galway there was a formidable and organized resistance to the payment of the arrears of poor-rates. The civil force was not sufficiently strong to be effective, and one or two steam-boats from the river Shannon were sent to assist the civil power. That transaction, he believed, did take place, but he was quite sure that his right hon. and gallant Friend was not aware, when he denied it, that the circumstance had occurred. On the part of her Majesty's Government he (Sir J. Graham) was quite prepared to justify the proceeding upon which so much stress had been laid, when the proper time should arrive.

Bill went through the Committee.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.] On the Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the Marine Mutiny Bill.

Sir C. Napier wished to take the opportunity of calling attention to one or two points connected with the existing Articles of War. If he were to send a watering party on shore, with a guard of marines and an officer to superintend them, and those marines got drunk or otherwise misconducted themselves, and if he were to punish them after they were brought on board the ship without trial by court-martial, they could turn round upon him and say, "The crime was committed on shore, and you have no right to punish us unless we are tried by court-martial." Well, his answer to that would be the authority given him by the Articles of War. This was a matter which required to be more clearly and thoroughly explained. The effect was bad. The marine could not be punished, but the seamen could. It was stated also in the Articles of War, that if a man committed such and such a crime, he must suffer death, or such punishment as the court-martial should upon trial inflict. The practice used to be to turn the hands up and punish the men; but they might have objected and demanded a trial by court-martial. By the last Article of War, all other but capital crimes were to be punished agreeably to the laws and customs of the Navy, and that was the only Article by which he could punish a man without trial by court-martial. He suggested that something should be done to make the Articles more intelligible. There were three cases only in which the punishment of death could be awarded. He remembered a master-at-arms being threatened by a drunken seaman, who said he would stick his knife into him. The man was rather a troublesome person, and there was no other alternative but to try him by court-martial, and he was condemned to die. The surgeon, however, certified that the offender had received a wound in his head, which at times rendered him not quite conscious of what he was doing. The Court, therefore, recommended him to mercy, and but for that recommendation he would have suffered death. He was sent home and transported for fourteen years. But the effect was lost upon the Fleet; there was no example before them; nobody knew what became of the man. The Article ought to be altered. Let it be death, or such other punishment as the court-martial should think fit, to be inflicted upon the spot. The court-martial should not be put in a position to prevent them carrying the law into effect.

Mr. S. Herbert would not at that moment give an opinion upon the expediency of the alterations suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but he would consult with the Admiralty, and give an answer upon the bringing up of the Report.

Mr. M. O'Ferrall said, this question had arisen in the case of the marines on service on the coast of Spain, and urged that some alteration should be made.

Captain Pechell was aware that this was both a difficult and a delicate subject. But when they heard that every person, including every midshipman and every volunteer who should sleep on his watch, was liable to the punishment of death, or such punishment as the court-martial should think fit, they must admit that an alteration of the law was required. Sleeping on a watch was not so bad an offence as a sentinel sleeping at his post; and men were constantly in the habit of sleeping on their watch, with this threat of death hanging over their heads.

Bill went through the Committee.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.] Sir R. Peel rose, according to notice, to move for a Select Committee "to consider the Acts in force with respect to the Trial of Controverted Elections, and to report their opinion, whether any and what Amendments can be made calculated to improve the provision of the said Acts." The right hon. Baronet stated, that when he introduced the Bill which provided for the jurisdiction of Controverted Elections, he stated that he would, before making a Motion this Session for the continuance of the Act, move for the appointment of a Committee to consider whether any Amendment could be introduced into it, and he now accordingly moved that a Select Committee be appointed for that purpose.

He proposed the Select Committee more for the purpose of considering whether any Amendment could be made in the existing law, for he thought that the important question, whether or no any other tribunal should be appointed, ought to be reserved for the House of Commons. It affected the privileges of the House of Commons, and was therefore a question which a Select Committee should not decide. His object, therefore, was to consider whether any amendment could be made in the existing system, assuming that the existing system be continued; but an opinion that the existing tribunal should be abandoned and another appointed, should be discussed in the House. He trusted that no party feeling would influence the House in the consideration of this question; he hoped that hon. Members, whatever their opinions might be, would be prepared to concur with him in thinking that while the present system continued, it should be made as perfect as possible.

Mr. Gisborne said, it was impossible to object to a measure for amending the law as it now stood. He should, however, have been gratified if the right hon. Baronet had explained what he thought the points were in which the present law required amendment. It was a law which the right hon. Baronet had introduced himself, and it seemed to be limited to one object, namely, to remedy the partiality which had been exhibited by Committees. There might be some doubts how far the alteration had made any improvement in that respect; he thought, however, that it had made some improvement. He had that morning examined the Journals of the House to see how far the decisions of the Committees since the passing of the Act would bear a party aspect (and he had excluded the Committees which were proved to have ended in compromises, viz., Lewes, Penryn, Nottingham, Bridport, and Reading), and he found that twenty-five Committees had decided in conformity with the politics of the majority of the Members who formed those Committees, and eight had decided the other way. The latter Committees seemed to have acted much less in conformity with the politics of the majority than those did in the first instance. But it appeared to him that the amendment of the law should go far beyond that to which the right hon. Baronet applied himself, when he brought forward that measure. The great object was to give a fair scope for all proper Petitions, but not to give undue encouragement to those who petitioned without sufficient cause. The law left it in the breast of the Committee to declare Petitions frivolous and vexatious, and thereby to saddle the parties with costs; the result had been, that no one Committee, since the new law had been adopted, had declared any Petition to be frivolous and vexatious. The Committee was still a party tribunal. They selected three hon. Gentlemen from one side of the House and three from the other; and by turns they gave a Chairman from one side of the House to one Committee, and from the other side to the next. Each Gentleman, therefore, saw that he was watched over and suspected of party feeling, and their natural desire was not to step beyond the line which their duty imposed on them, and they said, we won't go any further, and give costs. Last year, when an hon. Gentleman, who sat behind him, had made preparation for his defence, which could not be done for less than 300*l.* or 400*l.*, his opponents came forward and said, they were not prepared to go on with their Petition. He, however, thought it right, as in the courts of law, to let the costs follow the decision, only giving the Committee the right to decide in such cases as they pleased, that the unsuccessful party should not pay the costs. There was a point of practice upon which he thought the action of these Committees would be extremely improved, and it was, perhaps, more necessary before them than any other tribunal. When any person had an action at law, he might give notice to the opponent that if he did not admit certain points, they would be proved at his expense. Now, nothing ever was admitted before an Election Committee; they put the cleverest counsel to argue before men who were not lawyers; they took evidence of everything, and admitted nothing. He hoped that would be a point of consideration also. He did not know who the right hon. Baronet meant to put on his Committee, but he hoped amongst the number there would be some hon. Gentlemen who had suffered by the present system, who felt where the shoe pinched, and who would be able to give the Committee some assistance in coming to a decision upon the merits and demerits of the present system. He had no doubt the right hon.

Baronet had made an extremely fair and judicious selection, and he hoped the attention of the Committee might be directed to the two points he had referred to.

Mr. Collett said, the hon. Member for the county of Anglesey having, I understood, under the best advice, consented to postpone for the present his Motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances attending the getting-up and prosecutions of two Petitions against my return for the Borough of Athlone, I feel satisfied that the object will be equally obtained if his Motion be allowed to merge into the Committee of the Government, and that the right hon. Baronet will give instructions to the Committee to inquire, not only into the getting-up of those Petitions, but also how far it is consistent with the dignity of this House, with the rights and privileges of its Members, and with the intention of the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, under whose Act these repeated Petitions have been presented—how far it is just and proper for any Member to have to appear before more than one Committee to defend the same, and at the same Election. If you refer to the Journals of this House you will find it entered on them on 31st May, 1843, that by a decision and verdict of a Committee, I was then declared duly elected for Athlone during the present Parliament. I should have thought that here the matter ended—that the decision was final—that I was, as I was stated to be, elected for this Parliament, meaning the whole of it, and that the plea of "autrefois acquis" was in this, as in all other cases in this country, a bar to any other proceedings or investigation; instead of this, I have, in the present month, been subjected to a second edition of precisely the same annoyance, attended with precisely the same result; my opponents have no case, and I am on 7th March 1844, again declared duly elected for the present Parliament, which is again entered on your Journals—and I may, perhaps, again have to defend this seat. I can assure the House that a series of these Petitions, got up for the purpose of annoyance, intimidation, extortion, and peculation, are by no means either agreeable or profitable. In these two particular instances, (in which, as to the charge of bribery, I am as innocent and ignorant as any one in this House) the answering and having to defend these Petitions has been attended with no small anxiety of mind—and has cost me more than 1000*l.* out of my pocket—indeed, from what I understand, I have not yet purchased peace and the quiet enjoyment of my privileges; the apparent getter-up of these Petitions, a Mr. Moss (but who being, I understand, as indifferently off in his circumstances as in his character, can hardly really be at the bottom of them; indeed, he has stated that there are other parties behind the scene desirous of my seat in this House, and if report speaks true, some parties desirous also of a seat in another place, this Mr. Moss having stated publicly, and to one of the servants employed in the offices of this House, that “if Mr. Collett got over this (meaning the last) Petition, he would not be much the forwarder in retaining his seat—that he would have another Petition shortly—and that it would be an annual affair till he was ousted—in short, Sir, that there is to be no end to the persecution and annoyance to which I am to be subjected for the sake of depriving me of my seat. I have, I am sure, only to mention these circumstances, and to throw myself upon the House and the right hon. Baronet, to ensure some means for preventing for the future a repetition of these annoyances to myself and others.

Sir George Grey thought the course which the right hon. Baronet had taken very proper, and he hoped the House would not go into a further discussion of the subject then. He would, however, say, that he thought the right hon. Baronet was quite right in not leaving it to the decision of the Select Committee whether the tribunal should be confined to that House or not.

Sir E. Colebrooke wished to ask the right hon. Baronet whether it was his intention to appoint assessors competent to advise the Committee on points of law, to form part of the jurisdiction, and give their assistance to the Committee.

Sir R. Peel said, that he purposely abstained from making any statement of his opinions on this subject. Consistent with the principle that the Committee should not entertain the great question of the removal of the jurisdiction, he thought it would be better not to prejudge any point to come under their consideration, by making any statement of his own. With respect to the question put by the hon. Baronet, he thought it would be better to leave it to the consideration of the Committee. With reference to the points alluded to by the hon. Gentleman opposite, he thought it would not be well to make judges of hon. Gentlemen who had cause to complain. He thought it well that they should have an opportunity of stating their complaints, but he considered they had better do so in the character of witnesses than judges. As to the other point, he was not of opinion that the costs should follow the decision. If they wished to have cases of bribery and corruption at elections brought forward, they must give some latitude to complaining parties; but that was a question open to decision hereafter.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS PRESENTED By the Bishop of Hereford, from Burford, against Union of Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor. —By Lord Cottenham, from Frederick Capes, against Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. —By Lord Kenyon, from Denbigh and Flint Agricultural Society, against Alteration of the Corn Laws. —By Lord Campbell, from Edinburgh, against Religious Tests for Professors.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS' BILL.—COMMITTEE.] On clause 7 (excepting from the general operation of the Bill Royal Chapels, Collegiate, Cathedral, and University Churches, and “the Churches and Chapels of the Inns of Court, and the Preachers and Ministers thereof”),

Lord Campbell observed, he should be sorry to see interfered with, those ancient and learned bodies, the Inns of Courts, whose exercise of their rights of patronage had been unimpeachable, and from whose preacher-ships had risen to the Bench so many eminent Prelates; among whom one of the most distinguished he then had the honour of seeing present.

The Bishop of London said, he certainly acknowledged that those bodies had exercised their patronage most conscientiously and creditably; but he really did not quite see why the lawyers—custodes legis,—should be exempt from the general operation of this Bill.

The Lord Chancellor remarked, that it had been considered proper under all circumstances, and particularly with respect to the private statutes of the bodies in question.

On Clause 8.

Lord Cottenham observed, that this Clause proposed to establish a new principle. It was for continuing the Diocesan Courts, and he objected to that Clause standing part of the Bill upon the discussion that had taken place the other evening, and he had said all that he could say upon the subject, and he therefore did not mean to address them at any length on the present occasion. He hoped, however, that before noble Lords went to a division on the Question, they would consider what it was that the Bill proposed, and what was the weight of authority against that proposition. The Bill proposed to continue, under certain regulations, which would make them perpetual, the Diocesan Courts—that was, a Court in each Diocese in England and Wales. This was a proposition that was not only condemned by all those who had considered this subject, but it was also condemned by the reports of two Royal Commissions—by the reports on the Ecclesiastical and the Admiralty Courts—it was condemned by two reports of Special Committees, one of that and one of the other House of Parliament. It was condemned in the Measure of the Government that preceded the Government of noble Lords opposite; but, above all, it was condemned by the present Government itself. It was condemned by some of the most influential Members of the Government, including the head of the present Government. It was condemned by the present Government, as a Government; for by the Bill brought in by them last Session, they proposed the abolition of all the Diocesan Courts. Before, then, noble Lords were called upon to vote in favour of the Clause, they had to consider whether they would perpetuate an evil in the country without a single reason being offered in its favour. What was the inconvenience to be avoided by perpetuating these Courts? That doing so would interfere with the interests of certain local practitioners in Local Courts. Here, then, they found that the Government had not the courage to propose a Measure that they felt to be right, even though in doing so they might be assured of the support of those who were usually opposed to them. The Government were not only too weak to carry out their own Measure, but they had not even the courage to attempt it. Last year their Bill abolished all these Diocesan Courts, and this year their Bill perpetuated these very Courts. Such was the position of the Government.

The Lord Chancellor, in answer to the observations made by his noble and learned Friend, had to state that this Bill carried out many of the suggestions made by the Commissioners. In the Bill that was brought in last year an Amendment was made in the Committee of the other House, retaining the Diocesan Courts. Those who were responsible for the present Bill introduced it in the state in which it had last year left the House of Commons, and in that state they now expected to find it pass the other House. The Bill now contained so much of good that he was satisfied to have it passed in its present state. If after the Bill passed, his noble and learned Friend proposed a Measure with respect to the Diocesan Courts, it should have his best consideration. It was too, intended by this Bill, that the Diocesan Courts should be established not in the way in which they had hitherto existed. They would be placed in an improved state, although it was not meant that the present arrangement should be final; for if after the Bill passed, it were found that the Diocesan Courts did not faithfully discharge the duties entrusted to them, then Parliament would certainly interfere. It was to be observed that Lord Stowell's Bill corresponded with the scope and object of the present Bill. He denied that the Diocesan Courts were incompetent to perform the duties entrusted to them. There were three or four Courts in which justice was as well administered as in any Court of the country—for instance, those Courts over which Mr. Granville Vernon, Dr. Phillimore, and others presided. Were these Courts general, and judges of knowledge and ability placed at the head of them, there was no reason to suppose that the Administration of the Law would not be well and faithfully conducted.

Lord Campbell was gratified to find that his noble and learned Friend did not designate the plan for abolishing the Diocesan Courts as "Jack Cade legislation"—he did not denounce it as spoliation or plunder, nor an interference with the sacred rights of pro-

erty. But his noble and learned Friend knowing that the abolition of these Courts would be a great improvement in their institutions, what reason did he assign for abandoning the measure by which they might be abolished and abandoning, too, that measure, it being his own? He must say, that in this respect his noble and learned Friend acted as a most unnatural father. They were told over and over again that the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, abolishing those Diocesan Courts, was framed with the full concurrence of the Government. The Bill of 1835 had that object in view. It was approved of by those opposite, and left as a legacy to their successors. The Bill of 1835, abolishing contentious jurisdiction in those courts, was approved of by his noble and learned Friend. In 1836 his noble and learned Friend approved of that principle in a Committee of that House. His noble and learned Friend approved of it last year. It had the entire approbation of the Government. There was no difference in the Cabinet on the subject. It was supported by Sir Robert Peel, by the Attorney General, and by Sir James Graham. They, in a manner which was to be expected from their talent and learning, showed the extreme mischief arising from the Diocesan Courts. If his noble and learned Friend would look to Hansard, he would find there a most eloquent and elaborate speech from Sir Robert Peel against the Diocesan Courts. Why then were they to be now preserved? His noble and learned Friend spoke of making an experiment with them. These Courts had subsisted for a thousand years and it was on account of the abuses of these Courts and their inherent bad qualities, that their Lordships were now called upon to abolish them. His noble and learned Friend had drawn a distinction between the Courts of Peculiar and the Diocesan Courts, and yet it was impossible to say why the one class of courts should be abolished and the other preserved. Why, he asked, abolish the one and continue the other? It was said, that not much business was done in the one—apply this same reasoning to the other, and they too should be abolished. But then, if they looked to antiquity, like Sir Robert Inglis; if they were to have a matter preserved because it existed in the reign of King Stephen, then they ought to preserve all these courts. Now, as to the cases brought from the Archdiocese of York before the Privy Council, he could say, and he appealed to his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) if they were not full of the grossest blunders, and constantly followed by reversals, [Lord Brougham "Hear, hear."] If, then, that were the case with the Archdiocesan Court of York, what must be the state of the distant Diocesan Courts in England and Wales? If probate were not granted out of the right Court, it was declared by his noble and learned Friend to be void. Let them see all the consequences likely to follow from the continuance of these Courts. By perpetuating these Courts they kept up the system of Proctors, and the public was saddled with an enormous expense. There were to be two sets of agents, where the public would be much better served by one. The truth was, that the only defence of his noble and learned Friend was, that he could not carry the Bill—those opposite could not carry that which they thought for the benefit of the public. It was for them, then, to consider, whether under such circumstances, they ought longer to attempt to carry on the Government.

Lord Brougham agreed with the opinion expressed by his noble and learned Friend as to the Diocesan Courts. None of them had a good Bar, and many of them were without good Judges. They had neither eyes nor head. He thought, however, there was much good in the Bill; and if he could not go at a full pace, he must be satisfied to go at a half pace. It was, too, his opinion, that the Courts were improved by this Bill, for good judges were to be given by it to these Courts.

The Committee divided on the question that the Clause stand part of the Bill:—Contents 47; Not Contents 20: Majority 27.

On Clause 9,

Lord Cottenham complained of the closeness of the Courts at Doctors' Commons, both as respected Advocates and Proctors. No person was admitted to plead who was not admitted an Advocate of these Courts, and none but Proctors expressly admitted were allowed to practise. No persons pleading at the bar of other Courts, however great their experience, or however high their professional attainments, were allowed to practise as advocates, and no attorney or solicitor could act as agent. If a party wished to employ his own confidential solicitor or attorney it was done by engaging a Proctor on condition that he should not interfere in the business, but should receive all the fees. The monopoly was one which was very injurious to the public, and had been much abused, and he hoped his noble and learned Friend would be prepared at a future stage, to open these Courts, both as respected Proctors and Counsel.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had had communications with different persons belonging to the Ecclesiastical Courts, and he had found them extremely intelligent and perfectly conversant with the business in which they practised. After all the inquiry he had made, he did not think that the class known by the name of Proctors, were liable to the observation made by his noble and learned Friend, as to their competency to discharge all the duties required of them, there being men of great learning and great intelligence amongst that class of persons. It would be impossible to abolish their exclusive privilege without compensation, and the amount was so heavy that it rendered the measure impracticable in 1836. The abolition of the Six Clerks in the Court of Chancery had cost upwards of 40,000. With respect to the bar of the Civil Courts, the Advocates were brought up at the Universities, and were men of much learning, and in time of peace their fees were small. It was of the utmost consequence to the country that there should be a number of persons who applied themselves to the study of the Civil Law, so as to make themselves masters of learning applicable to questions of national law that arose between this and other countries. Upon the ground of policy, therefore, he must resist the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend in respect to the Bar, and as to the Proctors, on the pecuniary ground, that it would be impossible to effect the object without a charge upon the public which it would be utterly impossible to impose.

Lord Cottenham could not understand the fondness of his noble and learned Friend for Proctors in Doctors' Commons, when he had surrendered the cause of the Six Clerks in his own Court—both classes of officers standing precisely on the same footing. There was, however, an anomaly in the practice of these Courts to which he wished to call the attention of his noble and learned Friend. In some of them a party was not allowed to appear in person but must employ a Proctor. He could not do what in other Courts was considered a right of the subject, although it was one which it was not always thought wise to exercise—namely, to plead his own cause. Would the same privilege be allowed to suitors in the Ecclesiastical Courts, that were given in several of the Law Courts?

The Lord Chancellor said, that the object which his noble and learned Friend sought to accomplish would be effected by the provisions of the Bill; or, if it were not, he should take care that the suggestion should not be lost sight of. With respect to the power of suitors pleading in their own causes, he remembered an instance in which a man pleaded for himself, in a case before him, and, in consequence of some experience which he had of the individual, he appointed ten o'clock in the morning for hearing the case. The individual commenced addressing him at ten, and continued until a late hour in the evening, when he said he was so much exhausted, that he was unable to proceed further, and he put it to his (the Lord Chancellor's) humanity, whether he would not allow him to refresh himself, as he was unable to proceed further without some rest. He (the Lord Chancellor) agreed to the request, and the greater part of the next day was consumed in the remaining portion of his address. There was another case of the same sort that occurred in his Court more recently. He did not think such a practice at all tended to facilitate the administration of justice; but he would take care, if his noble and learned Friend's suggestion was not already sufficiently provided for, it should be by a subsequent Clause of the Bill.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. Hutt, from Australia and Merchants, and from the Cape and Merchants, for Admission of Australian and Cape Corn.—From North Berwick, for Alteration of Prisons (Scotland) Bill.

TOLL ON LIME (WALES.)] Colonel Wood rose to ask leave to introduce a Bill to exempt Lime from toll conveyed on any turnpike-road in the Principality of Wales. Though he held a large blue book in his hand, the House need not imagine that he would consume its time by a long speech; but as he was advocating the cause of a very poor country he hoped he should receive the sympathy and indulgence of the House. He wished his motion to rest on its own intrinsic merits. By the General Turnpike Act, every description of manure, with the exception of lime, was exempted from toll; and thus farmers might send their teams to large towns in the neighbourhood for the purpose of bringing home manure toll free. But the poor farmers in Wales were out of the reach of these great towns, and had no other manure but lime. The charge for lime for a small cart drawn by two small horses was 2s. 6d. and the toll was 6d. a horse; so that when the lime was brought to the farm the farmer had paid 3s. or 4s. in the shape of toll, or more than cent. per cent. the cost of the lime. He might be told that the roads had been constructed for the conveyance of the lime, and if the toll was removed the roads could not be maintained. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to forget the principle upon which these roads were originally made. Turnpike roads were the exception, not the rule, for every road was properly maintained by the parish, and formerly turnpike-acts were only granted for twenty-one years. The tolls were most irritating, and were the cause of the late outrages in Wales. The hon. and gallant Member proceeded to read various documents, purporting to show that even if the toll upon lime was abandoned, the turnpike tolls in the county of Brecon would produce sufficient to maintain the roads, and to allow a surplus. If he were permitted to introduce a Bill, he would not proceed with it if Her Majesty's Ministers would originate any Measure on the subject. The Commissioners had recommended that the debts on the roads should be taken by the landlords, and charged upon the county rates. All he could say was, that as a landlord, he was perfectly willing to take his portion of the debt upon himself, and to exonerate his county from tolls altogether. Some arrangements of that sort must be effected, and the multiplicity of trusts which unfortunately existed in some parts of the principality must be either extinguished or consolidated. He entreated the Government to concede this boon of exoneration from tolls to the inhabitants of Wales, by which they would secure the peace and tranquillity of their mountain glens, and happiness and contentment to a moral, a religious—and though to an excitable—a kind-hearted people.

Mr. Hume objected to the exemption proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Brecon, because he conceived that no sufficient ground for such exemption had been shown. The relief the hon. Member proposed to give the farmer would, in fact, be a relief to the landed proprietors, exempting them from a tax which other parties were compelled to pay. But he also objected to the Bill, as involving an interference with established rights. The Turnpike Trusts had been established by Act of Parliament, and the Commissioners stated that the turnpikes could not be maintained without the exaction of these tolls. If this Bill were carried out it would exempt from the payment of toll the very property for the convenience of which the Trusts were erected; it would aggravate the existing evils, and benefit only the landed proprietors.

Mr. M. Sutton did not rise to oppose the introduction of this Bill. He thought, under the circumstances, the House might give the hon. and gallant Member leave to bring in the Bill; but, at the same time, he was bound to state that this was, he feared, the last occasion on which he could concur with the hon. Member with regard to this Bill. He did not agree with the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the exemptions proposed by this Measure would give any unfair advantage to the agriculturists. He thought it right to state, however, in order that no false hopes might be raised among farmers interested in this Measure on account of there being no opposition on the part of Government to the introduction of the Bill, that the Government could not support the Measure in its future stages.

Mr. Alderman Thompson thought, that unless the whole system of Turnpike Trusts in Wales was examined and revised, the people of the Principality would not be satisfied or contented. He considered that the Turnpike Trusts in Wales had been the subject of gross neglect and abuse. If this was the only measure intended to be proposed with a view to allay the existing dissatisfaction in the principality, he thought the House should reject the Motion, for he conceived a great deal more was required.

Sir J. Walsh was convinced that great dissatisfaction would be felt in Wales if the House refused to entertain the Measure. But, however desirous he might be to relieve the farmers from the payment of these tolls, he felt it would be extremely difficult to carry the principle to its full extent without involving injustice to some classes in the principality. He wished to take this opportunity of calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the subject of the grievances of which the people of Wales complained. The appointment of the Commission of Inquiry by the Government had, he believed, had a most sedative effect upon the very excited state of public feeling which existed some time since in Wales; but the people of South Wales had, he believed, been looking forward with great anxiety to the proposition of some legislative measures founded on the Report of the Commissioners. He knew that the subject was one of great difficulty, and requiring very mature consideration; and he by no means wished to pledge himself to all the recommendations contained in the Commissioners' Report. At the same time, he wished to take this opportunity of assuring Her Majesty's Ministers, that the attention of the people of the southern portion of the Principality was anxiously directed to the proceedings of Parliament during the present Session; and that a very confident expectation was entertained that some legislative measures would originate from the Government, and he was afraid, if that expectation should unfortunately be disappointed, some recurrence of those disturbances which lately occurred in that part of the Principality might again be feared.

Mr. Labouchere said, they had heard from the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, that this was a subject on which great excitement and expectation prevailed in the Principality of Wales—that the people were anxiously looking forward to the adoption by this House of some legislative measures to redress the evils of which they complained. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Wood) now introduced a measure, not relating to tolls generally, but to exempt lime from the payment of that impost. The hon. Gentleman the under Secretary of State (Mr. M. Sutton) had said that he would vote for the introduction of this Bill; but he added, "I give notice to the gallant Officer that this is the last vote he will get from me; I intend to oppose the Bill in its future stages." Now he feared that while the people of Wales saw that the hon. and gallant Officer had introduced a measure of this nature, they would not be acquainted with the grounds on which the Government, supporting the Bill in its present stage, declared their intention of opposing it in future. If it was the opinion of the Government that no beneficial effects could be produced by this measure, he doubted whether the House would act a judicious part in assenting to its introduction; for such a course might produce great disappointment in Wales. As far as he understood the Bill, he must say that he thought wholly to exempt lime from toll, while toll in other respects was left unaltered, was a course which would be far from satisfactory. Unless, therefore, some reasons were given by the Government for the course they proposed to adopt, he should be inclined to vote against the introduction of the Bill. This was a measure of a very simple description, and if the Government had made up their minds to resist its principle, he thought they would act the fairest part in saying so, and taking the opinion of the House on the subject.

Sir J. Graham said, the House would recollect that, on a former occasion, when the hon. and gallant Member had given notice of his intention to move for the introduction of this Bill, the Motion was, at his instance, postponed till this evening. He had suggested that postponement, because he was anxious that his hon. Friend and the House should have the advantage of seeing the Report of the Commissioners, which dealt with this very subject. He had hoped that after the perusal of that Report, his hon. and gallant Friend would not have persevered in his Motion. He was most decidedly opposed to the remission of toll on lime in South Wales; and he must repeat the declaration of his hon. Friend (Mr. M. Sutton) that it would be his duty to oppose this Bill. The hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere) must however, be aware that it was not unusual, under such circumstances as existed in the present case, to permit the introduction of a Bill. The hon. Mover (Colonel Wood) represented a Welsh county, and had long enjoyed the confidence of its constituency, and he thought there could be no objection to the introduction of his Bill, with a view to its being printed and circulated in the Principality. An opportunity would thus be afforded of ascertaining the feelings of the parties whose interests this Measure would affect.

Mr. F. T. Baring was sure the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Wood) would not suppose that the Opposition to the introduction of this Bill arose from any want of courtesy towards him. He thought that in common cases there might be grounds for allowing the introduction of a Bill, to which objections might exist. But they must consider what was the present state of the Principality of Wales, and what expectations they were raising when they allowed the introduction of a measure of this nature. This Bill referred to a subject of great interest in Wales; and he thought they would not be acting wisely in allowing the introduction of the Bill with the intention of rejecting it in its second stage. The Report of the Commissioners had been presented, and that Report, he apprehended, must come under the consideration of the Government, and he thought it would not be prudent to introduce such a Bill as this, which dealt with one of the smallest questions noticed in the Report, if they intended to reject it in its next stage.

Mr. Morris supported the Motion, but observed, that in many cases money had been borrowed from widows and persons in comparatively humble circumstances upon the trusts, and he wished to know if the hon. and gallant Member was prepared to introduce into this Bill some provision for affording compensation to such persons.

Sir W. Jolliffe thought the principle sought to be introduced into Wales by this Bill ought also to be applied to England. On some Trusts lime was exempted from toll for agricultural purposes; but in other cases the small tenants were prevented from obtaining that material, which was cheaper than any other manure, in consequence of heavy tolls.

Mr. Darby said, that in many cases parties had advanced money on Turnpike Trusts on the faith of this toll on lime; and if they at once abolished that toll, the parties who had made such advances would be deprived of any return for their capital.

Mr. G. R. Trevor had no doubt that the Motion for leave to introduce this Bill was made by his hon. and gallant Friend from the best possible motives, but he was afraid it would be the cause of great difficulties in that part of the country to which they were both most warmly attached. It was impossible not to see that there was considerable difficulty in dealing with this question, looking to the amount of debt which had been incurred in the majority of cases, necessarily, no doubt, for the improvement of the roads of the Principality. Considering how great an amount of the interest of this debt had to be provided for from the toll on lime, and how great a portion would be deficient if the whole toll were abrogated, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend would have done better if he had abstained from bringing in the Bill, especially after the Commissioners' Report had been laid before the House, recommending a specific remedy. Of that remedy he would say nothing until he saw it embodied in a Bill; but with respect to much contained in the Report he went along with the Commissioners. He did not believe that this toll upon lime had anything to do with the commencement of the disturbances. Of that he was positive; he knew that the first gate attacked was one through which scarcely any lime was ever carried, and the greatest multiplicity of gates and side bars appeared to exist in the neighbourhood of lime rocks almost the last attacked at all. The effects of this Bill, would be, first to injure the credit of the Trusts, and to add most materially to the burthens pressing on the poor farmers in one part of the country, for the purpose of relieving the others who resided in another part. He would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, but for the reasons he had stated, he could not give it his support.

Lord Ebrington said, that were it not that an opportunity would, he understood, be afforded for a general discussion upon the subject of Turnpike Trusts in the course of the present Session, he should have embraced the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the evils arising from the exemption from tolls of all coaches and carriages carrying the mails. The subject was slightly glanced at in this Report, but he could show that this exemption materially diminished the funds of the Trusts, and obliged the Commissioners to inflict much heavier tolls on other wheels. With reference to the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member for Brecon, he must say, without wishing to be discourteous, that in the present excited state of the Principality, it was undesirable that such a Bill should be brought forward; he therefore felt himself compelled to vote against its introduction.

Mr. S. Davies was understood to express his regret that he could not support the measure proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend, because the revenues arising at present from the tolls would not admit of further reduction; he trusted, however, Her Majesty's Government would introduce some general measure on the subject.

Mr. Vivian remarked, that in the Swansea trust, with which he was connected, lime had been exempted from toll ever since the year 1764.

Colonel Wood in reply, denied that the proposition was a Government measure. He assured the House it was nothing of the kind, but he hoped Government would bring forward other measures to remedy the existing grievances in Wales in the course of the present Session. The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 42: Majority 26.

CORN FROM THE COLONIES.] Mr. Hutt rose to move, pursuant to his notice, that—

“The House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the Corn Laws, for the purpose of considering the following Resolution:—‘That it is expedient that Corn imported into the United Kingdom from the British possessions in South Africa, India, and Australasia, be made subject to the same duty which is levied on Corn imported into the United Kingdom from Canada.’”

The hon. Member said he begged, in the first place, to present three Petitions in favour of his Motion—one from the merchants and shipowners of the City of London connected with the Australian trade, another from the merchants and others engaged in the trade with the Cape of Good Hope, and the last from parties interested in the prosperity of South Australia. He would proceed to lay before the House the subject of a grievance under which he conceived some of the most valuable and distant of the British Colonies were at present labouring. He hoped he should have the good fortune to enlist attention to this important subject. In the course of the last Session, a Bill had been introduced by Her Majesty's Government, and by the Government had been carried through Parliament, by which certain duties were taken off Corn and Flour imported from Canada, on that occasion the subject had been fully discussed, and on the part of the ordinary supporters of Her Majesty's Government, had received a great deal of unmerited censure. The Measure drew down upon the Government a good deal of what appeared to him unmerited censure on the part of their supporters. The opinions of the Gentlemen were somewhat

They considered that the welfare of the country depended on the importation of foreign grain being regulated by an ascending and descending scale of duties, and on this point the Government entirely agreed with their supporters. But there was another article in their creed in which he was happy to observe that the Government did not agree with them. He meant that we should always govern our colonies in sole subservience to our own advantage. The right. hon. Baronet rejected this wild notion of the duties that attach to sovereign power. The right hon. Baronet had not thought it right to state to the people of Canada, when they came forward and pointed out the great advantage they would derive from a free-trade in Corn with this country, “True, all you state is perfectly correct, but it is the first duty of the Imperial Government to maintain a high price for Corn in this country, and the concession you demand is incompatible with that duty.” Such was not the language which had been addressed to the people of Canada. On the contrary, the language used by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, by the noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies, and by other Members of the Government, had been of a very different character when they severally recommended the Canada Corn Bill to the adoption of Parliament. The right hon. Baronet recommended that Bill by stating it was a measure which would give great encouragement to the agriculture of Canada—that it would augment Canadian commerce; and that, being just and reasonable in itself, it would necessarily cement the union between the parent country and its Colony. It was on these grounds, following (as he was proud to do when he could with consistency) the right hon. Baronet, that he now came forward to ask for a relaxation of the Corn Laws in regard to the British Colonies in South Africa, India, and Australasia; and to place them on the same footing as Canada. It appeared to him, indeed, that those Colonies to which he referred had a far stronger claim to this indulgence than ever could have been made out for Canada. In the first place, these Colonies were separated from this country by a much wider distance, and were, therefore, more exposed to the vicissitudes of the sliding-scale of duty, they were further separated than Canada from any other Corn-producing country, and in addition to all these considerations,

there was this further important fact—that Parliament had already applied the relaxation he contended for to one portion of the British colonial possessions. Why to one portion exclusively? Why should the people of Australasia and of the Cape of Good Hope and of India not have the same benefit dealt out by legislation as Canada. True, they had never risen against the authority of the mother country—but they were members of the same community—the subjects of the same Sovereign, and they were entitled to the same favour and protection. This was not like the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, both of which Colonies had been perhaps properly excepted from the advantages given to Canada. They had been excepted because the Government contended that those two Colonies never produced sufficient Corn for their own subsistence, and consequently, if they could have derived any advantage from being included in the Canada Bill, it would be given to smuggling, and not to legitimate commerce. This, however, was not the case of the Eastern Colonies; on the contrary, he thought he should be able to show, that their circumstances in regard to Corn were precisely the same as those of Canada. The right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) when recommending the Canada Corn Bill to the House, and the other members of the Government who took part in the debate, stated that Canada generally produced a larger quantity of Corn than was necessary for the subsistence of her own population, and was in a position to derive great advantages from the relaxation of the law. The whole case of the Government rested upon this fact. They said Canada was a Corn-producing country, and could afford to export Corn. He thought that it was in his power to establish that all the Colonies which were embraced in his Motion came within the denomination of Corn countries, and could export Corn. Australia was peculiarly adapted for the cultivation of Corn. It was true that the district round Sydney was in some degree an exception; but even in Sydney, Corn had occasionally been produced in sufficient abundance to be used in feeding cattle; and in the southern districts of New South Wales, it had always been a very successful article of cultivation, produced in great abundance and at small cost, and exported to other countries in that part of the world. But the great granary of the southern district was Van Diemen's Land and South Australia. It appeared by Papers which he had moved for, and which were on the Table of the House, that during last year a considerable portion of Corn had been imported into this country from Van Diemen's Land. A large portion of Corn had also been exported from the same place to Mauritius and the Islands in the Eastern Seas. A quantity of Corn, not less than 1,300 quarters, had been imported from Van Diemen's Land into our own ports for the first time last year. The event was a remarkable one in the annals of Australian commerce. If that experiment had failed, many years would have elapsed before it would have been tried again. But it quite succeeded. The wheat so imported had been examined by the corn factors of Mark Lane, and they had pronounced it to be excellent, both as to quality and condition. After deducting the duty which had been paid, a handsome profit had been left to the importer. Considering the state of the money-market, considering the difficulty which the large capitalists had of finding any new branch of commerce with which they could profitably engage, he need not remind the House, that the experiment to which he had referred would be repeated on a large scale. Having examined the wheat which had been imported, he must say, that he never saw Corn equal to it either in appearance or quality. The whole of the wheat imported into our ports last year from Van Diemen's Land paid a duty of 5s. The greater portion of this wheat sold at a price varying from 60s. to 62s. per quarter. Such was the purity of the Australian climate, that the whole of that Corn arrived in this country in a perfect state of preservation. It had not suffered any injury from the heat to which it had been exposed during the voyage, and when imported into the port of London it was found to be as good and perfect as when placed on board the ship in Australia. It appeared by a paper published in the colony, and which he held in his hand, that the expense of bringing a cargo of wheat to this country was as follows:—The cost of wheat in Van Diemen's Land was 38s. per quarter; the duty amounted to 5s., the freight was 10s. per quarter, making in the aggregate, including freight and all charges, 53s. per quarter. There was one fact in connexion with this subject to which he was desirous of calling the particular attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. The alteration which had been made the year before last in the duties payable on all those articles which entered into the construction and victualling of a ship would have the effect of very much diminishing the amount of freight, and thus remove some of the obstacles which before impeded the importation of Corn from distant countries. He trusted that the day was not very far distant when the condition of the ship-owner and the shipping interest would be very much improved; but freights, though profitable, would never again recover their former standard. He wished to direct the attention of the House to a letter which he had received from a cornfactor of Mark-lane, Mr. C. J. Heath, who pronounced the Australian wheat to be as good as any grown in the counties of Kent or Essex. That Gentleman also stated, that owing to the excellent order in which it was "got up," it was peculiarly suited to long voyages. This was fully confirmed by the experience of the past year, when many ships arrived in this country with wheat from Australia in very good condition. He felt certain that such wheat would find as ready a sale in the British markets as English wheat. He had another testimony to the same purport. Papers had been placed in his hand signed by various parties connected with the Australian colonies: they were signed by many highly respectable merchants of the city of London. They all affirmed that the Australian wheat was well fitted for importation. The only drawback was the high duty levied upon it in this country. If that duty were lowered it would produce a two-fold beneficial effect. It would lead to a large importation of Corn, and in consequence of the increased demand, greater attention would be paid, and encouragement extended to the agriculture of these colonies. Such was the case he had to lay before the House with relation to Van Diemen's Land. He would then proceed to South Australia. It was an extraordinary circumstance that a colony which was founded only six years and a half back should now hold a conspicuous place among the colonial possessions of this country. Such a happy state of things was to be attributed to the spirit of its inhabitants, and to the wisdom of the principles upon which the colony had been originally established. The House recollect that only a few years back this colony was quite a wilderness peopled by houseless savages.

was now the seat of a large British community, carrying on all the operations of productive industry. He was called upon to do his utmost to advance the interest of that colony from special and peculiar circumstances. He was with others among the first to recommend the formation of the South Australian colony. In addition to that he had for many years acted as one of the Commissioners connected with South Australia. All he asked for that colony was, that it should be placed on the same footing as our Canadian possessions. He found, by one of the journals published in that colony, that its agriculture was in a most prosperous state, the corn-fields were in a very promising condition; but it was stated that, unless they had fresh outlets for their agricultural produce, they would be compelled to discourage the growth of corn. All they wanted (the writer went on to say) was a new market. "What market," it was said, "could be so conducive to the interest of the colony as that to be found in their own native land?" "The markets of England invited the importation of corn from South Australia." The people of that colony were anxiously looking forward for that measure of justice which they had a right to expect from the Government of this country. It was said, in letters dated the 7th of May and the 28th of June, 1843, that a large quantity of Corn had been grown, much greater than last year. One letter referred to the great shipments of corn which had taken place; but there was one fact of great importance in relation to the subject, and that was, that large orders for corn had been sent out to South Australia, the execution of which was made contingent upon a reduction in the price of freight and the success of the motion then under the consideration of the House. He would next refer to South Africa, the state of which was not very different from that of Australia. With regard to India, strong as the case of South Australia was, the case of India was still stronger, and called more loudly upon the House for legislative interference. The great grievance of that country was the unceasing drain upon its resources arising from its connexion with Great Britain. The fortunes amassed by all who rule and by all who trade in India were remitted in order to be spent in England. The public tribute drew another three-and-a-half millions of sterling money in order to pay debts contracted by our wars. Any nation would stagger under such deteriorating influences, and it was clear that such injuries as we were inflicting could only be compensated for by good government. Should we then refuse to India the advantages we gave to Canada? It would be said, perhaps, that it would confer little benefit on India to give facilities for the admission of its corn. Those who were best acquainted with the country, however, were of a different opinion. There was scarcely a mail which came from India that did not bring some expression of opinion, through the public press or otherwise, upon a point which was considered of such consequence to the commerce of the country. It was represented that corn could be shipped to England from Bengal at a freight of from 15s. to 16s. per quarter. It was declared, too, that India had the capacity of supplying any demand that might be made upon her. A large extent of fertile territory might without difficulty be speedily adapted to the purposes of agriculture. So impressed were the members of the Agricultural Society of Bengal with these points that they appointed a Committee to negotiate upon the subject with the Government at home. Nor was it wheat alone that could be exported. Flour might be, and had been, imported in considerable quantities. He had received a communication from Messrs. Rawson, Norton, and Co., merchants in this city, in which they told him that they imported from India from 2,000 to 3,000 tons of flour annually, and that a house in Liverpool was also largely engaged in the same trade. They added their firm conviction that from the preference lately given to Canada this trade would come to an end, and he had indeed seen a letter which Messrs. Rawson and Co. had written to their Bengal correspondent warning him that it was indiscreet to make large consignments of Indian flour, as the flour trade with India must, after the Act of last year, be considered at an end. These were facts, and having stated them he now came to the conclusion of his address. When they looked at the state of the country—at the misery and crime which were accumulating around them—they could not fail to arrive at the conclusion that this was not a time to repress commercial industry. Only a night or two ago they were told that such was the state of society at present, and so deranged was its general economy, that they were not only justified, but that it was essentially necessary to interfere with the free market of labour. Would they in such a state of things, so interfere with the operations of commerce as to prejudice that most important of their colonial possessions? There could be no doubt that the addition of a corn trade would be to our colonies a considerable advantage. Did they think those colonies of such little consequence that they could refuse them such advantage? If not, how, he should like to know, were his arguments to be met? Would they contend that, because only a small quantity would be exported, therefore no encouragement at all was to be given? Why, if only a small quantity was exported now, a larger might be exported when the benefits of the trade were duly appreciated. If the quantity likely to be exported had been large, too, there were not wanting those in that House who would instantly have declared their opposition to the motion on the ground that it would interfere with the consumption of home produce. Let them not, then, imitate the charlatan of Moliere, and say both "yes" and "no" to the same proposition. For his own part he considered it as an advantage that the importation was likely to be small at first. "Oh! but," somebody else would say, "you will disturb the Corn Laws." Why, had they not disturbed the Corn Laws already? It was, surely, not his fault that, in their anxiety to pacify Canada, they had overlooked the interests of the rest of their Colonial Empire. He was doing his duty in calling on the House to overlook those interests no longer, but to take a step which must inevitably serve them whilst it did no injury to others. There was, he knew, another section whose opposition he would have to meet—he meant that class of rich and comfortable persons who were worried by every anticipation of a change in the corn law. But, were they to be guided by the morbid apprehensions of a few vapouring individuals, when every consideration of justice, of equity, of policy, and of consistency called upon them to take a particular course? They must remember that it was possible by arbitrary and vexatious laws to alienate the British Colonies and to lose them—to convert them into quarrelsome and imperious States, delighting in thwarting the mother Government and barricading their shores against her commerce. On the other hand they possessed, if they pleased to employ it, the power of cementing the natural union of a common origin by a bond of reciprocal good will. Of this alternative they would do well to take advantage. "Deal with your Colonies," said the hon. member, "on the principle of a generous and liberal policy, and depend upon it nothing will estrange them from Great Britain; but make them the victims of your commercial monopolies, treat them with neglect, treat them with contumely, and they will one day throw your alliance to the winds, neither your laws nor your arms will maintain them."

Mr. Mangles rose to second the motion, confining himself to that part of the question which related to the commerce of India. The claims of India were second to those of no colony of the British Empire, and there was no reason why she should not receive the benefit of all the concessions which were made to Canada. On no ground whatever ought we to deny every facility to the export of her produce, but yet the Government refused to accept her wheat and flour, which was a part of that produce. As this country had ruined the manufactures of India, they were bound at any rate to take her raw produce. She was now beginning to show how much she could consume of our manufactures. In the three years ending in 1838, the average of exports from this country to India was 3,800,017*l.* In 1839 the exports amounted to upwards of 5,000,000*l.* sterling; in 1840, the year of the latest returns, 6,000,000*l.* Then it must be remembered, India not only paid all the expenses of its own Government and the army maintained there, but remitted, without any return, about 4,000,000*l.* sterling. None but a country so fertile and rich by nature as India could have borne such a drain without any return. He did not say that the price she paid for her connection with this country was too high; on the contrary, he believed that connection was cheaply purchased, even at that price; but in common justice we were bound to afford her every facility for paying that price.

Mr. Gladstone: Although, Sir, I cannot agree to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, I feel great satisfaction in commencing what I am about to say by acknowledging the temperate and fair manner in which the hon. Gentleman generally argues, and declaring that I fully concur in the principles he has laid down in advocacy of the policy of encouraging in every manner the trade between this country and India; and I have some gratification in thinking that the duties which he seeks to reduce are not so great as to prevent those experiments in the corn trade to which he refers. The argument from the difference between 5*s.* and the 1*s.* duty which the hon. Gentleman spoke of, only applies to particular states of the corn market in this country; but, at any rate, it cannot be stated that this duty of 5*s.* prevents experiments in the corn trade. The hon. Gentleman has undertaken to show that the situation of all the colonies whose cause he advocates is analogous to that of Canada; but, so far as regards the argumentum ad hominem, the appeal to the Government to follow out the principles we have adopted in the Measure of last Session with regard to Canada, I think it must be allowed that the hon. Gentleman has wholly failed. The proceedings of the House of last year will be found by those who will take the trouble to refer to them to contain repeated statements of the intentions of the Government with respect to the subject. It was urged again and again on the Government, that if they passed the Measure then before the House, they would do that which would be unwise and impolitic, in disturbing the law respecting Canadian Corn. We were repeatedly told this by some hon. Gentlemen who were advocates of the contrary line of policy, and the answer to that uniformly was not the announcement of the principle that wherever you can improve the existing law, you ought to come to Parliament to do it,—that was not the answer that was made; but the answer was made by a reference to pledges given some time before, and by recalling to the recollection of the House that the Canada Corn Bill was to be considered as properly a part of the Corn Bill of 1842. I think, therefore, it cannot reasonably be expected by the hon. Gentleman that he will succeed in fixing on the conduct of Government the imputation of inconsistency if they refuse to agree to his Motion. Having said thus much, I think I need not refer at any length to the repeated declaration of my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies in answer to repeated questions put to the Government, as to whether they intended to follow out the principle of that Measure to the other Colonies, in which he did not scruple to indicate (without binding up the Government in all circumstances which might occur) that the question was one which ought not to be lightly raised, and which the Government could not consent to raise again for the sake of the advantages which might be derived by New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the other colonies then alluded to. Then, Sir, are these colonies whose interests the hon. Gentleman advocates in the same position as Canada? I apprehend not; I apprehend none of them have petitioned through the medium of the same authority as Canada did. Canada petitioned by her public organ for many Sessions, indicating public opinion in that country so strongly that the House must, I think, agree with me that the petitions now on the Table, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, though proceeding from very respectable individuals—individuals probably many of them engaged in the Corn trade of the Colonies—are not entitled to be considered as saying so authoritatively what is the opinion of the people of those Colonies. The hon. Gentleman wishes to place the Colonies mentioned in his Motion on the same footing, in respect to the export of Corn, as Canada; but though he speaks of the same footing, he has omitted to propose the imposition of the duty on the importation of foreign Corn which obtains in Canada. The hon. Gentleman proposes a resolution—"that it is expedient that Corn imported into the United Kingdom from the British possessions in South Africa, India, and Australia, be made subject to the same duty which is levied on Corn imported into the United Kingdom from Canada." But the hon. Gentleman will recollect that he founds his Motion mainly on the ground of fairness and equal dealing with the Colonies; the arrangement, however, with Canada was, that a duty should be imposed on the importation of foreign Corn into Canada, and that arrangement was an essential part of the Measure of last Session. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman would not put the Colonies to which his Motion refers on the same footing with Canada, if his Resolution were carried, because he does not impose a duty on all such Corn as shall be imported into those Colonies. The hon. Gentleman asks where is such Corn to come from? I will endeavour to tell him. The hon. Gentleman says that these are exporting Colonies. I apprehend scarcely one of them can be called so. One year they are exporting. New South Wales may export occasionally, but manifestly it is an importing, not an exporting Colony. The Cape of Good Hope is becoming every year more and more an importing, and less and less an exporting Colony. But, as the hon. Gentleman, in asking that these Colonies should have the right to send their Corn here at a 1s. duty excludes the duty on the importation of foreign Corn, which we have imposed in the case of Canada, therefore I say that, before he can place his proposition on the same grounds as we legislated on with respect to Canada, he must impose in those Colonies the import duty on foreign corn now established in Canada. It is to be considered, that at the time of passing the measure with respect to Canada, there were expectations in Canada of establishing a regular trade in corn or flour from that country to this, Sir, there are other reasons which I may give against the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. A very considerable shock to trade was apprehended in Canada from the alterations made in 1842, and although the Government here did not participate in that apprehension, yet it was felt in Canada, and I consider that the panic which prevailed in Canada—I am not one of those who regard commercial panics as matters of light importance—did furnish no unimportant reason for passing the measure. I repeat that the hon. Gentleman has no reason to say that these Colonies are exporting Colonies. It is true, that in Van Diemen's Land, as the hon. Gentleman shows, it may answer very well at particular periods to send Corn here, but that, I apprehend, must be a rare occurrence; indeed, I think it is perfectly obvious from the circumstances of the Colonies in that quarter, that hon. Gentlemen have no right to calculate upon any supply of corn worth talking of being obtained from that quarter. The hon. Gentleman is as well aware, I dare say he is better aware than myself, that a very considerable importation of Corn takes place into those Colonies from South America; for it is worth while to carry Corn from very considerable distances into those Colonies. Then the circumstances of these Colonies differ materially in different years, but upon the whole, the range of prices shows that they are importing Colonies. Taking a series of years, from 1830 to 1842, we find that in some years the price of Corn in these Colonies is enormous; and in Van Diemen's Land which is more likely than New South Wales to export Corn to this country, in 1839 the price of Corn was 15s. a bushel; in 1840 the price was from 8s. to 12s. a bushel, or from 64s. to 96s. a quarter; in 1841 it ranged from 48s. to 80s. a quarter. These were the prices in those years in the Colony of Australia, which is most favourably situated for sending corn to this country. The hon. Gentleman has not paid attention to the returns on the Table of the House, or he would have been aware of this. We have on the Table a return showing the total number of quarters of Corn imported from all countries into this country, from 1828 to 1841; and also the number of quarters exported to all countries during the same period. If the hon. Gentleman will examine that return, he will find in the first place, that England sent to the Australian Colonies a much larger quantity of Corn and Flour than was received by this country from those Colonies; and in the second place, that while those Colonies sent, during the first seven years of that period, though not a large, yet a noticeable quantity of Corn and Flour to this country, yet during the second seven years of that term they sent nothing that could be named. During the first seven years, ending in 1836, the Australian Colonies exported 2,689 quarters of wheat to this country; and during the second seven years, they exported only 19 quarters. Now, during the first seven years, this country sent to those colonies 7,615 quarters of wheat, and of wheat in the form of flour; and during the second period it sent 19,000 quarters of wheat, and of wheat in the form of flour, annually. So that while, during the last seven years, the Colonies were sending nothing to this country, they were receiving from this country upwards of 20,000 quarters of wheat and flour annually. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the levity with which a portion of his remarks was received, as he said, by Members of the Government; perhaps he mistook incredulity for levity; but at any rate he now seems to exhibit incredulity at the statement I have made. I refer him, however, to the returns on the Table. Sir, among other objections, it appears to me, that there is a valid one to the form of the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The argument of the hon. Gentleman is, that having dealt in a certain manner particular product of a particular Colony, we ought to go on and do the same thing, so as to make the system uniform in all our Colonies. Now, it appears to me, that the hon. Gentleman would make more anomalies than he would remove. If he wishes to have the system uniform, why does he not begin and apply to Canada itself the remission of the duties imposed by the Corn-Law on exports of Canadian corn other than wheat? Perhaps he considers that to be insignificant. I am prepared to show that the whole subject matter of his Motion is insignificant. But what is the case with respect to Canada? Canada, on an average of the years 1841, 1842, and 1843, exported of corn other than wheat, 20,000 quarters; and the hon. Gentleman, who rests his case on the analogy to other colonies, has altogether overlooked these exports of Canadian corn other than wheat. Then, there are other points which must be taken into consideration. The circumstances in which these Colonies have an interest in sending Corn to England are of rare occurrence. Van Diemen's Land is an exporting colony, but to nearer countries than Great Britain, viz., to all the other Colonies of Australia with which they have a commerce; they export also to the East Indies; they export to the Mauritius; and I think it is extremely difficult to argue that, with other markets wanting Corn, and the Mauritius so near them, we can establish any trade in corn from Van Diemen's Land to this country. The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope. Now, the circumstances of the Cape are analogous to those of the Australian Colonies; it is not an exporting country. It is true that we have had a small quantity of wheat and flour sent here from the Cape of Good Hope at times; and I believe that the wheat of that Colony is as fine as any that is grown on the face of the earth; but I find we send a balance of Corn to the Cape. In the interval between 1828 and 1841, we received from the Cape of Good Hope 11,572 quarters of wheat and flour; but we sent there in that time 27,200 quarters; and if the hon. Gentleman will refer to the returns on the Table, he will find that the exports from the Cape are almost altogether confined to the first seven years, and that in the last seven they have sent here very little indeed. Therefore I meet the hon. Gentleman by saying that these Colonies are not exporting Colonies as far as the market of Great Britain is concerned. They are more importing than exporting Colonies. The hon. Gentleman consequently fails in establishing such a case as would warrant the House in re-opening the question of the Corn Laws, even though the re-opening of that question should do no more than arouse the idle vapours and apprehensions of a few busy, fussy, and fidgetty persons, to quote the language of the hon. Gentleman opposite. When I look at the large number of persons connected with the agricultural interest of this country, I cannot subscribe to the description the hon. Gentleman has given of them, and I cannot think that a panic affecting their operations is an evil of slight magnitude, or one the chance of which ought to be incurred, except for strong and material interests. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the case of India, and I agree with him in thinking that it is desirable that the Legislature of this country should deal on the most liberal and favourable terms with the commerce of India. The hon. seconder of the present Motion has, indeed, justly observed that substantial indications of such a disposition have been given by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government. I admit that the importations of wheat and flour from India—though they be very small—yet are of greater magnitude than those importations from Van Diemen's Land, which it almost requires a microscope to discover; but I think we have no right to say, under present circumstances, that we can expect a supply of corn or flour from India, except when prices are high in this country. The length of the transit, the changes of climate to which the corn would be subject, interpose material obstacles to bringing it to this country; in fact, the flour is apt to become sour. When the average price of wheat in this country reaches 58s. a quarter, the wheat and flour of India is admissible at 1s. duty; and I ask the House whether there is any probability of India sending in any quantity grain and flour to this country (taking into view the enormous expense of the transit) on an average of years, except when prices are high with us? The latest information supplied to the House on this subject confirms my views. On referring to a return moved for by the hon. Gentleman opposite, stating the quantity of grain and flour imported in 1841, 1842, and 1843, from each of the British Colonies, including India, I find that in 1841, which was a year of high prices, India sent us in wheat and flour, together 13,000 quarters. In 1842, which was also for the first six months a year of high prices, and would have continued so but for a revolution in the state of the weather, 20,000 quarters of wheat and flour were imported from India; being an annual average for these two years of 17,000 quarters. With regard to 1843, there was at the time every probability of its being a year of moderate prices. The actual prices at the end of 1842 were low, and the prospect for the crop of 1843 was excellent. The stock of foreign corn in the country, too, was large; and what effect had these circumstances on the trade with India? Why, that, whereas India sent to us 17,000 quarters of wheat and flour annually on an average in 1841 and 1842, the quantity India sent us in 1843 was no more than 4,200 quarters. If then it be admitted as a general principle, as I conceive it must, that when laws are passed by Parliament after long deliberation, and in the nature of a settlement of a great interest, upon which the application of great capital and the employment of a large amount of labour depended, such laws should not be disturbed, except for an object of considerable magnitude; I must say that the hon. Gentleman opposite has altogether failed in showing us that the object which he purposes to attain is one of sufficient magnitude. Indeed, I think I have shown the contrary. I therefore submit that there is no adequate reason why the House should accede to the motion of the hon. Gentleman, and I deprecate his tone in treating the apprehension of a panic on a subject of this kind as an idle matter, and as unworthy the consideration of the Government or Parliament. I, on the contrary, contend that panics, whether reasonable or unreasonable, which affect the application of capital and the employment of labour, and which may pervade large classes of the community, are not to be disregarded by Parliament, and the less so, of course, if they are reasonable; but they must and ought to be taken into consideration at a time when the House approached a question like the present, and endeavoured to give a decision on it according to the principle of balancing the advantages proposed to

Mr. Labouchere was prepared to place the other colonies on the same footing as Canada. He had resisted the policy of the Government last session with respect to Canada, and he retained his opinions, but still he thought that they ought to deal with equal justice towards the whole of their Colonial Empire; and if other colonies required the same concession as Canada had received they ought not to be refused. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had resisted the present Motion on grounds singularly inconsistent. At one time he said that the practical effect of it would be so insignificant that it would not be worth the while of the House to consider the question; and at another moment he observed that it was attended with danger to the agricultural interest on account of its being calculated to create a panic. He was inclined to think with the right hon. Gentleman, that the nerves of the agricultural interest were not very strong; but he could not, like the right hon. Gentleman, suppose that the agriculturists would anticipate a deluge of colonial corn, if the present Motion should be carried. The great distance of the countries to which the Motion referred from England, of itself constituted a protection to home agriculture; and it was impossible that the importation of corn from those colonies could produce any great effect on the markets of this country. He did not see how the Government having made a concession to Canada could refuse a similar one to our other colonies, should they demand it. He was at a loss to understand what distinction could be drawn in such a matter between Canada and Prince Edward's Island, Van Diemen's Land, Australia, and India. However insignificant the export of grain might now be from those colonies, it was important that principle should be maintained, and on principle there should be equal justice for the different parts of their Colonial Empire. He did not mean to say that the same regulations should be applied to every colony, for the various circumstances under which they were placed ought to be taken into consideration. The only argument used by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade against the Motion of the Board of Trade was, that it would not do the Colonies any practical good. No possible harm, however, could result from it, if it were made optional for the Colonies to receive or refuse the concession, while, on the other hand, they might be galled by being excepted from the system which had been extended to Canada. Having heard no satisfactory declaration from the Minister, and no assurance that if any of these colonies should apply to be placed on the same footing as Canada, the Government would feel it their duty to consider the question, he should, for the reasons he had given, vote in favour of the Motion. Something had been said of a panic in connection with the present Motion. He only hoped that this question of panic was not to be set up as a bugbear against all improvement. He agreed with the President of the Board of Trade that the Corn Laws ought not to be altered or modified except on good grounds. It was very foolish to tamper with a great law for the sake of slight or immaterial benefits. But this was not a proposition for altering the Corn Laws, but to give equal advantages (if advantages they be) to all our Colonies.

Lord Stanley would not detain the House long, for he admitted the subject was exhausted by the speeches which had been delivered. The right hon. Gentleman had commented on the inconsistency of the course pursued by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, in first contending that this matter was of slight importance, and then describing it as a measure which might create a panic among the agricultural interest. Now, however unreasonable the hon. Gentleman opposite might think this argument, it was the main one on which he rested his opposition to the proposition. He did not believe that the practical effect of acquiescing in the present Motion would be any serious injury to the agricultural interest, or lead to any large importation of corn from the Colonies; but still he thought it was generally admitted, that if there was one question which it was unwise, above all others, to tamper with, except on a great emergency, it was the question of the laws which regulated the importation of Corn, and exercised so great an influence over the agricultural and other classes. Was it desirable, he asked, to create uncertainty, alarm, and confusion, in the operations of those classes, for this object, comparatively insignificant, but which would be misrepresented as of great importance? The hon. Gentleman opposite said that the Ministers ought to have foreseen that the other Colonies would apply to be placed on the same footing as Canada (though, by-the-by, none had applied). It was not the case, however, that the Ministers had not foreseen this possibility, and in the course of last year, when he introduced the Canada Corn Bill, he distinctly stated that he introduced it as the fulfilment of an arrangement with this country through the Government entered into with the people and Legislature of Canada, and in reliance on which the Legislature of Canada passed certain enactments: that this was an isolated case, and not applicable to other Colonies; and in answer to a question put by the hon. Member for Sussex he stated that "The engagement of the Government was he repeated, with Canada, and Canada only. It had made none with any other colony, and had no intention of disturbing the principle of the Corn Laws by any further extension of the principle applied to Canada."

On the same occasion the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere) rose and said,

"He wished to know whether he understood the noble Lord correctly in this,—that it was not the intention of the Government in this session to extend the boon given to Canada to Prince Edward's Island, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick."

His reply was as follows:—

"I wish it to be distinctly understood that the course the Government has taken is in accordance with the engagements entered into with Canada, and is not intended to justify other colonies in saying, 'We have complied with the same conditions, and we call on you to give us similar advantages.' It is our desire that we should not be called upon to disturb existing arrangements, on the ground of what we have done with respect to Canada; and it is our opinion that if we should be called upon, such a course would merely tend to disturb an extensive settlement for an unimportant object."

Therefore the hon. Gentleman opposite could not accuse the Government of not having foreseen the possibility of other colonies applying for the concession made to Canada. Was it, then, wise for this object, to disturb an extensive settlement; and was not the Corn Law an extensive settlement, and one which involved extensive interests—interests which were peculiarly sensitive, and with respect to which great uncertainty was productive of continual inconvenience and loss? Was not the object contemplated by the Motion unimportant? Last year he treated, and the House granted as comparatively unimportant, the admission of Corn from Canada at the reduced rate of duty from 5s. to 1s. Now, with reference to the imports of Corn in this country, what was the case? It appeared that in the year 1841, out of 68,858 quarters of wheat imported into that country from all their Colonies, 68,854 were imported from the single colony of Canada; and out of 665,000 cwt. of wheat meal and flour similarly imported, no less than 594,000 cwt. came from the single colony of Canada. The proportion in the last year was not quite so great, but still it showed how largely Canada exceeded all their other colonies. Last year they had imported from Canada 207,000 quarters of Corn out of 225,600 quarters from all their colonies, and they had imported 325,900 cwt. of wheat meal and flour from Canada out of 339,000 cwt. imported from all their colonies put together. Now, deduct the importation from Canada, and he asked them whether, if Canada was in itself unimportant, the other colonies were not so in a far greater degree; and whether it would not be most unwise, and whether the argument was not most conclusive against disturbing the settlement of the Corn Laws, for securing such advantages as the hon. Gentleman had anticipated for the Australian colonies from his proposition? It had been observed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) that Australia was not an exporting country, and that it could not export Corn to this country excepting when Corn was dear here. Consequently, when Corn should rise to 58s. in this country the duty would be only 1s., and then practically the object of the present motion would be obtained; for if many of these colonies could export grain to this country at all it must be when prices were high, for below 58s. they could not. In such a case as he had stated the object of the Motion would be obtained without altering the laws, and without creating any panic. If hon. Gentlemen had proved that prices in this country would permanently rise to such a height that obviously the supply of the country was insufficient for its growing population—if they had proved that they might have from our own Colonies, without reference to other countries, a large and increasing supply to meet that deficiency, which could not be made up at home, he might admit that they had established some case for the motion; but when he considered that the Corn-Law had been adopted by that House only a year or two ago, and when last year he warned the Colonies not to expect a relaxation of that law, he did not think that the House would for a slight, almost an inappreciable, advantage to the Colonies, disturb a general system of laws of infinite importance, infinite delicacy, and watched with the deepest interest by the people of this country.

Mr. Hawes remarked, that the very weakness of his hon. Friend's case was its strength, because the more it was shown that the importations of grain would be trifling the less ground there was for any alarm on the part of the agriculturists. He was willing to rest the case upon the smallness of the expected importation, which nobody could pretend would create a panic. The noble Lord overlooked the main ground on which the Motion rested, viz., that it was laying the foundation for a great trade. It was indisputable that the shipping interest of the country was much depressed, and if an importation of corn could be established from the Colonies, it was evident that it must be advantageous to the owners of our vessels. It seemed to matter little in what way the question of the Corn-Laws was touched: the moment a word was said regarding them, Ministers took the alarm, and reiterated their determination that no alteration should be made in them. [Cheers.] Those cheers afforded evidence of the determination, if not of Ministers, of their supporters, that the Corn-Laws should not be changed. This might be the resolution of those who sat at the back of the Treasury bench, but the noble Lord did not venture to say that in bad seasons a change should not be made. No Minister would dare to say that; and having set the example as respected Canada, what now was required was, that the same principle and the same justice should be extended to the other colonies.

Mr. Ewart thought certain hon. Members of peculiar susceptibility on the subject of the Corn-Laws, could not have been insensible to the remarkable expression of the noble Lord, that the system changed in a case of emergency were any motion that ought not to be made by farmers and their friends, it was the House, which it was admitted sides could introduce only a very small quantity of corn into the country. However, the smallest quantity was too much for the agricultural interest: and let the dose be as infinitesimal and as homœopathic as it might, the landed interest refused to swallow it. He contended that mere justice required that this Motion should be carried, and further went on to advocate the claims of India in particular, for which he had long and vainly sought equal justice. His conviction was, that the country had, in fact, out-grown such a Motion as that before the House; it was a step in the right direction, but far too short for the times in which we lived. The real question at this moment was, whether the market of this country ought not to be opened to the grain of the world? Upon this question the people had now formed a mature judgment, thanks mainly to the agitation of that wise and formidable band of political philosophers, the leading Members of the Corn-law League. The people would only be satisfied with the total repeal of the existing Corn-Laws. He did not expect the landed Members would be inspired with such a sudden fit of generosity as to concede even what was now asked; and perhaps it was better for the general interest that they should reject the Motion, because possibly it might the sooner lead to the entire removal of the present impediments to the free importation of grain from all parts of the globe.

Mr. Hutt said there were no just grounds for the alarm that had been expressed. It was his opinion that the first duty of a Colonial Minister was to provide for the welfare of the mother country, and the next to look at the interests of the colonies; but by no means to neglect the latter. He felt that he could not overcome the resistance to this Motion; but he entertained no doubt the time would come when Ministers would regard their present policy with bitter and unavailing regret.—The House divided: Ayes 47; Noes 117: majority 70.

REV. DR. MORRISON] Sir G. Staunton rose for the purpose of submitting the Motion of which he had given notice—

"That this House will, on an early day, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider the following Address to Her Majesty; that is to say, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that, whereas, the late rev. Dr. Morrison, and his eldest son, the late John Robert Morrison, rendered eminent public services in China, the former for a period of twenty-six years, and the latter for a period of nine years, and successively fell a sacrifice to their severe exertions in the performance of their public duties; and whereas, the death of the latter individual was pronounced by his Excellency Sir Henry Pottinger, Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China in a public proclamation on the occasion of his decease, 'a positive national calamity,' Her Majesty be graciously pleased to direct a suitable provision to be made for the widow of the late rev. Dr. Morrison, and for the other surviving members of his family; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the same."

He said he was very sensible that he incurred a grave responsibility in making this appeal to the House. He was sensible that such appeals in favour of private individuals ought not to be lightly hazarded. He could assure the House that he would not have undertaken the task if he had not felt the strongest conviction that this claim was of so peculiar and almost unparalleled a character, that it could not be neglected without reflecting dishonour and discredit on the country. He wished the Motion had been in more able hands, but as he could speak from his own personal knowledge, while in office in China, respecting most of the facts which it would be his duty to submit to the House, he felt confident of receiving their indulgent attention. He had submitted these claims in the first instance to the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Department, who had received the appeal with the greatest consideration and sympathy. He had done everything that was within the competence of the Foreign Office, by continuing the small pension granted to the widow by his predecessor, and by conferring an appointment in China upon one of the younger sons; but the pension was utterly inadequate, and the appointment he had been obliged, it was apprehended, to relinquish on account of ill-health. No resource therefore remained but an appeal to Parliament. The proposition he had to bring forward was strictly in accordance with the best precedents of our history. He thought he need not adduce any of those precedents to show that it had been the policy of this country, when great and eminent services had been performed, and when those who performed them had sacrificed their lives in the cause, to recognize the claims of their families who survived them on the gratitude of the country. He would, therefore, shortly state the history of those two distinguished individuals for whose family he appealed. The late Rev. Dr. Morrison went out to China as a missionary of the Gospel, and had no desire or wish to obtain employment at the public expense; all he desired was to be permitted to exercise unmolested his sacred functions; the East India Company, he hoped, would not employ the powers with which they were invested by law to remove him from his mission. So far, however, from the East India Company wishing to remove him, they found that he possessed most valuable and important talents, and they invited him to take office in their establishment, which he acceded to, and which office he held for a period of twenty-five years. At the same time he made no mercenary compromise. He did not abandon the sacred profession to which he had devoted his life, but continued to his last moments as he had begun—a Missionary of the Gospel. He united to the most ardent religious zeal the perhaps still more rare quality of sound sense and discretion; so much so, that he was enabled to exercise these two offices without any detriment being sustained by either of them. He had also accompanied the Embassy of Lord Amherst to Peking as interpreter, without receiving any special remuneration for that service. Dr. Morrison in the course of his valuable life accomplished two great literary works, to which he would shortly direct the attention of the House. The first was his elaborate and voluminous Chinese and English dictionary. The East India Company had considered this work of so much importance, that they had granted a sum of 10,000*l.* towards defraying the expenses of printing it in China. If it was of so much importance even when only one Port was open to us in China, it became of ten-fold importance when we had four new Ports opened to our commerce and our enterprise, where the English language was wholly unknown, and a knowledge of Chinese was a sole passport to commercial dealings. This work was now in the hands of every individual who was desirous of availing himself of the improved state of our commercial relations with China. This alone, gave him a strong claim upon the gratitude of his country. The other was a work, the value of which could not be estimated in a mere pecuniary or a commercial point of view, but it was a work which had conferred on Dr. Morrison great celebrity throughout Europe, and had earned for him the heartfelt gratitude and admiration of a great body of persons in this country—he meant the translation of the holy Scriptures into the Chinese language. This work, he trusted, would, through the favour of Providence, lay the foundation of the introduction of the blessings of Christian civilization into that immense territory, by enabling its inhabitants—constituting as they did, one-third of the population of the world—to read the word of God in their own language. At the end of twenty-five years spent in the service of the East India Company, the East India Charter expired, and Dr. Morrison would have been justified in retiring, when he would have been entitled to a pension: there was at that time a fund from which that pension would have been payable; and if he had died in their service, his widow would have been entitled to a pension. At that critical moment, however, his services were considered indispensable, and he consented to transfer those services from the East India Company to the Crown, without making any stipulations whatever. The first act of Lord Napier on his arrival in China, was to order Dr. Morrison to Canton at an unhealthy season of the year, and in a declining state of health, to conduct a most harassing and ill-advised negotiation with the Chinese government. Dr. Morrison fell a victim to his exertions in the course of a few days. Lord Napier, it is well known, followed him to the grave in about two months afterwards. He thus died in the performance of his public duties. He had abandoned his claim on the East India Company by the transfer of his services to the Crown, and the fund was abolished from which that pension might have been paid. No adequate provision was made by the Government to his family on this occasion, but they did that which seemed equivalent to it; at least it would have been so, had Providence spared the life of the son, for they immediately appointed him to the situation which had been held by his distinguished father. This young man, although at that time only twenty years of age, performed the duties which devolved upon him with singular ability and great zeal, but his bodily strength was not equal to the strength of his mind, and he had applied for, and obtained leave of absence, for the purpose of returning to England to recruit his health, when the seizure of the opium placed us in hostility with the Chinese, and, in consequence of the extraordinary crisis which then arose with regard to our relations with the Chinese, Mr. Morrison felt it his duty to forego his leave, and to remain in China. The war broke out, and the necessity of having on the spot a secretary who was acquainted, not only with the language, but with the habits and manners of the Chinese, became every day more apparent: Mr. Morrison, unfortunately for his life, but fortunately for his fame, and fortunately for the benefit of the English nation, remained. He lived to take an important part in the negotiations for the Treaty of Nankin; and when it was recollected that Sir Henry Pottinger, although a man of great ability, was a total stranger to the language, manners, and habits of the Chinese, (unlike his successor, Mr. Davis, whose consummate ability on these points is well known), the extreme importance of his having the aid of a man like Mr. Morrison would be quite evident. When the Treaty was concluded, there was a general feeling throughout the whole of the British community that some honours and favours ought to be conferred on Mr. Morrison; and Sir Henry Pottinger warmly responding to this feeling, appointed him one of the Legislative Council of Hong-Kong. He was thus placed in a situation which would have amply enabled him to maintain his father's family. He had while he lived remitted to them various small sums, and had given up the whole of his share of his little patrimony to his sister. But while his family in England were congratulating themselves on his merited exaltation, their joy was turned into sorrow, the era of prosperity was suddenly dashed from their lips; for, a few days after his appointment, he was seized with the fever of Hong-Kong, and his constitution being already undermined, he very shortly fell a victim to it. Sir Henry Pottinger stated, in a proclamation, announcing his decease, that the loss of Mr. Morrison was a public and national calamity, and would be so felt, he was sure, by his Sovereign and his country; and in a private letter to him (Sir G. Staunton), he added, speaking of Mr. Morrison, that no man living could supply his place—"You may find as good interpreters and as good translators, but where will you find a man of such talent, judgment, devotion and influence?" He submitted that he had made out a case for the consideration of the House. These two individuals had performed eminent services, had sacrificed their lives in the cause of their country. Their family, therefore, it appeared to him, had a most powerful claim upon Parliament. He did not bring forward the case as one of destitution, except as far as regarded the sister of Dr. Morrison, who was residing at Newcastle, and who he understood was in a destitute state; but with regard to the rest of the family, although not in a state of destitution, he considered that their means were totally inadequate to maintain them in the station which they ought to occupy in the country. He concluded by moving his resolution.

Sir J. C. Hobhouse did not know if the forms of the House relative to the necessity for the consent of the Crown in cases of such propositions as the present would be interposed in this instance; but this he would say, that accident had made him fully acquainted with the merits of the two individuals whose services had well been narrated; nor could he avoid adding, that by no one could their eulogy be more appropriately pronounced, as assuredly by none could their services be more thoroughly appreciated than by his friend the hon. Baronet who had brought forward the subject. From the first moment he saw the notice of the hon. Baronet, he felt that the Government ought to adopt some mode of expressing their opinion, and that of the Crown, as to the merits of these two individuals. After the tribute which had been paid to their memory by the hon. Baronet, it would be impertinent on his part to say one word on the subject of their services. But if any hon. Gentleman had read the beautiful memoirs of Dr. Morrison, if they knew the circumstances under which he commenced his eminent, useful, and Christian career, — if they were acquainted with his conduct throughout that career, — if they knew how his mantle had descended to his son, they could not doubt that the appeal which had been made to the House by the hon. Baronet was fully justified; and he hoped, that if the forms of the House did not preclude it, that appeal would receive the concurrence of the right hon. Baronet and his colleagues.

Sir R. Peel fully admitted the justice of the eulogium which the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Baronet had respectively passed upon the characters and services of Dr. Morrison and his son. He did not believe, that in the whole range of the public service of this country, two men could be found more remarkable for their high character, or for the fidelity with which they had discharged their duties. The particular works, also, to which the hon. Baronet had referred, the productions of Dr. Morrison, the father, were works of signal merit. Nothing could be more agreeable to his feelings than to be able to accede to this Motion; but there were certain duties imposed upon public men which they could not shrink from discharging; and he must ask the House not merely to regard the merits of these individuals, but to consider the effect of the precedent for the interference of that House with respect to the grant of pensions to public men. It was, some years ago, the practice in the civil service of this country to allot pensions to the widows and female relatives of public servants who died in the discharge of public duties; but that practice, speaking generally, had for some time passed into desuetude. No man could fill the office which he occupied without being well aware that many claims were often preferred on the part of the widows and relatives of public servants of the highest merit and distinction with which it was impossible to comply. For instance, in the whole range of the revenue service of this country, no pensions were allotted to the widows or female relatives of public officers who died in the discharge of their duty. The same was the case with regard to all the great departments of the State. In the case of clerks in public offices—men who performed the greatest services to the country, and who frequently died in the public service, after continuing in it for thirty, forty, or fifty years—Parliament had allotted no means of making provision for their widows or female relations. In some departments of the public service there were means of making such provision. In the Army and Navy, pensions might be allotted to the widows of officers who died in the public service; but those pensions were of very limited amount. The whole amount, he believed, which could be granted to the widow of a flag-officer of the Navy, who might have served his country for many years, did not exceed 120*l.* a year. In the case of a Captain or Colonel of Marines, actually dying in action, the public provision was limited to 200*l.* a year. In the case of public civil servants, to whom liberal salaries were allotted, the principle held was that it was their duty, out of those salaries, to make provision for their widows or relatives. That was the general rule now observed, and, if they lightly departed from it, there was no limit to the number of applications which might be presented. He knew how strong were the claims which might be urged; and he would venture to say that, if the precedent was once established, unless it was limited and confined by circumstances the most peculiar, numberless applications would pour in, with which it would be most difficult to refuse compliance. The cases of governors of the colonies, or of individuals who discharged judicial functions in those colonies, were constantly brought under the notice of the Government; in many instances such men were cut off in the prime of life, and their widows or relatives appealed to his noble Friend (Lord Stanley), but no means existed of making a provision for them. The House must therefore take a comprehensive view of this subject, and prepare themselves for the consequences of establishing the precedent proposed by the hon. Baronet. He would state what were the circumstances of this case; and he would then leave it to the decision of the House whether there was anything so peculiar in the situation of the widow and family of the late Dr. Morrison as to induce the House to depart from its ordinary usage, and enable the Crown, by a special Vote, to make provision for this case. In addition to the provision already made for the public service, a very limited sum of 1,200*l.* was allotted yearly to the Crown, to enable the Crown to grant pensions in certain specified cases—cases of personal service to the Crown, to persons of eminent literary or scientific merit, or to persons who had rendered distinguished public services. He (Sir R. Peel) certainly thought that a very niggardly provision. He thought it confined the power of the Crown in this respect within very narrow limits. But after full inquiry into the Pension List, and having before them all the claims that could be made on account of public services, Parliament had allotted to the Crown for these purposes a sum not exceeding 1,200*l.* a year. He would undertake to say that that sum was appropriated in precise accordance with the wishes of Parliament. The question here was whether, independently of that amount, the House of Commons would enable the Crown to grant pensions to the surviving members of Dr. Morrison's family? He would briefly state to the House the facts of the case. Mrs. Morrison was the widow of Dr. Morrison, who died in 1834, but she was not the mother of the Mr. Morrison who lately died in the performance of public duties in China. The only immediate relative, by blood, of the late Mr. Morrison, was the sister to whom the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir G. Staunton) had alluded. Mrs. Morrison was the widow of the late Dr. Morrison, but Mr. Morrison was the son of that Gentleman's former wife. Mrs. Morrison did not, therefore stand in the relation of mother to the late Mr. Morrison. A pension of 100*l.* a-year was granted to Mrs. Morrison for herself by the East India Company; and a further pension of 25*l.* a-year for each of five children, till they arrived at the age of eighteen. On the transfer of the China establishment from the East India Company to the Imperial Government, it was represented to the Government that the provision made for Mrs. Morrison was not in proportion to the merits of Dr. Morrison, and insufficient to procure for his widow the comforts she had a right to expect. The Government then stated that the transfer of the Establishment of the East India Company to the Imperial Government should in no respect affect the interests of Mrs. Morrison; and they applied to the East India Company to know what provision, considering the peculiar merits and services of Dr. Morrison, the Company would have granted if he had continued in their service. The answer of the Company was, that they had no regular scale of allowance to the widows of their servants—that they granted liberal salaries on the express understanding that their officers should, out of such salaries, make provision for their families. The late Dr. Morrison received about 1,300*l.* a-year; on his death his son succeeded him, and at the time of his (the son's) decease, he was in the receipt of about 1,200*l.* a-year. The East India Company stated, that they thought, in this case, they would have made an exception to their usual rule, and have allotted Mrs. Morrison an addition of 50*l.* a-year, making 150*l.* a-year; but the Government granted her another sum of 100*l.* a-year, and she was now therefore in receipt of 200*l.* a-year. These were facts which the House ought to bear in mind, recollecting that no provision was made in the case of other civil servants. The right hon. Baronet opposite might probably know Mr. Bulley, of the Exchequer, who died recently, after a faithful service of fifty years, but his widow remained without a pension. The House must recollect too, that, in addition to the pension of 200*l.* a-year, Mrs. Morrison also received 25*l.* a-year for each of five children. On the decease of Dr. Morrison, his son, the late Mr. Morrison, succeeded to his office, which he held to the time of his death, and to which was attached a salary of 1,200*l.* Had the Executive Government then been insensible to the high merits of this family? He was discharging a most painful duty in opposing the proposal of the hon. Baronet opposite; but it was right that he should show that Mrs. Morrison had not been overlooked. The provision might seem scanty; but, as he had said before, they must look at these cases upon comprehensive principles. Since Mr. Morrison, the son's death, Lord Aberdeen had appointed the eldest son of Mrs. Morrison to a situation in China as assistant-secretary. The salary of that office had previously been 162*l.* a-year, but Mrs. Morrison's son received

300*l.* a-year, with the prospect of an increase, on good behaviour, to 600*l.* a-year. Mrs. Morrison was thus relieved of all charge for the education of that son. Lord Aberdeen also signified to Mrs. Morrison, that if among her remaining children there was one whose age qualified him for the performance of public duties, he would immediately appoint him to a situation; and that if his youth disqualified him for such a situation now, he would take the first opportunity of making provision for him hereafter. In the case of the eldest son of Mrs. Morrison, therefore, actual provision had been made; and the assurance of prospective provision had been given for the second. He thought, then, that he had conclusively shown that the Crown had not been insensible to the valuable services rendered to the country by Dr. Morrison, and his son, Mr. Morrison. He must say, feeling the greatest sympathy for the situation of this family, that if he were called upon to mention the cases of widows and families of other deserving persons, it would be found that an unusual provision had been made for the family of Dr. Morrison. He hoped he had said enough to show the House that they ought to be exceedingly cautious how they established a precedent in this case, of special interference with the conduct of the Executive Government, and, in some degree, with the prerogative of the Crown. He had every motive personally for acquiescing in the proposition of the hon. Baronet; he entertained the highest sense of the services of Dr. Morrison and his son; he felt great sympathy for their relatives, if they were in distress; but it was his duty, in the situation which he held, to caution the House against selecting a particular instance of this kind for special interference.

Mr. Lindsey said, he had the advantage of knowing Dr. Morrison and his son, and he was, therefore, gratified to hear not only what had been done, but what was to be done for their family. There were a few remarks of the right hon. Baronet on which he wished to offer a very few words. The right hon. Baronet drew a distinction between the military and naval services and the civil service, but the present was a case in which that distinction did not apply. It was true that Dr. Morrison had received a salary of 1,300*l.*, but then it should be recollected the use he made of that salary, for while he was devoted to the interests of his country, he had proved himself a benefactor to mankind. So soon as he was placed above necessity what did Dr. Morrison do? Why, he founded a college for the instruction of Chinese, as well as of others; and although the institution received other support, there could be no doubt that Dr. Morrison had devoted more of his means in furtherance of this college than prudence dictated. But he was looking for a higher reward than could be bestowed on him in this world. That college had since been removed to Hong Kong. He was in China in 1832, when, at the age of eighteen, Mr. Morrison, the son of Dr. Morrison, was called upon to act as interpreter, and he could speak to the ability with which he discharged the duties devolving on him. No man could bear higher testimony to the merits of John Robert Morrison than Sir H. Pottinger had done; and he entirely agreed with that gallant officer, that his death was to be regarded as a national calamity. The life of John Robert Morrison was sacrificed by the illness he contracted when he accompanied Captain Elliott to Canton; but, although he did not approve of that mission, his sense of public duty led him to accompany it, and the result was his contracting a disease which ultimately proved fatal to him. He thought Mrs. Morrison and her family were entitled to a more ample provision; but, seeing what had been done for them, he, having full confidence in the justice of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, was ready to leave the case in his hands, in the full belief that all that could be required would be granted.

Sir G. Staunton, in reply, said, he must take blame to himself for not having entered more fully into the pecuniary part of the case, from an anxiety to avoid unnecessarily occupying the House. The fact was, that the only permanent provision awarded to the family of Dr. Morrison was the 200*l.* a-year which Mrs. Morrison received, and that had no reference whatever to the services of the son. It was stated, and justly, by the right hon. Baronet, that Lord Aberdeen had made a provision for one of Mrs. Morrison's sons, and offered to provide for another of them; but it unfortunately happened that the health of the son who had gone to China was so bad, that he was on his return, and therefore the family would derive no benefit from that appointment. The East India Company had given several large pensions to their civil servants in China, at the expiration of the charter; and he particularly wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet to the fact, that the pension of 200*l.* now enjoyed by Mrs. Morrison, had no reference to the services of her son, but had been granted solely on account of the services of the father. The son's services were hitherto without any notice or reward whatever. It was, no doubt, true, that Mrs. Morrison was not his own mother, but he had always considered her as his mother—considered her with the same affectionate regard, and so called her in his letters. He submitted that the great and eminent services of Dr. Morrison and his son entitled their family to a better provision than had been made for them; that even upon the principle of 200*l.* a-year having been commensurate to the father's services, at least an additional 200*l.* a-year ought to be granted to the family for the services of the son. At the same time, he did not mean to press for a division, being satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the right hon. Baronet, who, he confidently hoped, would reconsider the subject, and feel disposed to do justice to its merits.

Sir R. Peel said he could not accept the withdrawal of the Motion on any such terms. He had before stated, that the whole sum which he could advise the Crown to apply to cases of this kind was 1,200*l.* a-year; and he had not before him the case of Mrs. Morrison alone, but the cases of at least 100 widows and persons whose relatives had rendered valuable public services, and who were not in the receipt of any pensions or gratuities.

Motion withdrawn.

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.]

Viscount Sandon thought it would be for the general convenience of the House if his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) would take the earliest opportunity of stating the course he intended to pursue on Friday next, in reference to the limitation of the hours of labour in the Factories Bill.

Lord Ashley said, that his first impression, which had since been confirmed by the opinions of several of his friends on both sides of the House was, not to offer any opposition to the Government proposition to withdraw the Bill. It was, therefore, not his intention to oppose the Government on Friday, in their Motion for the withdrawal of the Bill. He was aware that he surrendered many advantages which he now possessed by adopting that course, but he thought it his duty on all occasions, when he could do so without conceding principle, to consult the wishes and convenience of the House and the Government.

Sir J. Graham: Perhaps I may be permitted to say—having given a notice which now stands for Friday evening with respect to the Bill lately discussed—that if such a proposal meets with the general assent of the House, I shall on Friday move for leave to bring in a Bill to alter the existing law as to Labour in Factories.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS.—ORDER OF THE DAY.]—Mr. T. Duncombe on the Motion that the Order of the Day be read, said he believed the question now was, the reading of the Order of the Day; if they allowed the Order of the Day to be postponed on one Bill, there could be no objection to its being postponed on another; and he had an objection to the Bill that stood No. 7 on the Paper—the Masters and

Servants Bill, which he intended to propose should be postponed till after Easter. This was one of the most important Bills that had been introduced during the present Session, not excepting even the Factories Bill, or the Commons' Inclosure Bill. But any subject that was legislated upon on Wednesday was never reported. The labouring population had been taken quite by surprise by this Bill. The Bill was totally different in principle to any which had preceded it; and it had been altered in almost every word, from the Preamble to the last Clause contained in it. The Government, under such circumstances, ought to discharge the order for its committal, and bring in a new Bill, as they proposed to do on the Factory question. He had several petitions to present against the Bill, all of which went boldly to the point, by calling on the House to spout it from their consideration.

Sir J. Graham thought, after what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman, he ought to state that the Bill was disclaimed by the Government as a Government Bill. There was but one new enactment in this Bill, and that the 4th Clause, which applied to contract work; and he thought it highly expedient that it should be well considered. He (Sir J. Graham) was for the most part favourable to the new enactment, but he was not at all pledged with respect to it. He certainly thought this Bill ought not to be proceeded with in the absence of the hon. Member for Somersetshire.

Mr. Ferrand said, he had that morning received numerous letters from persons in the manufacturing districts, all expressing the greatest alarm as to the effect of the 4th Clause of this Bill, if it should become law. That Clause provided that if a working man should not fulfill a contract—

The Speaker said, the present discussion was altogether irregular. The question was whether the Order of the Day, should be now read, and on that question it was quite irregular to enter into a discussion of the details of a particular measure, although it might be included amongst the Orders of the Day.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, he should then move as an Amendment, that the Order of the Day for the Committee on the Masters and Servants' Bill be read, for the purpose of having the Bill postponed.

Mr. Gally Knight said the motive of this Bill was to enable magistrates to assist the working men in deciding points of difference between Masters and Servants. He thought if honorable Gentlemen knew as much as he did of the difficulties which surrounded a magistrate in the cases between Masters and Servants, they would not oppose this Bill.

Mr. Hawes thought it only an act of justice towards the Government to state, that whereas the Bill was originally obscure as to its enactments, it was now, in accordance with their suggestions, made clear and more fitted for discussion. He objected to the course pursued by the hon. Member for Finsbury in taking that Bill out of its order and moving that it be postponed, especially after an assurance had been given that it would be postponed when the Order of the Day came before the House in regular course.

Mr. T. Duncombe insisted on his right to make the Motion.

The Speaker said, it was the ordinary understanding that on Wednesdays the Orders of the Day should be taken as they stood on the List, but there was no rule of the House to prevent the hon. Member for Finsbury from moving his Amendment. The effect of that Amendment, however, if carried, would be, that a separate question must be put with respect to every distinct Order of the Day—a course which would be contrary to the general understanding which existed.

Amendment withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter before one.

PETITIONS PASSED.—From Greenwich, by Earl of Roseberry, from Lowick, and by Lord Campbell, from Birmingham, against the Disenters' Chapels Bill.—By Lord Kenyon, from Oxford University, and by Lord Colborne, from Hamilton and Rhos, against the Union of the Seas of St. Asaph and Bangor.

STATE OF IRELAND.] The Marquis of Clanricarde said, that it might be convenient that he should state, that in presenting the Petition of which he had given notice, to-morrow evening, relative to the State of Ireland, that it was not his intention to offer any observations to their Lordships, or to enter into any details that could raise a discussion on that question. He had two reasons for taking this course. One was, because he wished to have the advantage of seeing the Government plan relating to the Municipal and Electoral Franchise in Ireland. A proposition on that subject was, he understood, to be made this evening, in the other House of Parliament, but in consequence of the state of public business there, he supposed, it could not be introduced till after the holidays; for that reason he had stated he did not wish to make any observation to-morrow on the subject of the Franchise. The other reason for taking the course which he proposed was, that there was a part of the petition which alluded to the administration of justice in Ireland, and on that he should certainly feel himself called to make some observations on a fitting occasion. It would, however, be quite impossible for him to make those observations without adverting, at the same time, to the recent trials in Ireland. Now, at this moment there was every reason to suppose that the proceedings on those trials would come before their Lordships in their judicial capacity; therefore he conceived that it would be highly improper to introduce a discussion on the subject now; because noble and learned Lords, on both sides of the House, would be prevented from stating their opinions on a question which hereafter would come judicially before them. He thought it better, therefore, to present the petition in silence. Shortly after Easter, however, he should feel it to be his duty to call the attention of the House to that petition, when he should make some Motion on it, for the purpose of bringing the whole subject under consideration; he would, perhaps, move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Lord Brougham concurred with his noble Friend as to what he considered to be his duty upon this important subject; and, in his opinion, the same principle would apply equally to the Motion of which notice had been given by the noble Marquess near him (the Marquess of Lansdowne.) There was one of two courses open to his noble Friend. He could postpone his Motion, which would, perhaps, be the better way; or he could take the other course, of having it most distinctly understood that there was not one word to be introduced into the discussion to-morrow which could in any way affect the pending law proceedings. He believed it had been officially announced that a Writ of Error would be brought forward with reference to the recent legal proceedings. Under these circumstances, the question was, whether it would not be better that the subject should be put off altogether for the present.

The Marquess of Lansdowne coincided in opinion with his noble and learned Friend, as to the propriety of abstaining from entering into a general discussion on the state of Ireland; but he could not agree in the expediency of putting off his Motion with respect to the instructions given as to the challenging of jurors. In answer to a question which had been put to him, when he gave notice of this Motion, he stated that his intention was not at all to interfere with any proceedings that had taken place on the late State Trials, but to have a prospective inquiry as to the course to be taken by the Government, for the future in Ireland, with respect to the challenging of jurors. His Motion was grounded solely on the expediency of making known the instructions given by the Government to the Officers of the Crown in Ireland, for their future guidance. He should, therefore, allow his Motion to remain, on the understanding that there should be no reference to the conduct of the Government in the late trials.

The Lord Chancellor said, it would be found that the course adopted by previous Attorney-Generals had been precisely the same as was adopted in this instance by the present Attorney-General. That would be the result of the noble Marquess's Motion, and he was sure that such a statement would be satisfactory to the noble Marquess.

The Marquess of Lansdowne was very glad to hear what had fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, which confirmed him in his intention to bring forward his Motion to-morrow. Nothing could be more satisfactory to the people of Ireland, nothing could be more beneficial to the Government, than the announcement which had just been made.

Lord Brougham said, if his noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) thought that he was to be precluded from giving his opinion on the whole subject, if it should be introduced to their Lordships, he would find that he was mistaken. If his noble

Friend, for instance, or if any noble Lord, in the course of the discussion, should allude to the conduct of the Government in the late prosecution, or to the conduct of the Court before which the cause was tried, he would not be wanting in his duty to the public, but would give his clear and explicit opinion on the subject; that was the whole matter of debate; and how could they say, when the topic was once introduced, where it would end?

Lord Wharncliffe said, that it would perhaps put an end to the discussion, when he stated at once, that the Government had no objection to the production of the papers for which the noble Marquess intended to move.

Lord Campbell understood, that it was agreed that during the discussion there should be no allusion to the late trials, because those proceedings would be brought judicially before their Lordships, by Writ of Error. In his opinion, the discussion could not be entered into with advantage. There would be very great difficulty in separating the two parts of the subject—the legal question and the constitutional question. It was much more expedient, he thought, that even now they should no further refer to the very difficult and delicate question which must, from what he had heard, sooner or later come before them. Let it not, however, be imagined that because he or others abstained from giving any opinion now, or should abstain from so doing tomorrow, that they admitted the recent proceedings to be constitutional, or that they, in any way, sanctioned the conduct of Her Majesty's Government.

Subject dropped.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.] On the Motion "that the Report on the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, be agreed to,"

The Marquess of Normanby said, that as he intended to give his negative to this Bill, and as he could not be present at the third reading, he should take that opportunity to state the reason on which his opposition, both to the principle and the manner of the Bill, was founded. He did not know why the discussion of such a Bill should be left solely to the noble and learned Lords in that House; and having listened attentively to every word that had been uttered on the second reading, he must say, that never was a Bill brought forward with so little title to their Lordships' support. The only ground on which it was supported was the not very creditable one, that a better Bill could not be brought forward, because it would be opposed by the country practitioners. In his opinion, the House of Commons had been much wronged on this subject. The opinions had been declared very strongly, last Session, against the Diocesan Courts, which now they proposed to perpetuate. The right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, had said, on the measure which, last Session, he had introduced for abolishing those Courts, "Upon principle I cannot yield to the opposition against the Bill, the provisions of which rest upon the highest authority; and if the House reject this Bill, I cannot offer any other likely to be more acceptable." And the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had said, "We are told that if we proceed with this Bill, there are powerful parties who will remember it in the hour of trial. We know well how wide-spread are the interests connected with these Courts; and no executive Government can undertake to reform a legal abuse without for a time forfeiting, I will not say, 'public opinion,' but a very valuable support. We expose ourselves, however, to that danger in asking the House to consent to this attempt at reformation; and we will not purchase a continuance of that support by shrinking from what we conceive to be our duty." That measure had been decided on, on the division for the second reading, by a majority of 80, the numbers being 186 to 84, a much larger majority, in proportion to the numbers present, than any which even the present strong Government had had since they came into office. Now what had become of all that courage and determination not to shrink from their duty? Why the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee, and so far from being recognised and adopted by the House of Commons, it was reported by that Select Committee on the 28th May, and from that period to the end of the Session no steps had been taken on the subject. And why were their Lordships, who had not been at all inconsistent on the matter, to consent now to the perpetuation of courts which had not much business to perform? but the few cases which came before which required the highest legal knowledge. Why should their Lordships be required to imitate the example of the other House in submitting to repeated attempt at reversing solemnly affirmed decisions? The Government, indeed, did not pretend to have adopted the opinions of the other House upon the subject; and the course taken by Ministers on the measure would be deemed by the country one of the most humiliating necessities to which a "strong Government" had ever been reduced.

Lord Wharncliffe observed, the noble Marquess had adduced no argument against the measure, but had merely made an attack upon the Government for having introduced it without the stringent provisions which accompanied the measure of last Session. He partook without hesitation of the responsibility of that course, which he considered to have been a wise one under the circumstances. The former measure had experienced the opposition not only of the provincial practitioners but of the public, who conceived it would expose them to inconvenience, and therefore it was not persevered in. And certainly Government must consider what it could carry, and must submit to do all the good it could, if it was not able to do all it would. He was not at all moved by the lecture of the noble Marquess.

Lord Cottenham said, the noble Baron had claimed credit for the course the Government had pursued, as having been wise. It might be so; but the question was, had it been proper? The noble Baron had talked of the objections entertained on the score of anticipated inconvenience. Why, it was matter of history now that for the long period (since 1832) during which the subject had been under investigation, the result of all inquiries conducted by Committees of either House, or by Commissions under the Crown, had been, that the advantage of the measure would amply compensate for the inconvenience apprehended. It could have been no new discovery, then, that had altered the decision of the Government, which had formerly condemned these Courts, and only consented to their continuance when it appeared "wise" so to do.

Lord Brougham suggested that five years' standing (instead of seven) should be the qualification of the Judges in the Diocesan Courts.

The Lord Chancellor assented to the proposition, observing that five years was the qualification for Recorders. He took occasion to remark, that he had attentively considered the case of Taunton, as to which a Petition had been presented for exemption from the Diocesan Jurisdiction; and he could not accede to a proposal which might expose him to similar application from every "peculiar."

Lord Campbell (who had presented the Petition) had neither personal nor party motives in the matter, but regretted that the request could not be conceded, and wished that either all the courts should be abolished or all retained, for in many cases (as in that before him) it would be easier to go to the Metropolitan than to the Diocesan Court.

Report agreed to.

FACTORIES' BILL.] Lord Brougham was particularly anxious to correct a misrepresentation of his sentiments; or rather, he ought to say, a misunderstanding had arisen from particular sentiments of his not having been expressed with sufficient clearness, in presenting a Petition the other evening, when he had referred to employment in factories. He had received letters from different parts of the country on the subject. He had received very abusive letters; but these he did not mind. He was asked why he tried to keep the poor people labouring, when he himself did nothing at all for the money he received out of the taxes paid by the poor? His answer to this was, that he did labour—that he did work pretty hard too; and there was nothing he should like so much as that he might be allowed to give up what he received out of the taxes, on condition that he might go back to the Bar. What he received as a pension—and such was the case of his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Cottenham)—was in the way of compensation for not returning to their practice at the Bar, where they would receive a great deal more money than they now did. But his noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell) was in a still worse situation, for he gave up a very large income made by him, at the Bar, and he received no compensation, and yet worked there for ten hours a day, and was often there at night most ungratefully employed, so that he must often envy even the factory children. What he was now about to state was, however, of a much more important nature. It was said to him by friendly persons—by those who thought well of his exertions, that he ought to finish his good work—that he ought to follow out his useful suggestions as to wages—that he ought to limit wages—that he ought to bring in a Bill to prevent manufacturers from giving a less amount of wages. What he had said was, of the two greatest absurdities, that of limiting the amount of wages would be less bad, though both would be abominable, than the limiting the number of hours in which a man might choose to labour. He said if he were to do the one foolish thing, or the other, then he said he had rather limit the quantity of wages than of work. If he were to restrain any person in the use of his property, then, he said, he had rather restrain the rich capitalist in the use of his capital than he would interfere with labour, and let a man or woman, if they choose to work a certain time, that they should not be allowed to do so. But then it was said, that it was not inconsistent in him to say that it was the lot of man to toil, and yet be a friend to the abolition of slavery? How, it was said to him, could he seek for the abolition of slavery when he declared it was the lot of man to toil. Yes; but the toil was to be voluntary toil—not toil imposed by another. He hoped, then, that no idea could go abroad, of his sanctioning a Bill to limit the amount of wages; or that he thought they did wrong in the emancipation of their slaves in the colonies, because he would not limit the hours at which a man might choose to work.

House adjourned.

PRESBYTERIAN MARRIAGES (IRELAND.)] The Lord Chancellor moved the re-appointment of the Select Committee of last Session to inquire upon the state of the Law of Marriages in Ireland, with a view of considering whether any and what alterations were required in them.

Lord Campbell entirely concurred with the noble and learned Lord that, as legislation upon the subject had now become indispensable, the re-appointment of the Committee would be a very proper course to take. In the case of the Queen and Millis, the numbers being equal for and against the appeal, the forms of their Lordships' House constrained that equality into a vote in the negative, and thus the judgment of the Court below had been affirmed. But it should not be forgotten that if the case had come before their Lordships in a different form, namely, in a form affirmative of that view of the law, the effect of the equality of votes would have been to negative that proposition—in other words, to give a directly contrary decision upon the subject to that which is accordance with the forms of the House had been given to it. He must say that he should have been better pleased if the decision of their Lordships had been on the other side of the question, and that they had confirmed the first marriage.

Lord Cottenham said, that he could not quite concur in the view of the case which the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down appeared to take. The vote which had been come to was to all intents and purposes the judgment of their Lordships, and declared what the law was. He quite concurred in the propriety of re-appointing the Committee on the subject.

The Lord Chancellor said, it could not be denied that their Lordships having heard the case fully argued at their Bar, and having been equally divided in their votes upon it, the result necessarily had been that the judgment of the Court below had been affirmed. It was material, however, to bear in mind, that the decision to which their Lordships had come was in accordance with a very high authority in this House, and confirmatory of the judgment of the majority of the Bench in Ireland.

Lord Brougham said, he hoped that the Committee would be re-appointed without delay.

CRIMINAL LAW.] Lord Brougham said, he begged to lay a very important document upon their Lordships' Table. He stood there merely as the organ of the Criminal Law Commission, from whom this document emanated; and he acted in such capacity the more readily, as he had the custody of the Great Seal at the time this Commission was issued, which had led the way to this important and satisfactory result. The Report of this Commission contained a digest of the whole Criminal Law of the country, that was, of England and Wales; but not extending to Scotland or Ireland. It comprised the complete code of Criminal Law, excluding procedure, which he thought was a branch of the subject which might much more conveniently and perfectly be treated of in a distinct measure. This measure, so framed, he begged to lay before their Lordships, asking of them the usual courtesy of a first reading for it; whereupon he should be happy to consign it to their Lordships or to Her Majesty's Government, hoping that they would give it as much countenance and support as they might think it deserved; their Lordships, of course, not being in any way pledged to the adoption of it by allowing it to be read a first time. With respect to the separation of the law of procedure from the pure law upon criminal matters, they had the example of Napoleon's Code for such a mode of proceeding, and he thought there was a manifest advantage in adopting it. Again, expressing a hope that the Bill would meet with the support of Her Majesty's Government, he begged to move that this Bill be read a first time.

Lord Campbell said, he rejoiced to see a proposition made for establishing a criminal code; but he must say he had some apprehension as to the fate of this measure, from the irregular manner in which it had been introduced. His noble and learned Friend said that he presented this Bill "as the organ." He (Lord Campbell) expected to hear him go on and say "of Her Majesty's Government;" and he should have been very much rejoiced if he had said so; because, feeling very great anxiety upon this subject, he felt that no measure of the kind could hope to be carried into effect, except with the cordial assent and co-operation of the Government. But his noble and learned Friend did not say he stood here as the "organ of the Government," but as the "organ of the Criminal Law Commission." This was a position which he could not quite understand. The Commissioners, having been appointed by the Crown, had reported the result of their inquiries to the Queen's

Government, and having done so, were to all intents and purposes, functi officio. They had nothing more to do with the matter. It was for the Government, if they thought proper, to introduce a measure in accordance with their recommendations. It would seem, however, that Her Majesty's Government had either not seen this Report or had not thought proper to adopt its recommendations in the form of a Bill. This task they had abandoned to his noble and learned Friend, who did not hold any office under Government at present. He (Lord Campbell), therefore, felt some alarm at the manner in which this Bill had been brought in, but still he hoped that it would meet with the support of Her Majesty's Government, and that the country would not long be suffered to remain under the disgrace of having no criminal code.

Lord Brougham denied that there was any irregularity in the mode in which this Bill had been brought before their Lordships. His noble and learned Friend ought to be aware, that the Report upon which it was framed was a public one, and one to which, for the last twelve months, every Member of either House of Parliament could have had access. His noble and learned Friend seemed also to forget his constitutional law. The Constitution was one thing, the Government another. The Government might introduce Bills, but the Parliament passed them. He did not understand that there was any maxim of constitutional law which required that a Bill of this or any other nature should be introduced by the Government of the Crown. This might be the most effectual mode by which a Measure could be carried through Parliament; but there was not the shadow of a charge of irregularity in his (Lord Brougham) or any other Member of their Lordships' House bringing in any Bill which he thought proper. He concurred with his noble and learned Friend, in the hope that this Bill would be taken up with favour and consideration by Her Majesty's Government; but he had only to add, that if they did not, he should continue to take care of it himself.

[DISTRESS IN LIMERICK.] The Earl of Clare presented a petition from the City of Limerick, complaining of certain proceedings under the rate-paying clauses of the Irish Poor Law, by which districts were united within the elective boundary. His Lordship also presented a petition from the same city, complaining of the Distress which existed in that town: the petition described various features of the existing Distress, and particularly referred to the crowded and filthy state of that part of the town inhabited by the poorer classes. The noble Earl said, that he concurred in general in the prayers of this petition, and he was sure that the noble Marquess opposite, who was well acquainted with this town, would concur with him that it was a petition well deserving of the serious attention of their Lordships. [The Marquess of Lansdowne: "Hear, hear."] There was one of the prayers of the petition in which, however, he dared say their Lordships would not be disposed to concur; it was this—that an additional tax might be laid on absentees, in order to relieve the distresses of the poor. He had called the attention of the House to this petition, under a strong conviction that the grievances which oppressed Ireland were more of a social than political nature; and he hoped that Government would, with as little delay as possible, give their best attention to this subject.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRACY (IRELAND).] The Marquess of Normanby said, that he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to a subject which had only come under his notice to-day. He should have wished to have given Her Majesty's Government notice of his intention to do so, but for the consideration that, as the Easter recess was so near, they would not probably have time to communicate with Dublin and receive an answer on the subject before their Lordships adjourned. Their Lordships would recollect that, about a month ago, he moved for a list of the appointments which had been made to the Stipendiary Magistracy of Ireland from the year 1841 down to the present time. His object in moving for this return was, that he had reason to apprehend that a most objectionable appointment had been made, or was about to be made, to the Stipendiary Magistracy, and he intended, should it turn out that such was the case, to call their Lordships' attention to the subject. On receiving the Return, however, the name he apprehended to have found in it was not there, and upon ing this he was satisfied the appointment had not been made. In the course of the present day, however, he understood that the appointment in question had actually been made, and had been announced in the Dublin Gazette two days before the return to his (the Marquess of Normanby's) Motion had been made. He would not at present comment further upon this circumstance than to observe that he always understood that it was the practice of Government, when a Return was ordered by either House of Parliament, to make it out with the fullest and latest information which the subject admitted of. Her Majesty's Government would, perhaps, institute some inquiry upon the cause of this omission in the present case; and he (the Marquess of Normanby) would now proceed to make a few observations upon the appointment of which he had occasion to complain—namely, that of Mr. O'Brien. Three years ago Mr. O'Brien was a violent Repealer, and as an instance of his strong party feeling on this subject, he had refused to give the health of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for the time being at a public dinner, on account of that Nobleman having declared that he could not apply any of the patronage of the Government in favour of any declared Repealer. But not only did Mr. O'Brien refuse to give the health of the Lord Lieutenant, and upon this ground, but he had written a letter to the Gentleman who was Member for the county where it took place, which he should beg to read to their Lordships. The noble Marquess then read the following letter.

"Farfield, Oct. 20th, 1840.

"My dear Dillon Browne—The friends of Repeal in this great county, anxious at this present time to express, in the teeth of Lord Ebrington's Bill of pains and penalties, their firm adhesion to that now devoted question, have resolved to pay to you a tribute of respect as one to whose active services and chivalrous support Repeal is so much and deeply indebted, beg through me that you will name a day to meet your friends at a public dinner, to be given in Ballinasloe.

"There is no better time than the present for the people and their leaders, now that Lord Ebrington has given to the Repeal Question the hallowed tinge of persecution and all the attractive splendour of romance. His Excellency would seem to seek to uphold the Union by the same means that it was carried—the hopes of reward, the threats of persecution. He little knew the human heart, and less the Irish one, who supposed that from the hallowed watching we now hold over the tomb of our country we are to be routed by a Castle Proclamation.

"We will, by legal and peaceable means, show his Excellency that to dictate to a nation is but the golden lot of the few and thinly scattered. We make him a present of his prophecy as to the impracticability of Repeal—we were educated in the school of Richelieu, who acknowledged no such word as fail.

"Your friend and warm admirer, O'Connell, keeping his eye upon the falling sands of the hour-glass, is terribly in earnest, and performing miracles under the pressure of advancing years. In truth, my dear friend 'Repeal of the Union' has become the national mandate of a people who, in the midst of ruin, have not time or temper to say more.

"I fear, my dear Dillon Browne, I have become prolix upon the subject, which it has been my happy lot often to have heard you dilate upon in private, with that eloquence which now has become the intellectual property of the many. Forgetting my own unworthiness, I rejoice that I am selected as the instrument through whom the Repealers of this county convey their high admiration of your patriotism and talent, and remain, my dear Dillon Browne, unalterably yours,

"THOMAS O'BRIEN.

"Robert Dillon Browne, Esq., M.P., Mayo."

[The perusal of this letter was greeted with repeated bursts of laughter.] Now, when it was recollected that this was the man who had been put over the heads of many deserving competitors, who had been long waiting for appointment to the magistracy upon the promises of Her Majesty's Government, the termination, "yours unalterably," was certainly a little remarkable. With respect to the change which had occurred in this person's politics since this epistle was written, he was informed that it was owing to Mr. O'Brien's having wanted to go, in the advocacy of his repeal notions, beyond the line of conduct which was considered prudent by others of his party. It was then Mr. O'Brien seceded from them and became their bitter opponent. It was for their Lordships to consider whether the appointment of such a person to the magistracy, to preside over the disturbed districts of Ireland, was not very discreditable to those who made it. He hoped Her Majesty's Government, when they became aware how improper an appointment it was, would lose no time in correcting it. But at the same time he could not help observing that they had been warned, or at least might have been warned if they had chosen, at the time they were making this appointment of the impropriety of it, the matter having been noised about and discussed in all the newspapers. As it was, the circumstance of which he now complained of was gazetted two days before this Return was made, it was not included in it. He should therefore conclude by moving that the Return be completed up to the present day.

Lord Wharnccliffe said, that if the noble Marquess had confined himself to a complaint of the incompleteness of the Return which had been made in obedience to an order of this House, undoubtedly he (Lord Wharnccliffe) would have had nothing to complain of in the course he had taken. But the noble Marquess had thought proper, also, to go into the whole merits of this appointment, and the character of the Gentleman in whose favour it had been made, and this without the slightest notice to Her Majesty's Government of his intention. He certainly thought it would have been more courteous, and more in accordance with the usual proceedings in their Lordships' House, if the noble Marquess had given some intimation of the course he intended to take, in order that Her Majesty's Government might have prepared themselves with all the information which the subject afforded. As it was, however, he (Lord Wharnccliffe) would take care to inquire how it had happened that the name of Mr. O'Brien had not been included in this Return, and also as to the circumstances under which this appointment had been made.

The Marquess of Clanricarde said, he did not think that his noble Friend was open to any charge of unfairly attacking Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion. On the contrary, the attack was against the clerk for having omitted the name of Mr. O'Brien; and if Her Majesty's Government thought that this was a matter which could be allowed to remain where it was they were very much mistaken. He had intended himself, having heard of the appointment some days ago, to have brought forward a substantive Motion upon this subject, giving due notice to Her Majesty's Government of his intention; and all he could say was, that if this appointment were practically sustained, he should still think it his duty to do so. There was no one subject so importantly affecting the interests of Ireland as that of the appointment of the Magistracy, and the appointment of this Gentleman as a stipendiary magistrate, passing over, as was done here, persons well qualified, of undoubted respectability, who had invariably conducted themselves in the most exemplary manner, was not likely to give satisfaction to the people, but on the contrary, it was calculated to bring into disrespect the justice which was administered by those functionaries. The charge which his noble Friend had brought was one which could not be contradicted; and when Her Majesty's Government said that they did not know anything about the matter, it was only a repetition of the old excuse, that they did not read the newspapers. There was no newspaper in Ireland in which this appointment had not been noticed: and there was not one, not even of those which had printed Mr. O'Brien's letters against Mr. O'Connell, in return for which it was understood that this appointment had been given, that had ventured to say one word in favour of it.

The Duke of Wellington: My Lords, I must say that this debate is irregular, in consequence of the want of a notice on the part of the noble Marquess of his intention. If the noble Marquess had given notice respecting the inaccuracy of the Return which is now upon your Lordships' Table, inquiries should have been made into the reason of the omission of the name of the Gentleman among the list of Stipendiary Magistrates, who had been appointed within the period of the noble Marquess's Motion. Then followed another noble Marquess with his observations condemning the appointment, and mentioning that it had been severely commented upon in the Irish newspapers. Now, as regards that part of the speech of the noble Marquess, I must plead guilty to the charge, for I have not read one of the newspapers, and I have never heard before this evening of the name of Mr. O'Brien. I must say, that I am sorry that the name of the Gentleman who received the appointment complained of was not inserted in the list, seeing that his name had appeared in the Dublin Gazette two days before the list was made out. I beg to repeat, that if the noble Marquess had given notice of his intention, inquiries should have been made into the cause of the name being omitted in the list which has been furnished.

Lord Brougham said, he had

thus far concurred with this Gentleman—of whose existence until now he had been utterly ignorant—upon the subject of persecution,—without using the highly figurative eloquence about the “hallowed tinge” attending it; he had always objected to proscribing men for political opinions, and had disapproved of Lord Ebrington's declaration of his determination not to extend patronage to Repealers, because he knew the effect would be favourable to the cause; looking on Repeal of course as the greatest of all absurdities—as all men of sense in either country knew it to be; but he thought his noble Friends of the Government had taken a far better course, and were dealing with Repealers in a more “hallowed way” in promoting them instead of proscribing them; and he thought the process (so pleasing) would have perhaps a pretty effect on the “repealing minds of Ireland,” to whom it would unquestionably appear a far more “hallowed” way of doing the thing, putting Repealers as it did in a much more comfortable predicament than that of persecution. Nor was this course without precedent, for he remembered that a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sheil), who sometimes used figurative language of a species similar to that of this Gentleman (though of a higher kind, perhaps), had been an ardent Repealer, and was by the late Government “hallowed” into the Vice Presidency of the Board of Trade, and what was exceedingly observable was, that the right hon. Gentleman had never uttered a syllable about Repeal ever since. A far more comfortable, gracious, and pleasing mode this of dealing with Repealers than persecuting them—a process, which no doubt, this Mr. Dennis—what's his name?—preferred, just as the right hon. Gentleman did. What could be the objection to his appointment, if he had been converted from his Repeal opinions? The Gentleman had given up his “unalterable attachment” for substantial reasons, and others would be equally happy to do so, if they had reasons equally strong. God knows, however, that everything connected with the administration of justice was a very serious matter. But he really thought that anything connected with it should be discussed in a solemn, serious manner. They ought not to discuss it in an attack upon an individual, without giving him notice of their intention to assail him, and without affording to the Government that had appointed him the means of defending him. If there was any objection to the character of the individual appointed, and if that objection were connected with the Administration, it became a very serious matter, and tended to throw discredit upon the Government, and they should be afforded the opportunity of replying to it.

The Marquess of Clanricarde said, the subject was undoubtedly a grave one, and if noble Lords opposite could shew that this person was fitted for his situation in any one respect, he should be satisfied with their negating his Motion.

The Marquess of Normanby said, that in spite of the amusing and sarcastic speech of the noble Lord, he thought this a very serious subject, and it was greatly to be regretted, that, when his noble and learned Friend entertained the opinions he did, as to promotion being preferable to persecution, he did not impress these opinions upon the Government at the time that they dismissed the local Magistrates in Ireland,—not the paid Magistrates, it was to be observed,—for their Repeal opinions. As to the appointment of his right hon. Friend, he really did not think that his noble and learned Friend would have made that charge against the late Government, when he knew that the appointment had taken place many years after the opinions expressed by him on the subject of Repeal had been abandoned—for opinions expressed, and a part taken by him as a Member of the Legislature; and then he must own that he was still more surprised to hear his noble and learned Friend declare, that Mr. Sheil's appointment had never been objected to, that no objection had ever been urged against it. Surely, when his noble and learned Friend said this, he must have forgotten, that for two long years of his noble Friend's (Viscount Melbourne's) Administration, at every meeting of what was called Conservative gatherings there was nothing heard but the denunciation of the appointment of Mr. Sheil. It was one of the grounds of attack against that Administration. Now, as to the appointment of Stipendiary Magistrates, he must again state, that he considered it one of the most important which the Irish Government could make. He now, then, put it to their Lordships whether the person, whose letter he had read, could be considered one in the exercise of whose discretion any confidence could be placed; and whether a Government who made such an appointment was not to be considered responsible when they adopted a person who had committed himself to such sentiments. He had been accused of bringing forward this Motion without notice. The Motion was a mere matter of course. It was one he had heard moved a hundred times without the slightest objection being offered to it. No objection was urged against it in the first instance; and if the Gentleman had not been appointed at the time, then the Return he moved for would be the best defence of the Government. There was, it ought to be known to noble Lords, an Irish Office in town; and though his noble Friend (Earl de Grey) had declared that he never read the Irish papers, yet still in the Office to which he referred there ought to be the information which he sought. This subject had been a matter of discussion for the last month; and, from the objections that had been made to the appointment, and seeing the name omitted in the Return he had moved for, he considered that the appointment had not taken place. It was, then, under these circumstances, that his attention was called to the subject that morning, and if the appointment had been made when he proposed his motion, he could not conceive how it could be objected to. It was a matter of course—a thing that had been done a hundred times. When he said a matter of course, he recollected that when he was in Office, questions were put day after day, and week after week, by noble Lords opposite, and they were always expecting to have answers at once given them. He was not aware that there was anything irregular or unusual in the course that he had pursued. He was satisfied that he had done his duty in calling attention to the point, and he was glad to hear that it was now in the hands of his noble Friend, should the Government persist in their ill-advised appointment.

Lord Wharncliffe did not object to the Motion, but he did to what he must call the untimely and uncourteous nature of the attack made upon the Government, of which not the least notice was given, either to the Gentleman appointed or to the Government, so that it was impossible either to defend the appointment, or reply to the attack made.

The Earl of Ripon said, that he, for one, did not complain of the noble Marquess because he had proposed a Motion, but for his speech—not a simple statement—but a very violent speech. A Gentleman speaking was not always aware of his own violence; but he said that the noble Marquess had made a most bitter attack upon the Government—a most severe attack upon the Lord Lieutenant. The insinuation amounted to this, that the Lord Lieutenant had kept back the name of this Gentleman. If it were not so meant, that at least appeared to be the insinuation. Certainly no one who heard the noble Marquess, but must feel that a very serious attack had been made—it might be a deserved attack upon the writer of the private letter—the ridiculous letter that had been read; but then all this was done without notice. He did not complain of the Motion, which was a mere matter of course, but he said that no Government, conducted howsoever wisely or well at an instant, if an attack were thus made upon it, could possibly give an explanation. His noble Friend talked of reading newspapers—he seemed to consider it to be a duty to pick up all sorts of stories. He did not know how much idle time the noble Marquess had to read the Irish papers—nor how he could spare the time to go through them day by day; but this he knew, that a man who was engaged in public life found it impossible to read them. Whether the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was to be objected to, because he did not read the Irish newspapers, and search out all the things that might be complained of in those voluminous documents, he did not know; nor whether it was conceived to be a part of his duty upon every single appointment he made, to ferret out in the Irish newspapers whether it was approved or disapproved of. As to the Motion it was all very right; but he did think that at another time it would be more fair to all parties whom the noble Marquess meant to condemn, to give them notice of his intention to do so.

The Marquess of Normanby hoped, that at another time the occasion might not occur for finding so much fault as at present. His noble Friend opposite had said that he found fault with the Lord Lieutenant with respect to the Return. He had made no attack upon the Lord Lieutenant as to the Return. He did, however, find fault with him as to the appointment, and when the occasion occurred would show just grounds for so finding fault with him. At the same time he did not hold him responsible for the Return. There was, however, the appearance of blame somewhere, if there were an omission in the Return. His noble Friend complained of his having made a violent speech. The facts were strong, and he left the facts to speak for themselves; and if there were any violence in his speech, that was to be found in the facts he had stated. His noble Friend had said, too, that it would not be convenient to hold the Government responsible for not reading the Irish papers. He attached no such responsibility to them; but there was the Irish Office in London, and the Government, through the means of that Office, ought not now to be without an answer. When his noble Friend, Lord Morpeth, was Chief Secretary for Ireland, he was never unprepared for the defence of any appointment that had been made. This was a point to which public attention had been very generally directed. The matter was one that had occupied a considerable space in the discussions on Ireland, and it was therefore impossible that the local Government of Ireland could be ignorant of it; that they could not be able to answer upon that which was a matter of notoriety.

The Earl of Ripon observed, that if the noble Marquess had brought forward his Motion on Monday, he could have been answered satisfactorily and fully. He presumed it was not the convenience of the noble Marquess to wait till Monday. Probably the noble Marquess was going out of town, and that was the reason for their having a premature discussion, and when Government could not have time to answer him.

Lord Wharncliffe : hear, hear.

The Marquess of Normanby remarked that such a defence of the Government must be exceedingly satisfactory to the noble President of the Council, when he cheered it so loudly.

JURIES IN IRELAND.] The Marquess of Lansdowne had, he said, to move for copies of any instructions given to the Crown Law Officers of Ireland relative to the Challenging of Juries in Ireland. Having received an intimation from his noble Friend opposite that there would be no objection to the Return he moved for, it would not be necessary for him to detain the House with more than a few observations. All he intended then to say, was to justify him in pressing upon their attention, whilst the general observations that he had to make should be delayed until the period when they would have under discussion that Motion on the state of Ireland, of which his noble Friend the noble Marquess had given notice, and which, in the exercise of that which, he must say, was a wise and sound discretion, he had determined upon delaying until at least after the short recess which was about to take place. The Motion, however, which he himself was about to make—it was one in which he sought for information, and that information he considered it was most important to the public in Ireland that they should be put in possession of as soon as possible, and that, too, in the most authentic shape and form. Everything connected with the administration of justice was important; but that which, of all other things, was the greatest feature in the due administration of justice, was the appointment and selection of the Juries. In this country and Ireland the greatest importance was naturally attached to that subject. It was, then, calculated to excite their serious attention, when they found that an apprehension was entertained that a mode was adopted by which certain persons or classes were excluded—it was calculated to produce the greatest possible alarm, when it was believed that this was done in the selection of Jurors. When the prisoner or the culprit was called upon in those solemn forms which were, however, so full of meaning; when in the ordinary or commonest trials a man was called upon to state how he chose to be tried, and in answer to that question was advised to say, that he would be “tried by his country,” what was the meaning of that choice—what was the meaning of the declaration thus put into his mouth but this—that he was willing to be tried by persons partaking of the same sympathies, of the same feelings, of the same habits, with himself. Unfortunately it had been for a long time the practice in Ireland not to give to the persons tried that advantage which was thus intended for them, and the result was, a permanent want of confidence in the administration of justice. It had been the habit in using those powers and those forms, which in the hands of the Crown were intended for other purposes—it was the habit in using them to exclude the great majority of the people of that country from taking that share in the administration of justice which was their right. This had formerly prevailed to a great extent throughout Ireland, and to such an extent in some parts, that there were corporate cities (in which the corporations were now happily defunct) in which, for a series of years, not one Roman Catholic had ever sat on a Jury. In the present state of things, however, a better view of the subject was taken by those who had the superintendence of the administration of justice. By the precise orders given on the subject by his noble Friend near him (the Marquess of Normanby), and by the noble Earl who was then absent (the Earl Fortescue), who had lately filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the practice had been virtually abandoned, and since 1820 Catholics as well as Protestants had been admitted to serve on Juries, and the late Chief Baron Joy, although of what was called Orange politics, when Attorney General, seeing the advantage of having mixed Juries, had issued distinct orders on the subject, and the result was found to be most advantageous. If their Lordships looked to the various Reports upon their Table—if the Reports of their Committees upon the state of Ireland in 1824—1825 were referred to, they would see that the happiest effects had been the result, from the moment it was understood that Roman Catholics were allowed to enter into the composition of the Juries. He could quote the authorities of the most eminent Judges, of the most eminent Officers of the Crown, of the most eminent Crown Solicitors, and the most eminent Magistrates, all concurring in the opinion, that from the moment it was understood that Catholics were to act upon Juries, the administration of justice was improved, and that Roman Catholics did their duty in that respect in an exemplary manner. Such was the opinion of Mr. Justice Day, a most eminent and profound Judge; such, too, was the opinion of Mr. Barrington, the eminent Crown Solicitor; and of that useful and active Magistrate, Sir R. Becher. In short, every person of experience in the country testified to the advantages derived from this change in the old jury system. After this it was found necessary to have still more efficient rules laid down for the admission of Roman Catholics to Juries; and to prevent the powers of the Crown from being used for the purpose of excluding them, various instructions, having that object in view, were given by Judge Perrin; they were acted upon by Sir Michael O'Loughlen, and the matter was afterwards reconsidered by Chief Baron Brady, and various instructions were given, so as to insure that Catholics might be admitted on Juries. When that Return was before the House, it would be seen what had been done with respect to the admission of Catholics on Juries. He should rejoice to hear that the present Government had issued instructions to the same effect to their agents, and if it were so, the promulgation of those orders to that effect would, he believed, prove of the greatest possible advantage to them. The promulgation of these instructions would show that the power of the Crown was not to be exercised for the exclusion of persons on account of their religion: but equality was to be ensured. It would be useful to have that understood throughout the country—that it might be felt that exclusion would not attach to any person by reason of his religious opinions, but that if he were a person of respectability, he would be as likely to be left on a jury, as a person of any other religion. Circumstances to which it was not necessary for him to advert, but that were notorious to the whole country—admitted facts, which were known to the whole country—there were cases, he did not now mean a particular case, but there were certain trials that had lately taken place in Ireland, in which Catholics stood as criminals, and the jurors were exclusively Protestants. That may have been but an accident.

Lord Wharncliffe objected that he did not consider that that was a proper subject for observation at that time.

Lord Brougham observed, that it was one of the grounds on which the Return was moved for.

The Marquess of Lansdowne distinctly declared he did not mean to refer to an impropriety committed in a particular case. He desired to be understood as giving no such opinion. These things might have been the result of accident, and he did not contend that they were not. But some cases had occurred—which might not be known to his noble and learned Friend, if he did not read the Irish papers any more than Her Majesty's Ministers—a more had been taken by Her Majesty's Government, he believed, not with the view or for the purpose of excluding Roman Catholics, but the result had been that relief existed, and it was taken from the provincial papers, and the consequence was, that great excitement, particularly in the counties of Monaghan and Tipperary, founded upon the suggestion, that it was the intention legally, nevertheless improperly, to exclude Roman Catholics. They must see, then, that there was a necessity to set the people's minds right upon this matter—to make known the intentions of Her Majesty's Government in this respect. He said this, because he felt that the existence of the Trial by Jury was not only valuable, as a means of arriving at conviction—not as a means of arriving at criminal punishment; but he considered it valuable and important, as producing between man and man regard and confidence in the administration of justice. It was a most important privilege of the subject—it was one of which he ought not to be deprived, but he permitted to share in equally with his fellow subjects. He believed it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to exclude Roman Catholics from that privilege. He sincerely believed that Her Majesty's Government had no such intention—that they would feel obliged for the opportunity being given of disavowing such an intention. Possibly they would take advantage of this opportunity. At the same time he wished to impress upon the House and the public that, in submitting this Motion, he did not impeach the conduct of the Government upon a particular trial—that he did not make reference to anything that had passed in a particular case; but generally he wished it to be known, that the instructions that had been given, and which were entitled to such pre-eminent praise had not been withdrawn—that it was the intention of the Government to pursue the same course in this respect with their predecessors—that this was their intention, and this was done without meaning to cast a reflection upon individuals, whenever they might be found to exist, who had a bias in conducting prosecutions, if they were not restrained, and bound down by the directions of the Government to which he had referred.

The Motion having been put,

Lord Wharncliffe who was almost inaudible, was understood to say that a Return was made to the House of Commons in 1842, containing a copy of the instructions given to the Crown Solicitor, regarding the striking of Juries in Crown cases, and that the last instructions given were issued, as the noble Marquess observed, by Chief Baron Brady. He now held in his hand a circular which the present Attorney General for Ireland issued on this subject when he came into office. The circular referred to several matters besides that of striking Juries, and so far as it related to the instructions given by the Attorney General for the striking of Juries, he had no objection to lay a copy of it on the Table; but he did not think it would be convenient to produce a complete copy, because, as he had said, it contained some matters which were in no way connected with the present Motion. He would read that part of it relating to the striking of Juries. It was as follows:—

“The Attorney General presents his compliments to the Crown Solicitor for—, and having read the instructions given by Chief Baron Brady, as to the mode of striking Juries on the part of the Crown, requests the Crown Solicitor to continue to observe these instructions.”

He trusted that, the noble Marquess would now feel satisfied that Government had made no alteration on the subject.

The Marquess of Lansdowne said, that as the noble Lord had promised to lay before their Lordships extracts from the circular bearing on the particular point, he would not, under these circumstances, further trouble their Lordships.

Lord Brougham felt bound to say as he had objected to his noble Friend bringing on this Motion for fear of its leading to an unnecessary discussion, that nothing could be more fair or more correct than the manner in which he had brought it forward. The Motion referred only to Crown cases, and had nothing to do with Special Juries, the challenging of Crown Jurors and the striking out individuals from Special Juries being totally different.

Lord Campbell said, there certainly was a marked distinction between challenging Jurors in Crown cases, and striking off Special Jurors, but he hoped the instructions would not be confined to Crown cases, but that the spirit of them should be, that no man should be struck off from a Special Jury because of his religious opinions.

Lord Wharncliffe said, that although it was true the instructions referred only to Crown cases, he should be very sorry that any person should be struck off from a Special Jury on account of his particular faith. He felt that as strongly as any man.

Motion agreed to.—House adjourned.

NAVAL FORCE—POOR RATES (IRELAND).] Sir G. Cockburn said, that seeing the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton in his place, he begged to make some explanation relative to a statement which he had made in the discussion on the Navy Estimates. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had asked him whether a naval force had been employed in the collection of Poor Rates in Ireland. He then stated that he knew nothing of any such transaction, and that although Naval Officers had certainly been employed to support the Magistrates, they could have only had a moral influence upon the people as respected paying Poor Rates. Since then he had thought it right to look over the reports made to the Admiralty upon the subject, which exactly confirmed him in what he had before stated. The hon. and gallant Officer read several reports from Naval Officers stationed on the coast of Ireland, to the general effect that the appearance of war-steamers had been productive of the best moral effect, and in many instances probably prevented a collision between the people and the military. The steamers were sent to assist the civil authorities and to maintain peace.

Captain Pechell said, that on the Navy Estimates he had pointed out that one, if not two, war-steamers, were employed in the collection of Poor Rates in Ireland. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir George Cockburn) denied the statement, and said he was not aware of any such circumstance. He subsequently produced his authority for his statement, and the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department made an apology for the hon. and gallant Officer, and he was satisfied with the apology. But since the hon. and gallant Gentleman had chosen to come down and vindicate his own case, he must say that his opinion was not altered. In fact, the hon. and gallant Gentleman acknowledged that ships of war were sent to aid the civil power, so that the Poor Rates were actually collected under the guns of the steamers. The difference between him and the hon. Gentleman was, that the latter said, he had no cognizance of the fact of the steamers being so employed, and he added that the Officers of those vessels had received no instructions from the Admiralty to collect the Poor Rates, but merely to aid the civil power; whereas he (Captain Pechell) inferred that those ships of war were kept on that coast in order that the police and officers of Government might the better insure the collection of Poor Rates. One of the steamers was, in fact, converted into a sort of Somerset House. He thought, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made the matter worse, for it clearly appeared that Poor Rates had been collected under the guns of ships of war.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.]

On the Motion of Sir J. Graham, that the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Factories Bill, for the purpose of its being discharged, be read,

Mr. B. Cochrane, before this Bill was withdrawn, wished to say he believed that it was generally supposed by those hon. Members who had supported the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire (Lord Ashley) that the noble Lord had fully made up his mind as to the course he should pursue on this Bill, and that he had looked beforehand not only into every probable but also into every possible circumstance that might arise; and that the noble Lord was prepared to overstep all those obstacles which a Government might be expected to throw in his way. Under these impressions he had certainly the honour of voting with the noble Lord. He, however, did expect that upon this question of a withdrawal of the Bill—after the energetic manner in which the noble Lord had expressed himself the other night, that the noble Lord would be prepared to carry out his views to the fullest extent. He would say upon this question that he considered the conduct of the Government infinitely more sincere—indeed, he would not be guilty of throwing any doubt upon the sincerity of the noble Lord, but he must say that he considered the conduct of the Government upon this question more apparently in earnest than that of the noble Lord. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) was defeated on Monday upon his proposition of twelve hours labour. He, however, again brought the question before the House, which, though an unusual course, was, he believed, under the circumstances, a justifiable one; and the right hon. Gentleman was again defeated upon the twelve hours proposition; and on the same occasion the ten hour proposition of the noble Lord was also defeated by a small majority. The right hon. Gentleman then asked for a further delay, so as to enable him to decide upon what course, under the circumstances, he should pursue. The right hon. Baronet subsequently said that he would enter into no compromise or concession upon the point in dispute; and he (Mr. Cochrane) concurred with him so far,—that if the principle for which he was contending was worth anything, he should not submit to any compromise or concession. Though some hon. Members might have thought that an eleven hours Clause might have been a fair question for the right hon. Gentleman to have substituted, he had refused to entertain such a question, and preferred the withdrawing of the Bill altogether. He wanted to know why the noble Lord did not carry out the principle which he advocated so warmly, and object altogether to the withdrawal of the Bill. What was the present state of the House in reference to this Bill? The very same Bill, out of which the twelve hours Clause had been already struck, was again to be introduced to them for their consideration and adoption. What was the object to be gained by this delay? Why, it must be obvious to every person in this House, that the object in view was simply to gain time. It had been said, that the greatest policy of a Statesman was to gain time. Would it be a matter of greater possibility to carry the ten hours Clause after Easter, than at the present time? The noble Lord might no doubt say, that it was an unusual course of proceeding to object to the withdrawal of a Bill. It might be so; but had not the right hon. Baronet adopted an unusual course of proceeding on the subject? He thought that in a question of this nature, if a man had once put his hand upon the plough, he should never be induced to look back again. The noble Lord might again say, that the Government had declared this to be a party question, and that under the circumstances he did not wish to offer any opposition to the Government in moving for the withdrawal of their Bill. But he should recollect that the question would be equally a party one after Easter, as it was before it. Did not the noble Lord "keep his promise to the ear, and break it to the hope?" Was there a moral probability of the ten hours Clause being carried after Easter, if it were defeated before it? No doubt the fourteen days which should intervene before the re-assembling of Parliament would afford a great opportunity for agitating this question. He believed that the noble Lord said the noble Viscount the Member for Sanderland had concurred with him in the propriety of not opposing the discharge of this order. The noble Viscount might delight in agitation outside; indeed he understood that it was the intention of the noble Viscount to go down into the different districts for the purpose of agitating the question. This he would say, in respect to any agitation, he had supported the noble Lord on this question up to the present time, but he objected to all agitation out of doors, either on corn law repeal, or factory labour. This was a question which should be discussed calmly, dispassionately, and solemnly in this House. He thought that if this measure were only to be carried by the continued display of excitement out of doors, it would be almost better to give it up altogether. There was one point he wished to allude to in reference to what the noble Lord said the other night. He never was more astonished in his life than when he heard the noble Lord state that this Bill, in his opinion, would reduce wages. He (Mr. Cochrane) would have nothing to do with it if he thought it would have that effect. As he had supported the Bill, he should continue his support to the ten hours proposition; and he did not think that the result of such a measure would be to reduce wages. Permit him to state his reasons for saying so.

He considered that in most cases it could not reduce wages much, for in most of the manufacturing towns they had already arrived at the minimum of wages. He would say that the manufacturers would be amply compensated for this reduction of labour, and in a short time they would find that for the two hours' loss they would sustain by the adoption of such a proposition as this, they would be fully compensated by the addition of energy and nerve which would be thrown into the morning's work. "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work," was a good and wholesome maxim. He, therefore, believed that the proposition they were contending for, would not ultimately have the effect of reducing wages. If the noble Lord, however, thought that wages would be thus reduced, the noble Lord should have followed up his ten hours Clause with a measure like that of Mr. Whitbread, who, in 1793, brought in a Bill for regulating wages. He had thus far ventured to make these few remarks as to the position in which they were now placed in reference to this subject. He was afraid that this question would not now have the result which the noble Lord's party desired. He was afraid that much of the time of the House had been lost. He would only ask every unprejudiced person to look at the state of the House—what it is, and what it was. The noble Lord had, the other night, appealed in terms almost unusual in this House, to those hon. Members who had supported him in his proposition. In the most solemn manner the noble Lord asked them not to give way one inch. Hon. Members were thus kept in town for the purpose of supporting the noble Lord upon this field of battle. But then they found the noble Lord coming forward, and telling them that after Easter he would decide upon what course he would pursue. The country had been agitated to little purpose, and the time of the House had been taken up on this subject, without any object whatsoever being gained. This had been occasioned, not from any want of sincerity on the part of the noble Lord, for no person could accuse him of that, but earnestness of resolution in all relations of life was absolutely necessary to ensure success.

Mr. T. Duncanson: I am sure the House will excuse me for standing between the explanation of the noble Lord and the observations of the hon. Member for

Bridport, inasmuch as I mean to move an Amendment on the Motion of the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department, which may also call for some remarks from the noble Lord. Had it been the pleasure of the Government to have made a House yesterday, it was my intention to have given notice of the Amendment which I now mean to propose. I participate most fully in the great disappointment and surprise expressed by the hon. Member for Bridport, at the course which the noble Lord has pursued. Like the hon. Member for Bridport, I followed and fought with the noble Lord in those ranks, which to the last I thought the noble Lord would have commanded, and more particularly as I believed we had arrived at the hour of victory; and I am sure that no circumstance ever occurred which caused greater regret in the country than the postponement of the discussion until after Easter. Now, Sir, the Amendment I am about to propose will, at least, rescue those who vote for it, from what I consider the well-merited charge of abandoning those principles which they twice recorded, and of surrendering the advantages of which they are at present in possession. It is, after the words, "the Order of the Day, &c., be discharged," to insert these words—

"With a view not only of carrying into effect, in any future measure, the recorded decisions, of this House, that the labour to be performed by young persons and females should be less than twelve hours a day, but also with a view of maintaining good faith with those whose confidence in the integrity of the votes of this House is indispensable to its character and its existence as a deliberative and representative Assembly."

Now, how stands the case at the present moment? The House has told you, in three divisions, that twelve hours labour was too much for females and young persons employed in factories; and the Government, not being able to convince this House (as they, I believe, never will be) that twelve hours is not an unnatural time for the labour of such persons, have abandoned their Bill, with the assurance from the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department, "You must take this Bill, or something similar, or you can't get any at all." The noble Lord made a solemn appeal to us, on Friday, to stand by our recorded verdict, and to uphold our own solemn decision. We owe it to ourselves, that in some shape or other, we should give a pledge to the country, that the Amendment which has been carried, will be introduced on a future occasion. I say, we owe it to the dignity of the House, and to the people, that we should put on record some such sentiment. The right hon. Secretary for the Home Department dwelt, on Monday night, on the three courses which Ministers had to pursue. I think it might have suggested itself to him, and if it did not, I beg leave to remind him now, that there was a fourth course they might have taken, and that was, that instead of withdrawing the Bill, they might have withdrawn themselves. So far from such a step being at all impracticable, or causing any regret, nothing would have given greater satisfaction to the country. Instead of that, we are told, the Cabinet have solemnly deliberated and determined on this course, to reverse a solemn decision arrived at three times. The right hon. Gentleman tells us, moreover, that he can hold out no hope of introducing anything short of twelve hours; and yet this House, calling itself a reformed House of Commons, and a deliberative Assembly, suffers the Bill to be withdrawn, and does not place on record any opinion as to the conduct of the Government, and gives no pledge as to their future course. We are to take this Bill, or something like it, or none at all. The right hon. Gentleman reminds me of a captain of a merchantman, who freighted his ship to the West Indies with dry stones and cheese. When the ship arrived the cheese was in great request, but there was no demand for the dry stones. Finding this, the captain said, "If you take my cheese, you must also take my dry stones. I will not part with the one without the other." So the right hon. Gentleman comes with his Factory Regulation Bill in one hand, and his twelve hour dry stones in the other; and he says, if you don't please to take the latter, you shall have neither one nor the other. I think the right hon. Gentleman bids fair, like the West Indian captain, to have the whole freight left on his hands; for, I trust, the House will never allow him to pass a Bill with the twelve hours Clause in it. We, who support the Amendment, are accused, I will not say of improper motives, but here and elsewhere charges are brought against us which are wholly unjustifiable. The right hon. Gentleman found fault the other evening with the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard, because he said, in our new social state, a new system had been pursued. Why, can any one doubt that we have arrived at a new social state, particularly in the manufacturing districts? Look at the appalling distress and discontent that exist: look at the state of our working population, whether agricultural or manufacturing, and look at the increase of crime. Our population, we know, has increased within the last ten years 12 or 13 per cent. And what is the increase of crime? 15 to 18 per cent. annually. Read the charge of Justice Creswell, at the last summer assizes at York. He says, that in Yorkshire and Lancashire, crime has increased twofold within the last seven years. Read Sir A. Henniker's address in Suffolk. Does he not say the labouring population is in a state of discontent, and that it behoves the country gentlemen to remove their grievances? Well, then, is it not true that a change has taken place in our social system, that requires the vigilant care of this House? We are told by certain political economists, on our side, that our attempt to regulate the hours of labour is absurd, and that the grand panacea for all our evils is the repeal of the Corn Laws. Now, I believe, if the Corn Laws were repealed to-morrow, the due limitation of the hours of labour would be more than ever necessary. I have seen with much regret the course taken by the Gentlemen of the Anti-Corn Law League on this subject. I am sorry they have not shown that they, the master manufacturers, are prepared to make sacrifices for the benefit of the people. If they had done so, I think they would have been in a better position to appeal to the landed interest, and call on them to make a sacrifice too by the repeal of the Corn Laws. It is quite clear that the working classes cannot, by possibility, submit to further sacrifices; and that sacrifices must be made by those who are better able to bear them. The whole question now turns on this—is the House prepared, when a new Bill is introduced, to stultify itself, and to become a laughing stock in the eyes of the country? I, for one, do not intend to be dragged through the mire with the noble Lord, or with any right hon. or hon. Gentleman. I shall feel it my duty to place on record my opinion. I have been requested by large bodies of the working classes to state their views; and I shall conclude almost in the words of the solemn appeal made to us the other night, to stand by your solemn and recorded verdict, and not to allow yourselves to be dictated to by Her Majesty's Ministers, or sacrifice your consistency, because the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) may find it inconvenient to oppose the rescinding of the Order of the Day. Neither do I wish to oppose that Motion; but I take this course on the express understanding that the views of the majority of this House shall be sanctioned in any new Bill that is introduced.

Lord Ashley: Not having had the advantage of hearing the first part of the speech of the hon. Member for Bridport, I must be content to rest under any imputations thrown out in the course of it; but he appears to have confounded my views (and to this I do not object, quite the reverse) with those of my noble Friend the Member for Sunderland; so that much of what he has said against me should have been directed against my noble Friend, and much charged upon my noble Friend I have to answer for. But one of his allegations was distinct enough, and that was that I admitted that a ten hours Bill would cause a reduction of wages. Now, what I did say was, "Suppose, for the sake of argument, my proposal would lead to a reduction of wages, the operatives are perfectly ready to meet that reduction," and I stated to the House what were the arrangements by which they could meet the reduction in their wages. Let me now explain to the House in a very few words the grounds of the course I have taken with reference to the present Motion. I began by doing that which it appears the hon. Member for Bridport had not done—I took the advice of those capable of giving it. When the right hon. Gentleman made his statement I confess I was taken by surprise, and so was the House. The House required a certain time to deliberate before it came to a decision. During that interval I consulted many who voted with me, not quite confined to this side, and supposed to have a sympathy with the Government, but a great many on the other side, who gave me that advice which they thought best for the promotion of the question we all had at heart, totally irrespective of consequences to any party. Just see what would have been the result if I had taken any other course than that I chose. It is quite true that by the vote on the second Clause we had obtained virtually a ten hours Bill, but on the eighth there was an actual decision that the House would have no such thing. The Bill then presented, as the right hon. Gentleman said, a mass of contradictions. It was quite impossible to proceed, and the Government suggested, by way of extricating themselves from the difficulties by which they were surrounded, that they should be allowed to withdraw their Bill on the promise (a very important matter), that another should be substituted for it. My own impression was, that I should yield to that suggestion; but I was confirmed in that view by men of the greatest experience at both sides. Now, observe the effect of my saying "you shall not withdraw your Bill, but you shall try the effect of another debate and division." In the first place I should be compelled to do that which, during eleven years, I have ever avoided—to take a debate and a division on mere technicalities and points of order. I invariably pursued the course—and up to the present time it has prospered—of never taking a debate except on great and intelligible issues. If I put the question on an issue which could lead to no satisfactory result, in any case success was absolutely impossible. I will venture to say, instead of having a majority only of seven against me, as I had on the ten hours Amendment, I should have had 70 or 80, or 100. What position would the question have then been in? Would it not have been taken, if not by the country, most assuredly by the great body of the operatives whom I represented, as a decided expression on the part of this House of hostility to the great object which they so long and so anxiously sought? That was the reason why I took the step I did; but when I was confirmed in that view by men of the greatest experience, and, as I said before, by men not having any sort of sympathy for those at this side, I felt the course I determined upon to be by far the best with reference to this very question. Do not let it be said—for something like it has been insinuated—that I endeavoured to reconcile the interests of those whom I represented with the continuance in office of my political friends. I am not in the habit spargere voces in vulgum ambiguas; and, as I said before I say again, the course I have determined on I shall pursue, irrespective of consequences to any Government that exists, or that can possibly be formed. The hon. Gentleman says, I compelled him to come down, and then I cannot tell him what course I mean to pursue. Why, I announced on Wednesday how I should act, and the hon. Gentleman, therefore, cannot complain of being taken by surprise. But not only he says have I taken him by surprise, but that I asked to be allowed time until after Easter to make up my mind. I said no such thing. If the new Bill were now before us, I should give a positive declaration as to the course I meant to take; but surely I cannot be expected to state that until I see the new Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. If I see the Bill on Monday morning, I shall, if the House wish it, declare what course I shall pursue immediately after the recess. I am very unwilling to discuss comments on my own conduct. I do not know what may be the result of Gentlemen rising to attack me in all directions; but this I will say, I believe I have maintained my tranquillity up to this time; and I can assure the House that tranquillity was not external, but internal, for I have not felt in the least degree angry or exasperated in consequence of the remarks of any one opposed to me; and really if I had, I should have been most unreasonable and ungrateful, for I am sure of this, no one ever received from all sides of the House so many marks of constant and unmerited kindness and courtesy. But allow me to say again, whatever may be the insinuations against me for having used the phrase, I solemnly adjure you to stand by your recorded decision, and I declare, for myself, no earthly consideration shall turn me from the course I have endeavoured to pursue; and, so far as I am concerned, I care not what personal consequences may fall on my own head.

Mr. B. Cochrane: The noble Lord's absence from the House during my remarks does not warrant him in misrepresenting me. I did not charge against the noble Lord that there was an understanding between him and the Government. I said I thought the noble Lord perfectly sincere. I repeated it again and again. I hope, therefore, the noble Lord will prove that frankness which characterises him, and of which he boasted to-night, by withdrawing an expression which was not warranted by anything I said. I am not in the habit of dealing in "insinuation." If I thought him guilty of any connivance with Government I should not make the charge without good grounds, and I should then make it openly and above board. What I did say was, I believed him to be perfectly sincere, though he had, in my opinion, committed an error of judgment.

Lord Ashley: I can assure the hon. Gentleman I have no hesitation in withdrawing any expression of which he complains. So far as I gathered from report, I was under the impression that the hon. Gentleman said I was unwilling to press my Amendment, lest I should disturb the Ministers in their places. As he disclaims having said that, I withdraw everything that could have given him the least offence.

Viscount Howick: As I expressed a very strong opinion on the withdrawal of this Bill, I wish to say a few words, particularly as my noble Friend (Lord Ashley) truly said, that I assented to the course which he meant to take. The simple reason on which I agreed to the proposal of my noble Friend was this—that two evenings ago he informed me he had ascertained what was the feeling of his supporters, and he found if he resisted the withdrawal of this Bill, he should lose so large a proportion of his supporters, that he must be left in a small minority. I said to him, if that was so, I was quite ready to waive my opinion. I still think, that for those who entertain our opinions, the right and judicious course would be to resist the withdrawal of the Bill; but if those who concur in our views object to such a course, then it is quite clear it would prejudice our case to have it announced that it was supported but by a small minority, and that I am persuaded my noble Friend was bound, as is every man having charge of a great subject, to defer in a certain degree to the opinions of his supporters. I further said to my noble Friend—from whom I never for a moment thought of taking the lead on this subject—that if he found that the feeling was against a division on the withdrawal of the Bill, I would not be the person to divide the ranks of those in favour of a further restriction of the hours of labour by persevering in the course which, according to my judgment, was the best. But I still say, that under the very extraordinary circumstances under which we were placed by the course taken by the Government—a course anything but respectful to this House and to the majority who voted on a former evening—it would have been better if all acted together to resist the withdrawal of this Bill. Because, what is it we are now called on to do?

Her Majesty's Government have described their course to be this—they are about to obtain the consent of the House to discharge the Order of the Day for going into Committee on this Bill, and, having done so, they mean to introduce a new Bill, which will, it is true, have a different title—which will be called a Bill for Amending the Existing Law as to Factory Labour, instead of a Bill to Repeal the Existing Law, and to Regulate the Labour of Young persons and Women in Factories, but which, in substance and effect, will be precisely the same. Like that Bill, it will for the first time introduce a system of relays in the employment of children; it will have new regulations as to education; it will impose restrictions on the labour of grown-up women, and like that Bill, and unlike the determination of the House, it will make that restriction twelve hours, and not eleven or ten. I presume that so introduced it will, as a matter of course, be read a first and second time. In the Committee my noble Friend will move precisely the same Amendment he did before; therefore the effect of the course of the Government will be, that without any division, and with the tacit consent of the parties to the Amendment, our former decision will be reversed. If the Government had determined to do this on the bringing up the Report, or on moving the recommitment of the Bill, we should be in the advantageous position of having already made alterations in the measure, in accordance with our views; but instead of that, they take the indirect and unusual course of virtually defeating the decision of the majority, and placing us after all our debates and our four divisions, exactly where we began. Now, I must say, that this is a most extraordinary course. If the Government were of opinion that they could induce the House to reconsider their judgment, the proper and straightforward proposal would be to move the recommitment of the Bill, in order to go back to the first Clause and consider each Clause ab initio. But in order to gain some temporary advantage, to gain, what they have certainly succeeded in gaining, the advantage of throwing the ranks of the supporters of the Amendment into confusion, and inducing them to surrender, before they were aware of it, an advantageous position, they have brought things to that pass, that we shall find ourselves in the position in which we were before the discussions and divisions began. I cannot help, then, expressing my regret, that those who supported my noble Friend did not go along with him in resisting the discharge of the Order of the Day. Suppose that the Amendment of my noble Friend be carried, on coming to the Clause to which it refers in the new Bill, that Measure must be persevered in contrary to the wishes of the Government, or, with a majority in favour of our views, we must acknowledge ourselves defeated, and allow the Government to pass the Measure in any shape they think proper. As to the inconsistency of the two Amendments moved in the present Bill, I think that of no consequence. It is perfectly true there is a technical inconsistency between the first Clause and that amended by my noble Friend; but if either of the propositions to which the House agreed had been settled definitively, the difficulty would have vanished. I understand the meaning of the two decisions to which the House came, to be this—that they desired a compromise. Having rejected the proposal of twelve hours and that of ten, it was clear the majority was in favour of an eleven hours Bill. Now, I think it would have been far better if Government had acceded to that view. Surely they must have a low opinion, indeed, of the energy and enterprise of our manufacturing population, if they supposed that the diminution of an hour in the labour of women and young persons rendered the continuance of our manufacturing superiority impossible. I, for one, do not for one moment entertain such an apprehension. Practically, the workmen and masters would then have found the effect of the reduction of time, and we should have seen whether there would have been a reduction of wages. In my opinion there would. A less reduction, I doubt not, than there would have been according to the view stated by the Secretary for the Home Department; but still a reduction of wages. The hon. Member for Bridport made a remarkable speech, going over all the old clap-traps of the opponents of the Clause of which he is nominally a supporter, and said he could not at all understand how any one could vote for the Clause with the belief that it would effect a reduction of wages. Now, I think it is quite possible, on the grounds my noble Friend has stated, to support the Clause in that belief. No doubt, a reduction of wages is, in itself, an evil; but this is a question of two evils; which is the least—a reduction of wages, to no very great extent as I believe, or a system of labour which, we are informed, on the best authority, breaks down the health and strength of those subjected to it? [No, No.] I can only say, that it is the opinion of those best qualified to judge. Of course, I can give no opinion of my own; but I am adducing that of the Inspectors of Factories, whose judgment Her Majesty's Ministers have followed in great part of this Bill; and it is grounded on facts they quote on the authority of medical officers. I am not speaking of men; but for women and children I believe that twelve hours' labour in a day is too much. All I wish to do at present is simply to explain the grounds on which, though I still adhere to the opinion I expressed on a former evening, that the right course for the advocates of a greater reduction of the hours of labour, than that recommended by Her Majesty's Government was, to resist the withdrawal of the Bill, I have thought it my duty, wishing to do as much as I could in support of the Clause, to waive my own individual opinion, and yield to the judgment of my noble Friend and those with whom he is acting. I can only say, that having made this selection, it is impossible for me to vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury. I shall await, during the progress of the Bill, after it has been brought in, a further opportunity of discussing the principle on which the Amendment of my noble Friend is founded.

Sir R. Inglis said, the only fault he could find with the speech of his noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire, was one of omission—that he had not stated with sufficient distinctness, although doubtless it had appeared by implication, what line he meant to take in respect to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury. But he had every reason to believe and to know that his noble Friend intended to give a decided negative to that proposition—a course which he, individually, certainly meant to follow. He wished he could have followed in another matter the example of his noble friend; he wished he could have said, as his noble Friend had said, and as the whole House admitted he was justified in saying, that he had never introduced into that discussion anything like excitement of temper. He regretted that he could not say this, but there were certainly difficulties in dealing with these subjects which, though not of a party character, were, nevertheless, exciting; and, indeed, involved feelings of a higher kind;

still this did not justify such excitement when it led to any breach of Christian charity. He knew his noble friend could say, and the House admitted the correctness of the appeal, that in the discussion of subjects of this high moral character he had never permitted himself any feeling or expression of this kind. He trusted the example set by the noble Lord would be followed; and in the negative he now desired to give to the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury, he was not actuated by any principle of party warfare. He believed he only expressed the feelings of all parties when he declared his regret that such an apple of discord had been thrown in among them by the hon. Member. It might not be inconsistent on the part of the hon. Member, but it was inconsistent with the understanding which his noble Friend expressed two or three evenings ago, that Government should be permitted to withdraw the Bill of which they had charge, while his noble Friend should reserve to himself the unfettered right of exercising his own judgment in respect to the Bill that was to be brought in. When it came before the House it would be competent for any Gentleman to interpose any Amendment that would best carry out the noble principle which they wished to see adopted; but his noble Friend would also be prepared to bring forward his views in that substantive form which the rules of the House might render most available for his success. He believed his noble Friend could not have dealt with the Bill if it had been left in his hands by Government; he would have been defeated on every stage, by delay, if by nothing else; and, therefore, his noble Friend had exercised a sound discretion in the course he had adopted. One word as to an hon. Member who was not present; the hon. Member for Bridport did not insinuate anything against his noble Friend, but he did state this—that, admitting the sincerity of Her Majesty's ministers, they had acted on their views with consistency; and that while no one could doubt the sincerity of his noble Friend (and he was sure no one who had observed his noble Friend, whether in or out of the House, could doubt it), he, at least, had, not carried out his principles with such sternness as Her Majesty's Ministers. This, to his apprehension, was the effect of that statement. He said this because his noble Friend was not in the House at the time, and might have received an erroneous impression.

Mr. Acland rose with feelings of great embarrassment to endeavour to express the view he took on this question. He was one of those who, feeling a very great responsibility which attached, not merely to those in office, but to every individual Member of Parliament, had made up his mind in the course of the debate, and had voted with his noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire. He did so, not from a feeling that a question like this was to be dealt with by looking exclusively to humane or commercial considerations, for he believed that the question was essentially composed of considerations of both kinds; but he hoped he should not be supposed to say anything at all offensive if he did say what was the fact, that he was much inclined to vote as he had done by some of the speeches which fell from that (the Ministerial) side of the House, against the noble Lord. He did think that, in the earlier speeches delivered on this question, there was a too rigid and exclusive application of abstract principles of political economy. He did not mean, in that House, to use any common-place taunts against political economy; but there were two ways of dealing with the question, and it appeared to him that abstract principles were too strongly urged, and that the practical effect of those arguments was to go against a Factory Bill altogether. It was under the influence of that feeling that he had given his vote for a ten hours Clause. He had been greatly disappointed, (the judgment of the House having been expressed for a compromise, by a decision for something less than twelve hours, and yet, by the refusal to take the whole responsibility of the ten hours system,) that some middle point in this question had not been found. When he read the contemptuous statements directed against those Members who had voted against twelve hours in one division, and against ten in the other, he confessed he could not see what common sense there was in such arguments. After the statements of the hon. Member for Leeds, as well as of Members on the other side of the House, that it was a common practice with millowners to work only for eleven hours, and that this was really the best course that could be adopted, it was surely open to them to embrace that practical amendment, by which they would have obtained an eleven hours Bill. He had endeavoured to form an honest and sincere opinion on this question; the noble Lord, arguing in a different sense, had, far better than he could, also expressed his feelings as to the situation in which the House was placed. He could only say, if the House was prepared to see some one in the Home-office who would execute as well as carry a ten hours Bill, it might be well to stand out for that Bill; those who thought so, would act on their conviction, and take a course which might be attended with that effect; but he confessed he was not prepared for this, he was not one of those who thought it would be on the whole best to take that course. But those who were not prepared to take that course were not acting wisely or for the honour of the House in determining to adhere to the ten hours clause, without intending to carry it, like those who stepped up to the breach, and then shrunk from mounting the walls. He thought it better to pause in time. Independent Members on both sides had come forward and taken a very great responsibility, they had expressed an independent and honest opinion; having done so, if they meant only to protest, they had done enough—if they wished for a change of Government, let them carry out their opinions. He meant to protest in favour of the principle of protection for labour, and that principle he hoped to see carried out eventually. He did not mean, however, to insist on a ten hours Bill during the present Session; it appeared to him impossible; or, if possible, he was not prepared to say it would be worth so high a price. [Cheers.] Well, Gentlemen opposite might cheer; he knew such remarks on a change of Government were always laughed at. He must allude once more to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Lancashire (Lord Stanley); he was of opinion that those who voted as he did on the two first divisions ought to be most thankful to the noble Lord for placing the position of the question so clearly before them. It was not a question of principle; the principle of protection to labourers was admitted; but the question was, whether they were prepared at all risks to carry a ten hours' clause at present, or to accept as much protection as they could carry with the consent and concurrence of her Majesty's Government, and of a very large proportion, nay a very great majority, of the manufacturers interested in the question. He would rather accept this alternative. He preferred such a change as would be agreeable to the great body of the manufacturers: he thought it desirable, too, that those who carried a ten hours

Bill should also be those who were to work it. It appeared to him impossible that a ten hours' clause should be carried against the Government, and that they should be obliged afterwards to execute it. He hoped he had not now put himself forward in a position which some might think unseemly. With respect to the course of the Government, they did not yet know what the Bill about to be brought in was to be. He would only say, that the confidence he placed in the Government, on most occasions, would be much impaired if they were now to turn round and say they were prepared at once to carry a ten hours Bill. He retained the right of taking a perfectly free course as to the details of the clauses. The noble Lord's proposal would not give a ten hours clause in less than two years and a half. During that time he trusted the principle of protection to labour would be cleared from some of the asperities and difficulties by which it was surrounded; and the Government would find some reason to moderate somewhat the harsh principles they had applied to this question, and to yield to the increasing public opinion in favour of that mitigation of the horrors of the factory system advocated by the noble Lord.

Lord J. Russell: It appears to me, Sir, that the speech just delivered by the hon. Member has somewhat changed the position of this question as it affects the House. But, before I allude to anything which that hon. Gentleman said, I wish to make some remarks on the difficulties of the position in which the noble Lord who was the mover of the question, and the House, are placed. I cannot but think, I find it impossible to come to any other conclusion, that the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman now makes, coupled with the intimation as to the nature of the Bill he proposes to introduce, cannot fail to be a blow to the authority of this House. That course, no doubt, is the most convenient which the Government could adopt for itself; but with respect to this House, I fear its authority must suffer by their proceedings in this matter. What is the state in which it now stands? There have been no less than four divisions on this subject. I certainly had understood, from the statement of my noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire, that he had come to some understanding with the Government that the question with respect to ten hours or twelve hours should be taken, not on the eighth, but on the second Clause of the Bill, and that upon the Amendment he was then to propose, the question between those two different periods of labour was to be decided. The House decided on two separate divisions after two nights' debate, separated by the Saturday and Sunday, in a full House, with an opportunity for every person to attend who chose to be present at the discussion, in favour of the noble Lord's proposition. The right hon. Gentleman then declared that he would take—not accepting the decision come to by the House on the second Clause—a discussion and division upon the eighth Clause. On a subsequent night there were two divisions on the eighth Clause; in the first of these the House again put its negative on the period of twelve hours; in the second, on the period of ten. Therefore, the result of the deliberations of the House was, that there had been three divisions against the period of twelve hours, and one against that of ten hours. If the Bill had gone on, either in the hands of Government or in those of the noble Lord, it would have been necessary for the House to come to some decision, either avowedly reversing its former decisions in favour of ten hours, or adopting the middle course of eleven hours. But the right hon. Gentleman proposes that the House should now, by withdrawing the Bill, consent to frustrate altogether the three separate divisions by which the House decided that they would not consent to the time of twelve hours, and that the House should consent to the introduction of a Bill which should contain, as part of its provisions, twelve hours labour for those persons who, by the decision on the second Clause, were to be restricted to ten. Sir, it is impossible that that can be done, and done in this way, without a complete reversal of the decision of the House, shaking the opinion of the country generally as to its consistency. Why, then, was that course not pursued by the noble Lord? I think on grounds very sufficient, which, while they leave the mischief of injuring the authority of the House, must yet be paramount to him, as refers to the question itself, with respect to which, for so many years, he has shown so much perseverance. I cannot but think, with my noble Friend near me, and others, that if it had been made a question in this House whether Government should be permitted to withdraw the Bill they had themselves brought forward, there would then have been an opportunity for representing to their supporters, whether friendly to the noble Lord or not, that, in refusing to allow the Bill brought in by Government to be withdrawn, they were not behaving with that due regard, respect, and reverence which the Executive Government has a right to expect. The question then would have been changed, and that mischief which my noble Friend has always wished to avoid would have been incurred. Instead of arguing simply on the question to twelve hours or ten hours labour, it would have been confounded with the degree of confidence and support which the House wishes to give to the Government of the day; and my noble Friend would have had a defeat on the legislative question while, in fact, the question was rather one as to the grounds and the degree of support to be given to the Ministers of the Crown—there being also many of my Friends near me who take the same views as the Government on this subject. Therefore, I entirely concur with my noble Friend that there would have been a considerable majority against him on this question, and he would have prejudiced the cause of those whom he defends; and I differ entirely from the hon. Member for Finsbury as to the charge which the hon. Member brought against my noble Friend, of deserting those whose cause he has undertaken. I think, as respects that, my noble Friend has taken the wisest and most judicious course. At the same time, I did not attempt to influence the noble Lord's decision; and if he had come to the opposite determination, that it was wise to oppose the withdrawal of the Bill, I certainly should have appeared here to have given my vote with him against that withdrawal. I come now to a very different question, which is, the mode in which my noble Friend, suffering under the disadvantages he has to encounter, is to treat the Bill which it is proposed to bring in. The Government, as I have already said, getting rid of the whole of the decisions of the House by a course which, though convenient to them, is the least fair they could have chosen, it remains for the noble Lord to consider what course he is to take, so as to bring this question as simply, clearly, and fairly as possible to issue on the point on which he wishes it to be tried; and he will do it, I have no doubt, in such a way that it will be properly a question of legislation which it is competent for this House peculiarly to decide.

on its own merits. Because, let us recollect, after the doctrines we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman when in opposition—doctrines which it now appears in office they are following out consistently—Acts of Parliament are passed by the Queen's Majesty, not with the advice and consent of Her Majesty's confidential advisers of Her Majesty's Cabinet Council, but with the advice and consent of her Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled—so that what we have to consider with respect to any Bills brought forward, which are hereafter to be enacted into laws, is whether we can take on ourselves the responsibility of passing the law with these provisions—looking at it as it may, in its consequences, affect the great body of the people of this country. I do not think that any gentleman has a right to escape from that responsibility which belongs to him as a Member of Parliament, by saying "I think it very cruel, and a great hardship, that young persons of thirteen or fourteen years of age should be kept for twelve hours in a factory; but it is a question between their submitting to that labour, or bringing about a change of Government." Neither do I think that Government have a right to make it a question on which their influence as a Government is to be exerted to the utmost, nor that any one has a right to escape from his responsibility by saying, "I shut my eyes to the merits of the question; I will not look into them; but I have great confidence and trust in the Executive, and as they have declared they will not submit to this change, I will not vote for it." I must declare this, because I see that this question is undergoing a great change, from the manner in which it is placed before us. I certainly had understood at first that Government, having done what was properly their duty in this matter, by considering the subject with the best attention they could give it, and its bearings on the interests of those who were to be affected by it, had placed it before the House of Commons as a legislative body, to affirm or deny the propositions contained in that which was hereafter to be an Act of the Legislature. But it appears, according to the statement of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, that we are hereafter to have an entirely different question to consider, and that Government are disposed to say, "We think it will be so detrimental to our views, so injurious to our interests, if the opinion of the House is against ours, that all our influence is to be exerted in the question; and therefore we call on our supporters, and not as they are convinced by the merits of the question itself, nor as they are prompted by the statements we shall make to them, but as they wish the Government to be maintained, and no change to take place—to vote for twelve hours." I fear that such an opinion, and it is one which seems to prevail on the Benches opposite, will produce a change, and a very detrimental change, even in the constitution of the country. I do not think it will be for the advantage of the country, if a Government is to consider itself bound to carry every Measure in this House exactly in the shape they propose it. I have heard that doctrine stated, especially I believe, by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, and the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, when they were sitting on these (the Opposition) Benches. Perhaps then they were disposed to require more than could properly be assented to; I would much rather see them change their views on this subject, and disposed to take counsel of the House. If this House were to come to any vote which really shows any want of confidence in them as an Executive, they might then consider it as a proof that the House could no longer put trust in them. But with respect to these large questions of legislation, affecting the whole body of the people, of whose feelings many Members from the places they represent must be cognizant, I do hope that this House is to retain some of its legislative authority, and that the Members are not merely to vote as puppets, according to their party purposes or opinions.

Sir R. Peel: I quite admit the just distinction which the noble Lord has drawn between the functions and responsibility of an individual Member of the House of Commons, and those of a Member of the Executive Government. The noble Lord has justly said the Members of the Executive are responsible to the Sovereign for the advice they give; that they stand in a different relation to the Sovereign from that in which Members of the House of Commons stand; and that it is incumbent on Members of this House, acting in their capacity as legislators, well to weigh the merits of every question, and to consider whether or not they are ready to become responsible for the particular consequences of their legislation. With respect to the last, the noble Lord will admit that the Members of the Executive Government, although they stand in a certain relation towards the Sovereign, have the same privileges as other Members of Parliament, and are bound by the same obligations; and that it is necessary that they, in their legislative capacity, should consider whether they will become responsible for the consequences of any acts of legislation. If they doubt the policy of them, it is their duty and their privilege to consider those acts as Members, and give their advice to Parliament as to how they may affect the public interests. The noble Lord says, and says truly, that with respect to many great measures the sense of the Legislature ought to prevail; that if no great principle be involved, and very dangerous consequences are not expected to result, then Government ought not to declare to Parliament that they stake their existence as a Government on any particular measure, but are bound, on certain occasions, to pay proper deference to the expressed opinions of their supporters. The noble Lord, however, is not always willing to act on these principles, because when we have had to make concessions to the apparent weight of the majority, on matters not involving principle, or any very important consequence, the noble Lord, and some of his friends, have taunted us with yielding our own opinions, and adopting those of a majority. I take, for instance, the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. [Lord J. Russell: The majority was on the other side.] I beg pardon, the opinion of the House on that Bill was very decisively expressed; and we were told, there would be no hope whatever of proceeding into a Committee on the Bill. I quite agree with the noble Lord, it is not on every occasion that this menace is to be held out, and I am not aware, that in the course of the discussions on this measure, any unseemly menace was held out by Government. We have felt it to be our duty to deliberate, not to act hastily; we have felt that measures of great importance should not be carried by very small majorities, when an opportunity might be afforded, by delay, to consider the consequences. We thought the constitutional practice of this House was, to permit opportunities of frequent deliberation on legislative measures. The noble Lord is prepared to say, that one decision or two, carried by a small majority, ought to be conclusive. If that be so, let us at once reduce the number of stages through which a Bill must necessarily pass, which number has been expressly provided in order that when opinions appear much divided, or nearly balanced, opportunity may be given for re-considering the decision. There is nothing inconsistent with constitutional usage, or Parliamentary propriety, in taking the sense of the House again on the very same question which has been involved before. Why have we taken this course? On the first night, Gentlemen on the opposite side, as well as on this side of the House, who came to different conclusions from our own, expressly stated that it was a matter of great doubt. If I recollect right, the noble Lord, the Member for Sunderland, stated, that he had great difficulty in making up his mind: the noble Lord, the Member for London, himself admitted, that it was a matter of the greatest difficulty. We found that, with respect to this Measure, those responsible for its execution, and for the commercial interests of this country, had always contended against a further limitation of labour than twelve hours. When the Bill was introduced by our predecessors, that was the principle laid down. I say not a word against the noble Lord for the change of his opinions: such changes, when produced by subsequent consideration, a public man is not only entitled to, but called upon to avow. I concede, at once, that this change of opinion was the consequence of mature deliberation, and new light thrown upon the subject. But the noble Lord will admit to me, that if I found his Government, when responsible for the consequences, insisting upon the course we are inclined to take, though it entitles me to throw no reflection upon him, it at least offers an element in the decision of the Government, whether they shall give more time to consider. And do I not know how much pain the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the late President of the Board of Trade, and the right hon. Gentleman, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, men holding situations which gave them peculiar authority to speak upon this subject, must have felt when they were compelled to dissent from the noble Lord opposite—dissenting from him, but adhering to the opinions they had formerly expressed—dissenting, as I do now, reluctantly and with pain, from those with whom I have generally acted. And is not that again a justification of the present Government for entreating the House to pause, and calmly and deliberately to consider the consequence of the present course? It is said, why do you not admit a compromise? It is true there are many cases in which I think a compromise may be the natural solution of a difficulty. In ordinary cases, a Government would be justified in resorting to a compromise. But the policy of admitting a compromise must always depend upon circumstances, and upon the nature of the question. Having deliberately considered this subject for two years, we approached it with the strongest conviction upon our minds, that it was not advisable to propose, or to accede to, a further limitation of the hours of labour, excepting only in one case which we thought grew naturally out of past legislation upon the subject. We found upon the Statute Book an Act which imposed upon the labour of young persons a restriction to twelve hours—we found the existing state of the law to be this—that no person between the age of thirteen and eighteen, should be allowed to work more than twelve hours. The consequence is, that adult women perform the work of young persons; the result of that step in Legislation is, that you encourage the employment of women above the age of eighteen. Now, it might not be wise to interfere if there had not been legislation before; but as you have restricted the time of the labour of young persons to twelve hours, you injuriously affect the position of adult females, by giving an encouragement to the employment of them. Now, all we said was this: we will place adult females upon precisely the same footing upon which the Legislature has placed young persons. If we are wrong, the remedy appears to be, to omit the Clause in the Bill relating to this point. But the lesson to be taught by this is, the danger of further interference. The consequence which interference entails, is the necessity for further interference, for the purpose of redressing the inconveniences arising from the past legislation. The lesson, then, we ought to learn from interference is, rather to avoid than to sanction it. But it is by no means a legitimate argument to say, "You are yourselves interfering with labour, and therefore we will not admit of your new enactment, but require you to carry out your principle here." If you object to our Act, on the ground of it being a new interference, correct it by omitting the Clause; but it is no logical consequence to contend that interference ought therefore to be carried further. Still it might have been possible for the Government to propose a compromise. If we had proposed eleven hours, we should, I have no doubt, have had a majority; but unless we were convinced that that compromise was a wise one—unless we were convinced that that compromise was a practical and permanent adjustment of the question—I must contend that it was our duty, as responsible Ministers of the Crown, not to consent to relieve ourselves from present difficulties at the expense of causing 'permanent evils. Of this I am sure. No man can more deeply regret when circumstances place me in opposition to the wishes and opinions of Friends who give such constant and regular support to the Government; but there are occasions, as I before remarked, when if a Government does discharge the duty of responsible advisers of the Crown, they must set themselves in opposition to the wishes and feelings of their friends, and by apparent hostility give effect to their conscientious intentions. The way to secure lasting confidence and respect is to act upon principle. Three months hence the country and my hon. Friends themselves will hold us in higher confidence and estimation for being determined, so far as we can, to act upon our principles and not to yield to those of others. But why do we refuse the compromise of eleven hours? First, let me say, that I will not enter upon the merits of the question of eleven hours now. Subsequent deliberation and communications addressed to me from different parts of the country prove to me that the country was taken by surprise; and when we come to the discussion of the question itself, I shall be enabled to show that a further limitation of the time of labour than a limitation to twelve hours would be productive of most injurious consequences to the manufactures and commerce of this country; but, above all, it would be productive of most signal injury to the labourers of this country. I will not, as I have said, now prejudice the question, but I do believe it will be possible to clearly demonstrate this position at the proper time. As regards this question being one of principle or one of degree, the question is this—whether you will impose a further limitation practically to the hours of labour? It is not, in one sense, a question of principle. We are imposing no maximum or minimum of labour; we impose a maximum, but we leave it open to the parties concerned, by agreement among themselves, to work for a period as much less as they may think proper. It has been said, that in many great towns the operatives do practically work for only eleven hours a-day. When you say that, can you better show the merit, practically, of the principle we are adhering to than by showing that by voluntary agreement parties are actually working for a less time, although we propose to protect them from the imposition of a greater. But I will revert to the question—what was the objection to accepting eleven hours as a compromise? If a compromise was to be made, it would have been more satisfactory to the Government and more congenial to their feelings, to have acceded to the wishes of my noble Friend upon this point, than any man in this House. To say nothing of personal feelings of respect, my noble Friend has a right to be looked upon as a leader in this cause. My noble Friend knows very well that the disagreement between us is one of opinion, and that it was solely on account of his conscientious adherence to his own, that he is not now a Member of Her Majesty's Government. That fact only shows that Her Majesty's Government maturely considered this question two years ago, and nothing but the strongest conviction of its propriety and justice could induce them to forego the assistance of my noble Friend. Therefore, if a compromise was to have been made, I would rather have taken the proposal of my noble Friend for ten hours, because I know that eleven hours never could have been satisfactory to my noble Friend and those who think with him on this subject; not, indeed, because they have pledged themselves to ten hours, but because the argument went to show this, that if you adopted ten hours instead of twelve, there would be a possibility of making those domestic arrangements which have been dwelt upon in regard to the comfort of the home of the operative; that there would be a saving of time, and that the means would be afforded of preparing meals at home, which would compensate to the families for the reduction of wages. But that argument does not apply to the reduction of the time to eleven hours; and to have consented to that would, therefore, have been a concession of our own opinions, but without those countervailing advantages which my noble Friend has represented as resulting from the proposal he has submitted. Not, then, from a mere obstinate adhesion to our own opinions has it been that we have not entertained this compromise of eleven hours, but from the conviction that we should thereby weaken our position, and that without gaining those corresponding advantages which we might possibly obtain from consenting to the proposal for ten hours; so that we should not, by consenting to the eleven hours, give to the working-classes that which it has been represented would be regarded by them as a compensation for that reduction in wages which, if there be truth in the figures of arithmetic, or in the first principles of commercial calculation, must inevitably attend a reduction of the time of labouring. These, then, are the general principles for which we must contend. We have not adopted lately nor hastily the opinions we have avowed. I had hoped that the opportunities for deliberation which have occurred would have induced the House to take a different view of the case. However, Her Majesty's Government have felt that there is no alternative but to steadily persevere in their own opinions, and they strongly and confidently hope that, in the result, the calm and deliberate judgment of the House will be found to be with them.

Mr. C. Wood wished to say a few words, as the representative of a large manufacturing community, and as he had not had an opportunity of taking any part in the discussions which had already taken place upon the Factories' Bill. Though he could not conceal from himself that the position in which the question now stood, would tend to stimulate the agitation which existed, though it might disappoint the hopes, and alienate from the Legislature the confidence of the people, yet he comforted himself, and estimated these evils far more lightly than others, because he believed that a very small number of the working men themselves really wished for shortening the hours of labour, except under the belief—a belief which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Bridport—that the shortness of time would not reduce the amount of their wages. He wished, on this occasion, simply to state one fact. Representing, as he did, a large manufacturing town, the entire neighbourhood of which was studded with mills, and occupied by a large population which would be affected by this Bill, he had not, up to this hour, from any body or set of men, or from any individual in that neighbourhood, received a representation on the subject, or a request to vote in favour of the short-time Clause. Was it possible that this would have been the case, if there existed, as had been so frequently stated, a universal and general feeling in favour of that Measure. Placed in the difficulty in which the Government had been, he thought that they had adopted a prudent and proper course. Though some mischief might arise from the disappointment of the hopes which had been excited by the vote of the House, yet, he thought if these hopes had been realised, and that the time had been shortened to the extent advocated by the noble Lord, the Member for Dorsetshire, or even if eleven hours, which would not satisfy the country, had been adopted, a more serious blow would have been given to the commercial prosperity of the country, and a more serious injury would have been inflicted upon the prosperity and well-being of the labourers themselves. He thought it right to this extent to express his opinion on this occasion; not that he was presumptuous enough to suppose any weight would attach to his individual opinion, but believing it to be in perfect accordance with the feelings of the large constituency he represented. He hoped this opinion would have some weight, coming from thousands of labourers who would be affected for good or evil by legislation on this subject.

Viscount Palmerston was not about to enter upon the general subject, or even state the grounds upon which he had given his hearty support to his noble Friend; but he must say, if the right hon. Baronet imagined the country had been taken by surprise by the votes that had been given, the right hon. Gentleman must suppose that the country was more easily surprised than roused. Seeing that the question had been so frequently and repeatedly discussed, there was no ground upon which the country could feel surprise at the decision which had been arrived at. That Government had been surprised he could believe; but it arose from their not being sufficiently aware of the feelings of Gentlemen on their own side. It was perfectly true, as the right hon. Baronet had said, that if the Government were convinced that the proposal they had made was essential to the interests of the country, they were quite justified in not being satisfied with one or two divisions upon it. But it did appear to be an unusual course that they should not only take the sense of the House repeatedly upon the Bill before them, but that they should withdraw that Bill as they were about to do, and then by another Act to replace the House in the same position as when the Bill was first brought in. He agreed that his noble Friend, Lord Ashley, had no choice but to submit to that course, and he was not prepared to make an objection to that course. He was willing to submit to it with other Gentlemen; but at the same time, it was his intention, if his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury should press his Amendment to a division, to vote with him; because, although, he was willing, from inability to make a successful resistance, to acquiesce in the course the Government intended to pursue, he yet thought that it would be expedient that the House should, in consenting to the withdrawal of the Bill, state at the same time that they did not do so from any intention of abandoning the decision they had previously come to, so that it might be carried into effect in the progress of the Bill about to be brought in. He regretted that the Government, whatever might be the preference that they entertained for the period of twelve hours labour, should not, after such repeated expressions of the opinion of that House in favour of the period of ten hours, have been prepared to accept the compromise that might have been made of eleven hours. He could not deem the reasons against it which he had heard to be satisfactory, when he remarked that the Government was not standing upon a principle, but simply a question of degree. They themselves, as the right hon. Baronet had admitted, had extended the principle to a class of persons to which it had not before been applied. In reducing the hours of labour of families, therefore, the question whether the whole of that labour should be reduced to eleven instead of twelve hours, was a question of degree, and not of principle; and he thought the Government might have yielded to what appeared to be the sense of a majority of that House.

Mr. W. Williams requested the hon. Member for Finsbury to withdraw his Amendment. Although he agreed in the principle, he saw no good to result from a division.

Amendment negatived. Main question agreed to. Order for committing the Bill discharged. Bill withdrawn.

IMPORT DUTIES.] Upon the Motion that the Order of the Day for the House to go into a Committee of Supply be read,

Mr. Ewart said, it was with sincere reluctance that he rose to bring forward, on the question of going into a Committee of Supply, the important subject of which he had given notice; he, however, felt justified in doing so, because the matter had not received on a former occasion, that due attention which its importance ought to ensure from Her Majesty's Government. The House had now for some hours been occupied in discussing the hours of employment of the operatives of the country. He now proposed to bring under consideration the means of employment afforded to those operatives. The Motion which he was about to submit to the House embraced three divisions; first, the Import Duties imposed upon raw materials of manufactures; the second division has reference to the Duties upon articles of subsistence; and the last to the Duties on those articles in which the smuggling trade was concerned. In a manufacturing country like this nothing was more important than the supply of what was called "the raw material," in order that the machinery of the mills and factories should be kept employed, and the most important was the supply of the raw materials upon which the cotton and woollen trades of the country depended. The importation of the article of raw cotton was loaded with a duty of 2s. 11d. per cwt., a duty which was most oppressive to the manufacturers of this country. It had almost now become a trite axiom of political economy that the raw material ought not to be taxed, and that principle had been adopted by the right hon. Baronet opposite in his tariff, but only in reference to some petty articles such as drugs, dyes, and other similar articles, which were only subsidiary or ancillary to manufactures. The real way to have begun would have been to have taken off the duties on the raw materials of the cotton and woollen trade. If the right hon. Baronet had begun with the centre, instead of touching the circumference of trade, he would have effected one of the greatest possible benefits and improvements to the commerce and manufactures of this country. Every day there was an increased demand for manufactures, and every day the oppressiveness of the duty on raw cotton became more severely felt. Again, it was rendered more oppressive in consequence of the competition with foreign nations to which this country was exposed. France had done away with the duty on raw cotton, America had the raw material grown within herself, and the German Commercial Union had no duty whatever upon the raw material of the cotton manufactures. He begged to refer to the statements made by the President of the United States, and by the Secretary of the Treasury, in their late addresses to Congress on this subject. The President, in his message of December, 1843, said, "The German Zollverein will admit our cotton free of duty," and the Secretary of the Treasury stated, "the basis of a commercial convention had just been agreed upon with the Zollverein, which, if sanctioned, admits our cotton free of all duty." Therefore, as this immense confederation of Commercial Germany admitted cotton free, could this country long stand the competition, if she did not adopt a similar course? He felt justified in calling upon the House to follow an example so worthy of imitation. He was satisfied that if the duty were taken off, Liverpool would become the market or emporium of raw cotton for all the world. On a former occasion he had alluded to the Duties on sheep's wool; that duty formed the second section of his present Motion. At present an Import Duty of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. was levied on all sheep's wool which was of less value than 1s. per lb. and a duty of 1d. per lb. on all sheep's wool, the value of which exceeded 1s. per lb. Both these duties were, he maintained, extremely oppressive, and the more so because the latter wools, being derived from Germany, had to pay an export duty on leaving the Prussian dominions of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. This afforded an additional reason why the Import Duty on this country should be taken off. With respect to the duty on the cheaper wools, it was every day

becoming more and more inconvenient to commerce. Upon this article, like the last, France, America, and Germany, had no duties, and it was most unfair to the manufacturers of the country that they should be placed in competition with them with the impost of those Duties. It had, he believed, been understood as arranged when the export Duties had been taken off British wool, the Import Duties on foreign wool should be taken off too; and good faith, as well as good policy, required that this arrangement should be carried into effect. The next division of the subject of which he wished to treat was the policy of lowering the duties on tea, sugar, and coffee. The altered habits of the people of the country, whether arising from Temperance Societies, or whatever cause, called upon Parliament to adopt some steps which would give them these articles, almost of existence, at a lower rate. The duties of which he complained did not fall heavily on the wealthier classes; but, on the contrary, the poor were the chief sufferers. There was, however, one way in which the whole commercial interest would be great sufferers, and it was this:—the Chinese would not continue long to take our manufactures, if they were, in all time to come, obliged to pay for them in silver or gold. If we did not take their goods more freely in exchange, we could not long continue to preserve a commercial intercourse with them. He felt very strongly the evils of the existing system, and he was the more impelled to raise up his voice against it, seeing the extent to which it interfered with the comforts of the poorer classes; for they were the chief sufferers from the adulteration of tea, sugar, and coffee, and that fact the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew as well as he did. He knew that, in urging these considerations, he was addressing himself to an unwilling House; but, though hon. Members did not attend to those subjects, the people did, and they had a right to call upon their Representatives to alter the laws. The other evening, when addressing the House on this subject, he referred to articles the high duties on which had a tendency to encourage smuggling. He would ask hon. Members, did any man in the country think that the continuance of such duties could be favourable to the morality of the people? He brought these topics before the House actuated by none other than a conscientious feeling that it was his duty so to do; and if hon. Members opposite came down there to while away an hour in private conversation, they might do so if they pleased; he should treat their interruptions with the most entire indifference. He then proceeded to observe, that while England was slumbering, other nations were doing all in their power to reduce their Import Duties. The Report even of the Excise Commissioners showed that, however late, we ought to follow that example. It was well known that when Mr. Pitt was Minister he greatly increased the actual amount of the revenue by diminishing the Import Duties; for increased consumption more than made up the difference. With respect to silks, there could not be a doubt that the Duty on their Import ought to be reduced to 10 or 15 per cent., and if that had been the rate of duty for some time past, the late frauds in the Customs department would never have been committed. Had the duties been low, no temptation to commit fraud would have existed. The hon. Member then went on to notice the conversation which at this time was going forward at the other side of the House, and to say he did not know whether it was intended by that manifestation of indifference to insult a Member who had felt it to be his duty to bring a Motion like the present under the consideration of Parliament. [Lord Stanley: "Not in the least."] The manner of the noble Lord was considered by hon. Members near him to indicate a feeling of which it was thought he had a right to complain. [On the Motion of Mr. Hume the House was counted, but there being upwards of forty Members present, the hon. Member (Mr. Ewart) continued.]—He thought the most politic course would be to adopt a general scheme, not to reduce seriatim, not to make alterations one by one, but rather to adopt a comprehensive system whereby the gain on one article would be made to compensate for the loss upon another. In conclusion, he would tell the House that the object of his Motion was to extend employment for the people, to cheapen the articles which they consumed, and to remove the temptations to smuggling. He felt that in making this Motion he was not so much addressing the House as he was addressing the public, through the press; and, though Members opposite might interrupt him, yet he did hope that he should nevertheless be supported in a manner such as the occasion merited. The hon. Member concluded by moving as an Amendment, that—

“It is indispensable to the maintenance and extension of the trade of this country that those duties be repealed which press on the raw materials of manufacture, especially the raw materials of the woollen and cotton trade. That it is expedient also that those duties be greatly reduced which press on articles of interchange in return for our manufactures; especially such articles of interchange as, at the same time, concern the subsistence of the people; being (besides corn, which is the subject of superior and separate consideration) such articles as tea, sugar, coffee, bacon, butter, and cheese. That it is expedient that those duties also be greatly reduced which, by their amount, encourage smuggling; being at once injurious to the revenue and dangerous to the morality of the country; such as the duties on tobacco, silk goods, and foreign spirits. That whatever temporary deficiency of revenue be caused by such reduction, ought, until the revenue regain its former amount, to be sustained by the property, and not by the trade and labour of the country.”

Mr. Hume who seconded the Motion, complained that his hon. Friend, when he brought forward a Motion calculated to relieve that distress, was met with nothing but interruptions, and Members did not think it worth their while to attend in sufficient numbers to make what is called a House. Such was now the distressed and demoralized condition of the people, that the Legislature found it necessary to take charge of the children of the poor; for the English people had sunk into a condition so savage that they could not be intrusted with the care of their own offspring. Such were the effects produced by bad Legislation, and by the practical working of monopolies, class interests combined with other causes to extract nothing but evil from the proceedings of the House of Commons. It was most lamentable that the Government would not be prevailed upon to look into the origin of the present distress. What his hon. Friend had said of the prevalence of discontent, was perfectly true; but he need not resort to the authority of his hon. Friend, the Magistrates could bear witness to it, and the reeking corn-stacks throughout the country, were evidence of it. He found in a newspaper of that morning the following remarks:—

dianism in Suffolk, we have received accounts of some very alarming fires in this county (Suffolk). On Saturday night we witnessed an awful conflagration at Capel, which was visible from Ipswich; and in the previous evening a fire occurred at Hitcham. A fact which we have just learned in connexion with the last-mentioned fire, goes some way to explain the cause of these lamentable events, and fully sustains the views so well laid before the Grand Jury by the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions, in the Shire-hall, in this town, a few days ago. At this moment no less than forty labourers are without employment in the parish of Hitcham, where work is difficult to be obtained, and numbers are unable to procure it: wages generally tend downward; so that we find two powerful causes of discontent in operation among our rural population,—low wages and want of employment. It is idle to conceal the fact too, that these are greatly augmented by the severity of the Poor Law, which indeed is built on the theory that the labourers should be forced to obtain work, which work, it is improperly assumed, can be obtained by every honest and able-bodied man.”

It was true that that law was constructed on the idea that every labourer should provide himself with work, yet Legislation prevented him getting work, or getting food. Nevertheless his hon. Friend on that the second occasion on which he had brought forward the subject of diminishing the burthens which pressed upon industry, was not listened to by the House of Commons. The House had heard many tales of distress: were they aware how much of that distress arose from causes which his hon. Friend, by his propositions sought to remove? He must say, he felt it was disgraceful to a reformed House of Commons not to listen to the practical suggestions of his hon. Friend. In a few minutes the House would go into a Committee of Supply, where they would be called on to vote away hundreds of thousands of pounds, and on these occasions there were seldom present more than forty or fifty Members of that House, which ought to be the guardian of the public purse. That was discreditable to the House of Commons. He was sorry to say, that the electors did not seem to him to have the wisdom or the knowledge to prevent this kind of legislation. He must repeat, that in the present state of the country, he thought it was not creditable to the House not to have listened to his hon. Friend. The House of Commons, he fully believed, had the power of removing the evils with which the country was afflicted—the misery, the fires, and the destitution which was going on owing to a course of bad Legislation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the hon. Gentleman who seconded the motion, had indulged in an attack upon the House of Commons generally, rather than addressed himself to the subject before them. To that charge he as a Member of the House, felt that he was not justly subject, and he should not reply to it further than to say that if the hon. Gentleman who made this Motion had been interrupted in the course of his proceedings on this question, those interruptions had taken place rather from the opinion entertained by the House, and especially by those hon. Gentlemen who sat on the same side of it with the hon. Gentleman, that the mode the hon. Member had adopted with respect to the question, was rather calculated to bring forward his individual opinion than to secure the concurrence of a majority of the House. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) must recollect, that, if the hon. Gentleman had been interrupted, the interruption on two several occasions had proceeded from hon. Gentlemen on the hon. Member's own side of the House; for, on the former occasion the hon. Member for Cheltenham, and on this, the hon. Gentleman himself, had moved that the House be counted, so little did the hon. Member think it for the advantage of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ewart's) views that he should proceed in addressing the House. Now, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had great confidence in the judgment of the hon. Member for Montrose on such occasions; the hon. Member had had much experience. He thought that the hon. Member's judgment with respect to the Motion, was to be gathered far more from his Motion for putting a stop to the speech of his hon. Friend than from the philippic which he had since pronounced on the House, and with which he had occupied his speech, not being able to say any thing in favour of the Motion. He must repeat, that he thought the hon. Gentleman must have made this Motion rather with a view of expounding his own principles with respect to taxation than with any expectation of obtaining the concurrence of the House to his propositions, or producing any practical result; for, of course, no man on the one side of the House or the other, whether a Member of the Government or the Opposition, could doubt the general principles laid down by the hon. Gentleman — that all taxes were evils in themselves; that taxes on raw materials were disadvantageous to manufactures; that it was not desirable to tax raw materials; and that it was not desirable to impose taxes to a greater amount than could be readily collected. These principles every hon. Member would be prepared to admit; but there were nevertheless grave and serious objections to placing upon the Journals a proposition of this kind. What was the hon. Gentleman's first proposition? "That it is indispensable to the maintenance and extension of the trade of this country that those duties be repealed which press upon the raw materials of manufacture, especially the raw materials of the woollen and cotton trade." This was the general proposition of the hon. Gentleman; but had the hon. Gentleman, he wished to ask, considered how far the principle he there laid down tallied with the papers on the Table respecting the cotton and woollen trade? those papers showed this—that, notwithstanding the duties which related to those trades still subject as they were to that pressure as the hon. Gentleman described it, they were not so much affected by them as to afford any pretence for saying that it was indispensable that such duties should be removed. From the returns on the Table, it appeared that in 1842 there were imported 4,200,000 cwt. of cotton wool. In 1843 there were 5,200,000 cwt. imported; making an increase of 1,000,000 cwt. in one year, under the pressure of that duty, which the hon. Gentleman said it was indispensable for the maintenance and extension of the trade should be removed. Again, what was the value of the exports of cotton goods? In 1842 the value of the cotton exports was 21,740,000*l.*; in 1843, it was 23,440,000*l.*; being an increase of 1,700,000*l.* in the year. Therefore the records on the Table showed that as regarded the cotton trade at the present moment the taxes levied on the raw material, so far from impeding importation or shackling the extension of the trade, had not even checked the increase of it. With respect to the woollen trade, the imports at present were 4,000,000*lb.* weight of wool, and the value of the exported manufactured articles amounted to 1,600,000*l.* How then could the House with these facts before them, say that it was "indispensable to the maintenance and extension of these trades," that the duties on the raw materials should be repealed. To affirm such a proposition would involve the House in an absurdity which he did not think the hon. Gentleman contemplated, and which had infinitely better be avoided. But it would be an additional objection to affirming these propositions that they committed the House to an expression of opinions which would go forth to the country, and which the country would expect the House to act upon. The hon. Gentleman he thought, scarcely knew how far his plan went; his propositions would affect an amount of revenue very little short of 30,000,000*l.* sterling. Under these circumstances to affirm these propositions, would be neither more nor less than to throw the interests mentioned into the greatest confusion; they would be at a loss to know how to act; and the House and the country would lose all the advantages at present arising from a belief that public credit was in a flourishing condition. When he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said he did not mean to say one word at present on those taxes to which the hon. Gentleman referred, the House he hoped, would take notice that he also wished to state that the time would come when the Government would state what they thought it to be their duty to do on the subject, and if he were then to go into the question of which of these taxes ought to be repealed and which maintained, he should not be doing his duty to the country; but the hon. Gentleman, after having effected this large reduction of revenue by the changes he proposed, wished to make up the deficiency by a Property-tax. The hon. Gentleman, if he mistook not, had voted in opposition to the proposal of a Property Tax by his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Peel); but he was now become a convert, and like all converts, not content with effecting his views with all convenient speed, he proposed to repeal no less than 30,000,000*l.* of taxes. [Mr. Ewart: No; only to affect.] At any rate the hon. Gentleman's propositions would affect 30,000,000*l.* sterling of taxes, and the hon. Gentleman proposed to make up the deficiency, whatever it was, by a Property Tax. Now he thought he was consulting the feelings of both sides of the House in not going further into the subject. He was not opposed to any beneficial expression of general principles; but his objections to the hon. Gentleman's propositions were that it would be useless to send forth for the people to meditate upon these propositions, which, however good in themselves, must be impracticable, and tend to throw into confusion the trade of the country without answering any of those good ends, which he believed the hon. Gentleman sincerely aimed at. He therefore should support the original Motion.

Dr. Bowring said, that the right hon. Gentleman had confessed there was something not quite defensible in those duties on raw materials, and he thought, therefore, that something was obtained for that (the Opposition) side of the House. His hon. Friend and many hon. Members near him thought that, on a question of this importance it was not becoming that so few Members should be present, and the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) had moved the counting of the House, not in order to get rid of the Motion, as the hon. Gentleman had assumed, but to show the country how little the subject was being attended to at the moment he called upon the Speaker to count the House. He thought that this ought to be known to the country: it was a case of very frequent occurrence; and he thought it would be found from the divisions on such subjects that the great majority who voted had not heard the debates. If, instead of interfering between the Master and the Labourer, the House would show the same anxiety to remove the restrictions and duties which pressed upon industry, he thought they would do a much greater service to the popular interests. He knew of no grievance more intolerable than this of the duties which pressed upon labour. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that 30,000,000*l.* of taxes would be affected by the Motion of his hon. Friend. Was it not distressing to think that these taxes were levied on the working classes, a very small proportion being in fact borne by the opulent, the bulk falling on those who worked from the rising to the setting of the sun to enable them to maintain their families? He thought that his hon. Friend, and any hon. Member who reiterated the necessity of altering our fiscal legislation deserved well of the House and the country. His hon. Friend wished to reduce those duties which es-couraged smuggling. The fact was, the Government in their controversy with the smuggler, were again and again defeated. He did their work better for the people. But not only under the existing rules of taxation were the Government defeated, but an enormous mass of depravity and misery was created. For his part, he thought his hon. Friend had established every point he had brought forward; his arguments were irresistible. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted they were irresistible; and he must say, that considering the importance of the subject, and the moderate way in which his hon. Friend advocated his views, he thought it discreditable that he got so small and unwilling an audience.

Mr. F. T. Baring had voted a good many years ago for a Motion of his late noble Friend (Lord Sydenham) to a somewhat similar effect as this Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman, however, could hardly expect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would vote with him as the Motion now stood. In his (Mr. Baring's) opinion, the Motion did not go far enough. The hon. Gentleman had not taken the comprehensive view of the subject which had been taken by Lord Sydenham. If they were prepared, and thought it advisable under the present state of their finances, to change their system of taxation altogether, let them do so, and take off those taxes which pressed most on the productive industry of the country. They ought to look at other subjects besides those contained in the Resolution moved by the hon. Member. Look at their Excise Duties—duties which pressed heavily on the productive industry of the country. There was the Soap Tax, which was a tax on cleanliness and on the comforts of the people; there was the tax on paper, which used to be called a tax on the raw material of knowledge; there was the tax on glass, and other taxes connected with the Excise, which, if it were possible for them to take a general review of their taxation, ought not to be omitted from consideration. There was the tax on windows, and the tax on insurance,—as it used to be called, a tax upon prudence—all these taxes ought to be taken off if they were prepared to make a great alteration in their system of taxation. They ought not, like His hon. Friend, to confine themselves to some one branch of taxation. It had been stated that the taxes mentioned were taxes which fell on the poor. If his hon. Friend could find any tax which did not ultimately fall on the poor he should be very glad to know what it was. It was a remark of Mr. Cobbett's, that "if they wanted to get millions they must tax the millions." Let them lay on what tax they pleased, it must fall on the poor, if any man could find a tax which did not so fall on the poor, in his opinion he would have found the philosopher's stone in taxation. He had never read or heard of, or been able to put his finger on, any tax which would not affect the poor. When the hon. Member came forward to propose reductions in certain duties, and to impose others in their stead, he ought to state the loss that would be occasioned by the change, and the sum that would have to be raised to counterbalance that loss. The proposed reductions involved a question of about 30,000,000*l.* but his hon. Friend did not state to the House what loss his Resolutions might involve. Take the loss at half this amount. His hon. Friend calculated that the Government would be able to get rid of the coast-guard by these reductions; still, however, the duty on tobacco, if reduced to 1*s.*, would be a duty of 250 per cent. on the cost of the article; and could they suppose that, with this duty imposed, they could do without their Coast-guard? His hon. Friend's proposal would induce the necessity of imposing taxes to the amount of 16 or 17 per cent. on property; and did any hon. Member suppose that, capital would remain in this country and be taxed at the rate of 17 per cent? He was sorry, for these reasons, that he could not vote for the Resolutions.

Mr. Williams said, the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer had hardly thought it necessary to make any observations on the Motion, and had stated that his hon. Friend merely thought it necessary to bring it forward to exemplify his own opinion. Nothing but the greatest necessity could justify the imposition for one day of import duties on cotton and wool. The right hon. Gentleman had brought forward his statistics to show that there had been an increase in the trade in these articles. Happily for the right hon. Gentleman and for the country, a change for the better had taken place in the trade in these articles; otherwise what would have been the condition of the Exchequer and the state of the country? What had produced that change they perfectly well knew, namely, the excitement ever produced in commercial affairs by a vast increase in the paper circulation of the country. The right hon. Gentleman shook his head, but if he referred to the amount of the paper circulation of the Bank of England, he would find there had recently been an increase of 50 per cent. For the last eighteen months there had been little more in circulation than 22,000,000*l.*; but the last return which he had seen exceeded 33,000,000*l.* The increase in the importation of cotton advanced in precisely the same proportion as the increase in the circulation. When the question had been introduced last year by the hon. Member for Halifax, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the duties on cotton and wool ought not to be maintained except on the ground of absolute necessity. The finances of the country were placed now in a condition to afford the reduction of these taxes, and they ought not to be continued one day. If the right hon. Gentleman calculated on the continuance of the present activity in commerce he would be disappointed. The warehousing system, rendered necessary by the imposition of these duties, entailed a cost of 25 per cent. more than the ordinary warehousing, which, on the article of cotton, amounted to more than the amount of the duty itself. The duty on raw cotton was  $7\frac{1}{2}$  to 8 per cent. The dread of foreign competition, held forth in every form, had induced many votes to be given against the reduction of the hours of labour of factory children; and yet they continued the impolitic course of taxing the raw material imported for the purpose of manufacture—a course not pursued by any other country in the world. If they took off this tax they might safely entertain the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire for reducing the hours of labour in factories. The produce of the tax on raw cotton for the four years from 1839 to 1843, inclusive, was 541,000*l.*, on sheep's wool, 124,000*l.*, making a total of 665,000*l.* together. As a financial question, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no ground for refusing to entertain the proposition of the hon. Member for Dumfries. If great reductions were made in these duties the revenue would not suffer. Next to these taxes on the raw material for manufacture, his hon. Friend pointed out the tax upon tea. How did that tax operate on the great body of the people? The tea consumed by the Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury bench did not pay one-fourth so much tax as the tea consumed by the poor. Did they call that justice? The tax on tea sold at 1*l.* a pound was 2*s.* 2*d.*; on tea sold at 4*s.* and 5*s.* a pound the same duty was imposed. Was this justice? The next article pointed out was sugar. Just the same tax was paid upon the finest refined sugar that was paid upon the coarsest brown sugar. The next article was coffee; and on this article the same duty was paid on the coarsest as on the best, making a difference in favour of the richer classes of 100 to 150 per cent. The next article was tobacco. Hon. Members taxed their own cigars 125 per cent., and the poor man's tobacco 800 per cent. He hoped that some pressure out of doors would force the Government to do what was right.

Mr. P. Howard had always said, that they must make up their minds between the continuance of this tax and the maintenance of the Property Tax. If the hours of labour in factories were restricted it would be still more necessary to secure an unrestricted importation of the raw material. He trusted that the Government would take the repeal of this tax into consideration. He could not, upon the whole, however, say that in the present state of the House his hon. Friend would exercise a sound discretion in dividing upon his amendment, because he thought that at that moment the House would present no criterion of public opinion. At the same time, he thanked his hon. Friend for bringing forward this Motion, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, as soon as the finances of the country would permit, repeal this tax.

Main question agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE BRITISH MUSEUM.] House in Committee of Supply.

On the question that 37,987*l.* be granted for the British Museum,

Mr. Bernal called the attention of the right hon. Baronet to the case of Mr. José, who was intrusted with the management of the engraving and print department of the Museum, and had a salary of only 350*l.*

Sir R. Peel was well aware of the merits and qualifications of Mr. José, but recommended the House to leave the appropriation of the salaries to the Trustees of the Museum who fully understood the matter and were responsible for their proceedings.

Mr. Hume objected to the constitution of the Board of Trustees, and wished to know to whom they were responsible? He objected to the exclusion of the public from the different collections. He observed among the Votes, "salaries of officers of the ordinary establishment, 8,900*l.*; salaries of assistants, 3,500*l.*; and salaries and wages of attendants and servants, 5,400*l.*" He thought the Committee should have a detailed list of the salaries of individuals. He recommended that the British Museum should be thrown open to the public on Sunday, in order that the many tradespeople and others who could not visit it during the week might be able to avail themselves of the instruction which it afforded. He complained that facilities were not afforded to the thousands who visited the Museum, and deprecated the practice of requiring persons to sign their names in a book on entering, as causing unnecessary delay. Children were not excluded from Hampton Court or the National Gallery, and he saw no necessity for excluding them from the Museum. He did not think the Trustees would adopt these regulations if they were responsible to the public.

Sir R. Peel questioned whether the hon. Member's complaints were well-founded or reasonable. The Trustees were not responsible for the Estimates, but the Treasury was, and instituted the closest inquiry into each particular item, and into the merits of the several officers connected with the Museum. The Government did not wish to encumber the House with information, but to give it that which was really useful; if, however, the hon. Member desired to have more information respecting every officer in the Institution, he was most welcome to it. He gave the hon. Member credit for thinking that no public money was better expended than that which was voted for this Institution; but he would ask him, was there an Institution in Great Britain so accessible? [Mr. Hume: You may make it more so.] Make it more so, if you like, but that was at least a prima facie case in its favour; and the Returns of the number of visitors confirmed it. The number who visited the Museum in the year ending Christmas, 1840, was 247,000; and in 1843, 517,000. He really wished to give the public every possible opportunity of acquiring information: but there must be a limit as regarded age, for if children of too tender an age were admitted, incapable of deriving instruction themselves, they would greatly impede others in endeavouring to obtain it. There was a time when infant schools were admitted, and when 300 young children were at once ushered into the King's Library, but he could assure the hon. Member that the necessities which they relieved were not the necessities of acquiring knowledge. Respecting additional facilities and conveniences which the hon. Member recommended, he had only to observe that this subject had not escaped the attention of the Trustees, but of course the details could not be discussed in that House.

Mr. Protheroe hoped the right hon. Baronet still bore in mind an observation which he made in a former year, that he looked forward to the time when a noble palace of art would be erected in one of the parks of the metropolis. He did not agree with his hon. Friend respecting the admission of very young children to the Museum, for in Hampton Court, where they were admitted, they rather detracted from the pleasure of others, without benefiting themselves.

Mr. Bernal expressed his regret at the total want of anything like a national museum in this country. It was, perhaps, the only country that had not a museum of the history and arts of the Middle Ages. The British Museum abounded in Egyptian mummies and South Sea Island curiosities, but everything appertaining to the early history of Europe and England was wanting.

Sir R. Peel had to state with the greatest pleasure that only last week the Treasury had authorized the expenditure of 2,000*l.*; one-half in the purchase of the zoological collection of the Antarctic voyage, and the other in completing a botanical collection, after communicating with a gentleman whose unobtrusive merits were not sufficiently known—he meant Mr. Brown, who was the companion of Sir Joseph Banks, and whose exertions entitled him to the highest commendation.

Mr. Hume insisted on the necessity of additional public conveniences at the Museum. He also thought that the admission of young persons might be permitted under the care of their parents. He had heard no good reason assigned why the Museum should not be opened after morning service on Sundays. The right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel), himself, he believed visited the Museum on Sunday, and why should not the public as well?

Mr. Borthwick thought the hon. Member for Montrose somewhat unreasonable in complaining of the answers which he had received from the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government to the questions put in the former part of his speech. He thought those answers had been abundantly explicit and satisfactory. With reference to the latter observations of the hon. Member, those, namely, which referred to the opening of the British Museum on Sundays, he wished to observe that he agreed in principle with the hon. Gentleman, though he doubted whether the feelings of the people themselves were in unison with his upon the subject. If the public mind was not ripe for this change, however desirable in itself, more evil than good might possibly result from its adoption. There were buildings which ought to be open for the reception of the people, both on Sundays and on other days, which it was most painful to find shut against them, or open only upon payment of money. He referred to the cathedrals and other churches of the metropolis. St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey were on Sundays even less accessible than on week days—for, with the exception of the short hours of public worship, they could not on Sundays be entered even by payment of money. This ought to be reformed altogether. He believed if the Church had the control of its own affairs, these abuses would cease to exist. The hon. Member for Weymouth had very judiciously recommended the preservation of the monuments of the Middle Ages. Since modern habits and innovations had shut the cathedrals against the people, they had become the receptacles of monuments of no age at all. You might see sprawling over and defacing their graceful and splendid proportions, figures which might be worshipped without any breach of the commandment; for they were like nothing “that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.” And indeed, if hon.

Members were to read, as he had done, the legends appended to those things they would find, that the persons in whose memory they had been erected must have been as great monsters of virtue as these figures were of art. Those indecencies should not be allowed to desecrate walls so holy, and he hoped the day was approaching when those noble buildings would be appropriated to their right use.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY COMMISSARIAT.] Sir G. Clerk in proposing the vote for Commissariat Services observed, that there was a considerable apparent increase in the sum required this year; but it arose from a large sum that formerly appeared in the Army and Ordnance Estimates being transferred for the first time to this department. The Commissariat Department always supplied rations, forage, fuel, and light to the troops on foreign stations, and the funds for that purpose were partly voted under the Army, Ordnance, and Commissariat Estimates. But this led to great complication of accounts, and it was considered much better that the department having the charge of providing those articles should also have the funds voted under a general head. In consequence of this there would appear a vote in the present estimate of 270,000*l.* on account of rations, forage, and fuel, but there was an actual saving in the whole Estimate of 8,000*l.* Another item which now had been introduced into the Estimate was that of the profit upon bills, which heretofore had been otherwise accounted for. He moved a vote of 436,000*l.* for the Commissariat.

Mr. Hume saw that the accounts had been much simplified and improved by bringing into operation the principle which should be applied also to the general accounts of the country, not allowing each department to deduct from its receipts its own expences before remitting into the Exchequer, but bringing all the national resources primarily into one general receipt. He desired very much to have statements of the contract prices at which the different articles of provisions had been supplied, so that the prices paid in different parts of the country might be seen.

Dr. Bowring strongly urged the practical adoption of the principle respecting accounts recommended by a Committee of that House, with the concurrent sanction of the right hon. Members for Portsmouth and Dorchester—the principle of the Exchequer receiving, in the first place, the entire of our taxation, and allowing payments only on the authority of Parliament and the Executive.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed. Committee to sit again.

THE NEW FACTORIES BILL.] Sir J. Graham in rising to move for leave to bring in the New Factories Bill said,—The House will remember that in the earlier part of the evening the Bill which I had the honour of introducing at a former period of the Session was, by permission of the House, withdrawn; and I understand that the feeling was pretty general in the House that leave should be given to introduce another Bill. Something, however, which fell from the hon. Member for Finsbury led me to suppose there would be some opposition, but I trust that I shall be allowed to introduce it unopposed on the present occasion. At the same time, it is right that I should state to the House the precise nature of the Bill which I now ask for leave to bring in. The Bill which was withdrawn was a Bill repealing all former Acts with regard to employment in factories. The Bill which I now ask leave to introduce does not repeal any other former laws but introduces certain Amendments into the existing law. Speaking generally, the Amendments I seek to introduce are Amendments recommended by the Committee which sat in 1840. In fact only one Amendment which I ask to introduce is not included in that recommendation. First, with respect to the Amendments recommended by the Committee. I seek by the Bill which I now ask leave to introduce to provide that children shall not work in any factory employed in the manufacture of silk, flax, woollen, and cotton, longer than six hours and a half, between the age of eight and eleven in silk, and eight and thirteen in flax, woollen and cotton, and, that they shall in no case work both in the forenoon and afternoon of the same day. I propose also to introduce another provision. In some factories the labour is not extended beyond ten hours each day. Where that is the case, for the convenience of manufacturers, I would propose (although it is not included in the recommendations of the Committee) that children may work for ten hours in a day, provided they work on alternate days only. I propose also to introduce an important alteration in the existing law, with respect to certificates. As the law now stands, the surround the labourer with greater protection. When those restrictions were removed, the operatives might be safely left to go into the labour-market unfettered, for he believed that they would then, without any excessive amount of labour, be able to obtain an ample supply of the necessities of life. When, therefore, the noble Lord again moved his Amendment, he would give it his support.

Sir C. Napier hoped that, after Easter, they would find all hon. Gentlemen who had before taken part on this question against the Bill as sturdy as the hon. Member for Evesham, and that while they supported the ten hours Amendment, they would give their unqualified opposition to the twelve hours Bill. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham), in the course of his very persuasive speech to-night, turned round to an hon. Gentleman near him, and said he was satisfied that, three months hence, they would have a better opinion of him (Sir J. Graham) for having maintained his position than they would have entertained had he given way on this question. He thought they need not take three months to consider that. He would give them till the Easter holidays were over. He feared, however, that some hon. Gentlemen would go down home, and read over all the speeches that had been made on this subject—the right hon. Baronet's as well as others, and then they would return to town with a fixed determination to prevent the present Government from going out of office. The right hon. Baronet only had to say to his Friends, "Gentlemen, if I lose this Bill I shall not remain in office; take your choice of me or the hon. Gentlemen opposite," this would be effectual in bringing round all the right hon. Gentleman's wavering Friends.

Leave given.

Bill brought in and read a first time.

COUNTY COURTS.] Sir James Graham rose to ask for leave to bring in "A Bill for the more easy Recovery of Small Demands in the County Courts of England." The House was well aware, that among the most ancient Courts in the Realm, were the County Courts. There had been, however, one great defect in the constitution of that Court. By a Writ of Justicies, there was no limit placed to the extent to which a personal action could be brought. If a case was to be removed from that County Court to Westminster Hall, by a Writ of Justicies, it was provided that the party should give security for the costs. There was another defect. These County Courts retained all the old cumbrous machinery unchanged, whereas in the Superior Courts, the machinery had been remodelled, in conformity with the recommendations of the Committees of 1839, which were incorporated in all the local Acts establishing such Courts, which had passed since 1839. From the inquiry which he had made respecting the expense of working these new Courts, he thought that their general adoption would be followed by the most beneficial results. The Bill which he proposed to bring in, would enable Her Majesty in Council, to form districts throughout the country, and to bring this Act for the establishment of County Courts into operation in certain localities in which the establishment of such tribunals appeared to be required. The Bill would not interfere with any of those improved systems of jurisdiction which had been brought into operation since 1839. The Barristers and Judges appointed would be paid by salaries, and the Clerks also paid by salaries instead of fees, and were not to have compensation. He now came to the extent of the jurisdiction. By the Bill of 1837, the Court of Requests was limited to 10*l*. His proposition was, that these County Courts' jurisdiction should extend to the sum of 15*l*. As to the subject-matter of jurisdiction, it would refer to simple cases of contract debt—damages for a breach of the peace—for unlawful holding of property rendering the party liable to an action of trover. With regard to actions for the recovery of small debts, the summons must be issued seven days prior to the trial coming on. If the defendant should go out of the district the plaintiff would have the option of suing in the County Courts, or in one of the superior Courts of Law. The party, if he required it, might have the benefit of a Jury. The Grand Jury need not consist of a larger number than five persons. The Court would have the power of making an order for the payment of the debt by instalments. The party would have the power of taking out an execution against the body or goods of the person against whom a debt was proved. With regard to the power of removing the case to a superior Court, the party would have the power of doing so upon moving for a new trial, and giving proper securities for the costs. The jurisdiction with reference to the rights of ejectment, would be transferred from the two Magistrates to the Judge of the Court. This Bill introduced no new experiment. The Courts of Request had been found to work beneficially. It was Courts similar to those which it was proposed to extend. He felt confident, if the House gave its consent to the Bill which he was then proposing, it would effect a great improvement, and render cheap the administration of the law. It was his purpose to introduce this measure for the recovery of small debts gradually, according to the wants and demands of certain localities, without incurring any great increase of expense.

Mr. Hames hoped the large fees to which persons proceeded against for small debts had been subjected would be reduced. He hoped that those local Acts, which granted so many days to liquidate a debt would be taken into consideration, as he was quite sure it would not only effect a saving in the county-rates, but also put an end to the enormous misery so frequently suffered by families being broken up in consequence of the imprisonment of the head.

Mr. Shaw said, the right hon. Baronet, (Sir J. Graham) would obtain a good guide in legislating on the subject, by a reference to the practice of the Civil Bill Courts in Ireland. Of those Courts he had never heard a complaint, and he believed they worked well and satisfactorily in every part of that country.

Mr. Warburton hoped his right hon. Friend would persist in retaining the power of examining both parties in the suit. This was done in the Court of Bankruptcy, which dealt with property to any amount, and he did not see why it should not be permitted in the inferior Courts.

Mr. Cripps observed, that he did not think that practically any great danger was to be apprehended if there was no appeal at all. At the same time, it was a dangerous principle to say there should be no appeal. With regard to the examination of the parties themselves, according to the Law of Evidence Bill, parties were prevented being examined in great causes, and, therefore, it would be inconsistent to permit their examination in small suits.

Sir J. Graham remarked, that there were 120 Local Courts created by Act of Parliament in England; 40 of those 120 had been created since the year 1839, and with respect to those 40, the general limit of the debt to be recovered in them was 15*l.*; and he had taken this limitation which had been established in 1839, in the most important localities, comprising large and important cities, and towns, and containing dense populations. He must also further observe, that since 1839, and in conformity with the recommendation of the Select Committee to which reference had already been made, power was given to examine the parties to a suit in forty important local Acts, exactly as he proposed to examine them in suits of debt. From the adoption of that principle, in the instances he had stated, no bad effects had ensued. He proposed to give execution generally against the person. If to have credit was advantageous to the poor (of which he was not quite convinced,) he was very much afraid that unless there was a remedy against the person, credit would be stopped.

Bill brought in and read a first time.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Lord Redesdale, from Netherwitton, and from Norfolk and Whitburn, against the Repeal of the Corn Laws.—By the Bishop of Hereford, from Clun, and 8 other places, and by the Bishop of Bangor, from Cloacnag, against the Union of the Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—By the Earl of Malmesbury, from Wellington, New Zealand, for Protection to Settlers of Cook's Straits.—From Chichester, for the Suppression of Duelling.—From Debtors in Monmouth and Wilton Gaols, in favour of the Creditors and Debtors Bill.

NEW ZEALAND.] The Earl of Malmesbury presented a petition from 700 inhabitants of the town of Wellington and the neighbourhood of Cook's Straits, New Zealand, calling the attention of their Lordships to the unprotected state of that colony, and praying that some measures might be adopted for their safety. The petitioners also prayed for a settlement of the disputed land claims. He should state to their Lordships, that the question appeared to be mooted in consequence of the massacre which took place in the colony on the 17th of June, 1843, arising out of those disputed claims; and as very great apprehension existed amongst the colonists, as well as amongst their friends in this country upon the subject, he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government what steps they had already taken, or intended to take, in restoring the confidence of the settlers, by adding to the military force for the protection of the colony, and also what steps were in contemplation for the settlement of the land titles?

The Earl of Ripon replied, that the commanding officers of the military forces in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land had been directed to forward a force from those two colonies respectively to New Zealand, for the purposes to which the petitioners alluded; and that the force so sent was deemed sufficient for the protection of the colonists by the commanding officer in New Zealand itself. The apprehensions of the settlers, it might easily be conceived, went beyond the actual necessity of the case; but, under any circumstances, the arrangements which had been made would afford them the security they sought. At the same time, he must be allowed to remark, that it was impossible for the Government not to feel that the practice of removing troops in detachments from one colony to another, was liable to considerable inconvenience. Looking at the vast extent of our colonial possessions, there would be great inconvenience in the attempt to meet every case of this kind, unless a much greater military force was employed: and with regard to the detachment which had been sent to New Zealand, he could not say how long it might be possible to maintain it there. There were, however, means by which the colonists might provide for their own safety. The government of the colony was authorised to levy a militia, or a constabulary force, constructed upon the principles of the constabulary force in Ireland, for the protection of the colonists; and, seeing that there were 10,000 inhabitants in the colony, he should say there would be but little difficulty in providing, in the way he had stated, for their mutual protection. With regard to the other question which his noble Friend had put in reference to the titles of land, all he could say was, that Captain Fitzroy had been sent with instructions from the Secretary of State, for the purpose of bringing those matters to a satisfactory termination. No blame whatever attached to the Government upon this subject.

The Earl of Malmesbury said, he had been informed by persons well acquainted with the colony that a very small force would be sufficient; but what the colonists particularly wished was that a small armed steamer should be stationed at Cook's Straits, as the most effectual means of protection. He was the last man who would impute blame to Her Majesty's Government on the subject, and the settlers themselves, in their petition, were very far from blaming the Government; on the contrary, they stated that the dispatches of Lord Stanley had given them every hope of a speedy prosperity, but they felt compelled to add, that the local authorities did not act up to the spirit or the letter of that noble Lord's instructions and dispatches. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) would not on that occasion trouble their Lordships with the particulars of the complaints of the colonists against the local authorities; but they asserted generally that very great blame rested with the executive of the colony, but not with the Government here.

SUPPLEMENTAL TREATY WITH CHINA.]

The Earl of Aberdeen: My Lords, I beg to lay upon your Lordships' Table, by command of Her Majesty, a copy of a Supplemental Treaty made between Her Majesty and the Emperor of China. This Treaty contains the regulations of trade between England and that country. By it the northern ports of China are now open to British commerce; and, I am happy to say, with every prospect of complete success. It affords me, my Lords, much satisfaction to add, that general goodwill on the part of the population of that nation exists, and the best feeling on the part of Her Majesty's subjects. I trust that the precautions taken will prevent that good feeling from being diminished. I cannot allude to this subject without directing your Lordships' attention to the ability of the very distinguished man, Sir Henry Pottinger, by whom those negotiations have been effected, surrounded as he was by complicated difficulties—your Lordships cannot be aware how great they were—in a country so entirely new; but the great experience which he had previously gained elsewhere, enabled him, in spite of the complicated difficulties, which is not a little matter—to accomplish what he did. By the energy of his character, and the resources of his own mind, he surmounted them all.
